[14] Proverb, "to miss the cushion" (Tilley C928), meaning to miss the mark or make a mistake.

[15] nipped on the head overpowered or overcome.

lament your inconstancy than revenge it. But I hope that such hot love cannot be so soon cold,[1] neither such sure faith be rewarded with so sudden forgetfulness."

Lucilla, not ashamed to confess her folly, answered him with this frump:[2] "Sir, whether your deserts or my desire have wrought this change it will boot[3] you little to know. Neither do I crave amends, neither fear revenge. As for fervent love, you know there is no fire so hot but it is quenched with water, neither affection so strong but is weakened with reason. Let this suffice thee: that thou know I care not for thee."

"Indeed," said Euphues, "to know the cause of your alteration would boot me little, seeing the effect taketh such force. I have heard that women either love entirely or hate deadly,[4] and seeing you have put me out of doubt of the one, I must needs persuade myself of the other. This change will cause Philautus to laugh me to scorn, and double thy lightness in turning so often. Such was the hope that I conceived of thy constancy that I spared not in all places to blaze[5] thy loyalty, but now my rash conceit will prove me a liar and thee a light huswife."[6]

"Nay," said Lucilla, "now shalt thou not laugh Philautus to scorn, seeing you have both drunk of one cup.[7] In misery, Euphues, it is great comfort to have a companion.[8] I doubt not but that you will both conspire against me to work some mischief, although I nothing fear your malice. Whosoever accounteth you a liar for praising me may also deem you a lecher for being enamoured of me; and whosoever judgeth me light in forsaking of you may think thee as lewd in loving of me. For thou that thoughtest it lawful to deceive thy friend must take no scorn to be deceived of thy foe."

"Then I perceive, Lucilla," said he, "that I was made thy stale and Philautus thy laughingstock;[9] whose friendship, I must confess indeed, I have refused to obtain thy favour. And sithence[10] another hath won what we both have lost, I am content for my part; neither ought I to be grieved, seeing thou art fickle."

"Certes, Euphues," said Lucilla, "you spend your wind in waste, for your welcome is but small and your cheer is like to be less. Fancy giveth no reason of his change, neither will be controlled for any choice.[11] This is, therefore, to warn you that from henceforth you neither solicit this suit, neither offer any way your service. I have chosen one (I must needs confess) neither to be compared to Philautus in wealth, nor to thee in wit, neither in birth to the worst of you both. I think God gave it me for a just plague for renouncing Philautus and choosing thee. And sithence I am an example to all women of lightness, I am like also to be a mirror to them all of unhappiness. Which ill luck I must take by so much the more patiently, by how much the more I acknowledge myself to have deserved it worthily."

"Well, Lucilla," answered Euphues, "this case breedeth my sorrow the more in that it is so sudden, and by so much the more I lament it by how much the less I looked for it.[12] In that my welcome is so cold and my cheer so simple, it nothing toucheth me, seeing your fury is so hot and my misfortune so great, that I am neither willing to receive it nor you to bestow it. If tract of time or want of trial had caused this metamorphosis, my grief had been more tolerable, and your fleeting[13] more excusable. But coming in a moment, undeserved, unlooked for,

---

1 Proverb. See p. 475, note 14.

2 frump jeer, mocking speech.

3 boot avail, profit.

4 Proverb, "A woman either loves or hates to extremes" (Tilley W651).

5 blaze publicly proclaim.

6 huswife a worthless hussy.

7 Proverb, "To drink of the same cup" (Tilley C908).

8 Proverb, "It is good to have company in trouble (misery)" (Tilley C571). Cf. F295.

9 stale a lover whose devotion is turned into ridicule for the amusement of a rival or rivals; laughingstock butt of ridicule.

10 sithence seeing that.

11 Proverb, "Love is without reason" (Tilley L517). See p. 478, note 5; p. 481, note 15.

12 Proverb, "The sorrow that is sudden is the more sour" (Tilley, Eliz. Prov. no. 575).

13 fleeting fickleness, inconstancy.

unthought of, it increaseth my sorrow and thy shame."

"Euphues," quoth she, "you make a long harvest for a little corn,[1] and angle for the fish that is already caught.[2] Curio—yea, Curio—is he that hath my love at his pleasure, and shall also have my life at his commandment; and although you deem him unworthy to enjoy that which erst[3] you accounted no wight[4] worthy to embrace, yet seeing I esteem him more worth than any, he is to be reputed as chief. The wolf chooseth him for her mate that hath or doth endure most travail for her sake;[5] Venus was content to take the blacksmith with his poltfoot;[6] Cornelia here in Naples disdained not to love a rude miller. As for changing, did not Helen, that pearl of Greece, thy countrywoman, first take Menelaus, then Theseus, and last of all Paris? If brute beasts give us examples that those are most to be liked of whom we are best beloved, or if the princess of beauty, Venus, and her heirs, Helen and Cornelia, show that our affection standeth on our free will, then am I rather to be excused than accused. Therefore, good Euphues, be as merry as you may be,[7] for time may so turn that once again you may be."

"Nay, Lucilla," said he, "my harvest shall cease, seeing others have reaped my corn; as for angling for the fish that is already caught, that were but mere folly. But in my mind, if you be a fish you are either an eel which as soon as one hath hold on her tail will slip out of his hand,[8] or else a minnow which will be nibbling at every bait but never biting.[9] But what fish soever you be, you have made both me and Philautus to swallow a gudgeon.[10]

"If Curio be the person, I would neither wish thee a greater plague, nor him a deadlier poison. I, for my part, think him worthy of thee, and thou unworthy of him: for although he be in body deformed, in mind foolish, an innocent born, a beggar by misfortune, yet doth he deserve a better than thyself, whose corrupt manners have stained thy heavenly hue, whose light behaviour hath dimmed the lights of thy beauty, whose inconstant mind hath betrayed the innocency of so many a gentleman.

"And in that you bring in the example of a beast to confirm your folly, you show therein your beastly disposition, which is ready to follow such beastliness. But Venus played false. And what for that? Seeing her lightness serveth for an example, I would wish thou mightest try her punishment for a reward, that being openly taken in an iron net all the world might judge whether thou be fish or flesh.[11] And, certes, in my mind no angle[12] will hold thee; it must be a net. Cornelia loved a miller, and thou a miser. Can her folly excuse thy fault? Helen of Greece—my countrywoman born, but thine by profession—changed and rechanged at her pleasure, I grant. Shall the lewdness of others animate thee in thy lightness? Why then dost thou not haunt the stews[13] because Lais frequented them? Why dost thou not love a bull, seeing

---

[1] Proverb, "A long harvest of a little corn" (Tilley H184).

[2] Proverb, "He angles for the fish already caught" (Tilley F312).

[3] erst earlier.

[4] wight person, man.

[5] Proverb, "The she-wolf chooses always that wolf for her mate who is made most lean and foul by following her." According to Tilley, a rare proverb which appears only here in Euphues, in Lyly's play Love's Metamorphosis (3.1.45), in Pettie's Petite Palace (1.19) and in the Maxwell Younger Manuscript (Tilley, Eliz. Prov., no. 697).

[6] See p. 461, note 4; p. 483, note 11.

[7] Proverb, "He that cannot do as he would, must do as he may." A very popular proverb (Tilley, Eliz. Prov., no. 720; Tilley M769, 769a)

[8] Proverb, "as slippery as an eel" (Tilley E60). See also, "Who has a woman has an eel by the tail" (W640); see the related proverbs, E59, E61, and H508.

[9] The minnow's caution does not seem to be proverbial. Cf. the proverb, "That fish will soon be caught that nibbles at every hook (bait)" (Tilley F324).

[10] Proverb, "To swallow (gape for) a gudgeon," a very popular proverb meaning "to be imposed upon," or "to be fooled into believing anything" (Tilley G473). Lyly's use is the earliest one Tilley cites; gudgeon a small fresh-water fish used as bait.

[11] Proverb, "neither fish nor flesh nor good red herring" (Tilley F319), a very popular proverb, meaning that something or someone is neither one thing nor another; being openly taken in an iron net Vulcan, Venus' husband, threw a magic net over Venus and her lover Mars, the god of war, while they were in bed together. He then called all the gods together to witness their shame and to laugh at them.

[12] angle a fish-hook (cf. Coverdale, Ecclesiastes, 7:26: "a woman is bitterer than death: for she is a very angle, her heart is a net").

[13] stews brothel; Lais was the most famous of ancient courtesans, mistress of Alcibiades, and famous for her debauchery and her mockery of those philosophers who counselled the control of the passions (Classical Dict., p. 346).

Pasiphae loved one?[1] Why art thou not enamoured of thy father, knowing Myrrha was so incensed?[2] These are set down that we, viewing their incontinency, should fly the like impudency, not follow the like excess; neither can they excuse thee of any inconstancy.

"Merry I will be as I may.[3] But if I may hereafter as thou meanest, I will not. And therefore farewell Lucilla, the most inconstant that ever was nursed in Naples. Farewell Naples, the most cursed town in all Italy. And women all, farewell."

[...]

Ferardo, seeing his daughter to have neither regard of her own honour nor his request, conceived such an inward grief that in short space he died, leaving Lucilla the only heir of his lands and Curio to possess them. But what end came of her, seeing it is nothing incident to the history of Euphues, it were superfluous to insert it, and so incredible that all women would rather wonder at it than believe it. Which event being so strange, I had rather leave them in a muse[4] what it should be than in a maze in telling what it was.

Philautus, having intelligence of Euphues his success[5] and the falsehood of Lucilla, although he began to rejoice at the misery of his fellow, yet, seeing her fickleness, could not but lament her folly and pity his friend's misfortune, thinking that the lightness of Lucilla enticed Euphues to so great liking. Euphues and Philautus having conference between themselves, casting discourtesy in the teeth each of the other,[6] but chiefly noting disloyalty in the demeanour of Lucilla, after much talk renewed their old friendship, both abandoning Lucilla as most abominable. Philautus was earnest to have Euphues tarry in Naples, and Euphues desirous to have Philautus to Athens; but the one was so addicted to the court, the other so wedded to the university, that each refused the offer of the other. Yet this they agreed between themselves: that though their bodies were by distance of place severed, yet the conjunction of their minds should neither be separated by the length of time, nor alienated by change of soil.

"I, for my part," said Euphues, "to confirm this league give thee my hand and my heart."

And so likewise did Philautus. And so, shaking hands, they bid each other farewell.

—1578; 2nd revised edition, 1579

[1] Pasiphae, wife of King Minos of Crete, fell in love with a bull and contrived to have intercourse with it, giving birth later to the Minotaur, a creature half-man and half-bull.

[2] See p. 478, note 6.

[3] See p. 466, note 5.

[4] in a muse i.e., in a state of wonderment, bewilderment, or amazement. The romance later contains a letter, "Euphues to Philautus, touching the death of Lucilla," wherein we learn that Lucilla took to a courtesan-career at court, wasted her inheritance, and was finally reduced to a poverty-stricken death. However, she also died unrepentant.

[5] success i.e., the outcome (of Euphues' affair with Lucilla).

[6] I.e., each accused the other of discourtesy.

Barnabe Riche
1542-1617

The writer of numerous books and pamphlets ranging from satire to translation to novella and romance, Barnabe Riche has until recently been a much-neglected sixteenth-century figure, although among military historians his stock has always been high. The facts of his life have been the subject of much debate, but while his place of birth, his family, and his early years are essentially undocumented, his life in his chosen professions—soldier and writer—provides more material for the biographer. Probably born in Essex, Riche's own prefaces suggest that he had some formal education, but that this did not extend to university. He often describes himself as a "gentleman" in his various prefaces and dedications, and his original DNB biographer states that he was "distantly connected with the family of Lord-chancellor Rich" (p. 991). As a very young man he enlisted in the army and fought in Queen Mary's war with France (1557-58), although this war was only the first of many in which he would fight; by his own testimony, he was an active soldier for over forty years. After a privateering venture which ended badly, Riche found himself in debt, for which he was briefly imprisoned in 1570. Later, he served in Ireland, and spent some time in Dublin, and it was during a brief peace in 1574 that he began to write, initially military works, although at least one of these showed an interest in literary devices which he was to develop later.[1] His fictional works date from the late 1570s, beginning with The Strange and Wonderful Adventures of Don Simonides (1581), a romance influenced by the Italian novella. A 1584 sequel to Don Simonides satirized many of the conventions of romantic love and desire which he had employed in the original.

Just before being called to serve during the 1579 Fitzmaurice Rebellion in Ireland, Riche wrote what many consider his finest work, the collection of short narratives called Riche His Farewell to Military Profession (1581). Marrying in 1586, Riche found that his new bride's powerful family, the Eastons, did not assist his military or political advancement. Involved in the training of new recruits and in the suppression of the Essex Rebellion in 1601, Riche carried on with his military service even while continuing to write. He produced a series of four pamphlets on Ireland between 1609 and 1617, as well as numerous satirical works including The Honesty of This Age (1614) and My Lady's Looking Glass (1616). Spending much of his later years in Dublin, Riche was in contact with the government about the situation in Ireland, although his ill-considered insult directed at James VI in the conclusion of Riche His Farewell perhaps kept him from the royal patronage he sought throughout much of his life. His value to the Crown, however, was finally recognized in James's gift of £100, although it came just eighteen months before his death in 1617.[2]

Riche His Farewell to Military Profession (1581) is "arguably the finest set of Elizabethan stories written in imitation of the Italian novella, a genre that enjoyed twenty-five years of popularity following the publication of William Painter's Palace of Pleasure in 1566."[3] This collection of eight short love stories contains both imitatio and original works, although the line between these two is often blurred in the period. Even those three stories based on tales in Lodowick Bryskett's translation of Cinthio's Hecatommithi (1565) are significantly reworked; the others are based on many different sources, from Bandello to Straparola to Painter and Pettie.[4] While "Of Apolonius and Silla" is the best-known because of Shakespeare's use of it as the source material for Twelfth Night, it is in many ways the most conventional of the tales, employing a set of familiar romance conventions. Even so, Riche employs considerable skill "in imposing romance patterns on the social fable" and transforming "anecdote back into myth."[5]

---

1 D. Beecher, "Barnabe Riche," DLB 136, p. 284.
2 Ibid., p. 287.
3 Ibid., p. 285.
4 Ibid., p. 285.
5 Introduction, Barnabe Riche His Farewell to Military Profession (Ottawa, 1992), p. 80.

EDITION: Barnabe Riche His Farewell to Military Profession. Edited and introduced by Donald Beecher. Publications of the Barnabe Riche Society 1. Ottawa: Dovehouse, 1992. Text and select notes used with the kind permission of Donald Beecher.

from Barnabe Riche His Farewell to Military Profession:

Containing Very Pleasant Discourses Fit for a Peaceable Time: Gathered Together for the Only Delight of the Courteous Gentlewomen, Both of England and Ireland, for Whose Only Pleasure They Were Collected Together, And unto Whom They Are Directed and Dedicated by Barnabe Riche Gentleman.[1]

To the Right Courteous Gentlewomen, Both of England and Ireland, Barnabe Riche Wisheth All Things They Should Have Appertaining to Their Honour, Estimation, and All Other Their Honest Delights.

Gentlewomen, I am sure there are many—but especially of such as best know me—that will not a little wonder to see such alteration in me, that, having spent my younger days in the wars among men and vowed myself only unto Mars,[2] should now, in my riper years, desire to live in peace amongst women and to consecrate myself wholly unto Venus.[3] But yet the wiser sort can very well consider that the older we wax[4] the riper our wit, and the longer we live the better we can conceive of things appertaining to our own profits. Though harebrained youth overhaled[5] me for a time that I knew not bale from bliss, yet wisdom now has warned me that I well know cheese from chalk;[6] I see now it is less painful to follow a fiddle in a gentlewoman's chamber than to march after a drum in the field, and more sound sleeping under a silken canopy close by a friend[7] than under a bush in the open field within a mile of our foe, and nothing so dangerous to be wounded with the luring look of our beloved mistress as with the cruel shot of our hateful enemy: the one possessed with a pitiful heart to help where she hath hurt, the other with a deadly hate to kill where they might save.

Experience now hath taught me that to be of Mars his crew there is nothing but pain, travail,[8] turmoil, disquiet, cold, hunger, thirst, penury, bad lodging, worse fare, unquiet sleep, with a number of other calamities that haps[9] I know not how. And when a soldier hath thus served in many a bloody broil, a flap with a foxtail[10] shall be his best reward, for I see no better recompense that any of them can get. Now contrary, to be of Venus' band there is pleasure, sport, joy, solace, mirth, peace, quiet rest, dainty fare, with a thousand other delights such as I cannot rehearse; and a man having served but a reasonable time may sometimes take a taste at his mistress' lips for his better recompense.

---

[1] This selection is based on D. Beecher's Barnabe Riche His Farewell to Military Profession (Publications of the Barnabe Riche Society, vol. 1., edited, with an introduction and notes by D. Beecher [Ottawa, ON: Dovehouse, 1992]). Thanks to Donald Beecher for permission to use his text and select notes. The original title page includes the Latin epigram Malui me divitem esse quam vocari (I would rather be wealthy than appealed to [i.e., authoritative or popular]).

[2] Mars the god of war.

[3] Venus the goddess of love.

[4] wax grow.

[5] overhaled overpowered, overmastered.

[6] cheese from chalk Proverb, "No more like than chalk and cheese (To give chalk for cheese)" (Tilley C218), to mock the "wisdom" of an individual who can tell the difference between two totally dissimilar things.

[7] friend lover.

[8] travail labour.

[9] haps happens, chances.

[10] a flap with a foxtail Proverb, "He gave him a flap with a foxtail" (Tilley F344), meaning to flatter or deceive someone, to make a contemptuous return (usually for a good deed, a piece of sound advice, etc.).

But now, gentlewomen, as I have vowed myself to be at your dispositions,[1] so I know not how to frame myself to your contentations.[2] When I consider with how many commendable qualities he ought to be endowed that should be welcomed into your blessed companies, I find in myself no one manner of exercise that might give me the least hope to win your good likings.

As first for dancing, although I like the measures very well, yet I could never tread them aright, nor to use measure in anything that I went about, although I desired to perform all things by line and by level whatsoever I took in hand.[3] Our galliards are so curious[4] that they are not for my dancing, for they are so full of tricks and turns[5] that he which hath no more but the plain cinquepace[6] is no better accounted of than a very bungler, and, for my part, they might as soon teach me to make a capricornus[7] as a caper in the right kind that it should be. For a jig[8] my heels are too heavy, and these brawls[9] are so busy[10] that I love not to beat my brains about them. A round[11] is too giddy a dance for my diet,[12] for let the dancers run about with as much speed as they may, yet are they never a whit the nigher to the end of their course, unless with often turning they hap to catch a fall, and so they end the dance with shame that was begun but in sport. These hornpipes[13] I have hated from my very youth, and I know there are many other that loves them as evil as I. Thus you may perceive that there is no dance but either I like not of them, or they like not of me, so that I can dance neither.

There resteth, then, if I could play of any instrument, or that I had any sight in song whereby I might delight your dainty ears, gentlewomen, by sweet playing or feigning[14] some pretty ditties. But to the first, my fingers would never be brought in frame; for the second, my mouth is so unpleasant, either to sing or to feign, as would rather breed your loathing than your liking.

Why yet if I could discourse pleasantly to drive away the time with amorous devices, or that my conceit[15] would serve me either to propone[16] pretty questions or to give ready answers, with a number of other delights too long to be rehearsed, there were some comfort that I might be allowed of amongst you. But my capacity is so gross,[17] my wits be so blunt, and all my other senses are so dull that I am sure you would sooner condemn me for a dunce than confirm me for a disciple fit to whisper a tale in a gentlewoman's ears.

But yet I trust, gentlewomen, when you shall perceive the zeal that I bear to my new profession, although you will not presently admit me to the pulpit, yet you will not deny me to be one of your parish, where, if it please you but to place me in the body of the church, you shall find my devotion as much as he that kneels next the chancel[18] door.

And here, gentlewomen, the better to manifest the further regard of my duty, I have presented you with a few rough-hewn histories. Yet, I dare

---

1 dispositions disposal.

2 contentations contentment, pleasure.

3 measures ... hand Riche plays here with the meanings of the word "measure." "Measures" refers to grave or stately dances, while "measure" means moderation or temperance. However, "measure" can also refer to the graduated rod, line, or tape used by builders and tailors for taking measurements, as in Riche's use here of the proverbial statement, "To work by line and level (measure)" (Tilley L305), meaning to do anything perfectly, with great attention to detail.

4 galliard a quick and lively dance in triple time; curious elaborate.

5 tricks and turns "specific gestures pertaining to formal dancing, the trick and the caper being leaping figures" (Beecher, Barnabe Riche, p. 124, note).

6 cinquepace a lively dance, the steps of which were based on the number five; it seems to have been associated with the galliard.

7 capicornus "capriole, the frisky leap of a goat" (Beecher, Barnabe Riche, p. 124, note).

8 jig a lively, rapid, springy kind of dance.

9 brawl a kind of French dance resembling a cotillion.

10 busy elaborate, intricate, complicated.

11 round a dance in which the performers move in a circle, or around a room, etc.

12 for my diet i.e., to my way of thinking.

13 hornpipe a lively and vigorous dance, usually performed by a single person, orig. to the accompaniment of the wind instrument also called a hornpipe (associated with the merrymaking of sailors).

14 feigning singing softly or humming an air.

15 devices familiar conversation, talk, chat; conceit faculty of conceiving; wit.

16 propone propose (for consideration, acceptance, or adoption).

17 capacity mental ability, talent; gross lacking in delicacy of perception; dull, stupid.

18 chancel the eastern part of a church, used by those who officiate in the performance of the services, and separated from the other parts by a screen, railing, etc.

undertake, [they are] so warely[1] polished that there is nothing let slip that might breed offence to your modest minds.

I have made bold to publish them under your safe-conduct, and I trust it shall nothing at all offend you. My last request is that at your pleasures you will peruse them, and with your favours you will defend them, which if I may perceive not to be misliked among you, my encouragement will be such that I trust within a very short space you shall see me grow from a young puny[2] to a sufficient scholar. And thus, gentlewomen, wishing to you all what yourselves do best like of,

I humbly take my leave.
Yours in the way of honesty,
Barnabe Riche.

To the Noble Soldiers Both of England and Ireland, Barnabe Riche Wisheth as to Himself.

There is an old proverb, noble soldiers, and thus it followeth: "It is better to be happy than wise."[3] But what it is to be happy how should I decipher, who never in my life could yet attain to any hap[4] at all that was good. And yet I have had soldier's luck and speed[5] as well as the rest of my profession. And with wisdom I will not meddle—I never came where it grew—but this I dare boldly affirm, and the experience of the present time doth make daily proof, that wit stands by in a threadbare coat where folly sometimes sits in a velvet gown. And how often is it seen that vice shall be advanced where virtue is little or not at all regarded; small desert shall highly be preferred where well-doing shall go unrewarded; and flattery shall be welcomed for a guest of great account where plain Tom-tell-truth shall be thrust out of doors by the shoulders; and to speak a plain truth indeed, do ye not see pipers, parasites, fiddlers, dancers, players, jesters, and such others, better esteemed and made of, and greater benevolence used toward them, than to any others that endeavour themselves to the most commendable qualities?

Then seeing the abuse of this present age is such that follies are better esteemed than matters of greater weight, I have stepped onto the stage amongst the rest, contented to play a part, and have gathered together this small volume of histories, all treating, sir reverence of you,[6] of love.

I remember that in my last book entitled the Alarm to England[7] I promised to take in hand some other thing, but believe me it was not this that I meant, for I pretended then to have followed on, and where I ended with the decay of martial disciplines, so I meant to have begun again with the disciplines of war, and withal to have set forth the orders of sundry battles, and the manner of skirmishes, with many plots[8] of fortification, but especially those of the low countries, as Delft, Delftshaven, Rotterdam, Leyden, the Brielle, both the head[9] and the town, Gorcum, Gouldsluice, Maaslandsluce, the Krimpen,[10] with diverse others worth the perusing for such as have not seen them.

---

1 warely cautiously, circumspectly; prudently.

2 puny a junior or recently admitted student in a school or university.

3 See Tilley H140.

4 hap chance, fortune, luck.

5 speed success, advancement.

6 sir reverence of you "in all due respect" (Beecher, Barnabe Riche, p. 128, note).

7 Published in 1578, its full title is "Alarm to England, Foreshowing What Perils Are Procured, Where the People Live without Regard of Martial Law. With a Short Discourse Containing the Decay of Warlike Discipline, Convenient to Be Perused by Gentlemen, Such as Are Desirous by Service, to Seek Their Own Deserved Praise, and the Preservation of Their Country." See p. 491, note 10.

8 plots plans.

9 head "headland or promontory; bank or dam for holding back water" (Beecher, Barnabe Riche, p. 128, note).

10 Delft … Krimpen "Riche names here some of the principal locations in the Dutch wars, no doubt scenes of action he meant to describe in the projected book mentioned [above]. The names were in the news throughout the early 1570s, and it is not easy to determine which actions Riche himself might have participated in as an eyewitness [...] Riche may have been among the 500 soldiers forced to return to England in 1574 when the English under Colonel Chester were driven from their stronghold in Maaslandsluice (Maeslandsluis). Riche gives a close account in the Alarm of the siege of Zieriksee in June, 1576, and of Brielle, or Bryel Island. The Gouldsluce or Goudasluice was a key stronghold for preventing the entry of the Spanish cavalry, although Valdez finally succeeded in May, 1574, and slaughtered many of the English" (Beecher, "Textual Notes and Commentary," Barnabe Riche, p. 324, note 4).

But I see the time serves not for any such thing to be accounted of, and therefore to fit the time better, I have put forth these loving histories, the which I did write in Ireland at a vacant time before the coming over of James Fitzmaurice.[1] And it pleased me the better to do it only to keep myself from idleness—and yet they say it were better to be idle than ill-occupied. But I trust I shall please gentlewomen, and that is all the gain that I look for. And herein I do but follow the course of the world, for many nowadays go about by a great device as may be how they might become women themselves. How many gentlemen shall you see at this present date that, I dare undertake, in the wearing of their apparel, in the setting of their ruffs and the frizzling[2] of their hair, are more newfangled and foolish than any courtesan of Venice.

And I beseech you, gentlemen, give me leave to tell you a tale that comes even now in my mind: the matter is not worth the hearing, but yet very strange unto me at the first. It was my fortune, at my last being at London, to walk through the Strand towards Westminster, where I met one came riding towards me on a footcloth nag,[3] apparelled in a French ruff, a French cloak, a French hose, and in his hand a great fan of feathers, bearing them up very womanly against the side of his face. And for that I had never seen any man wear them before that day, I began to think it impossible that there might a man be found so foolish as to make himself a scorn to the world to wear so womanish a toy,[4] but rather thought it had been some shameless woman that had disguised herself like a man in our hose and our cloaks—for our doublets, gowns, caps, and hats they had got long ago. But by this time he was come something near me and I might see he had a beard, whereby I was assured that he should have been a man, whereat I began to muse with myself whether his simplicity[5] were more to be pitied, or his folly more to be laughed at. For in mine opinion, it is as fond[6] a sight to see a man with such a bauble in his hands as to see a woman ride through the streets with a lance in hers. And as he passed me, I saw three following that were his men, and taking the hindermost by the arm I asked him what gentlewoman his master was. But the fellow, not understanding my meaning, told me his master's name and so departed.

I began then to muse with myself to what end that fan of feathers served, for it could not be to defend the sun from the burning of his beauty, for it was in the beginning of February when the heat of the sun may be very well endured.

Now if it were to defend[7] the wind or the coldness of the air, methinks a French hood[8] had been a great deal better, for that had been both gentlewoman-like and, being close pinned down about the ears, would have kept his head a great deal warmer. And then a French hood on his head, a French ruff about his neck, a French cloak on his back, and a pair of French hose on his legs had been right à la mode de France—and this had been something suitable to his wit.

But I think he did it rather to please gentlewomen, and, the better to show what honour he bore them, would wear one of the greatest vanities that long[9] to their sex. And to this end, gentlemen,

---

[1] James Fitzmaurice Fitzgerald, Irish nobleman (d. 1579) who spearheaded a revolt against what he and others perceived as English attempts to undermine the power of the established Anglo-Irish aristocracy. After an initial abortive revolt (1569), Fitzmaurice fled to the Continent, returning to Ireland in 1579 with Spanish and Italian troops, paid for by the Pope. The revolt was not finally put down until 1583 (R. Lockyer, Tudor and Stuart Britain, 1471-1714 [London, 1964], p. 159). Beecher notes that although "we must presume the Farewell was completed before [1579]," Riche "no doubt had to abandon his writing for some time while performing his duties in the quelling of the rebellion" ("Textual Notes and Commentary," Barnabe Riche, p. 324, note 4).

[2] ruff an article of neck-wear, usually consisting of starched linen or muslin arranged in horizontal flutings, and standing out all around the neck, worn especially in the reigns of Elizabeth and James I; frizzling curling hair in small crisp curls.

[3] footcloth a large, richly ornamented cloth hanging over the back of a horse and down to the ground on each side. It was considered as a mark of dignity and state; nag a small riding horse or pony.

[4] toy trinket, trifle, frippery.

[5] simplicity lack of wisdom or ordinary judgement.

[6] fond foolish, silly.

[7] defend ward off.

[8] French hood a headdress worn by women in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries.

[9] long i.e., belong.

I have told you my tale that you might perceive the sundry means we use, and all to please women. I see it is the path that all desire to pace, and sure I would wish my friends to tread the same trace. For what is he that is wise which desires to be a soldier? Mars his court is full of bale, Venus' is full of bliss. And, my good companions and fellow soldiers, if you will follow mine advice, lay aside your weapons, hang up your armour by the walls and learn another while,[1] for your better advancements, to pipe, to fiddle, to sing, to dance, to lie, to forge,[2] to flatter, to carry tales,[3] to set ruff[4] or to do anything that your appetites best serve unto, and that is better fitting for the time. This is the only means that is best for a man to bring himself credit. Otherwise I know not which way a man might bend himself either to get gain or good report.

For first, the military profession, by means whereof men were advanced to the greatest renown, is now become of so slender estimation that there is no account neither made of it, nor any that shall profess it.

To become a courtier there is as little gain to be gotten, for Liberality, who was wont to be a principal officer as well in the court as in the country, by whose means well-doing could never go unrewarded, is turned Jack-out-of-office[5] and others appointed to have the custody of him to hold him short, that he range no more abroad so that no man can speak with him. And they say the poor gentleman is so fleeced, from time to time, by those that be his keepers that he hath nothing to give that is good but it falls to their shares.

To become a student in the law, there are such a number of them already that methinks it is not possible that one of them should honestly thrive by another. And some will say that one lawyer and one goshawk were enough in one shire. But of my conscience, there are more lawyers in some one shire in England, with attorneys, solicitors—or as they are termed, brokers of causes or pettifoggers[6]—than there are goshawks[7] in all Norway.

To become a merchant, traffic[8] is so dead by means of these foreign broils[9] that unless a man would be a thief to his country to steal out prohibited wares, there were small gains to be gotten.[10]

To become a farmer, lands be so racked[11] at such a rate that a man should but toil all the days of his life to pay his landlord's rent.

But what occupation or handicraft might a man then follow to make himself rich, when every science depends upon newfangled fashions? For he that today is accounted for the finest workman, within one month some new-found fellow comes out with some new-found fashion, and then he bears the prize, and the first accounted but a bungler. And within another month after, the second shall be served with the same sauce, and thus there is no artificer[12] that can hold his credit long.

Such is the miserable condition of this our present time; this is the course of the world, but especially here in England, where there is no man thought to be wise but he that is wealthy, where no man is thought to speak a truth but such as can lie, flatter, and dissemble, where there is no advice allowed for good but such as tendeth more for

---

1 another while another time.

2 forge fabricate, frame, invent (a false or imaginary story, lie, etc.).

3 to carry tales to gossip, to tell tales, to be a tattle-tale.

4 to set ruff to play cards.

5 Proverb, "He is Jack-out-of-office" (Tilley J23), referring to a person who has been dismissed from his office or employment.

6 pettifogger a legal practitioner of inferior status, who conducts petty cases; usually derogatory: a crooked or unethical attorney.

7 goshawk a large short-winged hawk.

8 traffic trade.

9 these foreign broils In August 1567, Philip II of Spain sent troops into the Spanish Netherlands, triggering a European-wide political crisis, with the Dutch engaged in open revolt by April of 1572. Trade with the Continent in general suffered accordingly.

10 unless a man would be … gotten Beecher notes that this concern over illegal trade and its effects on England's economic prosperity turns up in a number of Riche's works, including Alarm to England (1578). Riche argued "that the illegal exportation of domestic products such as corn, leather, hides, butter, [and] cheese [...] was impoverishing the nation" ("Textual Notes and Commentary," Barnabe Riche, p. 324, note 7). John Dee deals with the same concern in The Perfect Art of Navigation (1577). See p. 409.

11 racked rented (at an exorbitant, even extortionate, rate).

12 artificer craftsman.

gain than for glory. And what pinching for a penny that should be spent in our country's defence? How prodigal for a pound to be spent upon vanities and idle devices? What small recompense to soldiers that fight with foes for their country's quiet? How liberal to lawyers that set friends at defiance and disquiet a whole commonwealth? What fawning upon him whom fortune doth advance? What frowning upon him whom she hath brought low? What little care of the poor and such as be in want? What feasting of the rich, and such as be wealthy? What sumptuous houses built by men of mean estate?[1] What little hospitality kept from high and low degree?[2]

And here I cannot but speak of the bounty of that noble gentleman, Sir Christopher Hatton,[3] my very good master and upholder who, having builded a house in Northamptonshire called by the name of Holdenby, which house for the bravery of the buildings, for the stateliness of the chambers, for the rich furniture of the lodgings, for the conveyance[4] of the offices, and for all other necessaries appurtenant to a palace of pleasure, is thought by those that have judgment to be incomparable, and to have no fellow in England that is out of her Majesty's hands. And although this house is not yet fully finished and is but a new erection, yet it differeth far from the works that are used nowadays in many places, I mean where the houses are built with a great number of chimneys[5] and yet the smoke comes forth but at one only tunnel. This house is not built on that manner, for as it hath sundry chimneys so they cast forth several smokes. And such worthy port and daily hospitality [are] kept that, although the owner himself useth not to come there once in two years, yet I dare undertake there is daily provision to be found convenient to entertain any nobleman with his whole train that should hap[6] to call in of a sudden. And how many gentlemen and strangers that come but to see the house are there daily welcomed, feasted, and well lodged. From whence should he come, be he rich, be he poor, that should not there be entertained if it please him to call in. To be short, Holdenby giveth daily relief to such as be in want for the space of six or seven miles' compass.

Peradventure those that be envious will think this tale nothing appurtenant to the matter that I was in hand withal, but I trust my offence is the less, considering I have spoken but a truth, and do wish that every other man were able to say as much for his master, and so an end.

And now where I left off, I was telling what pride, what covetousness, what whoredom, what gluttony, what blasphemy, what riot,[7] what excess, what drunkenness, what swearing, what bribery, what extortion, what usury, what oppression, what deceit, what forgery, what vice in general is daily entertained and practiced in England. And although it hath pleased God by wonderful signs and miracles to forewarn us of his wrath and call us to repentance,[8] yet you see the world runneth forward and keepeth his wonted[9] course without any remorse of conscience, neither making sign nor proffer to

[1] mean estate low social rank.

[2] What little hospitality … low degree? The tendency of the English to starve the military of funds while spending lavishly on personal luxuries is "another touchstone topic for Riche," and he saw this misdirection of wealth as "a moral issue" (Beecher, "Textual Notes and Commentary," Barnabe Riche, p. 324, note 8).

[3] Sir Christopher Hatton (c. 1540-91), prominent courtier and later lord chancellor (1587), well-known as a patron of the arts, supporting and encouraging Edmund Spenser and Thomas Churchyard among others; his ornate country house at Holdenby, a symbol of his status and royal favour, was one of the most magnificent of its time.

[4] conveyance management.

[5] As Beecher notes, Holdenby's many working chimneys "meant that there were fires in many rooms for the comfort of guests. Many houses had merely decorative chimneys on the roof—a common architectural affectation of that age" ("Textual Notes and Commentary," Barnabe Riche, p. 325, note 13).

[6] hap chance, happen.

[7] riot wanton, loose, or wasteful living; debauchery, extravagance.

[8] by wonderful signs … repentance As Beecher notes, "for signs and portents 1580 had been a banner year: floods in January; an earthquake on April 6; apparitions in Cornwall around May 18; and a comet on Oct. 10 (Cranfill, p. 241)" ("Textual Notes and Commentary," Barnabe Riche, p. 325, note 15). See also "The Monstrous Children Broadsides" (pp. 556-71 below) for some examples of the literature of sign and portent.

[9] wonted accustomed, customary, usual.

amend. But like as we say, an old sore, being once overrun,[1] will not be cured with any moderate medicine, but must be eaten with corrosives till it comes to the quick,[2] and like as we say, one poison must be a means to expel another,[3] so what should we otherwise think of ourselves, but if we be grown to such extremity as no gentle admonition will serve to reclaim us, what other thing should we look for but a mischief[4] to be the medicine? God will not suffer that vice shall always flourish; he will surely root it out at the last. And how long hath he already borne with us in our wickedness? And what reformation is there had amongst us, unless it be to go from evil to worse? But if we did duly consider how mercifully he hath still dealt with us, how favourably he hath preferred us, and how wonderfully he hath defended us, I think we should not be altogether so unthankful as we show ourselves to be. For who knoweth not what an eyesore this little isle of England hath been to the whole world, and how long we have lived, as it were, in contempt of such countries as be our next neighbours, who, still envying[5] our quiet and happy government, have practiced by as many devices as they could to bring us into their own predicament, had it not been only the providence of God that preserved us? Or what friendship might we yet hope to find at any of their hands if their opportunity would serve them to be revenged of the despite which long ago they had conceived against us? First the French hath ever been our enemies by nature, the Scots by custom, the Spaniards for religion, the Dutch, although we have stood them in great stead and helped them at many a pinch, yet I could buy as much friendship as they do all owe us for a barrel of English beer.[6] If we should go any further, then we come to the Pope, the Turks, and the Devil, and what friendship they bear us I think everyone can imagine.

And here we might consider how wonderfully God hath wrought on our behalves, and with all humbleness of heart give him daily thanks for his benefits bestowed upon us—but most of all, and especially, for our most gracious and sovereign lady, Queen Elizabeth, who from time to time he hath so mightily preserved to be the very instrument of his mercy and loving kindness towards us, and for whose sake, no doubt, he hath forborne us in his displeasure, as many times he did the children of Israel at the request of his servant Moses.

First, how was she assaulted in her sister's time by those ravening wolves that daily sought her death,[7] for they all stood in doubt[8] that she should be that Judith which should cut off proud Holofernes his head.[9] And it pleased God to bring it

---

1 overrun suppurative, infected.

2 the quick the living (and sound part of the flesh so infected).

3 one poison must be a means to expel another Proverb, "One poison expels another" (Tilley P457).

4 mischief disease, ailment.

5 envying "(orig. enueighyng), suggesting 'inveighing against' as a possible reading" (Beecher, Barnabe Riche, p. 133, note).

6 First the French … of English beer The long and bloody history of relations between the French and English is well-known; the Scots' relations with the English were also constantly fraught over matters of religion and foreign alliances (particularly between the Scottish and French thrones), leading to English invasions in 1542, 1544, 1545, and 1547; Spain was Roman Catholic and thus an enemy of Protestant England; the Dutch had a national reputation among the English for being drunkards; owe profess to.

7 First, how she was assaulted … death During the reign of her Catholic half-sister, Mary I, Elizabeth found herself in real danger of execution in the aftermath of the failure of the Wyatt Conspiracy, an attempt to block Mary's intended marriage to Philip II of Spain and place Elizabeth on the throne. There were assiduous attempts to implicate Elizabeth in the plot, particularly by Simon Renard, imperial ambassador to Charles V, and a faction of Mary's Privy Council, and to have her tried and executed as a traitor. For a full account, see. D. Starkey, Elizabeth: The Struggle for the Throne (New York, 2001), chapters 20-23.

8 stood in doubt suspected.

9 that she ... Judith … Holofernes his head In the Book of Judith, an Apocryphal book of the Hebrew Scriptures, the pious and beautiful Jewish widow Judith saves the Jews of Bethulia from an attack by Nebuchadnezzar's general, Holofernes. Entering his camp, Judith overwhelms Holofernes with her beauty and charm. She gets him drunk and proceeds to cut off his head. Stowing the head in a bag, she carries it back to the city where, displayed publicly, it encourages the Israelites to attack; the Assyrians flee and Judith praises God. When Elizabeth ascended the throne in 1558, John Aylmer (among others) defended her right to rule as a specifically female (continued)

even so to pass, not only defending her from their cruelty and rage, but raised her up, indeed, to the utter subversion of those bloody butchers, and to the great comfort of us all that were in bondage and subject to tyranny, not only setting us free from those detestable enormities that so corrosived our consciences,[1] but made open way and passage for the word of God freely to be published,[2] I think, to our own destruction that so unworthily receive it. Upon this, how many mighty enemies protested against her, and what harm have any of them been able to do her?[3] And how many treasons and privy conspiracies since that time hath been practiced by our own pelting papists against her?[4] But God hath revealed and brought them to light. Let us therefore pray unto God that he would so lengthen her days that we might still enjoy so gracious a princess long to govern and reign over us, and that from time to time he would so direct her noble Council in all their meetings and consultations as may redound to[5] his glory, to the benefit of their country, and to their own immortal fame. Let us likewise pray that God would root such covetous hearts out of England that, for the sparing of a penny for the present time, care not to let slip such matter as may cost many a pound hereafter this.

Now lastly, and as mariners use[6] to sing at the sea, "God save my mate and me also": God send all soldiers that hath honestly served their country better consideration than of long time they have had.

And thus, noble soldiers and gentlemen all, I have held you with a long sermon, neither can I tell how my preaching will be allowed of; I crave no more, but wish you all better fortune than I know the present time will afford you, and so will rest at your disposition.

Barnabe Riche

---

sovereign by pointing to the Biblical precedent of Judith. He argued that "if God has chosen to give England a queen regnant, then his will is manifest and to complain of it blasphemous. [...] As when the formidable Judith flayed those 'milksops,' the Israelite elders, for their fear and faithlessness, Elizabeth has been chosen to rouse Protestantism and England to their triumph over the Holofernes of Popery" (M. Stocker, Judith, Sexual Warrior: Women and Power in Western Culture [New Haven, 1998], p. 74). Comparisons between Elizabeth and Judith were particularly common in the early years of her reign (Stocker, pp. 70-76).

[1] to the utter subversion ... those detestable enormities that so corrosived our consciences Under Mary I, most English Protestants had to accommodate themselves to the Catholic rite which she and her government reintroduced into public worship, as well as Catholic doctrine in general. Of those who refused to make any such compromises, just under 300 were executed (R. Tittler, The Reign of Mary I [London, 1993], p. 33) and subsequently memorialized as the Marian martyrs in John Foxe's Acts and Monuments (popularly known as The Book of Martyrs); corrosived eaten away, consumed (as metal is by an acid or corrosive).

[2] published reported openly or publicly. In the first weeks of her reign, Mary I deprived many prominent Protestant ministers of their parishes and imprisoned some of English Protestantism's most influential speakers and writers (such as Thomas Cranmer, Thomas Becon, Hugh Latimer, and Nicholas Ridley). A large number of the earliest of the Marian Martyrs (see pp. 220-24) were popular Protestant preachers, such as John Rogers, Rowland Taylor, and Hugh Latimer (Tittler, Reign of Mary, p. 33). Mary's government also attempted to prevent the printing and distribution of Protestant books and pamphlets through a number of proclamations and acts of Parliament between 1553 and 1558 (ibid., pp. 38-39).

[3] Pope Pius V (reigned, 1566-72) issued against Elizabeth I a papal bull (or edict) of excommunication (Regnans in excelsis [1570]), which also absolved her subjects of allegiance to her and in fact excommunicated any of them who continued loyal. This bull was intended to help bolster the Northern Rebellion (1569-70).

[4] And how many treasons ... against her? There were a number of conspiracies against Elizabeth which were at least partly motivated by the desire for the restoration of Catholicism in England. These plots were often formulated by some of Elizabeth's Catholic subjects who felt alienated and threatened by her regime's commitment to Protestantism and were tacitly supported by some of Europe's Catholic powers; many of these conspiracies, such as Pole's Plot (1562) and the Ridolfi Plot (1570-71), circulated around the figure of Mary, queen of Scots. However, Riche may also be referring to the activities of the Jesuits in England in the 1570s and 1580s, perhaps in particular their encouragement of lay recusance (the resistance of Catholic Englishmen and Englishwomen to the Church of England, particularly by refusing to attend its services). After the 1570 papal bull (see p. 494, note 3), it became easy to view any English Catholic as a potential traitor, and any secret meeting of Catholics as "privy conspiracies"; pelting violent, passionate, hot-tempered.

[5] redound to contribute or turn to.

[6] use are accustomed.

To the Readers in General

I assure thee, gentle reader, when I first took in hand to write these discourses, I meant nothing less than to put them in print, but wrote them at the request of some of my dearest friends, sometimes for their disport,[1] to serve their private use. And now again, by great importunity, I am forced to send them all to the printer. The histories, altogether, are eight in number, whereof the first, the second, the fifth, the seventh and eighth are tales that are but forged only for delight, neither credible to be believed nor hurtful to be perused. The third, the fourth, and the sixth are Italian histories written likewise for pleasure by Master L.B.[2] And here, gentle reader, I must instantly entreat thee that if thou findest any words or terms seeming more indecent than peradventure[3] thou wilt like of, think that I have set them down as more appropriate to express the matter they entreat[4] of than either for want of judgement or good manners. Trusting that as I have written them in jest, so thou wilt read them but to make thyself merry, I wish they might as well please thee in the reading as they displease me in putting them forth. I bid thee heartily farewell.

Barnabe Riche

[...]

[1] disport entertainment, amusement.

[2] Master L.B. Lodowick Bryskett (born c. 1546, died between 1609 and 1612), poet, translator, and administrator, son of Italian immigrants. His knowledge of Italian is testified to by his translation of Giraldi Cinthio's philosophical treatise Tre dialoghi della rita civile ("A Discourse of Civil Life, concerning the Ethic Part of Moral Philosophy," published 1606). The third, fourth and sixth stories in Farewell are translations from the Italian collection Hecatommithi by Cinthio ("Textual Notes and Commentary," Beecher, Barnabe Riche, p. 326, note 22), and Bryskett (Beecher believes) "is the perfect candidate for the original translator of these three stories."

[3] peradventure perhaps.

[4] entreat handle, treat.

Of Apolonius and Silla

The Argument of the Second History

Apolonius, duke, having spent a year's service in the wars against the Turk, returning homeward with his company by sea, was driven by force of weather to the isle of Cyprus, where he was well-received by Pontus, governor of the same isle, with whom Silla, daughter to Pontus, fell so strangely in love that after Apolonius was departed to Constantinople, Silla with one man followed, and coming to Constantinople she served Apolonius in the habit of a man, and after many pretty accidents falling out, she was known to Apolonius, who, in requital of her love, married her.

There is no child that is born into this wretched world but before it doth suck the mother's milk it taketh first a sup of the cup of error,[5] which maketh us when we come to riper years not only to enter into actions of injury, but many times to stray from that[6] is right and reason. But in all other things wherein we show ourselves to be most drunken with this poisoned cup, it is in our actions of love, for the lover is so estranged from that is right and wandereth so wide from the bounds of reason that he is not able to deem white from black, good from bad, virtue from vice, but only led by the appetite of his own affections, and grounding them on the foolishness of his own fancies, will so settle his liking on such a one as either by desert or unworthiness will merit rather to be loathed than loved.

If a question might be asked, "what is the ground indeed of reasonable love whereby the knot is knit of true and perfect friendship?" I think those that be wise would answer, "desert," that is, where the party beloved doth requite us with the like. For otherwise, if the bare show of beauty or the comeliness of personage might be sufficient to confirm us in our love, those that be accustomed to go to fairs and markets might sometimes fall in love with twenty in a day; desert must then be, of force, the ground of reasonable love, for to love them that hate us, to follow them that fly from us, to fawn on them that frown on us, to curry favour with them that disdain us, to be glad to please them that care not how they offend us—who will not confess this to be an erroneous love, neither grounded upon wit nor reason? Wherefore, right courteous gentlewomen, if it please you with patience to peruse this history following, you shall see Dame Error so play her part with a leash[1] of lovers, a male and two females, as shall work a wonder to your wise judgment in noting the effect of their amorous devices and conclusions of their actions: the first, neglecting the love of a noble dame, young, beautiful and fair, who only for his good will[2] played the part of a serving man, contented to abide any manner of pain only to behold him; he again setting his love of a dame that, despising him—being a noble duke—gave herself to a serving man, as she had thought, but it otherwise fell out, as the substance of this tale shall better describe. And because I have been something tedious in my first discourse, offending your patient ears with the hearing of a circumstance overlong,[3] from henceforth that which I mind to write shall be done with such celerity as the matter that I pretend to pen may in any wise permit me, and thus followeth the history.

[5] it taketh first a sup of the cup of error a reference to the Christian doctrine of original sin.

[6] that i.e., that which.

During the time that the famous city of Constantinople remained in the hands of the Christians,[4] amongst many other noblemen that kept their abiding in that flourishing city there was one whose name was Apolonius, a worthy duke, who, being but a very young man and even then new come to his possessions, which were very great, levied a mighty band of men at his own proper charges with whom he served against the Turk during the space of one whole year, in which time, although it were very short, this young duke so behaved himself—as well by prowess and valiance showed with his own hands as otherwise by his wisdom and liberality used towards his soldiers—that all the world was filled with the fame of this noble duke. When he had thus spent one year's service, he caused his trumpet to sound a retreat, and gathering his company together and embarking themselves he set sail, holding his course towards Constantinople. But being upon the sea, by the extremity of a tempest which suddenly fell, his fleet was dissevered, some one way and some another; but he himself recovered the isle of Cyprus where he was worthily received by Pontus, duke and governor of the same isle, with whom he lodged while his ships were new repairing.

This Pontus that was lord and governor of this famous isle was an ancient duke and had two children, a son and a daughter. His son was named Silvio, of whom hereafter we shall have further occasion to speak, but at this instant he was in the parts of Africa serving in the wars.

The daughter her name was Silla, whose beauty was so peerless that she had the sovereignty amongst all other dames, as well for her beauty as for the nobleness of her birth. This Silla, having heard of the worthiness of Apolonius, this young duke, who besides his beauty and good graces had a certain natural allurement, that being now in his company in her father's court, she was so strangely attached[5] with the love of Apolonius that there was nothing might content her but his presence and sweet sight. And although she saw no manner of hope to attain to that she most desired, knowing Apolonius to be but a guest and ready to take the benefit of the next wind and to depart

---

[1] leash a set of three, orig. in sporting language used of hounds, hawks, foxes, hares, deer, etc.

[2] good will favour or kindly regard.

[3] And because … overlong As Beecher notes, Riche's self-censure "for the prolixity of his first story" and his "promise henceforth to tell his tales as quickly as the matter would allow" are both unusual: "This shows either a clear sense of an impatient readership, or a sense of a new narrative form based on conciseness, rapid intrigue, and an uninterrupted movement of events. That was a novel view of fiction in the age of the chivalric romance" ("Textual Notes and Commentary," Barnabe Riche, p. 328, note 3).

[4] During the time … Christians Constantinople was a Christian city from its founding by Constantine in 324 CE until its capture by Sultan Mohammed II in 1453 (Topographical Dict., p. 128; OCD, p. 380).

[5] attached seized, laid hold of.

into a strange country, whereby she was bereaved of all possibility ever to see him again, and therefore strived with herself to leave her fondness, but all in vain—it would not be, but like the fowl which is once limed, the more she striveth, the faster she tieth herself.[1]

So Silla was now constrained, perforce[2] her will, to yield to love; wherefore from time to time she used so great familiarity with him as her honour might well permit, and fed him with such amorous baits as the modesty of a maid could reasonably afford, which when she perceived did take but small effect, feeling herself so much outraged with the extremity of her passion, by the only countenance that she bestowed upon Apolonius it might have been well perceived that the very eyes pleaded unto him for pity and remorse. But Apolonius, coming but lately from out the field from the chasing of his enemies, and his fury not yet thoroughly dissolved or purged from his stomach, gave no regard to those amorous enticements which, by reason of his youth, he had not been acquainted withal. But his mind ran more to hear his pilots bring news of a merry wind to serve his turn to Constantinople, which in the end came very prosperously; and giving Duke Pontus hearty thanks for his great entertainment, taking his leave of himself and the Lady Silla his daughter, departed with his company and with a happy gale arrived at his desired port.

Gentlewomen, according to my promise, I will here for brevity's sake omit to make repetition of the long and dolorous discourse recorded by Silla for this sudden departure of her Apolonius, knowing you to be as tenderly hearted as Silla herself, whereby you may the better conjecture the fury of her fever.

But Silla, the further that she saw herself bereaved of all hope ever any more to see her beloved Apolonius, so much the more contagious were her passions, and made the greater speed to execute that she had premeditated in her mind, which was this: amongst many servants that did attend upon her there was one whose name was Pedro, who had a long time waited upon her in her chamber, whereby she was well-assured of his fidelity and trust; to that Pedro, therefore, she bewrayed[3] first the fervency of her love borne to Apolonius, conjuring him in the name of the goddess of love herself and binding him by the duty that a servant ought to have that tendereth his mistress' safety and good liking, and desiring him with tears trickling down her cheeks that he would give his consent to aid and assist her in that she had determined, which was—for that she was fully resolved to go to Constantinople where she might again take the view of her beloved Apolonius—that he, according to the trust she had reposed in him, would not refuse to give his consent secretly to convey her from out her father's court according as she would give him direction, and also to make himself partaker of her journey and to wait upon her till she had seen the end of her determination.

Pedro, perceiving with what vehemency his lady and mistress had made request unto him, albeit he saw many perils and doubts depending in her pretence,[4] notwithstanding, gave his consent to be at her disposition, promising her to further her with his best advice and to be ready to obey whatsoever she would please to command him. The match being thus agreed upon and all things prepared in a readiness for their departure, it happened there was a galley of Constantinople ready to depart, which Pedro understanding, came to the captain desiring him to have passage for himself and for a poor maid that was his sister which were bound to Constantinople upon certain urgent affairs—to which request the captain granted, willing him to prepare aboard with all speed because the wind served him presently to depart.

Pedro now coming to his mistress and telling her how he had handled the matter with the captain, she liking very well of the device, disguis-

[1] like the fowl … tieth herself Small birds were often hunted by smearing their usual perches with a sticky substance.

[2] perforce against.

[3] bewrayed revealed.

[4] doubts depending in her pretence dangers or uncertainties connected with her plan.

ing herself into very simple attire, stole away from out her father's court and came with Pedro, whom now she calleth brother, aboard the galley, where all things being in readiness and the wind serving very well, they launched forth with their oars and set sail.

When they were at the sea, the captain of the galley, taking the view of Silla, perceiving her singular beauty, he was better pleased in beholding of her face than in taking the height either of the sun or star. And thinking her by the homeliness[1] of her apparel to be but some simple maiden, calling her into his cabin he began to break with her after the sea fashion, desiring her to use his own cabin for her better ease, and during the time that she remained at the sea she should not want a bed, and then whispering softly in her ear he said that, for want of a bedfellow, he himself would supply that room. Silla, not being acquainted with any such talk, blushed for shame, but made him no answer at all. My captain, feeling such a bickering[2] within himself, the like whereof he had never endured upon the sea, was like to be taken prisoner aboard his own ship and forced to yield himself a captive without any cannon shot; wherefore to salve all sores, and thinking it the readiest way to speed,[3] he began to break with Silla in the way of marriage, telling her how happy a voyage she had made to fall into the liking of such a one as himself was, who was able to keep and maintain her like a gentlewoman, and for her sake would likewise take her brother into his fellowship whom he would by some means prefer in such sort that both of them should have good cause to think themselves thrice happy, she to light of such a husband, and he to light of such a brother. But Silla, nothing pleased with these preferments, desired him to cease his talk for that she did think herself indeed to be too unworthy such a one as he was, neither was she minded yet to marry, and therefore desired him to fix his fancy upon some that were better worthy than herself was, and that could better like of his courtesy than she could do. The captain, seeing himself thus refused, being in a great chafe,[4] he said as followeth:

"Then seeing you make so little account of my courtesy, proffered to one that is so far unworthy of it, from henceforth I will use the office of my authority; you shall know that I am the captain of this ship and have power to command and dispose of things at my pleasure, and seeing you have so scornfully rejected me to be your loyal husband, I will now take you by force and use you at my will, and so long as it shall please me will keep you for mine own store; there shall be no man able to defend you, nor yet to persuade me from that I have determined."

Silla, with these words being struck into a great fear, did think it now too late to rue her rash attempt, determined rather to die with her own hands than to suffer herself to be abused in such sort. Therefore she most humbly desired the captain so much as he could to save her credit, and seeing that she must needs be at his will and disposition, that for that present he would depart and suffer her till night, when in the dark he might take his pleasure without any manner of suspicion to the residue of his company. The captain, thinking now the goal to be more than half won, was contented so far to satisfy her request and departed out, leaving her alone in his cabin.

Silla, being alone by herself, drew out her knife ready to strike herself to the heart, and falling upon her knees desired God to receive her soul as an acceptable sacrifice for her follies which she had so willfully committed, craving pardon for her sins and so forth, continuing a long and pitiful reconciliation to God, in the midst whereof there suddenly fell a wonderful storm, the terror whereof was such that there was no man but did think the seas would presently have swallowed them. The billows so suddenly arose with the rage of the wind that they were all glad to fall to heaving out of water, for otherwise their feeble

[1] homeliness simplicity, plainness.

[2] bickering battle.

[3] speed succeed.

[4] chafe rage, passion, fury.

galley had never been able to have brooked[1] the seas.

This storm continued all that day and the next night, and they, being driven to put romer[2] before the wind to keep the galley ahead the billow, were driven upon the main shore where the galley broke all to pieces; there was every man providing to save his own life: some got upon hatches, boards, and casks, and were driven with the waves to and fro; but the greatest number were drowned, amongst the which Pedro was one. But Silla herself being in the cabin, as you have heard, took hold of a chest that was the captain's, the which by the only providence of God brought her safe to the shore; the which when she had recovered, not knowing what was become of Pedro her man, she deemed that both he and all the rest had been drowned for that she saw nobody upon the shore but herself.

Wherefore, when she had awhile made great lamentations, complaining her mishaps, she began in the end to comfort herself with the hope that she had to see her Apolonius, and found such means that she broke open the chest that brought her to land, wherein she found good store of coin, and sundry suits of apparel that were the captain's. And now, to prevent a number of injuries that might be proffered to a woman that was left in her case, she determined to leave her own apparel and to sort herself into some of those suits, that, being taken for a man, she might pass through the country in the better safety. And as she changed her apparel, she thought it likewise convenient to change her name, wherefore, not readily happening of any other, she called herself Silvio, by the name of her own brother whom you have heard spoken of before.

In this manner she travelled to Constantinople where she inquired out the palace of the Duke Apolonius, and thinking herself now to be both fit and able to play the servingman, she presented herself to the Duke, craving his service. The Duke, very willing to give succour[3] unto strangers, perceiving him to be a proper smug[4] young man, gave him entertainment. Silla thought herself now more than satisfied for all the casualties[5] that had happened unto her in her journey, that she might at her pleasure take but the view of the Duke Apolonius, and above the rest of his servants was very diligent and attendant upon him, the which the Duke perceiving, began likewise to grow into good liking with the diligence of his man, and therefore made him one of his chamber.[6] Who but Silvio then was most neat[7] about him, in helping of him to make him ready in a morning, in the setting of his ruffs, in the keeping of his chamber? Silvio pleased his master so well that above all the rest of his servants about him, he had the greatest credit, and the Duke put him most in trust.

At this very instant there was remaining in the city a noble dame, a widow, whose husband was but lately deceased, one of the noblest men that were in the parts of Greece, who left his lady and wife large possessions and great livings. This lady's name was called Julina, who, besides the abundance of her wealth and the greatness of her revenues, had likewise the sovereignty of all the dames of Constantinople for her beauty. To this Lady Julina Apolonius became an earnest suitor, and according to the manner of wooers, besides fair words, sorrowful sighs, and piteous countenances, there must be sending of loving letters, chains, bracelets, brooches, rings, tablets,[8] gems, jewels, and presents—I know not what. So my

---

1 brooked endured, withstood.

2 to put romer "Either to trim the sails, or allow to be driven by the wind, or to use a sea anchor to keep the ship properly oriented to the wind" (Beecher, Barnabe Riche, p. 186, note).

3 succour aid; refuge.

4 smug neat, spruce, smart (according to Beecher, originally "smouge" [Barnabe Riche, p. 187]).

5 casualties mishaps, unfortunate accidents.

6 made him one of his chamber i.e., he made him one of the servants who attended him in his private quarters, a position of status and influence indicating here the Duke's affection for and trust in Silvio/Silla.

7 neat "(possibly a misprint for 'near') skillful and precise" (Beecher, Barnabe Riche, p. 187, note).

8 tablet ornament of precious metal or jewellery of a flat form, worn about the person.

duke, who in the time that he remained in the isle of Cyprus had no skill at all in the art of love, although it were more than half proffered unto him, was now become a scholar in love's school and had already learned his first lesson, that is, to speak pitifully, to look ruthfully,[1] to promise largely, to serve diligently, and to please carefully. Now he was learning his second lesson, that is, to reward liberally, to give bountifully, to present[2] willingly, and to write lovingly. Thus Apolonius was so busied in his new study that I warrant you there was no man that could challenge him for[3] playing the truant, he followed his profession with so good a will. And who must be the messenger to carry the tokens and love letters to the Lady Julina but Silvio his man; in him the Duke reposed his only confidence to go between him and his lady.

Now gentlewomen, do you think there could have been a greater torment devised wherewith to afflict the heart of Silla than herself to be made the instrument to work her own mishap and to play the attorney in a cause that made so much against herself? But Silla, altogether desirous to please her master, cared nothing at all to offend herself, followed his business with so good a will as if it had been in her own preferment.

Julina, now having many times taken the gaze of this young youth Silvio, perceiving him to be of such excellent perfect grace, was so entangled with the often sight of this sweet temptation that she fell into as great a liking with the man as the master was with herself. And on a time Silvio, being sent from his master with a message to the Lady Julina, as he began very earnestly to solicit in his master's behalf, Julina interrupting him in his tale, said:

"Silvio, it is enough that you have said for your master; from henceforth either speak for yourself or say nothing at all."

Silla, abashed to hear these words, began in her mind to accuse the blindness of love, that Julina, neglecting the good will of so noble a duke, would prefer her love unto such a one as nature itself had denied to recompense her liking.

And now for a time leaving matters depending,[4] as you have heard, it fell out that the right Silvio indeed—whom you have heard spoken of before, the brother of Silla—was come to his father's court into the isle of Cyprus, where, understanding that his sister was departed in manner as you have heard, conjectured that the very occasion did proceed of some liking had between Pedro her man—that was missing with her—and herself. But Silvio, who loved his sister as dearly as his own life, and the rather for that as she was his natural[5] sister both by father and mother—so the one of them was so like the other in countenance and favour that there was no man able to discern one from the other by their faces, saving by their apparel, the one being a man, the other a woman—Silvio therefore vowed to his father not only to seek out his sister Silla, but also to revenge the villainy which he conceived in Pedro for the carrying away of his sister. And thus departing, having travelled through many cities and towns without hearing any manner of news of those he went to seek for, at the last he arrived at Constantinople, where, as he was walking in an evening for his own recreation on a pleasant green yard without the walls of the city, he fortuned to meet with the Lady Julina, who likewise had been abroad to take the air. And as she suddenly cast her eyes upon Silvio, thinking him to be her old acquaintance by reason they were so like one another as you have heard before, said unto him:

"Sir Silvio, if your haste be not the greater, I pray you let me have a little talk with you, seeing I have so luckily met you in this place."

Silvio, wondering to hear himself so rightly named, being but a stranger not of above two days' continuance in the city, very courteously came towards her, desirous to hear what she would say.

Julina, commanding her train something to stand back, said as followeth: "Seeing my good

---

[1] ruthfully piteously, dolefully.

[2] to present to grant or give gifts.

[3] challenge him for accuse him of.

[4] depending suspended.

[5] natural legitimate.

will and friendly love hath been the only cause to make me so prodigal to offer that I see is so lightly rejected, it maketh me to think that men be of this condition, rather to desire those things which they cannot come by than to esteem or value of that which both largely and liberally is offered unto them; but if the liberality of my proffer[1] hath made to seem less the value of the thing that I meant to present, it is but in your own conceit,[2] considering how many noble men there hath been here before, and be yet at this present, which hath both served, sued, and most humbly entreated to attain that which to you of myself I have freely offered, and I perceive is despised or at the least very lightly regarded."

Silvio, wondering at these words, but more amazed that she could so rightly call him by his name, could not tell what to make of her speeches, assuring himself that she was deceived and did mistake him, did think, notwithstanding, it had been a point of great simplicity[3] if he should forsake that which fortune had so favourably proffered unto him, perceiving by her train that she was some lady of great honour, and viewing the perfection of her beauty and the excellency of her grace and countenance did think it impossible that she should be despised, and therefore answered thus:

"Madam, if before this time I have seemed to forget myself in neglecting your courtesy which so liberally you have meant unto me, please it you to pardon what is past, and from this day forwards Silvio remaineth ready prest[4] to make such reasonable amends as his ability may any ways permit, or as it shall please you to command."

Julina, the gladdest woman that might be to hear these joyful news, said: "Then, my Silvio, see you fail not tomorrow at night to sup with me at my own house where I will discourse further with what amends you shall make me."

To which request Silvio gave his glad consent, and thus they departed very well pleased. And as Julina did think the time very long till she had reaped the fruit of her desire, so Silvio, he wished for harvest before corn could grow, thinking the time as long till he saw how matters would fall out. But not knowing what lady she might be, he presently—before Julina was out of sight—demanded of one that was walking by what she was and how she was called, who satisfied Silvio in every point, and also in what part of the town her house did stand whereby he might inquire it out.

Silvio, thus departing to his lodging, passed the night with very unquiet sleep, and the next morning his mind ran so much of his supper that he never cared neither for his breakfast nor dinner; and the day, to his seeming, passed away so slowly that he had thought the stately steeds had been tired that draw the chariot of the sun, or else some other Joshua had commanded them again to stand,[5] and wished that Phaethon had been there with a whip.[6]

Julina, on the other side, she had thought the clock-setter had played the knave, the day came no faster forwards; but six o'clock being once struck, recovered comfort to both parties, and Silvio hastening himself to the palace of Julina, where by her he was friendly welcomed, and a sumptuous supper being made ready, furnished with sundry sorts of delicate dishes, they sat them down, passing the supper time with amorous looks, loving countenances, and secret glances conveyed from the one to the other, which did better satisfy them than the feeding of their dainty dishes.

---

1 the liberality of my proffer the generosity of my offer.

2 conceit personal or private opinion, judgement.

3 point instance; simplicity lack of judgement.

4 ready prest prepared to strive hard (and with eagerness).

5 some other Joshua had commanded them again to stand In the Book of Joshua, Joshua performs the miracle of making the sun stand still during his victory over the Amorites (10:12-14).

6 he had thought … and wished that Phaethon had been there with a whip Riche refers here to the myth of Apollo, the sun god, and his son, Phaethon. When Apollo gave Phaethon permission to drive the horses of the sun across the sky, Phaethon found that he lacked the strength to control the fiery beasts. Zeus, fearing that earth and heaven would both be set on fire by the out-of-control sun chariot and its wildly racing horses, struck Phaethon down with a thunderbolt.

Supper time being thus spent, Julina did think it very unfitly if she should turn Silvio to go seek his lodging in an evening, desired him therefore that he would take a bed in her house for that night; and bringing him up into a fair chamber that was very richly furnished, she found such means that when all the rest of her household servants were abed and quiet, she came herself to bear Silvio company, where concluding upon conditions that were in question between them,[1] they passed the night with such joy and contentation[2] as might in that convenient time be wished for, but only that Julina, feeding too much of some one dish above the rest, received a surfeit whereof she could not be cured in forty weeks after,[3] a natural inclination in all women which are subject to longing and want the reason to use a moderation in their diet. But the morning approaching, Julina took her leave and conveyed herself into her own chamber; and when it was fair daylight, Silvio making himself ready departed likewise about his affairs in the town, debating with himself how things had happened, being well assured that Julina had mistaken him, and therefore, for fear of further evils, determined to come no more there, but took his journey towards other places in the parts of Greece to see if he could learn any tidings of his sister Silla.

The Duke Apolonius, having made a long suit and never a whit the nearer of his purpose, came to Julina to crave her direct answer, either to accept of him and of such conditions as he proffered unto her, or else to give him his last farewell.

Julina, as you have heard, had taken an earnest penny[4] of another, whom she had thought had been Silvio the duke's man, was at a controversy in herself what she might do. One while she thought, seeing her occasion served so fit, to crave the Duke's good will for the marrying of his man. Then again she could not tell what displeasure the Duke would conceive in that she should seem to prefer his man before himself, did think it therefore best to conceal the matter till she might speak with Silvio to use his opinion how these matters should be handled, and hereupon resolving herself, desiring the Duke to pardon her speeches, said as followeth:

"Sir duke, for that from this time forwards I am no longer of myself, having given my full power and authority over to another whose wife I now remain by faithful vow and promise, and albeit I know the world will wonder when they shall understand the fondness[5] of my choice, yet I trust you yourself will nothing dislike with me sith[6] I have meant no other thing than the satisfying of mine own contentation and liking."

The Duke hearing these words, answered: "Madam, I must then content myself, although against my will, having the law in your own hands to like of whom you list[7] and to make choice where it pleaseth you."

Julina, giving the Duke great thanks that would content himself with such patience, desired him likewise to give his free consent and good will to the party whom she had chosen to be her husband.

"Nay surely madam," quoth the Duke, "I will never give my consent that any other man shall enjoy you than myself. I have made too great account of you than so lightly to pass you away with my good will. But seeing it lieth not in me to let[8] you, having, as you say, made your own choice, so from henceforwards I leave you to your own liking, always willing you well, and thus will take my leave."

The Duke departed towards his own house, very sorrowful that Julina had thus served him. But in the mean space[9] that the Duke had remained in the house of Julina, some of his ser-

---

1 concluding upon conditions … them i.e., they first exchanged a promise of marriage; they betrothed themselves to each other.

2 contentation contentment; pleasure.

3 in forty weeks after the human gestation period.

4 earnest penny a small sum of money paid as an earnest (i.e., a pledge) to secure a bargain.

5 fondness foolishness, folly.

6 sith since.

7 list desire, wish.

8 let hinder, oppose.

9 mean space meantime.

vants fell into talk and conference with the servants of Julina, where, debating between them of the likelihood of the marriage between the Duke and the lady, one of the servants of Julina said that he never saw his lady and mistress use so good countenance to the Duke himself as she had done to Silvio his man, and began to report with what familiarity and courtesy she had received him, feasted him and lodged him, and that in his opinion, Silvio was like to speed[1] before the Duke, or any other that were suitors.

This tale was quickly brought to the Duke himself, who making better inquiry in the matter, found it to be true that was reported; and better considering of the words which Julina had used towards himself, was very well assured that it could be no other than his own man that had thrust his nose so far out of joint,[2] wherefore, without any further respect,[3] caused him to be thrust into a dungeon where he was kept prisoner in a very pitiful plight.[4]

Poor Silvio, having got intelligence by some of his fellows what was the cause that the Duke his master did bear such displeasure unto him, devised all the means he could, as well by mediation by his fellows as otherwise by petitions and supplication to the Duke that he would suspend his judgment till perfect proof were had in the matter, and then if any manner of thing did fall out against him whereby the Duke had cause to take any grief, he would confess himself worthy not only of imprisonment, but also of most vile and shameful death; with these petitions he daily plied the Duke, but all in vain, for the Duke thought he had made so good proof that he was thoroughly confirmed in his opinion against his man.

But the Lady Julina, wondering what made Silvio that he was so slack in his visitation and why he absented himself so long from her presence, began to think that all was not well. But in the end, perceiving no decoction[5] of her former surfeit received as you have heard, and finding in herself an unwonted swelling in her belly, assuring herself to be with child, fearing to become quite bankrupt of her honour, did think it more than time to seek out a father, and made such secret search and diligent inquiry that she learned the truth how Silvio was kept in prison by the Duke his master. And minding to find a perfect remedy, as well as for the love she bore to Silvio as for the maintenance of her credit and estimation, she speedily hasted to the palace of the Duke, to whom she said as followeth:

"Sir duke, it may be that you will think my coming to your house in this sort doth something pass the limits of modesty, the which I protest before God proceedeth of this desire that the world should know how justly I seek means to maintain my honour. But to the end I seem not tedious with prolixity of words, nor to use other than direct circumstances, know, sir, that the love I bear to my only beloved Silvio, whom I do esteem more than all the jewels in the world, whose personage I regard more than my own life, is the only cause of my attempted journey, beseeching you that all the whole displeasure which I understand you have conceived against him may be imputed unto my charge, and that it would please you lovingly to deal with him whom of myself I have chosen rather for the satisfaction of mine honest liking than for the vain pre-eminences of honourable dignities looked after by ambitious minds."

The Duke, having heard this discourse, caused Silvio presently to be sent for, and to be brought before him, to whom he said: "Had it not been sufficient for thee, when I had reposed myself in thy fidelity and the trustiness of thy service, that thou shouldest so traitorously deal with me? But since that time hast not spared still to abuse me with so many forgeries and perjured protestations, not only hateful unto me whose simplicity thou thinkest to be such that by the plot of thy pleasant

[1] speed succeed.

[2] that had thrust his nose so far out of joint i.e., that had displaced or supplanted him; that had spoiled his plans.

[3] respect consideration.

[4] plight condition.

[5] decoction digestion.

tongue thou wouldst make me believe manifest untruth, but most abominable be thy doings in the presence and sight of God, that hast not spared to blaspheme his holy name by calling him to be a witness to maintain thy leasings,[1] and so detestably wouldst forswear thyself in a matter that is so openly known."

Poor Silvio, whose innocency was such that he might lawfully swear, seeing Julina to be there in place, answered thus:

"Most noble Duke, well understanding your conceived grief, most humbly I beseech you patiently to hear my excuse, not minding thereby to aggravate or heap up your wrath and displeasure, protesting before God that there is nothing in the world which I regard so much or do esteem so dear as your good grace and favour. But desirous that your Grace should know my innocency, and to clear myself of such impositions wherewith I know I am wrongfully accused, which as I understand should be in the practicing of the Lady Julina who standeth here in place, whose acquittance for my better discharge now I most humbly crave, protesting before the almighty God that neither in thought, word, nor deed, I have not otherwise used myself than according to the bond and duty of a servant that is both willing and desirous to further his master's suits,[2] which, if I have otherwise said than that is true, you, Madam Julina, who can very well decide the depths of all this doubt, I most humbly beseech you to certify a truth if I have in anything missaid or have otherwise spoken than is right and just."

Julina, having heard this discourse which Silvio had made, perceiving that he stood in great awe of the Duke's displeasure, answered thus: "Think not, my Silvio, that my coming hither is to accuse you of any misdemeanour towards your master; so I do not deny but in all such embassages wherein towards me you have been employed, you have used the office of a faithful and trusty messenger. Neither am I ashamed to confess that the first day that mine eyes did behold the singular behaviour, the notable courtesy, and other innumerable gifts wherewith my Silvio is endued, but that beyond all measure my heart was so inflamed that impossible it was for me to quench the fervent love or extinguish the least part of my conceived torment before I had bewrayed[3] the same unto him, and of my own motion craved his promised faith and loyalty of marriage. And now is the time to manifest the same unto the world which hath been done before God and between ourselves, knowing that it is not needful to keep secret that which is neither evil done nor hurtful to any person. Therefore, as I said before, Silvio is my husband by plighted faith, whom I hope to obtain without offence or displeasure of anyone, trusting that there is no man that will so far forget himself as to restrain that which God hath left at liberty for every wight,[4] or that will seek by cruelty to force ladies to marry otherwise than according to their own liking. Fear not then my Silvio to keep your faith and promise which you have made unto me, and as for the rest, I doubt not things will so fall out as you shall have no manner of cause to complain."

Silvio, amazed to hear these words, for that Julina by her speech seemed to confirm that which he most of all desired to be quit of,[5] said: "Who would have thought that a lady of so great honour and reputation would herself be the ambassador of a thing so prejudicial and uncomely for her estate?[6] What plighted[7] promises be these which be spoken of? Altogether ignorant unto me, which if it be otherwise than I have said, you sacred gods consume me straight with flashing flames of fire. But what words might I use to give credit to the truth and innocence of my cause? Ah, Madam Julina, I desire no other testimony than your own honesty and virtue, thinking that you will not so much blemish the brightness of your honour,

1 leasings lies, falsehoods.

2 suits supplications, petitions.

3 bewrayed revealed.

4 wight person, individual.

5 to be quit of to be clear of, freed from.

6 prejudicial detrimental or damaging to; uncomely improper, unseemly; estate moral and/or bodily condition; perhaps, also, status or standing in the world.

7 plighted solemnly pledged.

knowing that a woman is or should be the image of courtesy, continency and shamefastness, from the which so soon as she stoopeth and leaveth the office[1] of her duty and modesty, besides the degradation of her honour, she thrusteth herself into the pit of perpetual infamy. And as I cannot think you would so far forget yourself, by the refusal of a noble duke, to dim the light of your renown and glory, which hitherto you have maintained amongst the best and noblest ladies, by such a one as I know myself to be too far unworthy your degree and calling, so most humbly I beseech you to confess a truth: whereto tendeth those vows and promises you speak of, which speeches be so obscure unto me as I know not for my life how I might understand them?"

Julina, something nipped[2] with these speeches, said: "And what is the matter that now you make so little a count of your Julina, that being my husband in deed have the face[3] to deny me to whom thou art contracted by so many solemn oaths? What, art thou ashamed to have me to thy wife? How much oughtest thou rather to be ashamed to break thy promised faith and to have despised the holy and dreadful name of God. But that time constraineth me to lay open that which shame rather willeth I should dissemble and keep secret, behold me then here, Silvio, whom thou hast gotten with child, who if thou be of such honesty as I trust for all this I shall find, then the thing is done without prejudice or any hurt to my conscience, considering that by the professed faith thou didst account me for thy wife and I received thee for my spouse and loyal husband, swearing by the almighty God that no other than you have made the conquest and triumph of my chastity, whereof I crave no other witness than yourself and mine own conscience."

I pray you, gentlewomen, was not this a foul oversight of Julina, that would so precisely swear so great an oath that she was gotten with child by one that was altogether unfurnished with implements for such a turn? For God's love take heed, and let this be an example to you, when you be with child, how you swear who is the father before you have had good proof and knowledge of the party, for men be so subtle and full of sleight[4] that, God knoweth, a woman may quickly be deceived.

But now to return to our Silvio, who, hearing an oath sworn so divinely that he had gotten a woman with child, was like to believe that it had been true in very deed; but remembering his own impediment thought it impossible that he should commit such an act, and therefore half in a chafe,[5] he said:

"What law is able to restrain the foolish indiscretion of a woman that yieldeth herself to her own desires? What shame is able to bridle or withdraw her from her mind and madness, or with what snaffle[6] is it possible to hold her back from the execution of her filthiness? But what abomination is this, that a lady of such a house should so forget the greatness of her estate, the alliance[7] whereof she is descended, the nobility of her deceased husband, and maketh no conscience[8] to shame and slander herself with such a one as I am, being so far unfit and unseemly for her degree. But how horrible is it to hear the name of God so defaced, that we make no more account but for the maintenance of our mischiefs, we fear no whit at all to forswear his holy name, as though he were not in all his dealings most righteous, true, and just, and will not only lay open our leasings to the world, but will likewise punish the same with most sharp and bitter scourges."

Julina, not able to endure him to proceed any farther in his sermon, was already surprised with a vehement grief, began bitterly to cry out uttering these speeches following:

"Alas, is it possible that the sovereign justice of God can abide a mischief so great and cursed?

---

1 office moral obligation.

2 nipped stung; vexed.

3 face effrontery, impudence, shameless boldness.

4 sleight cunning, deceit, trickery.

5 chafe rage, passion; state of vexation.

6 snaffle a light bridle.

7 alliance kindred, family.

8 maketh no conscience i.e., does not make it a matter of conscience; has no scruples about.

Why may I not now suffer death rather than the infamy which I see to wander before mine eyes? Oh happy and more than right happy had I been if inconstant fortune had not devised this treason wherein I am surprised and caught. Am I thus become to be entangled with snares, and in the hands of him who, enjoying the spoils[1] of my honour, will openly deprive me of my fame by making me a common fable[2] to all posterity in time to come? Ah, traitor and discourteous wretch, is this the recompense of the honest and firm amity which I have borne thee? Wherein have I deserved this discourtesy? By loving thee more than thou art able to deserve? Is it I, arrant thief, is it I upon whom thou thinkest to work thy mischiefs? Doest thou think me no better worth but that thou mayest prodigally waste my honour at thy pleasure? Didst thou dare to adventure upon me, having thy conscience wounded with so deadly a treason? Ah, unhappy and above all other most unhappy, that have so charily preserved mine honour, and now am made a prey to satisfy a young man's lust that hath coveted nothing but the spoil of my chastity and good name."

Herewithal the tears so gushed down her cheeks that she was not able to open her mouth to use any further speech.

The Duke, who stood all this while and heard this whole discourse, was wonderfully moved with compassion towards Julina, knowing that from her infancy she had ever so honourably used herself that there was no man able to detect her of any misdemeanour otherwise than beseemed a lady of her estate. Wherefore being fully resolved that Silvio his man had committed this villainy against her, in a great fury drawing his rapier, he said unto Silvio:

"How canst thou, arrant thief, show thyself so cruel and careless to such as do thee honour? Hast thou so little regard of such a noble lady as humbleth herself to such a villain as thou art, who, without any respect either of her renown or noble estate, canst be content to seek the wrack and utter ruin of her honour? But frame thyself to make such satisfaction as she requireth—although I know, unworthy wretch, that thou art not able to make her the least part of amends—or I swear by God that thou shall not escape the death which I will minister to thee with my own hands, and therefore advise thee well what thou doest."

Silvio, having heard this sharp sentence, fell down on his knees before the Duke, craving for mercy, desiring that he might be suffered to speak with the Lady Julina apart, promising to satisfy her according to her own contentation.

"Well," quoth the Duke, "I take thy word, and therewithal I advise thee that thou perform thy promise, or otherwise I protest before God I will make thee such an example to the world that all traitors shall tremble for fear how they do seek the dishonouring of ladies."

But now Julina had conceived so great grief against Silvio that there was much ado to persuade her to talk with him. But remembering her own case, desirous to hear what excuse he could make, in the end she agreed, and being brought into a place severally[3] by themselves, Silvio began with a piteous voice to say as followeth:

"I know not, madam, of whom I might make complaint, whether of you or of myself, or rather of fortune, which hath conducted and brought us both into so great adversity. I see that you receive great wrong, and I am condemned against all right: you in peril to abide the bruit[4] of spiteful tongues, and I in danger to lose the thing that I most desire. And although I could allege many reasons to prove my sayings true, yet I refer myself to the experience and bounty of your mind."

And herewithal, loosing his garments down to his stomach, and showed Julina his breasts and pretty teats surmounting far the whiteness of snow itself, saying: "Lo, madam, behold here the party whom you have challenged[5] to be the father of your child; see, I am a woman, the daughter of a noble duke, who only for the love of him whom

[1] spoils plunder.

[2] fable the subject of common talk.

[3] severally apart from others or from the rest.

[4] bruit report, rumours; clamour, din.

[5] challenged accused.

you so lightly have shaken off, have forsaken my father, abandoned my country, and in manner as you see, am become a servingman, satisfying myself but with the only sight of my Apolonius. And now madam, if my passion were not vehement and my torments without comparison, I would wish that my feigned griefs might be laughed to scorn and my dissembled pains to be rewarded with flouts.[1] But my love being pure, my travail[2] continual, and my griefs endless, I trust madam, you will not only excuse me of crime but also pity my distress, the which I protest I would still have kept secret if my fortune would so have permitted."

Julina did now think herself to be in a worse case than ever she was before, for now she knew not whom to challenge to be the father of her child. Wherefore, when she had told the Duke the very certainty of the discourse which Silvio had made unto her, she departed to her own house with such grief and sorrow that she purposed never to come out of her own doors again alive to be a wonder and mocking stock to the world.

But the Duke more amazed to hear this strange discourse of Silvio, came unto him whom, when he had viewed with better consideration, perceived indeed that it was Silla the daughter of Duke Pontus, and embracing her in his arms, he said:

"O the branch of all virtue and the flower of courtesy itself, pardon me I beseech you of all such discourtesies as I have ignorantly committed towards you, desiring you that without further memory of ancient griefs, you will accept of me who is more joyful and better contented with your presence than if the whole world were at my commandment. Where hath there ever been found such liberality[3] in a lover, which having been trained up and nourished amidst the delicacies and banquets of the court, accompanied with trains of many fair and noble ladies, living in pleasure and in the midst of delights, would so prodigally adventure yourself, neither fearing mishaps nor misliking to take such pains as I know you have not been accustomed unto? O liberality never heard of before! O fact that can never be sufficiently rewarded! O true love most pure and unfeigned!"

Herewithal, sending for the most artificial[4] workmen, he provided for her sundry suits of sumptuous apparel, and the marriage day appointed, which was celebrated with great triumph through the whole city of Constantinople, everyone praising the nobleness of the Duke; but so many as did behold the excellent beauty of Silla gave her the praise above all the rest of the ladies in the troupe.

The matter seemed so wonderful and strange that the bruit was spread throughout all the parts of Greece insomuch that it came to the hearing of Silvio, who as you have heard, remained in those parts to inquire of his sister. He, being the gladdest man in the world, hastened to Constantinople, where coming to his sister he was joyfully received and most lovingly welcomed and entertained of the Duke his brother-in-law. After he had remained there two or three days, the Duke revealed unto Silvio the whole discourse how it happened between his sister and the Lady Julina, and how his sister was challenged for getting a woman with child. Silvio, blushing with these words, was stricken with great remorse to make Julina amends, understanding her to be a noble lady, and was left defamed to the world though his default. He therefore bewrayed the whole circumstance to the Duke, whereof the Duke being very joyful, immediately repaired with Silvio to the house of Julina, whom they found in her chamber in great lamentation and mourning, to whom the Duke said:

"Take courage madam, for behold here a gentleman that will not stick both to father your child and to take you for his wife—no inferior person but the son and heir of a noble duke, worthy of your estate and dignity."

Julina, seeing Silvio in place, did know very well that he was the father of her child, and was so rav-

[1] flouts mockeries, jeers, scoffs.

[2] travail labour.

[3] liberality generosity.

[4] artificial skillful.

ished with joy that she knew not whether she were awake or in some dream. Silvio, embracing her in his arms, craving forgiveness of all that passed, concluded with her the marriage day, which was presently[1] accomplished with great joy and contentation to all parties. And thus Silvio, having attained a noble wife, and Silla his sister her desired husband, they passed the residue of their days with such delight as those that have accomplished the perfection of their felicities.

The Conclusion

Gentle reader, now thou hast perused these histories to the end, I doubt not but thou wilt deem of them as they worthily deserve and think such vanities more fitter to be presented on a stage—as some of them have been—than to be published in print—as till now they have never been. But to excuse myself of the folly that here might be imputed unto me, that myself being the first that have put them to the print, should likewise be the first that should condemn them as vain, for mine own excuse herein I answer, that in the writing of them I have used the same manner that many of our young gentlemen useth nowadays in the wearing of their apparel, which is rather to follow a fashion that is new—be it never so foolish—than to be tied to a more decent custom that is clean out of use. Sometimes wearing their hair frizzled so long that makes them look like a water spaniel, sometimes so short like a new shorn sheep; their beards sometimes cut round like a Philip's dollar,[2] sometimes square like the King's Head in Fish Street;[3] sometimes so near the skin that a man might judge by his face the gentleman had had very pilled[4] luck. Their caps and hats sometimes so big as will hold more wit than three of them have in their heads; sometimes so little that it will hold no wit at all. Their ruffs sometimes so huge as shall hang about their necks like a cartwheel; sometimes a little falling-band that makes them look like one of the Queen's silk women.[5] Their cloaks sometimes so long as it shall trip on their heels; sometimes so short as will not hang over their elbows. Their jerkins sometimes with high collars buttoned close under their chin, sometimes with no collars at all about their necks like a wench in a red waistcoat that were washing of a buck;[6] sometimes with long saucy sleeves that will be in every dish before his master, sometimes without sleeves like Scogin's man that used to run of sleeveless errands.[7] Their doublets sometimes faggot-waisted about the navel, sometimes cow-bellied below the flanks that the gentleman must undo a button when he goes to piss.

In their hose so many fashions as I cannot describe, sometimes garragaskins[8] breeched like a bear, sometimes close to the dock[9] like the devil in a play, wanting but a tail, sometimes round like to Saint Thomas' onions,[10] sometimes petite ruffs of two inches long with a close stocking clean above the nock of his tail, sometimes disguising themselves after the use of Spain, sometimes after the Italian manner, and many times they imitate the [1] presently immediately, straightaway.

[2] Philip's dollar piece of eight (Spanish coin worth eight reales).

[3] the King's Head in Fish Street a London tavern and its sign.

[4] pilled beggarly, meagre.

[5] falling-band a band or collar worn falling flat around the neck, in fashion during the seventeenth century. Beecher notes that it was a new fashion that came into vogue in the 1580s ("Textual Notes and Commentary," Barnabe Riche, pp. 335-36, note 3); silk woman one engaged in the manufacture, use, or sale of silk.

[6] washing of a buck "a washing tub or vat, buck-washing, thus a woman in a red undergarment carrying out this task" (Beecher, Barnabe Riche, p. 316, note).

[7] "The allusion is to The Jests of Scogin. Men on important errands wore sleeves in their caps for safe conduct. Without the sleeve, missions were far more difficult to accomplish, and hence the proverbial phrase 'sleeveless errand,' which also denoted a silly, trivial, or unimportant task, such as going to market for some minor purchase, or the kinds of jesting errands Scogin performed" (Beecher, "Textual Notes and Commentary," Barnabe Riche, p. 336, note 4).

[8] garragaskins gallagaskins: "wide hose or breeches, narrow at the waist, full at the knee" (Beecher, "Textual Notes and Commentary," Barnabe Riche, p. 316, note).

[9] dock buttocks.

[10] Saint Thomas' onions "... large, round breeches resembling the shape of onions, usually referred to as St. Omer's onions" (Beecher, "Textual Notes and Commentary," Barnabe Riche, p. 336, note 5).

French fashion so near that all their hair is ready to fall off their heads.[1]

Now I am sure if any of them were asked why he used such variety in his apparel, he would answer, because he would follow the fashion. Let this then suffice likewise for mine excuse, that myself, seeing trifles of no account to be now best in season, and such vanities more desired than matters of better purpose, and the greatest part of our writers still busied with the like, so I have put forth this book because I would follow the fashion.

And now friendly reader, because I have entered thus far to speak of fashions, I will conclude with a tale that maketh something for my purpose. I have read it so long ago that I cannot tell you where—nor the matter is not great though I do not tell you when. But in England, as I think, and, as it should seem, near about London there was sometimes dwelling a gentleman, though not of very great wealth yet of a very honest life and of good report amongst his neighbours, whose name was Master Persinus.[2] This gentleman had a daughter whose name was Mildred, about the age of eighteen years, of a singular beauty, very well trained up by her own mother, who was likewise living and with whom she now remained. It fortuned that a devil of hell called Balthazar, no inferior devil but a master devil, a principal officer and commander in Hell—and trust me, if there were ever a devil that was an honest man, Balthazar was he—saving that being now an ancient devil and well spent in years, he began to wax wanton and to dote in the love of Mistress Mildred, but yet not like our greatest part of lovers nowadays that still practice their loves unlawfully, more for lust than for loyalty. But Balthazar, contrariwise, bore his love honestly, lawfully, yea, and in the way of marriage, the which to bring to pass he took such continual care and travail in his mind that he now confessed the fire of Hell to be but a trifle in respect of the scorching flames of love. Sometimes conjecturing in his mind what bashfulness is found to be in young damsels in these days, but especially when a man comes to proffer them love, they are so shamefast that with a good will they would never hear of marriage till they were thirty years old at the least, and many of them, if it were not for men, I think could be well contented to lead apes in Hell.[3] Otherwhiles he remembered the greedy desire that is generally in parents, who never consent to the marrying of their fair daughters without some great jointure.[4] Now the devil had no lands, and therefore to find the best remedy he could, they say the devil is able to put upon him all manner of shapes. So he took upon him the presence and personage of so gallant a young gentleman as fitted so well the fancy of Mistress Mildred that without any long circumstance she was contented to accept him for her husband, the which being perceived by her father and mother, not minding to contrary their daughter's liking, gave their free consents. There was no more to do but to appoint for their marrying day, the which being once expired, the devil sitting by his best beloved, uttered these words, or such like as followeth:

"My good Mildred, my dear and loving wife, I must confess myself not a little beholding unto you that neither examining my pedigree from whence I came, neither what I am, neither yet how I am able to keep you, would notwithstanding vouchsafe to take me for your husband. I must think your courtesy proceeded of love, and do account myself so much the more beholding to you, and now to give you some trial that you have not made your choice of a rascal or a knave of no reputation, I am contented to give you one demand whatsoever you think best to require of me. And therefore, my dear, ask what you list, your desire shall be satisfied—always provided that

[1] imitate the French fashion … ready to fall off their heads Hair loss was a symptom of venereal disease, known in England as the French pox, a disease to which the French were thought particularly prone.

[2] Beecher says that the precise source for this tale is debated, although Riche probably used "Jean Louveau's translation of Le piacevoli notti by Straparola" ("Textual Notes and Commentary," Barnabe Riche, p. 336, note 7).

[3] to lead apes in Hell the proverbial punishment for young virgins who refused to wed.

[4] jointure dowry.

hereafter you never trouble me with any further requests."

The young wife, wonderfully well contented with these loving speeches of her courteous husband, desired of him a little pause and respite. And now coming to her mother, to whom she unfolded the whole contents of the premises, sitting them down together to consider of the matter, after a great number of consultations and as many imaginations had between them, in the end they concluded that her request should be for a suit of apparel of a gallant fashion but even then newly come up. And coming to her husband with this demand, they had their wish presently accomplished and this suit of apparel laid by them so well made and fitted as possibly could be desired. Thus all parts were well pleased, they continued in good liking for the space of one month, at which time another new fashion was then come up, as well in the attiring of their heads as also in the making of the gowns, kirtles, and stomachers.[1] Mistress Mildred, being now quite out of a conceit for that she had never a gown to put on her back but of a stale cut and the fashion at the least of a month old, who would blame the gentlewoman though she took it very grievously? Alas, her mind was so far out of quiet that her meat almost did her no manner of good. Which sudden alteration being perceived by her husband, he began to entreat her to show him the cause of her conceived grief, the which when she had revealed, the good honest devil her husband said:

"Well, my dear wife, although when I satisfied your last demand my conditions were that you should never trouble me with any further requests, yet once again to recomfort you, ask of me what you will. I will grant your desire, but to cut you of all hope that hereafter this I will never be troubled again with new fashions, assure yourself that this is the last request that ever I mind to grant you."

Mistress Mildred, giving him twenty kisses for his kindness, went again to her mother with these joyful news, and concluding as before, they brought the devil an inventory of new fashions, beginning with caps, cauls, coifs, ruffs, partlets,[2] sleeves, gowns, kirtles, petticoats, and there was no stitch, no cut, no lace, no guard,[3] nor no fashion that was then in use but in this inventory it was to be found. And as before, this bill was no sooner presented, but all things were in readiness so well fitted and fashioned as if the most cunning workmen in England had been at the making. But what should I say? Before another month was expired, there was a new invention, for then came up new fashions in their caps, in their hats, in their cauls, new fashioned shadows, then came up periwigs, frizzling, and curling,[4] then came up doublets, bombasting and bolstering,[5] new fashions in their gowns, kirtles and petticoats, then they began to wear crimson, carnation, green and yellow stockings; to be short, there was such alteration in women's apparel from the top to the toe in a month that Mistress Mildred thought herself now again to be clean out of fashion, the remembrance whereof brought her likewise to be quite out of countenance.[6] But when she remembered how she was prohibited from making any further demands, it did so gall her at the heart that now she began to frown, lump and lower[7] at her husband, which when he perceived, he said unto her:

"Why how now, my good Mildred, I fear me thy head is troubled again with new fashions from whence cometh these sudden fits. What is the matter that breedeth such alteration in thy manners, tell me I pray thee, what is it that doth offend thee?"

---

1 kirtle skirt or outer petticoat; stomacher an ornamental covering for the chest (often finely embroidered or covered with jewels) worn by women under the lacing of the bodice of a gown.

2 caul a netted cap or head-dress usually richly ornamented; coif a hat; partlet a neckerchief of linen or other fine fabric.

3 guard ornamental border or trimming on a garment.

4 periwig a fashionable head-dress resembling a highly ornate wig; frizzling, and curling methods of dressing the hair.

5 doublet a close-fitting body garment (usually a male garment, but writers such as Philip Stubbes decry its adoption by women at the time); bombasting and bolstering the padding of clothes, particularly in the area of the bottom.

6 to be quite out of countenance completely disconcerted or abashed.

7 lump and lower to look sulkily and angrily.

The poor gentlewoman, not able to speak one word for weeping, at the last bursting out into these terms: "If," quoth she, "I had made my choice of a husband worthy of myself, I should never have given him cause thus to wonder at me, nor myself have had occasion to complain for such a trifle, for that I might have done as other women do, and have followed every fashion and every new device without either grudging or restraint of my desire. I should not then have been enjoined to such a kind of silence, but I might have made my husband privy to my wants. I should not then have been kept like Joan of the country in attire of the old fashion devised a month ago."

While Mistress Mildred was proceeding in these speeches or such other like, the devil her husband was struck in such a dump that, not able any longer to endure her talk, he not only avoided himself from her presence, but also devised with speed to fly the country. And coming to Dover, thinking to cross the seas, finding no shipping ready he altered his course and got him into Scotland, never staying till he came to Edinburgh where the King kept his court, and now forgetting all humanity which he had learned before in England he began again afresh to play the devil, and so possessed the King of Scots himself with such strange and unacquainted passions that by the conjecture of physicians and other learned men that were then assembled together to judge the King's diseases, they all concluded that it must needs be some fiend of Hell that so disturbed their prince,[1] whereupon proclamations were presently sent forth that whosoever could give him relief should have a thousand crowns by the year so long as he did live. The desire of these crowns caused many to attempt the matter, but the fury of the devil was such that no man could prevail.

Now it fortuned that Persinus, the father of Mistress Mildred, at this present to be at Edinburgh, who by constraint of some extremity was now compelled to practice physic wherein he had some pretty sight,[2] but therewithal so good success that who but Persinus the English physician had all the name through the whole realm of Scotland. The fame of this physician came to the hearing of the King, who, sending for Persinus, began to debate with him of the strangeness of his fits, proffering large sums of money if he could find a remedy, to whom Persinus answered that it passed far his skill. The King notwithstanding would not give over, but entreated Persinus to take in hand the cure, which when he still denied, did think it rather proceeded of stubbornness than for want of experience, wherefore he began to threaten him, swearing that if he would not accomplish his request it should cost him his life.

Persinus, seeing himself so hardly bestead,[3] was contented to try some part of his cunning; and the next day when the King was in his fit, he was brought in to see the manner how it held him, whom the devil perceiving to come in at the door, speaking to Persinus he said in this manner:

"My father Persinus, I am glad I see you here, but what wind hath driven you hither to this place?"

"Why what art thou," quoth Persinus, "that callest me thy father?"

"Marry," quoth the devil, "I am Balthazar that was once married to your daughter, indeed a devil of hell, though you never knew it before, whom your daughter wearied so much with her new fashions as I had rather be in hell, than married to such a wife."

"And art thou then Balthazar?" quoth Persinus. "Why then I pray thee, good son, depart the King of Scots, for he hath threatened me for thy cause to take away my life."

---

[1] As Beecher notes, "The joke at the expense of King James of Scotland would have been appreciated by most of the English before the death of Elizabeth in 1603, especially because James himself had a scholar's interest in witchcraft and demon possession. Circumstances altered when he became James I of England, and took umbrage at any slurs, even the most playful and innocent, that were directed against the Scots. This section had to be reworked for the edition of 1606, quite probably by Riche himself" ("Textual Notes and Commentary," Barnabe Riche, p. 336, note 9). See Beecher's introduction, p. 110.

[2] pretty sight understanding or insight.

[3] so hardly bestead so keenly pressed.

"Marry," quoth Balthazar, "even so I would have it, it were some part of acquittance for your daughter's kindness towards me."

Persinus, seeing the disposition of the devil, thought it not good to deal any further with him at that present, but afterward when the King was come to himself, he requested of him but respite for one month, and against the day that he should then take him in hand again, he devised with the King that all the ordinance in the town might be shot off, all the bells in the town might be rung, and that all the trumpets, drums, and all manner of other instruments might altogether sound about the court and lodging of the King.

These things being accordingly prepared and the day come that was assigned, Persinus being with the King at the beginning of his fit, according as it was appointed the ordinance was shot off, the bells began to ring, musicians played on every side, at which sudden noise the devil began to wonder, and calling to Persinus he said:

"Why, how now father, what meaneth all this noise?"

"Why," quoth Persinus, "dost thou not know the meaning? Then I perceive devils do not know all. But because thou must be acquainted with it, I will tell thee aforehand. The last time I talked with thee thou toldest me thou hadst married my daughter, and thy tokens were so true that I am sure thou didst not lie, for which cause knowing where thy biding[1] is, I have sent for her to the town, and this noise that thou hearest is her welcome to the court."

"And is my wife then come hither to seek me out?" quoth the devil. "Then I shall be sure to be troubled with new fashions; nay, then, farewell Scotland, for I had rather go to Hell," and thus leaving the King he departed his way.

Now to conclude, if a silly woman were able to weary the devil that troubled him with new fashions but once in a month, I think God himself will be wearied with the outrages of men that are busied with new fangles at the least once in a day; I can no more, but wish that gentlemen leaving such superficial follies would rather endeavour themselves in other exercises that might be much more beneficial to their country and a great deal better to their own reputation, and thus an end.

—1581

[1] biding dwelling, residence.

Raphael Holinshed
c. 1525-?1580

Holinshed's Chronicles of England, Scotland, and Ireland is best known as the chief source for Shakespeare's history plays. Despite the work's fame, the details of Raphael Holinshed's life are somewhat unclear, in part because of the large number of Ralphs and Raphaels in various branches of the family. However, he is thought to have been the son of Ralph Holinshed of Cophurst, Cheshire, to have been in residence at Christ's College, Cambridge in 1544-45, and perhaps to have been ordained.

By the 1560s Holinshed was working as a translator in the print shop of Reginald (Reyner) Wolfe, printer to the Queen, where he began work on the monumental history that eventually bore his name. Wolfe initiated the project in 1548 when, under the patronage of Archbishop Thomas Cranmer, he designed a universal history and cosmography complete with maps and illustrations and began the process of acquiring the documents and records needed to fulfill it.

Identifying Raphael Holinshed as the "author" of the Chronicles is perhaps a bit misleading, though, given that the work was the product of a complex and long-term collaboration among a number of scholars and printers. Following Wolfe's death in 1573, Holinshed continued the project under the direction of a syndicate of publishers comprised of George Bishop, John Harrison, and Lucas Harrison. These scholars reduced the scope of the work to histories and descriptions of England, Scotland, and Ireland from the time of inhabitation to 1576. As well, William Harrison (see pp. 527-36) and Richard Stanyhurst aided in its compilation and writing, although it was published under Holinshed's name. Henry Bynneman's 1577 printing of the Chronicles sold well enough by 1583 for a revised edition to be undertaken, although not by Holinshed. The expanded publishing syndicate of George Bishop, Lucas Harrison, Ralph Newbery, Henry Denham, and Thomas Woodcocke directed a larger team of writers and compilers, made up of John Hooker, William Harrison, Francis Thynne, John Stow, and Abraham Fleming, who also acted as editor.[1]

Both editions of the work underwent censorship, although in the case of the 1577 edition the changes required were limited to a few passages in the section on Ireland. Scrutiny of the 1587 edition was more stringent, however, possibly because it contained more contemporary, and thus more immediately politically sensitive material. The first review of the work took place immediately after its completion, in February 1587, while the second occurred at the end of 1590. Collectively, the result was abridgement of a number of passages.[2] The "castrations" from the 1590 censorship are more visible because not all copies were brought in when they were recalled.[3]

In his preface to the 1577 edition, Holinshed indicates that one of his objectives is to show diversity of opinion, a goal expressed through the methodology of both editions; both use, for example, a vast array of sources from both traditional and more recent humanist scholarship. In the earlier sections of the "Historie of England" traditional materials such as Geoffrey of Monmouth's History of the Kings of Britain (c. 1136) that address pre-Roman Britain were combined with most of the relevant classical writings. For more contemporary events, the compilers favoured eyewitness testimony, verbatim reporting, anecdotes, and multiple accounts of the same events. In the process of revising the 1577 edition, the compilers not only extended the earlier accounts of the history of England and Scotland where Harrison and Stanyhurst left off, but also supplemented and reworked them.[4] For example, Abraham Fleming added to the earlier periods documents and details of economic history and the prehistory of the Reformation. As well, the illustrations from the first edition were removed, likely for the dual purposes of economy and ease of printing.[5]

---

[1] See E.S. Donno, "Some Aspects of Shakespeare's Holinshed," Huntington Library Quarterly 50 (1987): pp. 229-31, and A. Patterson, Reading Holinshed's Chronicles (Chicago, 1994), pp. 8-9.

[2] Donno, "Some Aspects of Shakespeare's Holinshed," p. 231.

[3] Ibid., p. 233.

[4] Patterson, Reading Holinshed's Chronicles, p. 56.

[5] Ibid., p. 57.

In its approach to historiography, the Chronicles maintains contact with the chronicle tradition, but also shows signs of a developing concern with causation and critical evaluation of sources. The English chronicles had tended to develop by accretion, with an emphasis on quantity of information over critical selection on the basis of relevance.[1] This pattern developed because events were reported in the order in which they occurred, because events of the past were viewed as models for the present, and because the chronicles functioned not only as accounts of the past, but also as a means of preserving documents. Thus, two or three inconsistent accounts of an event were likely all to be recorded in a single history for purposes of preservation and in case a moral lesson invisible to the historian might be apparent to another reader.[2] The work of Polydore Vergil (?1477-?1555), an Italian who spent more than half a century in England, marked a shift from this practice. In his Anglicae Historiae (1534-55) he began to look for patterns in the mass of materials available to him and examine the issue of causation, albeit returning frequently to the idea of the direct intervention of divine providence in human affairs.[3] He also began comparison of multiple sources in an effort to determine their accuracy, a process influenced by the developing humanist scholarship.[4] Like the medieval chronicles, Holinshed's Chronicles contained a vast number of sources without elaboration of a method for deciding which had priority.[5] It also emphasized the idea of providential control of human history, in which history is read as a record of the execution of God's justice and/or as a working-out of divine will toward a foreordained, if not fully clear, end. It differs from tradition, however, in its fuller and more consistent working-out of the providential argument.[6]

Critics reading the Chronicles as an example of a national history have interpreted these characteristics broadly in two ways. The providential thrust of the text has been seen as simply an accretion of moral exempla and as an extended, univocal legitimation of the Tudor dynasty as an expression of England's status as God's chosen land, with English Protestants as God's chosen people.[7] At the same time, however, the proliferation of material has been understood to express a conception of a multivocal, diverse nation, and to be designed to produce critical readers and citizens.[8] Thus, the presentation of parallel histories and of multiple versions of incidents grants readers significant control over interpretation. In this way the reader is permitted to act as a kind of censor, a process that invokes the kind of political control over the past exercised by those in power in the present.[9] The strategy, begun by Holinshed and continued by Fleming, of adding marginalia to mark or comment on sources also helps to construct a sense of debate or discussion within the textual space of the work.

The selections here exemplify the range of the Chronicles. The account of Brute reflects a sense of Britain's mythical past and its connection to the power of the Roman Empire, an association fundamental to the ideology of the Tudor dynasty. However, its parenthetical comments identifying sources indicate that this history exists in more than one voice. The account of the 1554 trial of Sir Nicholas Throckmorton, one of a group of eight members of the gentry charged with conspiring with Sir Thomas Wyatt the Younger to seize the Tower of London and overthrow Mary Tudor, takes a strikingly different form. A more contemporary event, its transcription is unique among accounts of trials in the Chronicles for its full representation of both prosecution and defence. Its dialogic character is heightened by the use of conventions of dramatic form, including speech prefixes and occasional stage directions.[10] The result is an unusual

---

1 F.J. Levy, Tudor Historical Thought (San Marino, CA, 1967), p. 167.

2 Ibid., p. 169.

3 Ibid., p. 171.

4 Ibid., p. 172.

5 Ibid., p. 184.

6 R.M. Benbow, "The Providential Theory of Historical Causation in Holinshed's Chronicles: 1577 and 1587," Texas Studies in Language and Literature 1 (1959): p. 265.

7 Ibid., p. 269.

8 Patterson, Reading Holinshed's Chronicles, pp. 6-8.

9 S.A. Kelen, "'It is Dangerous (Gentle Reader)': Censorship, Holinshed's Chronicle, and the Politics of Control," Sixteenth Century Journal 27 (1996): pp. 710-12.

10 Patterson, Reading Holinshed's Chronicles, p. 154.

freedom of expression and positioning of readers as members of the jury who may balance the testimony and reach their own conclusions.

EDITION: Holinshed's Chronicles: England, Scotland, and Ireland. London: C. Stowe for J. Johnson et al., 1807. Vol. I, pp. 3-4, 437-44; Vol. IV, pp. 31-44.

from Chronicles: England, Scotland, and Ireland

To the Readers Studious in Histories

The order observed in the description of Britain, by reason of the necessary division thereof into books and chapters growing out of a variety of matters therein contained, seemed (in my judgement) so convenient a course devised by the writer, as I was easily induced thereby to digest the history of England immediately following into the like method, so that as in the one, so likewise in the other, by summary contents foregoing every chapter, as also by certain material titles added to the head of every page of the said history, it is a thing of no difficulty to comprehend what is discoursed and discussed in the same.[1]

Wherein (sith[2] histories are said to be the registers of memory and the monuments of verity) all lovers of knowledge, specially historical, are advisedly to mark (among other points) the several and successive alterations of regiments[3] in this land, whereof it was my meaning to have made an abstract, but that the same is sufficiently handled in the first book and fourth chapter of the description of Britain; whereto if the seventh chapter of the same book be also annexed, there is little or no defect at all in that case whereof justly to make complaint.

Wherefore by remitting the readers to those, I reap this advantage, namely a discharge of forethought and purposed labour, which as to reduce into some plausible form was a work both of time, pain and study, so seeming unlikely to be comprised in few words (being a matter of necessary and important observation) occasion of tediousness is to and fro avoided, specially to the reader, who is further to be advertised, that the computations of years here and there expressed, according to the indirect direction of the copies whence they were derived and drawn, is not so absolute (in some men's opinion) as it might have been, howbeit justifiable by their originals.

Wherein hereafter (God prolonging peace in the Church and commonwealth that the use of books may not be abridged) such diligent care shall be had, that in whatsoever the help of books will do good, or conference with antiquaries avail, there shall want no will to use one and the other. And yet it is not a work for every common capacity, nay it is a toil without head or tail even for extraordinary wits, to correct the accounts of former ages so many hundred years received, out of uncertainties to raise certainties, and to reconcile writers dissenting in opinion and report. But as this is unpossible, so is no more to be looked for than may be performed; and further to inquire as it is against reason, so to undertake more than may commendably be achieved, were foul folly.

ABRAHAM FLEMING

[...]

[1] For the sake of brevity, these summaries have been omitted for chapters 3 and 4, below.

[2] sith since.

[3] regiments reign.

Of Brute and His Descent, How He Slew His Father in Hunting, His Banishment, His Letter to King Pandrasus, against Whom He Wageth Battle, Taketh Him Prisoner, and Concludeth Peace upon Conditions.

The First Chapter

Hitherto have we spoken of the inhabitants of this isle before the coming of Brute,[1] although some will needs have it, that he was the first which inhabited the same with his people descended of the Trojans, some few giants only excepted whom he utterly destroyed, and left not one of them alive through the whole isle. But as we shall not doubt of Brute's coming hither, so may we assuredly think, that he found the isle peopled either with the generation of those which Albion the giant had placed here, or some other kind of people whom he did subdue, and so reigned as well over them as over those which he brought with him.

This Brutus, or Brytus [for this letter (Y) hath of ancient time had the sounds both of V and I] (as the author of the book which Geoffrey of Monmouth[2] translated doth affirm) was the son of Silvius, the son of Ascanius, the son of Aeneas the Trojan, begotten of his wife Creusa, and born in Troy,[3] before the city was destroyed. But as other do take it, the author of that book (whatsoever he was) and such other as follow him, are deceived only in this point, mistaking the matter, that in Posthumus the son of Aeneas (begotten of his wife Lavinia, and born after his father's decease in Italy) was called Ascanius, who had issue a son named Julius, who (as these other do conjecture) was the father of Brute, that noble chieftain and adventurous leader of those people, which being descended (for the more part in the fourth generation) from those Trojans that escaped with life, when that royal city was destroyed by the Greeks, got possession of this worthy and most famous isle.

[...]

The Third Chapter.

But to our matter concerning Brute, who after he had obtained so famous a victory, albeit there was good cause for him to rejoice, yet it sore troubled him to consider that his numbers daily decayed, and his enemies still increased, and grew stronger. Whereupon resting doubtful what to do, whether to proceed against the Gauls,[4] or return to his ships to seek the isle that was appointed him by oracle, at length he chose the surest and best way, as he took it, and as it proved. For whilest the greater part of his army was yet left alive, and that the victory remained on his side, he drew to his navy, and lading his ships with exceeding great store of riches which his people had got abroad in the country, he took the seas again. After a few days sailing they landed at the haven now called Totnesse,[5] the year of the world 2850, after the destruction of Troy 66, after the deliverance of the Israelites from the captivity of Babylon 397, almost ended, in the 18 year of the reign of Tineas king of Babylon, 13 of Melanthus king of Athens, before the building of Rome 368, which was before the nativity of our Saviour Christ 1116,

---

[1] Brute Brutus, legendary founder of Britain, accidentally killed his father, Silvius, while hunting, in fulfilment of a prophecy. The goddess Diana told the exiled Brutus of an island that awaited him and his followers. Brutus landed on the island, which was inhabited only by a band of giants and called Albion. He renamed the island after himself and his companions "Britons" (from Brut-ans) (Spenser Encycl.).

[2] Geoffrey of Monmouth author of the Historia Regum Britannia (History of the Kings of Britain), c. 1139, the first coherent account of the origins of the nation (Spenser Encycl.).

[3] Troy Aeneas escaped from the ruins of Troy to found a "second Troy" in Italy. This became the Roman Empire. Aeneas had two wives, Creusa, the mother of Ascanius and great grandmother of Brutus, a daughter of Priam who did not survive the fall of Troy, and Lavinia, daughter of Latinus, king of Latium (Italy) (OCD).

[4] Gauls inhabitants of a territory bounded by the Alps, Rhine, Atlantic ocean, Pyrenees, and Mediterranean, which later becomes France (OCD).

[5] Totnesse Totnes, meaning "the fort or lookout on the nose or ridge of land," is a town in Devon, near Torbay.

almost ended, and before the reign of Alexander[1] the Great 783.

[...]

The Fourth Chapter.

When Brute had entered this land, immediately after his arrival (as writers do record) he searched the country from side to side, and from end to end, finding it in most places very fertile and plenteous of wood and grass, and full of pleasant springs and fair rivers. As he thus travelled to discover the state and commodities of the island, he was encountered by diverse strong and mighty giants, whom he destroyed and slew, or rather subdued, with all such other people as he found in the island, which were more in number than by report of some authors it should appear there were. Among these giants (as Geoffrey of Monmouth writeth) there was one of passing strength and great estimation, named Gogmagog, with whom Brute caused Corineus[2] to wrestle at a place beside Dover, where it chanced that the giant broke a rib in the side of Corineus while they strove to clasp, and the one to overthrow the other. Wherewith Corineus being sore chaffed[3] and stirred to wrath, did so double his force that he got the upper hand of the giant, and cast him down headlong from one of the rocks there, not far from Dover,[4] and so dispatched him, by reason whereof the place was named long after, The fall or leap of Gogmagog, but afterward it was called The fall of Dover. For this valiant deed, and other the like services first and last achieved, Brute gave unto Corineus the whole country of Cornwall. To be brief, after that Brute had destroyed such as stood against him, and brought such people under his subjection as he found in the isle, and searched the land from the one end to the other, he was desirous to build a city, that the same might be the seat royal of his empire or kingdom. Whereupon he chose a plot of ground lying on the north side of the river of Thames, which by good consideration seemed to be most pleasant and convenient for any great multitude of inhabitants, as well for wholesomeness of air, goodness of soil, plenty of woods, and commodity of the river, serving as well to bring in as to carry out all kinds of merchandise and things necessary for the gain, store, and use of them that there should inhabit.

Here therefore he began to build and lay the foundation of a city, in the tenth or (as other think) in the second year after his arrival, which he named (saith Gal. Mon.[5]) Troynovaunt,[6] or (as Hum. Llhoyd saith) Troynewith, that is, New Troy, in remembrance of that noble city of Troy from whence he and his people were for the greater part descended.

When Brutus had builded this city, and brought the island fully under his subjection, he by the advice of his nobles commanded this isle (which before hight Albion) to be called Britain, and the inhabitants Britons after his name, for a perpetual memory that he was the first bringer of them into the land. In this mean while also he had by his wife 3 sons, the first named Locrinus or Locrine, the second Cambris or Camber, and the third Albanactus or Albanact. Now when the time of his death drew near, to the first he betook the government of that part of the land now known by the name of England, so that the same was long after called Loegria, or Logiers, of the said Locrinus. To the second he appointed the country of Wales, which of him was first named Cambria, divided from Loegria by the river of Severn.[7] To [1] Alexander 356-323 BCE, king of Macedonia and son of Philip II, famous for his imperial conquest of Greece and Asia Minor (OCD).

[2] Corineus Trojan who wrestled and defeated Gogmagog. The two figures were represented in pageants to welcome Mary I (1554) and Elizabeth I (1559) (Spenser Encycl.).

[3] chaffed angered, vexed.

[4] Dover significant to the original name of Britain (Albion) because "alba" means "white" and Dover, on the SE coast, is noted for its white chalk cliffs (Spenser Encycl.).

[5] Gal. Mon. Galfridus Monemutensis: Geoffrey of Monmouth.

[6] Troynovaunt city founded by Brute ("New Troy"), later rebuilt by British King Lud, from whom London gets its name (Spenser Encycl.).

[7] Severn river that runs up through the western counties of England near Wales.

his third son Albanact, he delivered all the north part of the isle, afterward called Albania, after the name of the said Albanact: which portion of the said isle lieth beyond the Humber[1] northward. Thus when Brutus had divided the isle of Britain (as before is mentioned) into 3 parts, and had governed the same by the space of 15 years, he died in the 24 year after his arrival (as Harrison[2] noteth) and was buried at Troynovaunt or London, although the place of his said burial there be now grown out of memory.

Mary the Eldest Daughter of King Henry the Eighth. Successor to Edward the Sixth.

The Order of Arraignment of Sir Nicholas Throckmorton, Knight, in the Guildhall of London, the Seventeenth Day of April 1554.

Expressed in a Dialogue for the Better Understanding of Every Man's Part.

The names of the commissioners[3]

Sir Thomas White, knight, Lord Mayor of London; the Earl of Shrewesbury; the Earl of Derby; Sir Thomas Bromley, knight, Lord Chief Justice of England; Sir Nicholas Hare, knight, Master of the Rolls; Sir Edward Englefield, knight, Master of the Court of Wards and Liberties; Sir Richard Southwell, knight, one of the Privy Council; Sir Edward Walgrave, knight, one of the Privy Council; Sir Roger Cholmley, knight; Sir William Portman, knight, one of the justices of the King's Bench; Sir Edward Sanders, knight, one of the justices of the Common Pleas; Master Stanford and Master Dyer, sergeants; Master Edward Griffin, attorney general; Master Sendall and Peter Tichbourne, clerks of the Crown. First, after proclamation made, and the commission read, the Lieutenant of the Tower, Master Thomas Bridges, brought the prisoner to the bar. Then silence was commanded, and Sendall said to the prisoner as followeth.

The Queen's Learned Counsel Gave Evidence against the Prisoner.

SENDALL: Nicholas Throckmorton, knight, hold up thy hand, thou art before this time indicted of high treason, etc., that thou then and there didst falsely and traitorously, etc., conspire and imagine the death of the Queen's Majesty, etc., and falsely and traitorously didst levy war against the Queen within her realm, etc., and also thou wast adherent to the Queen's enemies within her realm, giving to them aid and comfort, etc., and also falsely and traitorously didst conspire and intend to depose and deprive the Queen of her royal estate, and so finally destroy her, etc., and also thou didst falsely and traitorously devise and conclude to take violently the Tower of London, etc. Of all which treasons and every of them in manner and form etc., art thou guilty or not guilty?

THROCKMORTON: May it please you my lords and masters, which be authorised by the Queen's commission to be judges this day, to give me leave to speak a few words, which doth both concern you and me, before I answer to the indictment, and not altogether impertinent to the matter, and then plead to the indictment.

BROMLEY: No, the order is not so, you must first plead whether you be guilty or no.

THROCKMORTON: If that be your order and law, judge accordingly to it.

HARE: You must first answer to the matter wherewith you are charged, and then you may talk at your pleasure.

THROCKMORTON: But things spoken out of place, were as good not spoken.

BROMLEY: These be but delays to spend time, therefore answer as the law willeth you.

THROCKMORTON: My lords I pray you make not too much haste with me, neither think not long for your dinner, for my case requireth leisure, and you have well dined when you have done justice truly.

---

[1] Humber river that runs into the northern counties from the North Sea, just south of Scotland.

[2] Harrison author of the Description of Britain, a chief source for the English section of the Chronicles. See below, pp. 527-36.

[3] Italics indicate comments or references that appear in the margins of the original text.

Christ said, Blessed are they that hunger and thirst for righteousness.[1]

BROMLEY: I can forbear my dinner as well as you, and care as little as you peradventure.[2]

SHREWSBURY: Come you hither to check us Throckmorton? We will not be so used, no no. I for mine own part have forborne my breakfast, dinner, and supper to serve the Queen.

THROCKMORTON: Yea my good lord I know it right well, I meant not to touch your lordship, for your service and pains is evidently known to all men.

SOUTHWELL: Master Throckmorton, this talk needeth not, we know what we have to do, and you would teach us our duties, you hurt your matter. Go to, go to.

THROCKMORTON: Master Southwell, you mistake me, I meant not to teach you, nor none of you, but to remember you of that I trust you all be well instructed in; and so I satisfy myself, sith I shall not speak, thinking you all know what you have to do, or ought to know. So I will answer to the indictment, and do plead not guilty to the whole and to every part thereof.

SENDALL: How wilt thou be tried?

THROCKMORTON: Shall I be tried as I would, or as I should?

BROMLEY: You shall be tried as the law will, and therefore you must say by God and by the country.[3]

THROCKMORTON: Is that your law for me? It is not as I would, but sith you will have it so, I am pleased with it, and do desire to be tried by faithful just men, which more fear God than the world.

The names of the jurors

Lucar	Low
Young	Whetston
Martin	Painter
Beswick	Banks
Barscarfield	Calthrop
Beswick	Banks
Kightley	Cater

What time the Attorney went forthwith to Master Cholmley, and showed him the Sheriff's return, who being acquainted with the citizens, knowing the corruptions and dexterities[4] of them in such cases, noted certain to be challenged for the Queen (a rare case) and the same men being known to be sufficient and indifferent,[5] that no exceptions were to be taken to them, but only for their upright honesties. Nothwithstanding, the Attorney prompting the Sergeant Dyer, the said Sergeant challenged one Bacon, and another citizen peremptorily for the Queen. Then the prisoner demanded the cause of the challenge? The Sergeant answered, "We need not to show you the cause of the challenge for the Queen." Then the inquest was furnished with other honest men, that is to say, Whetston and Lucar. [...]

(The jury then was sworn, and proclamation made, that whosoever would give evidence against Sir Nicholas Throckmorton, knight, should come in and be heard, for the prisoner stood upon his deliverance, whereupon Sergeant Stanford presented himself[6] to speak) [...][7]

THROCKMORTON: But what doth the principal author of this matter say against me, I mean the Lord Thomas Grey[8] who is yet living? Why be not his depositions brought against me, for so it ought to be, if he can say anything? Will you know the truth? Neither the Lord Thomas Grey hath said, can say, or will say anything against me, notwithstanding the Duke his brother's confession and accusation, who hath affirmed many other things

[1] Blessed are they …righteousness one of the Beatitudes found in Matthew 5:6.

[2] peradventure by chance or accident, perchance.

[3] by God … country the formulaic response to Sendall's question, which Throckmorton challenges.

[4] dexterities adroitness, skills, talents.

[5] indifferent unbiased, neutral.

[6] himself i.e., Throckmorton.

[7] Throckmorton was charged with treason for his alleged plotting of a rebellion against Mary, which was led by Sir Thomas Wyatt. Evidence for these charges follows.

[8] Thomas Grey brother of Henry Grey, duke of Suffolk, and father of Lady Jane Grey.

besides the truth. I speak not without certain knowledge, for the Lord Thomas Grey, being my prison-fellow for a small time, informed me, that the Duke his brother had misreported him in many things, amongst others in matters touching me, which he had declared to you, Master Southwell, and other the examiners not long ago. I am sure if the Lord Thomas could, or would have said anything, it should have been here now. And as to the Duke's confession, it is not material, for he doth refer the matter to the Lord Thomas' report, who hath made my purgation.[1]

THE ATTORNEY: And it please you my lords and you my masters of the jury, besides these matters touching Wyatt's rebellion, Sir Peter Carew's treasons and confederating with the Duke of Suffolk, and besides the prisoner's conspiracy with the Earl of Devonshire, with Crofts, Rogers, Warner, and sundry others in sundry places, it shall manifestly appear unto you, that Throckmorton did conspire the Queen's Majesty's death, with William Thomas, Sir Nicholas Arnold, and other traitors intending the same, which is the greatest matter of all others, and most to be abhorred. And for proof hereof, you shall hear what Arnold saith.

Then was Sir Nicholas Arnold's confession read, saying that Throckmorton showed to him riding betwixt Highnam and Crossland in Gloucestershire, that John Fitzwilliams[2] was very much displeased with William Thomas.

ATTORNEY William Thomas devised, that John Fitzwilliams should kill the Queen, and Throckmorton knew of it, as appeareth by Arnold's confession.

[...]

STANFORD: Me think the matters confessed by others against you, together with your own confession, will weigh shrewdly.[3] But how say you to the rising in Kent,[4] and to Wyatt's attempt against the Queen's royal person at her palace?

BROMLEY: Why do you not read Wyatt's accusation to him, which doth make him partner to his treasons?

SOUTHWELL: Wyatt hath grievously accused you, and in many things that others have confirmed.

THROCKMORTON: Whatsoever Wyatt hath said of me in hope of his life he unsaid it at his death. For since I came into this hall, I heard one say (but I know him not) that Wyatt upon the scaffold did not only purge my Lady Elizabeth her Grace, and the Earl of Devonshire, but also all the gentlemen in the Tower, saying they were all ignorant of the stir and commotion. In which number I take myself.

HARE: Norwithstanding he said, all that he had written and confessed to the Council, was true.

SOUTHWELL: It appeareth that you have had good intelligence.

THROCKMORTON: Almighty God provided that revelation for me this day since I came hither, for I have been in close prison these eight and fifty days, where I heard nothing but what the birds told me, which did fly over my head. And now to you of my jury I speak specially, whom I desire to mark attentively what shall be said. I have been indicted, as it appeareth, and now am arraigned of compassing the Queen's Majesty's death, of levying war against the Queen, of taking the Tower of London, of deposing and depriving the Queen of her royal estate, and finally to destroy her, and of adherence to the Queen's enemies. Of all which treasons, to prove me guilty, the Queen's learned council hath given in evidence these points material; that is to say, for the compassing or imagining the Queen's death, and the destruction of her royal person, Sir Nicholas Arnold's depositions, which is that I should say to the said Sir Nicholas in Gloucestershire that Master John Fitzwilliams was angry with William Thomas.

Whereunto I have answered, as you have heard, both denying the matter, and for the proof on my

[1] purgation action of clearing oneself from the accusation or suspicion of crime or guilt.

[2] Sir Peter ... John Fitzwilliams figures implicated in the various uprisings that made up the rebellion.

[3] shrewdly sharply, severely.

[4] rising in Kent key uprising led by Sir Thomas Wyatt the younger.

side, do take exceptions, because there is no witness but one. And nevertheless, though it were granted, the depositions prove nothing concerning the Queen's death. For levying of war against the Queen, there is alleged my conference with Sir Thomas Wyatt, Sir James Crofts, Sir Edward Rogers, Sir Edward Warner against the marriage with Spain,[1] and the coming of the Spaniards hither, which talk I do not deny in sort as I spake it, and meant it, and notwithstanding the malicious gathering this day of my conference, proveth yet no levying of war. There is also alleged for proof of the same article, Sir James Croft's confession, which (as you remember) implieth no such thing, but general talk against the marriage with Spain. And of my departing westward with the Earl of Devon, which the said James doth not avow, and therefore I pray you consider it as not spoken. There is also for proof of the said article, the Duke of Suffolk's confession, with whom I never had conference and therefore he avouched[2] the tale of his brother's mouth, who hath made my purgation in those matters; and yet if the matter were proved, they be not greatly material in law. There is also alleged for the further proof of the same article, and for deposing and depriving the Queen of her royal estate, and for my adhering to the Queen's enemies, Cuthbert Vaughan's[3] confession, whose testimony I have sufficiently disproved by sundry authorities and circumstances, and principally by your own law, which doth require two lawful and sufficient witnesses to be brought face to face. Also for the taking of the Tower of London, there is alleged Winter's[4] depositions, which uttereth my misliking, when he uttered unto me Sir Thomas Wyatt's resolution and device for attempting of the said piece. And last of all, to enforce these matters, mine own confession is ingrieved[5] against me, wherein there doth appear neither treason, neither concealment of treason, neither whispering of treason, nor procurement of treason.

And forsomuch as I am come hither to be tried by the law, though my innocency of all these points material objected, be apparent to acquit me, whereto I do principally cleave,[6] yet I will for your better credit and satisfactions show you evidently, that if you would believe all the depositions laid against me, which I trust you will not do, I ought not to be attainted[7] of the treason comprised within my indictment, considering the statute of repeal the last Parliament, of all treasons, other than such as be declared in the five and twentieth year of King Edward the Third,[8] both which statutes, I pray you my lords, may be read here to the inquest.

BROMLEY: No sir, there shall be no books brought at your desire, we do all know the law sufficiently without book.

THROCKMORTON: Do you bring me hither to try me by the law, and will not show me the law? What is your knowledge of the law to these men's satisfactions, which have my trial in hand? I pray you my lords, and my lords all, let the statutes be read, as well for the Queen as for me.

STANFORD: My Lord Chief Justice can show the law, and will, if the jury do doubt of any point.

THROCKMORTON: You know it were indifferent that I should know and hear the law whereby I am adjudged, and forasmuch as the statute is in English, men of meaner learning than the justices can understand it, or else how should we know when we offend?

HARE: You know not what belongeth to your case, and therefore we must teach you. It appertaineth[9] not to us to provide books for you, neither sit we

---

1 marriage with Spain Mary I's unpopular marriage to Philip II of Spain, which was the impetus for the rebellion because of fears that it would bring England under Spanish domination.

2 avouched guaranteed, confirmed.

3 Cuthbert Vaughan one of Wyatt's lieutenants, who testified for Throckmorton's participation in the rebellion (DNB).

4 Winter one of four rebels never brought to trial.

5 ingrieved represented as grievous.

6 cleave stick fast, adhere.

7 attainted condemned.

8 Edward the Third ruled 1327-77 and established grounds for treason (in 1352) still in force under Mary I (Patterson, Reading Holinshed's Chronicles, pp. 165-66).

9 appertaineth be proper, appropriate to.

here to be taught of you, you should have taken better heed to the law before you had come hither.

THROCKMORTON: Because I am ignorant, I would learn, and therefore I have more need to see the law, and partly as well for the instructions to the jury, as for my own satisfaction, which me think were for the honour of this presence. And now if it please you my Lord Chief Justice, I do direct my speech specially to you. What time it pleased the Queen's Majesty, to call you to this honourable office, I did learn of a great personage of Her Highness' Privy Council, that amongst other good instructions, her Majesty charged and enjoined you to minister the law and justice indifferently without respect of persons.[1] And notwithstanding the old error amongst you, which did not admit any witness to speak or any other matter to be heard in the favour of the adversary, her Majesty being party, her Highness' pleasure was, that whatsoever could be brought in the favour of the subject, should be admitted to be heard. And moreover, that you specially, and likewise all other justices, should not persuade themselves to sin in judgement otherwise for her Highness, than for her subject. Therefore, this manner of indifferent proceeding being principally enjoined by God's commandment, which I had thought partly to have remembered you and others here in commission, in the beginning, if I might have had leave, and the same also being commanded you by the Queen's own mouth, me think you ought of right to suffer me to have the statutes read openly, and also to reject nothing that could be spoken in my defence; and in thus doing, you shall show yourselves worthy ministers, and fit for so worthy a mistress.

BROMLEY: You mistake the matter, the Queen spake those words to Master Morgan, chief justice of the Common Pleas, but you have no cause to complain, for you have been suffered to talk at your pleasure.

HARE: What would you do with the statute book? The jury doth not require it, they have heard the evidence, and they must upon their conscience try whether you be guilty or no, so as the book needeth not; if they will not credit the evidence so apparent, then they know not what they have to do.

CHOLMLEY: You ought not to have any books read here at your appointment, for where doth arise any doubt in the law, the judges sit here to inform the court, and now you do but spend time.

THE ATTORNEY: I pray you, my Lord Chief Justice, repeat the evidence for the Queen, and give the jury their charge, for the prisoner will keep you here all day.

BROMLEY: How say you? Have you any more to say for yourself?

THROCKMORTON: You seem to give and offer me the law, but in very deed I have only the form and image of the law; nevertheless, sith I cannot be suffered to have the statutes read openly in the book, I will by your patience guess at them as I may, and I pray you to help me if I mistake, for it is long since I did see them.

[...]

BROMLEY: Notwithstanding the principle (as you allege it) and the preciseness of your sticking to the bare words of the statute, it doth appear and remain of record in our learning, that diverse cases have been adjudged treason, without the express words of the statute, as the Queen's learned council there can declare.

THE ATTORNEY: It doth appear the prisoner did not only entice or procure Wyatt, Carew, Rogers, and others, to commit their traitorous act, and there doth his open facts appear, which Vaughan's confession doth witness, but also he did mind shortly after to associate himself with those traitors, for he minded to have departed with the Earl of Devonshire westward.

THROCKMORTON: My innocency concerning these matters I trust sufficiently appeareth by my former answers, notwithstanding the condemned man's unjust accusation. But because the true understanding of the statute is in question, I say procurement,[2] and specially by words only, is without the compass of it, and that I do learn and prove by the principle which I learned of Master Stanford.

[1] respect of persons regard for class and position.

[2] procurement accomplishing, or bringing about, instigation.

STANFORD: Master Throckmorton, you and I may not agree this day in the understanding of the law, for I am for the Queen, and you are for yourself; the judges must determine the matter.

BROMLEY: He that doth procure another man to commit a felony or a murther,[1] I am sure you know well enough the law doth adjudge the procurer there a felon or a murtherer; and in case of treason it hath been always so taken and reputed.

THROCKMORTON: I do and must cleave to my innocence, for I procured no man to commit treason, but yet for my learning I desire to hear some case so ruled when the law was as it is now. I do confess it, that at such time there were statutes provided for the procurer, counsellor, aider, abetter, and such like, as there were in King Henry the Eight's time;[2] you might lawfully make this cruel construction, and bring the procurer within the compass of the law. Happy for Throckmorton that those statutes stood then repealed. But these statutes being repealed you ought not now so to do, and as to the principal procurer in felony and murther, it is not like as in treason, for the principal and accessaries in felony and murther be tryable and punishable by the common law, and so in those cases the judges may use their equity, extending the determination of the fault as they think good, but in treason it is otherwise, the same being limited by statute, which I say and avow is restrained from any judge's construction, by the maxim that I recited.

[...]

SANDERS: The law always in cases of treason doth account all principals and no accessories as in other offences, and therefore a man offending in treason, either by covert act or procurement, whereupon an open deed hath ensued, as in this case, is adjudged by the law a principal traitor.

THROCKMORTON: You adjudge (me think) procurement very hardly, besides the principal, and besides the good proviso, and besides the good example of your best and most godly learned predecessors, the judges of the realm, as I have partly declared, and notwithstanding this grievous racking and extending of this word procurement, I am not in the danger of it, for it doth appear by no deposition that I procured neither one or other to attempt any act.

STANFORD: The jury have to try whether it be so or no, let it weigh as it will.

HARE: I know no mean so apparent to try procurement as by words, and that mean is probably enough against you, as well by your own confession, as by other men's depositions.

THROCKMORTON: To talk of the Queen's marriage with the Prince of Spain, and also the coming hither of the Spaniards, is not to procure treason to be done, for then the whole Parliament house, I mean the common house, did procure treason. But sith you will make no difference betwixt words and acts, I pray you remember a statute made in my late sovereign lord and master's time, King Edward the Sixth, which apparently expressed the difference. These be the words: "Whosoever doth compass or imagine to depose the King of his royal estate by open preaching, express words or sayings, shall for the first offense lose and forfeit to the King all his and their goods and chattels, and also shall suffer imprisonment of their bodies at the King's will and pleasure. Whosoever, etc., for the second offence shall lose and forfeit to the King the whole issues and profits of all his or their lands, tenements and other hereditaments, benefices, prebends,[3] and other spiritual promotions. Whosoever, etc., for the third offence, shall for term of life or lives of such offender or offenders, etc., and shall also forfeit to the King's Majesty, all his or their goods and chattels, and suffer during his or their lives perpetual imprisonment of his or their bodies. But whosoever, etc., by writing, ciphering, or act, etc., shall for the first offence be adjudged a traitor, and suffer the pains of death." Here you may perceive how the whole realm and all your judgements hath before this understood words and acts diversely[1] and apparently.[2] And therefore the judgements of the Parliament did assign diversity of punishments, because they would not confound the true understanding of words and deeds, appointing for compassing and imagining by word, imprisonment, and for compassing and imagining by open deed, pains of death.

[1] murther murder.

[2] King Henry the Eight's time expansion of grounds for treason under Henry's 1534 legislation.

[3] hereditaments, benefices, prebends property that can be inherited; ecclesiastical living; portion of land or tithe from which the clergy stipend is gathered.

BROMLEY: It is agreed by the whole bench, that the procurer and the adherent be deemed always traitors, when as a traitorous act was committed by any one of the same conspiracy, and there is apparent proof of your adhering to Wyatt, both by your own confession and other ways.

THROCKMORTON: Adhering and procuring be not all one, for the statute of Edward the Third doth speak of adhering, but not of procuring, and yet adhering ought not to be further extended than to the Queen's enemies within her realm, for so the statute doth limit the understanding. And Wyatt was not the Queen's enemy, for he was not so reputed when I talked with him last, and our speech implied no enemy, neither tended to any treason, or procuring of treason, and therefore I pray you of the jury note, though I argue the law, I allege mine innocence, as the best part of my defense.

HARE: Your adhering to the Queen's enemies within the realm, is evidently proved, for Wyatt was the Queen's enemy within the realm, as the whole realm knoweth it, and he hath confessed it both at his arraignment and at his death.

[...]

THE ATTORNEY: Master Throckmorton, quiet yourself, and it shall be the better for you.

THROCKMORTON: Master Attorney, I am not so unquiet as you be, and yet our cases are not alike, but because I am so tedious to you, and have long troubled this presence, it may please my Lord Chief Justice to repeat the evidence wherewith I am charged, and my answers to all the objections, if there be no other matter to lay against me.

Then the Chief Justice remembered particularly all the depositions and evidences given against the prisoner, and either for want of good memory, or good will, the prisoner's answers were in part not recited, whereupon the prisoner craved indifferency, and did help the judges' old memory with his own recital.

[...]

Upon the prisoner's suit on this behalf (that no one have access to the jury), the bench gave order that two sergeants were sworn to suffer no man to repair to the jury, until they were agreed according unto order. Whereupon, then the prisoner was by commandment of the bench withdrawn from the bar, and the court adjourned until three of the clock at afternoon, at which hour the commissioners returned to the Guildhall, and there did tarry until the jury were agreed upon the verdict. And about five of the clock, their agreement being advertised to the commissioners, the said prisoner, Sir Nicholas Throckmorton, was again brought to the bar, where also the jury did repair, and being demanded whether they were agreed upon their verdict, answered universally with one voice, "Yea." Then it was asked who should speak for them; they answered, Whetston, the foreman.

SENDALL: Nicholas Throckmorton, knight, hold up thy hand.

Then the prisoner did so upon the summons.

SENDALL: You that be of the jury, look upon the prisoner.

The jury did as they were enjoined.

[1] diversely in a different way.

[2] apparently evidently or manifestly to the understanding.

SENDALL: How say you, is Master Throckmorton, knight, there prisoner at the bar, guilty of the treasons whereof he hath been indicted and arraigned in manner and form, yea or no?

WHETSTON: No.

SENDALL: How say you, did he fly from them?

WHETSTON: No, we find no such thing.

THROCKMORTON: I had forgotten to answer that question before, but your have found according to truth, and for the better warranty[1] of your doings, understand that I came to London, and so to the Queen's Council unbrought, when I understood they demanded for me, and yet I was almost an hundred miles from hence, where if I had not presumed upon my truth, I could have withdrawn myself from catching.

BROMLEY: How say you the rest of you, is Whetston's verdict all your verdicts?

The whole inquest answered, "Yea."

BROMLEY: Remember yourselves better, have you considered substantially the whole evidence in sort as it was declared and recited; the matter doth touch the Queen's Highness, and yourselves also, take good heed what you do.

WHETSTON: My Lord, we have throughly[2] considered the evidence laid against the prisoner, and his answers to all these matters, and accordingly we have found him not guilty agreeable to all our consciences.

BROMLEY: If you have done well, it is the better for you.

THROCKMORTON: It is better to be tried than to live suspected. Blessed be the Lord God of Israel, for he hath visited and redeemed his people, and hath raised up a mighty salvation for us in the house of his servant David.[3] And it may please you, my Lord Chief Justice, forsomuch as I have been indicted and arraigned of sundry treasons, and have according to the law put my trial to God and my country, that is to say, to these honest men which have found me not guilty, I humbly beseech you give me such benefit, acquittal, and judgement, as the law in this case doth appoint.

When the prisoner had said these words the commissioners consulted together.

THROCKMORTON: May it please you, my Lord Chief Justice, to pronounce sentence for my discharge?

BROMLEY: Whereas you do ask the benefit that the law in such case doth appoint I will give it you; to wit, that where you have been indicted of sundry high treasons, and have been here this day before the Queen's commissioners and justices arraigned of the said treasons, whereunto you have pleaded not guilty, and have for trial therein put yourself on God and your country, and they have found you not guilty, the court doth award that you be clearly discharged, paying your fees. Notwithstanding, Master Lieutenant take him with you again, for there are other matters to charge him withall.[4]

THROCKMORTON: It may please you my lords and masters of the Queen's Highness' Privy Council, to be on my behalf humble suitors to her Majesty, that like as the law this day (God be praised) has purged me of the treasons wherewith I was most dangerously charged, so it might please her excellent Majesty to purge me in her private judgement, and both forgive and forget my overrash boldness, that I used in talk of her Highness' marriage with the Prince of Spain, matters too far above my capacity, and I very unable to consider the gravity thereof, a matter impertinent for me a private person to talk of, which did appertain to her Highness' Privy Council to have in deliberation. And if it shall please her Highness of her bountiful liberality, to remit my former oversight, I shall think myself happy for trial of the danger that I have this day escaped, and may thereby admonish me to eschew[5] things above my reach, and also to instruct me to deal with matters agreeable to my vocation. And God save the Queen's Majesty, and grant the [1] warranty substantiating evidence or witness.

[2] throughly thoroughly.

[3] Blessed be … David Luke 1:68-69.

[4] withall also.

[5] eschew avoid, shun.

same long to reign over us. And the same Lord be praised for you the magistrates, before whom I have had my trial this day indifferently by the law, and you have proceeded with me accordingly; and the grace of God be amongst you now and ever.

There was no answer made by any of the Bench to the prisoner's suit, but the Attorney did speak these words.

THE ATTORNEY: And it please you my lords, forsomuch as it seemeth that these men of the jury, which have strangely[1] acquitted the prisoner of his treasons whereof he was indicted, will forthwith depart the court, I pray you for the Queen, that they, and every of them may be bound in a recognisance of five hundred pounds a piece, to answer to such matters as they shall be charged with in the Queen's behalf, whensoever they shall be charged or called.[2]

WHETSTON I pray you, my lords, be good to us, and let us not be molested for discharging our consciences truly. We be poor merchant men and have great charge[3] upon our hands, and our livings do depend upon our travels, therefore it may please you to appoint us a certain day for our appearance, for perhaps some of us may be in foreign parts about our business.

Thus much for Sir Nicholas Throckmorton's arraignment, wherein is to be considered that the repealing of certain statutes in the last Parliament was the chief matter he had to allege for his advantage; whereas the repealing of the same statutes was meant notwithstanding for another purpose (as before you have partly heard), which statutes or the effect of the chief branches of them have been since that time again revived, as by the books of the statutes it may better appear, to which I refer the reader.[4]

—1587

[1] strangely surprisingly, unaccountably.

[2] bound … called The jurors were sent to prison and eventually called before the Star Chamber judges, where four confessed that their verdict had been in error. The other eight did not and were sentenced to pay fines ranging from £100 to £2,000 each (Patterson, Reading Holinshed's Chronicles, p. 178).

[3] charge load, burden.

[4] Thus much …reader A. Patterson notes that "on the one hand, Holinshed seems to be offering his readers a warning against any enjoyment of Throckmorton's escape, a reminder that he was able, and perhaps improperly, to take an advantage of a loophole in the law that had now, under Elizabeth, been properly closed. On the other hand, not only does the mere presence of the trial in the Chronicles serve an educational function, the making of knowledgeable citizens and future jurors, but the reader is explicitly directed to that very source of knowledge of the law that Throckmorton's judges wanted to withhold ..." (Reading Holinshed's Chronicles, p. 182).

William Harrison
1535-1593

Church of England minister and historian, William Harrison was born in London and received an excellent education at St Paul's School, Westminster, and Oxford University. From Oxford he graduated BA in 1557, and soon after accepted both a fellowship at Merton College and ordination as a Catholic priest (1558).

There is evidence that Harrison's decision to surrender his fellowship and take up the position of chaplain to William Brooke, Lord Cobham—to whom he dedicated his Historical Description of the Island of Britain—was motivated by Harrison's growing disenchantment with Catholicism and his slow movement towards "a fundamentally Protestant, Pauline faith."[1] Cobham remained a patron and supporter throughout Harrison's career in the Church of England, giving him the rectory of Radwinter, Essex in 1559. Interestingly, the Puritan minister and writer Richard Rogers [see above, pp. 440-45] was Harrison's curate; Rogers commented that "it is much unfitting for him that professeth divinity, to apply his time unto ... contemplation of civil histories."[2] Sometime after taking his MA in 1560, Harrison married Marion Isebrand, a marriage which resulted in four children, one of whom, Edmund, went on to become a Church of England minister. Although Harrison remained rector of Radwinter until his death, he was also made canon of Windsor in 1586 and it was at Windsor he died in 1593, having "despair[ed] at England's failure to emulate the social ideals of protestant humanism."[3]

Harrison's Historical Description of the Island of Britain, which appeared in volume 1 of Holinshed's Chronicles in 1577, was revised and enlarged for the Chronicles' 1587 edition (Vols. 1 and 2). Long recognized as the most complete sixteenth-century account of England's social behaviour and customs, the Historical Description is also a mine of information about how Harrison and his sixteenth-century readers conceptualized their present society and culture as well as its links to the medieval and distant past. Harrison's reputation as a historian is presently being re-evaluated, with critics beginning to examine the way his recounting of England's past, both in Description and in his unpublished works, is fashioned through his deep commitment to Protestantism generally and Protestant humanism in particular.[4]

EDITION: An Historical Description of the Island of Britain. Contained in Raphael Holinshed's The first and second volumes of Chronicles, comprising 1 The description and historie of England, 2 The description and historie of Ireland, 3 The description and historie of Scotland: first collected and published by Raphaell Holinshed, William Harrison, and others: now newlie augmented and continued ... to the yeare 1586. London: at the expenses of John Harrison, George Bishop, Rafe Newbery, Henry Denham, and Thomas Woodcocke. Printed [by Henry Denham], 1587. STC 13569.

ADDITIONAL ONLINE TEXTS: From "Chapter 12: Of the Manner of Building and Furniture of Our Houses," and from "Chapter 20: Of Gardens and Orchards" in An Historical Description of the Island of Britain (1587).

[1] G.J.R. Parry, "William Harrison," DLB 136, p. 202.
[2] Quoted in Parry, "William Harrison," DLB 136, p. 204.
[3] G.J.R. Parry, "William Harrison," DNB online, 2005.
[4] Parry, "William Harrison," DLB 136, p. 201.

from An Historical Description of the Island of Britain:

With a Brief Rehearsal of the Nature and Qualities of the People of England, and Such Commodities as Are to Be Found in the Same.

Comprehended in Three Books, and Written by W.H.

BOOK II: THE DESCRIPTION OF ENGLAND

Chapter 3: Of Universities

[...]

They[1] were erected by their founders at the first only for poor men's sons, whose parents were not able to bring them up unto learning, but now they have the least benefit of them, by reason the rich do so encroach upon them. And so far hath this inconvenience[2] spread itself that it is in my time a hard matter for a poor man's child to come by a fellowship (though he be never so good a scholar and worthy of that room[3]). Such packing[4] also is used at elections that not he which best deserveth, but he that hath most friends, though he be the worst scholar, is always surest to speed,[5] which will turn in the end to the overthrow of learning. That some gentlemen also, whose friends have been in times past benefactors to certain of those houses,[6] do intrude into the disposition of their estates, without all respect of order or statutes devised by the founders, only thereby to place whom they think good (and not without some hope of gain), the case is too, too evident; and their attempt would soon take place if their superiors did not provide to bridle their endeavours. In some grammar schools likewise, which send scholars to these universities, it is lamentable to see what bribery is used; for, ere the scholar can be preferred, such bribage[7] is made that poor men's children are commonly shut out and the richer sort received (who in time past thought it dishonour to live, as it were, upon alms), and yet, being placed, most of them study little other than histories, tables,[8] dice, and trifles, as men that make not the living by their study the end of their purposes, which is a lamentable hearing.[9] Beside this, being for the most part either gentlemen or rich men's sons, they oft bring the universities into much slander. For, standing upon their reputation and liberty, they ruffle and roist it out,[10] exceeding in apparel and haunting riotous company (which draweth them from their books unto another trade). And for excuse, when they are charged with breach of all good order, think it sufficient to say that they be gentlemen, which grieveth many not a little.

[...]

And thus much in general of our noble universities, whose lands some greedy gripers do gape wide for, and of late have (as I hear) propounded sundry reasons whereby they supposed to have prevailed in their purposes. But who are those that have attempted this suit, other than such as either hate learning, piety, and wisdom, or else have spent all their own and know not otherwise than by encroaching upon other men how to maintain themselves? When such a motion was made by some unto King Henry VIII, he could answer them in this manner:

---

1 They i.e., the colleges which comprise the universities of Oxford and Cambridge.

2 inconvenience evil.

3 room position, place.

4 packing underhanded arrangement; contriving, plotting.

5 speed succeed, prosper; achieve his desire.

6 houses colleges.

7 bribage exaction of illegal fees by officials.

8 histories The reference here may be to romances (history as a genre in the Renaissance could refer to stories both true and fictional); tables the ordinary name for the board-game backgammon (obsolete since c. 1750).

9 hearing report.

10 ruffle to make a great stir or display; to bear oneself proudly or arrogantly; roist it out to perform the actions of a riotous person or swaggering bully.

"Ah, sirrah, I perceive the abbey lands have fleshed[1] you and set your teeth on edge to ask also those colleges. And whereas we had a regard only to pull down sin by defacing the monasteries, you have a desire also to overthrow all goodness by subversion of colleges. I tell you, sirs, that I judge no land in England better bestowed than that which is given to our universities, for by their maintenance our realm shall be well-governed when we be dead and rotten. As you love your welfares, therefore, follow no more this vein,[2] but content yourselves with that you have already, or else seek honest means whereby to increase your livelods,[3] for I love not learning so ill that I will impair the revenues of any one house by a penny whereby it may be upholden."

In King Edward's days likewise the same suit was once again attempted (as I have heard), but in vain; for, sayeth the duke of Somerset,[4] among other speeches tending to that end—who also made answer thereunto in the King's presence by his assignation[5]—

"If learning decay, which of wild men maketh civil, of blockish and rash persons wise and godly counsellors, of obstinate rebels obedient subjects, and of evil men good and godly Christians, what shall we look for else but barbarism and tumult? For when the lands of colleges be gone, it shall be hard to say whose staff shall stand next the door;[6] for then I doubt not but the state of bishops, rich farmers, merchants, and the nobility shall be assailed by such as live to spend all and think that whatsoever another man hath is more mete[7] for them, and to be at their commandment, than for the proper owner that hath sweat and laboured for it."

In Queen Mary's days the weather was too warm for any such course to be taken in hand; but in the time of our gracious Queen Elizabeth, I hear that it was after a sort in talk the third time,[8] but without success, as moved also out of season,[9] and so I hope it shall continue forever. For what comfort should it be for any good man to see his country brought into the estate of the old Goths and Vandals,[10] who made laws against learning and would not suffer any skilful man to come into their council house, by means whereof those people became savage tyrants and merciless hell-hounds, till they restored learning again and thereby fell to civility?

Chapter 5: Of Degrees of People in the Commonwealth of England

[...]

Gentlemen be those whom their race and blood,[11] or at the least their virtues, do make noble and known.

[...]

Moreover, as the King doth dub knights and createth the barons and higher degrees, so gentlemen whose ancestors are not known to come in with

---

1 fleshed incited.

2 <*> Now abbeys be gone, our dingthrifts [i.e., spendthrifts, prodigals] pry after church and college possessions [Description's note].

3 livelods livelihoods (revenues).

4 Edward Seymour, duke of Somerset (c. 1500-52), lord protector of England during the minority of Edward VI, Henry VIII's heir.

5 by his assignation by the King's order.

6 whose staff shall stand next the door To say that "your staff stands next to the door" is to say "it is your turn next" (Tilley S806). See Hall's Chronicles Henry VII fol. 13 (1550): "... when thy neighbour's house is afire, thy staff standeth next the door."

7 mete appropriate, fitting, apt.

8 I.e., the subject of seizing college lands was revisited a third time.

9 moved also out of season suggested at an inappropriate or inopportune time.

10 In book 2, chapter 11: "Of Sundry Kinds of Punishments Appointed for Malefactors," Harrison explains the English legal custom of remitting punishment for certain crimes if the accused showed that he could read (but only if these crimes represented a first offence). He speculates that this law sprang from some Saxon prince's attempt "to train the inhabiters of this land to the love of learning" which previously had been despised. He offers the analogous contempt of the Goths and Vandals for learning: they believed it "weaken[ed] [the] courage" of their leaders, and they would allow no learned man to deliberate on matters of state (Holinshed's Chronicles, ed. Sir Henry Ellis, 6 vols. [London, 1807; rept. New York, 1976], 1.313).

11 <*> Gentlemen [Description's note].

William, duke of Normandy (for of the Saxon races yet remaining we now make none accompt,[1] much less of the British issue),[2] do take their beginning in England after this manner in our times:[3] whosoever studieth the laws of the realm; whoso abideth in the university giving his mind to his book; or professeth physic and the liberal sciences; or, beside his service in the room of a captain in the wars or good counsel given at home, whereby his commonwealth is benefitted, can live without manual labour, and thereto is able and will bear the port, charge, and countenance[4] of a gentleman, he shall for money have a coat and arms[5] bestowed upon him by heralds (who in the charter of the same do of custom pretend antiquity and service and many gay things), and thereunto being made so good cheap, be called "master," which is the title that men give to esquires[6] and gentlemen, and reputed for a gentleman ever after; which is so much the less to be disallowed of for that the prince doth lose nothing by it, the gentleman being so much subject to taxes and public payments as is the yeoman or husbandman, which he likewise doth bear the gladlier for the saving of his reputation. Being called also to the wars (for with the government of the commonwealth he meddleth little), whatsoever it cost him, he will both array and arm himself accordingly, and show the more manly courage and all the tokens of the person which he representeth. No man hath hurt by it but himself who peradventure will go in wider buskins[7] than his legs will bear or, as our proverb sayeth, now and then "bear a bigger sail than his boat is able to sustain."

Certes[8] the making of new gentlemen bred great strife sometimes amongst the Romans—I mean when those which were novi homines[9] were more allowed of for their virtues newly seen and showed than the old smell of ancient race, lately defaced by the cowardice and evil life of their nephews and dependants,[10] could make the other to be. But as envy hath no affinity with justice and equity, so it forceth not[11] what language the malicious do give out against such as are exalted for their wisdoms. This nevertheless is generally to be reprehended in all estates of gentility, and which in short time will turn to the great ruin of our country: and that is the usual sending of noblemen's and mean[12] gentlemen's sons into Italy, from whence they bring home nothing but mere atheism, infidelity, vicious conversation, and ambitious and proud behaviour, whereby it cometh to pass that they return far worse men than they went out. A gentleman at this present is newly come out of Italy who went thither an earnest Protestant, but coming home he could say after this manner: "Faith and truth is to be kept where no loss or hindrance of a further purpose is sustained by holding of the same, and forgiveness only to be showed when full revenge is made." Another, no less forward than he, at his return from thence could add thus much: "He is a fool that maketh accompt of any religion, but more fool that will lose any part of his wealth or will come in trouble for constant leaning to any;[13] but if he yield to

[1] accompt account.

[2] "Saxons" refers here to the descendants of those Germanic tribes who invaded and settled in England in the fifth and sixth centuries CE. "British issue" refers to those descended from the ancient peoples, the Celts or Britons, who inhabited England before the coming of the Saxons. England saw its last great invasion by the Norman French under William, duke of Normandy in 1066; make none accompt to regard as unimportant; to treat as valueless.

[3] <*> Lawyers. Students in universities. Physicians. Captains [Description's note].

[4] port bearing, deportment (more specifically, "style of living," especially, a grand or expensive style); charge expense; countenance behaviour, conduct (perhaps more specifically, "position, standing, dignity").

[5] coat and arms i.e., coat of arms, heraldic arms, armorial bearings.

[6] esquire a man belonging to the higher order of English gentry, ranking below a knight.

[7] buskins coverings for the foot and leg reaching to the calf or to the knee; half-boots; proverb, "Make not your sail too big for the ballast (the boat)" (Tilley S24).

[8] Certes certainly.

[9] Latin, "new men."

[10] dependants in the 1587 edition, "defendants" (a printer's error). Ellis suggests "dependants" (Holinshed's Chronicles, 1.273).

[11] it forceth not it is of no importance; it does not matter.

[12] mean inferior in rank or quality; lowly.

[13] leaning to any inclination or tendency to any religion.

lose his life for his possession,[1] he is stark mad and worthy to be taken for most fool of all the rest." This gay booty[2] got these gentlemen by going into Italy, and hereby a man may see what fruit is afterward to be looked for where such blossoms do appear. "I care not," sayeth a third, "what you talk to me of God, so as I may have the prince and the laws of the realm on my side."[3] Such men as this last are easily known, for they have learned in Italy to go up and down also in England with pages at their heels finely apparelled, whose face and countenance shall be such as showeth the master not to be blind in his choice.[4] But lest I should offend too much, I pass over to say any more of these Italianates[5] and their demeanour, which alas is too open and manifest to the world, and yet not called into question. [...]

In this place also are our merchants to be installed,[6] as amongst the citizens (although they often change estate with gentlemen, as gentlemen do with them, by a mutual conversion of the one into the other), whose number is so increased in these our days that their only maintenance[7] is the cause of the exceeding prices of foreign wares, which otherwise, when every nation was permitted to bring in her own commodities, were far better cheap and more plentifully to be had. Of the want[8] of our commodities here at home by their great transportation of them into other countries I speak not, sith[9] the matter will easily bewray[10] itself. Certes among the Lacedaemonians it was found out that great numbers of merchants were nothing to the furtherance of the state of the commonwealth,[11] wherefore it is to be wished that the huge heap of them were somewhat restrained, as also of our lawyers; so should the rest live more easily upon their own, and few honest chapmen[12] be brought to decay by breaking of the bankrupt. I do not deny but that the navy of the land is in part maintained by their traffic, and so are the high prices of wares kept up, now they have gotten the only sale of things,[13] upon pretence of better furtherance of the commonwealth, into their own hands; whereas in times past, when the strange bottoms[14] were suffered to come in, we had sugar for four pence the pound that now, at the writing of this treatise, is well worth half-a-crown; raisins or currants for a penny that now are holden at six pence, and sometime at eight pence and ten pence the pound. [...]

Yeomen are those which by our law are called legales homines,[15] free men born English, and may dispend of their own free land[16] in yearly revenue to the sum of forty shillings sterling, or £6 as money goeth in our times. [...] The truth is that the word is derived from the Saxon term zeoman, or geoman, which signifieth (as I have read) a settled or

[1] possession his "owning" of this religious conviction.

[2] gay booty excellent prize.

[3] This comment and those that precede it are all typical distortions of precepts in Niccolò Machiavelli's political treatise, The Prince, a work which Protestant reformers often represented as embodying Italy's cultural and moral corruption. Machiavelli does recommend that a sensible ruler will break his word if adherence to it would disadvantage him in some way. He also asserts that while it is important for a ruler to seem religious, he should be ready to sacrifice religious commitments if to maintain them would be to endanger the stability of the state. However, Harrison's examples largely reflect the widely accepted view in Renaissance England that Italy embraced an amoral pragmatism in matters of religion and politics.

[4] pages … face … choice The young Italianate Englishmen have chosen their pages on the basis of these young boys'/men's physical beauty, the implication being that the Englishmen have learned homosexual practices as well as atheism during their sojourn in Italy.

[5] Italianates Italianate persons. A popular Italian proverb at the time was Inglese Italianato è un diavolo incarnato ("An Englishman Italianate is a devil incarnate").

[6] I.e., among the citizens and burgesses whom Harrison has just finished describing. <*> Merchants [Description's note].

[7] I.e., the merchants' desire to maintain themselves in luxury is the sole cause of the expensiveness of imported products.

[8] want lack.

[9] sith since, seeing that.

[10] bewray reveal, disclose.

[11] Lycurgus, famous ancient legislator, restricted trade as part of his wide-ranging reform of Spartan (Lacedaemonian) political and economic institutions.

[12] chapmen traders, dealers, merchants.

[13] the only sale of things i.e., a monopoly on the sale of products.

[14] strange bottoms foreign ships (where "bottoms" refers to a part of the hull of a ship).

[15] Latin, "lawful men"; at the time, men were labelled probi et legales homines (Latin, "good and lawful men") if they were qualified to serve on juries (Bouvier Law Dictionary); <*> Yeomen [Description's note].

[16] dispend … land to have an income from land.

staid man, such I mean as, being married and of some years, betaketh himself to stay in the place of his abode for the better maintenance of himself and his family, whereof the single sort have no regard but are likely to be still fleeting, now hither, now thither, which argueth want[1] of stability in determination and resolution of judgment for the execution of things of any importance. This sort of people have a certain pre-eminence and more estimation than labourers and the common sort of artificers,[2] and these commonly live wealthily, keep good houses, and travail[3] to get riches. They are also for the most part farmers to gentlemen (in old time called pagani, et opponuntur militibus, and therefore Persius calleth himself semipaganus[4]) or at the leastwise artificers; and with grazing, frequenting of markets, and keeping of servants (not idle servants as the gentlemen do, but such as get both their own and part of their master's living) do come to great wealth, insomuch that many of them are able and do buy the lands of unthrifty gentlemen, and often, setting their sons to the schools, to the universities, and to the Inns of the Court,[5] or otherwise leaving them sufficient lands whereupon they may live without labour, do make them by those means to become gentlemen; these were they that in times past made all France afraid.[6] And albeit they be not called "master" as gentlemen are, or "sir," as to knights appertaineth, but only "John" and "Thomas," etc., yet have they been found to have done very good service;[7] and the kings of England in foughten[8] battles were wont to remain among them (who were their footmen) as the French kings did amongst their horsemen, the prince thereby showing where his chief strength did consist.

The fourth and last sort of people in England[9] are day labourers, poor husbandmen, and some retailers (which have no free land), copyholders,[10] and all artificers, as tailors, shoemakers, carpenters, brickmakers, masons, etc. As for slaves and bondmen, we have none;[11] nay, such is the privilege of our country by the especial grace of God and bounty of our princes that if any come hither from other realms, so soon as they set foot on land they become so free of condition as their masters, whereby all note of servile bondage is utterly removed from them, wherein we resemble not the Germans—who had slaves also, though such as in respect of the slaves of other countries might well be reputed free—but the old Indians and the Taprobanes[12]—who supposed it a great injury to nature to make or suffer them to be bond whom she in her wonted[13] course doth product[14] and bring forth free. This fourth and last sort of people, therefore, have neither voice nor authority in the commonwealth, but are to be ruled and not to rule other; yet they are not altogether neglected, for in cities and corporate towns, for default of yeomen, they are fain to make up their inquests[15]

---

1 want lack, absence.

2 artificers craftsmen, especially those engaged in industrial handicraft.

3 travail labour, work.

4 pagani, et opponuntur militibus Latin, "country-men [farmers] as opposed to soldiers." The Roman poet Persius calls himself semipaganus in the Prologue to his Satires (ll. 6-7): "It is but as a half-member of the community that I bring my lay to the holy feast of bards" (p. 311). Pagani means "members of the village community." See Juvenal and Persius, trans. G.G. Ramsay (Cambridge, MA, 1957), p. 311, note 5.

5 Inns of the Court the four sets of buildings in London (the Inner Temple, the Middle Temple, Lincoln's Inn, and Gray's Inn) belonging to the four legal societies which trained lawyers in the period.

6 a reference to the yeoman archers at the battle of Agincourt.

7 <*> Englishmen on foot and Frenchmen on horseback best [Description's note].

8 foughten fought.

9 <*> Capite censi or Proletarii [Description's note]. In ancient Rome, the capite censi ("registered by headcount") or proletarii ("the lowest class") were those not able to meet the property requirements for military service.

10 copyholder an individual who holds land by copyhold, a type of land tenure where the holder's claim was proven by reference to the manorial role; by the fifteenth century most tenants on a manorial estate held their land by copyhold in return for a yearly rent (J.P. Kenyon, Wordsworth Dictionary of British History, p. 92).

11 <*> No slaves nor bondmen in England [Description's note].

12 Taprobanes inhabitants of Ceylon, present-day Sri Lanka (Topographical Dict., p. 500).

13 wonted customary, usual.

14 product produce; bring forth, beget.

15 they are fain to make up their inquests i.e., they are willing or happy to compose their inquests (juries).

of such manner of people. And in villages they are commonly made churchwardens, sidemen, aleconners, now and then constables, and many times enjoy the name of headboroughs.[1]

Unto this sort also may our great swarms of idle servingmen be referred, of whom there runneth a proverb, "Young servingmen, old beggars," because service is none heritage.[2] These men are profitable to none, for if their condition be well perused, they are enemies to their masters, to their friends, and to themselves; for by them oftentimes their masters are encouraged unto unlawful exactions of their tenants, their friends brought unto poverty by their rents enhanced, and they themselves brought to confusion by their own prodigality and errors, as men that, having not wherewith of their own to maintain their excesses, do search in highways, budgets, coffers, mails, and stables which way to supply their wants.[3] How divers of them also, coveting to bear an high sail,[4] do insinuate themselves with young gentlemen and noblemen newly come to their lands, the case is too much apparent, whereby the good natures of the parties are not only a little impaired but also their livelihoods and revenues so wasted and consumed that if at all, yet not in many years, they shall be able to recover themselves. It were very good, therefore, that the superfluous heaps of them were in part diminished. And sith necessity enforceth to have some, yet let wisdom moderate their numbers; so shall their masters be rid of unnecessary charge and the commonwealth of many thieves. No nation cherisheth such store of them as we do here in England, in hope of which maintenance many give themselves to idleness that otherwise would be brought to labour and live in order like subjects. Of their whoredoms I will not speak anything at all, more than of their swearing, yet is it found that some of them do make the first a chief pillar of their building, consuming not only the goods but also the health and welfare of many honest gentlemen, citizens, wealthy yeomen, etc., by such unlawful dealings.

[...]

Chapter 6: Of the Food and Diet of the English

[...]

In number of dishes and change of meat, the nobility of England (whose cooks are for the most part musical-headed Frenchmen and strangers[5]) do most exceed, sith there is no day in manner that passeth over their heads wherein they have not only beef, mutton, veal, lamb, kid, pork, cony, capon, pig,[6] or so many of these as the season yieldeth, but also some portion of the red or fallow deer, beside great variety of fish and wild fowl, and thereto sundry other delicates[7] wherein the sweet hand of the seafaring Portingale is not wanting;[8] so that for a man to dine with one of them and to taste of every dish that standeth before him (which few use to do, but each one feedeth upon that meat him best liketh for the time, the beginning of every dish notwithstanding being reserved unto the greatest personage that sitteth at the table, to whom it is drawn up still by the waiters, as order requireth, and from whom it descendeth again even to the lower end, whereby

[1] churchwarden lay representative of the parish in matters of church organization, elected to assist the minister in his administrative duties; sideman sidesman: elected to assist the churchwardens of a parish; aleconner an elected examiner or inspector of ale, responsible for verifying its quality (also responsible for the quality of beer and bread); constable here, a petty or parish constable, appointed as a keeper of the peace and performer of various administrative duties in his district; headborough a parish officer identical in functions with the petty constable.

[2] Proverb, "A young servingman an old beggar" (Tilley S256). See also S255 and C737.

[3] budgets pouches, bags, wallets; mails travelling bags; wants needs, necessities.

[4] to bear an high sail to be exalted, to be prosperous.

[5] musical-headed While this sentence is listed in the OED, the connotations of the word are not commented on; strangers foreigners.

[6] cony rabbit; capon a castrated cock, considered a delicacy in the period; pig a young or suckling pig.

[7] delicates delicacies.

[8] Portingale Portuguese; wanting lacking, absent.

each one may taste thereof) is rather to yield unto a conspiracy with a great deal of meat for the speedy suppression of natural health than the use of a necessary mean[1] to satisfy himself with a competent repast, to sustain his body withal. But as this large feeding is not seen in their guests, no more is it in their own persons, for sith they have daily much resort unto their tables (and many times unlooked for),[2] and thereto retain great numbers of servants, it is very requisite and expedient for them to be somewhat plentiful in this behalf.

[...]

The artificer and husbandman make greatest accompt[3] of such meat as they may soonest come by and have it quickliest ready, except it be in London when the companies of every trade do meet on their quarter-days,[4] at which time they be nothing inferior to the nobility. [...] In feasting also this latter sort (I mean the husbandmen) do exceed after their manner, especially at bride-ales, purifications of women, and such odd[5] meetings, where it is incredible to tell what meat is consumed and spent, each one bringing such a dish or so many with him as his wife and he do consult upon, but always with this consideration, that the liefer[6] friend shall have the better provision. This also is commonly seen at these banquets: that the goodman of the house is not charged with anything, saving[7] bread, drink, sauce, houseroom and fire. But the artificers in cities and good towns do deal far otherwise: for albeit that some of them do suffer their jaws to go oft before their claws, and divers of them by making good cheer do hinder themselves and other men, yet the wiser sort can handle the matter well enough in these junkettings,[8] and therefore their frugality deserveth commendation. To conclude, both the artificer and the husbandman are sufficiently liberal and very friendly at their tables; and when they meet they are so merry without malice and plain without inward Italian or French craft and subtlety that it would do a man good to be in company among them. Herein only are the inferior sort somewhat to be blamed: that being thus assembled their talk is now and then such as savoureth of scurrility and ribaldry, a thing naturally incident to carters and clowns,[9] who think themselves not to be merry and welcome if their foolish veins in this behalf be never so little restrained.

[...]

I might here talk somewhat of the great silence that is used at the tables of the honourable and wiser sort generally over all the realm (albeit that too much deserveth no commendation, for it belongeth to guests neither to be muti nor loquaces[10]), likewise of the moderate eating and drinking that is daily seen, and finally of the regard that each one hath to keep himself from the note of surfeiting and drunkenness (for which cause salt meat—except beef, bacon, and pork—are not any whit esteemed, and yet these three may not be much powdered[11]). But as in rehearsal thereof I should commend the nobleman, merchant, and frugal artificer, so I could not clear the meaner sort of husbandmen and country inhabitants of very much babbling (except it be here and there

[1] a necessary mean a moderate or necessary [amount].

[2] much resort ... unlooked for i.e., many people turn up unexpectedly to eat at noblemen's tables.

[3] <*> Artificer [Description's note].

[4] quarter-days the four days of the year on which tenancy of houses began and ended, and the payment of rents and other quarterly charges fell due.

[5] bride-ales a wedding feast of the Old English type, an ale-drinking at a wedding; purifications of women Also known as "churching," "purification" was a religious ceremony which featured a woman's public appearance at her local parish church, wherein she gave ritual thanks for her recent safe delivery from the perils of child-bearing; odd irregular, casual, chance.

[6] liefer dearer.

[7] saving with the exception of.

[8] junkettings feasts, banquets (merrymaking accompanied by eating and drinking).

[9] carters and clowns synonyms for rustic, unsophisticated persons; peasants, boors.

[10] Latin, "silent" nor "talkative."

[11] powdered salted.

some odd yeoman), with whom he is thought to be the merriest that talketh of most ribaldry, or the wisest man that speaketh fastest among them, and now and then surfeiting and drunkenness, which they rather fall into for want of heed-taking than wilfully following or delighting in those errors of set mind and purpose. It may be that divers of them, living at home with hard and pinching[1] diet, small drink—and some of them having scarce enough of that—are soonest overtaken when they come unto such banquets; howbeit, they take it generally as no small disgrace if they happen to be cup-shotten,[2] so that it is a grief unto them, though now sans remedy, sith the thing is done and past.

[...]

Heretofore there hath been much more time spent in eating and drinking than commonly is in these days,[3] for whereas of old we had breakfasts in the forenoon, beverages or nuncheons[4] after dinner, and thereto rear-suppers[5] generally when it was time to go to rest (a toy[6] brought into England by hardy Canutus and a custom whereof Athenaeus also speaketh [lib. 1], albeit Hippocrates speaks but of twice at the most [lib. 2, De rat. vict. in. feb. ac.]).[7] Now these odd repasts—thanked be God—are very well left, and each one in manner (except here and there some young hungry stomach that cannot fast till dinnertime) contenteth himself with dinner and supper only. The Normans, misliking the gormandize of Canutus, ordained after their arrival that no table should be covered above once in the day, which Huntingdon imputeth to their avarice;[8] but in the end, either waxing weary of their own frugality or suffering the cockle[9] of old custom to overgrow the good corn of their new constitution, they fell to such liberty that in often feeding they surmounted Canutus, surnamed "the Hardy." For whereas he covered his table but three or four times in the day, these spread their cloths five or six times, and in such wise[10] as I before rehearsed.[11] They brought in also the custom of long and stately sitting at meat, whereby their feasts resembled those ancient pontifical banquets whereof Macrobius speaketh (lib. 3, cap. 13) and Pliny (lib. 10, cap. 10), and which for sumptuousness of fare, long sitting, and curiosity[12] showed in the same exceeded all other men's feasting;[13] which fondness[14] is not yet left with us, notwithstanding that it proveth very beneficial for the physicians, who most abound where most excess and misgovernment of our bodies do

[1] pinching scanty, sparing.

[2] cup-shotten cup-shot: drunk, intoxicated.

[3] <*> Less time spent in eating than heretofore [Description's note].

[4] nuncheons a slight refreshment of liquor, etc., orig. taken in the afternoon.

[5] rear-suppers rere-suppers: a supper (usually of a sumptuous nature) following upon the usual evening meal, and thus coming very late at night.

[6] toy triviality, frivolous matter or whim.

[7] Canutus Canute, Cnut, or Knut (995-1035), king of England (reigned, 1016-35); Athenaeus describes the various types of meals mentioned by several ancient Greek writers: "Philemon states that the ancients had four meals: araktisma [breakfast], ariston [luncheon], hesperisma ('evening meal'), and deipnon ('dinner')." See The Deipnosophists of Athenaeus of Naucratis, trans. C.B. Gulick, 6 vols. (Cambridge, MA, 1927-41), 1.11, pp. 49-51. Hippocrates' Regimen in Acute Diseases differentiates between the treatment regimen for patients with acute diseases partly on the basis of whether they are accustomed to take two meals a day or only one. See The Medical Works of Hippocrates, trans. J. Chadwick and W.N. Mann (Oxford, 1950), section 11, p. 130.

[8] Huntingdon notes that King Harold's son, Hardecanute, was well known for his liberality and hospitality: "... [the] tables were laid four times a day with royal sumptuousness ... In our time it is the custom, whether from parsimony, or as they themselves say from fastidiousness, for princes to provide only one meal a day for their court" (The Chronicle of Henry of Huntingdon, translated and edited by T. Forester, [London, 1853; rept., New York, 1968], book 6, p. 201). Huntingdon's Chronicle was written between c. 1123 and 1154, and first published in 1596.

[9] cockle a weed most often found in corn fields.

[10] in such wise in such a manner or way.

[11] <*> Canutus a glutton, but the Normans at the last exceeded him in that vice [Description's note].

[12] curiosity here, the elaborate and exotic nature of the food served. See p. 535, note 7.

[13] Macrobius recounts the novel dish of peacock served up by the ancient orator Hortensius, thought an extravagance by his contemporaries (Saturnalia, trans. and ed. P.V. Davies [New York, 1969], 13.3.1-2, p. 227; also recorded in Pliny, Natural History, 1.10.20).

[14] fondness foolishness, folly.

appear, although it be a great expense of time and worthy of reprehension. For the nobility, gentlemen, and merchantmen, especially at great meetings, do sit commonly till two or three of the clock at afternoon,[1] so that with many is a hard matter to rise from the table to go to evening prayer and return from thence to come time enough to supper.

[...]

—1587

[1] <*> Long sitting reprehended [Description's note].

Popular Literature in Sixteenth-Century England

Critics define popular literature in sixteenth-century England partly through its material nature (pamphlets, broadsides, and other ephemeral forms); partly through its genres and content (ballads, prose accounts of recent events, etc.); partly through its methods of dissemination and circulation (cheap print, oral recitation, the public theatre); partly through its audiences (including, but certainly not limited to, "the people"—those under the rank of gentleman); and, finally, partly through contemporary descriptions.

Unsurprisingly, the individuals and institutions in the period that possessed the authority to assign value to texts and discourses were often dismissive of popular literature. For Thomas Bodley—founder of Oxford University's famous Bodleian library—popular works were "not worth the custody in such a library," and he tried to exclude them from the collection. Such "baggage books," he believed, were not only valueless in literary and educational terms, but would also compromise the authority of the library and (by extension) the university itself.[1]

Sixteenth-century popular literature is intriguing, then, because it treats behaviours, beliefs, and actions on the margins of society, revealing varied religious, social, cultural, and economic anxieties. It is also fascinating because it draws our attention to the cultural construction of literary value, and the long history of relegating popular texts to the category of the "non-literary." These texts offer the modern reader a salutary contrast to the courtly genres and modes that have until recently been thought largely to comprise the field of Renaissance literature.

Pamphlets of Murder and Mayhem[2]

The author of The Murder of George Saunders claims that his pamphlet does not aim "to feed the fond humour of such curious appetites as are more inquisitive of other folks' offences than hasty to redress their own"; however, this very statement suggests that Renaissance murder pamphlets and broadsides aim largely at titillating and shocking their audiences.

Many of these texts represent not just murders that are bloody and grotesque, but murders that show the violation of the deepest bonds of human trust: those between husband and wife, between child and parent, between host and guest, between master and servant. Critics like Peter Lake and Frances Dolan have argued that these texts are not only sensationalist but also represent a nightmare vision of rampant human desire liberated from religious and social control, revealing the inability of the individual conscience and social institutions to maintain order and prevent the violent disintegration of the social world. Popular murder pamphlets generally agree that the single most destructive of these impulses is sexual desire, and that most murders and other serious social disorders can be traced back to women's lust and sexual provocativeness.[3] It is also interesting that these texts often place the blame for women's out-of-control lusts not on women themselves but on the authority figures who have weakly abjured or neglected their responsibility to reign in "the weaker sex": fathers, husbands, masters, and patriarchs generally. Again and again, these pamphlets suggest that if those in domestic authority abuse their power or neglect their duties and responsibilities as patriarchs, then they inevitably set in motion those events that

[1] A. Halasz, The Marketplace of Print: Pamphlets and the Public Sphere in Early Modern England (Cambridge, 1996), p. 3.

[2] Editions of various Renaissance crime pamphlets may be found in J.H. Marshburn, ed., Blood and Knavery: A Collection of English Renaissance Pamphlets and Ballads of Crime and Sin (Rutherford, 1973).

[3] P. Lake, "Deeds Against Nature: Cheap Print, Protestantism and Murder in Early Seventeenth-Century England," Culture and Politics in Early Stuart England, ed. K. Sharpe and P. Lake (Stanford, 1993), p. 263.

rend the social order, destroying the complex relationships of duty, authority, and obedience that protected the world from unbridled desire, sin, and satanic power. The result is a world where women run amok and where patriarchs (especially fathers) violate the very order they are expected to uphold.[1] These pamphlets admittedly share many conventional aspects: the motivating force of Satan, the sinfulness of humanity, the pervasive presence of God's providence (often expressed through the supernatural ways in which murders are brought to light), and the use of omens to highlight the violation of natural and social order. Together, these conventions speak to a number of contemporary anxieties about gender, family, agency, religion, urban life, and the effectiveness of the justice system. Peter Lake argues that the author of The Murder of George Saunders takes the conventional aspects of the murder tract and employs them to specifically Protestant ends, incorporating notions of justification by faith, election, and predestination into narratives of sin, murder, and repentance.[2]

EDITIONS: Arthur Golding, A briefe discourse of the late murther of master George Saunders. London: Henry Bynneman, 1573. STC 11985; Anonymous, The trueth of the most wicked and secret murthering of John Brewen. London: [T. Orwin?] for John Kid, and are to be sold by Edward White, 1592. STC 15095; Anonymous, The examination, confession, and condemnation of Henry Robson. London: Printed by Felix Kyngston for R. W[alker], 1598. STC 21131.

ADDITIONAL ONLINE TEXTS: Anonymous. Sundry Strange and Inhuman Murders (1591). Arthur Golding, translator. Selections from Ovid's Metamorphosis (1567).

[1] Ibid., "Deeds," p. 266-67.

[2] Ibid., p. 283.

[The Murder of George Saunders]

A Brief Discourse of the Late Murder of Master George Saunders, a Worshipful Citizen of London: and of the Apprehension, Arraignment, and Execution of the Principal and Accessories of the Same.[3]

Imprinted at London by Henry Bunneman,[4] dwelling in Knightriders Street, at the Sign of the Mermaid. anno.1573.

Forasmuch as[5] the late murder of Master Saunders, citizen and merchant taylor of this city, ministreth great occasion of talk among all sorts of men, not only here in the town but also far abroad in the country, and generally through the whole realm; and the sequels and accidents[6] ensuing thereupon breed much diversity of reports and opinions—while some do justly detest the horribleness of the ungracious fact,[7] some lament the grievous loss of their dear friends, some rejoice at the commendable execution of upright justice, the godly bewail the unmeasurable inclination of human nature to extreme wickedness, and there-

[3] The author (who signs himself A.G. at the end of the text proper) has been identified as Arthur Golding, most famous as the translator of Ovid's Metamorphoses. Saunders is one of only two original works by Golding, and it became the source for the play A Warning for Fair Women (1599). The Saunders murder occasioned four other prose accounts and one ballad (F. Dolan, Dangerous Familiars [Cornell, 1994], pp. 89-90, note 1). For Golding's life and works, see "Additional Online Texts."

[4] Henry Bunneman Henry Bynneman (b. in or before 1542, d. 1583), printer and bookseller, owner of one of the largest printing businesses in London, is most famous for his printing of the first edition of Holinshed's Chronicles (1577). He also published Gabriel Harvey and Edmund Spenser's Familiar Letters (1580), Erasmus's Familiarium colloquiorum ("Familiar Letters") (1571), a Latin translation of Castiglione's "Book of the Courtier," as well as Latin and English editions of Plutarch, Cicero, Ovid, Aristotle, and Virgil, in addition to many of the works of George Gascoigne; religious and political works also tended to be his specialty. See C.S. Clegg, "Henry Bynneman," DLB 170, pp. 37-40; M. Bell, "Henry Bynneman," DNB online, 2005.

[5] Forasmuch as seeing that, inasmuch as.

[6] accidents events.

[7] ungracious fact wicked crime.

with magnify God's infinite mercy in revoking[1] of forlorn sinners to final repentance, many delight to hear and tell news, without respect of the certainty of the truth, or regard of due humanity, every man debating of the matter as occasion or affection leads him, and few folk turning the advised consideration of God's open judgements, to the speedy reformation of their own secret faults: It is thought convenient, gentle reader, to give thee a plain declaration of the whole matter, according as the same is come to light by open trial of justice and voluntary confession of the parties, that thou mayst both know the truth to the satisfying of thy mind and the avoiding of miscredit,[2] and also use the example to the amendment of thy life. Notwithstanding thou shalt not look for a full discovery of every particular bymatter[3] appendant to the present case, which might serve to feed the fond humour[4] of such curious appetites[5] as are more inquisitive of other folk's offences than hasty to redress their own, for that were neither expedient nor necessary. And men's misdoings are to be prosecuted no further with open detestation than till the parties be either reclaimed by reasonable and godly persuasion or punished by orderly and lawful execution, according to the quality of their offence. When law hath once passed upon them and given them the wages of their wicked deserts, then Christian charity willeth men either to bury the faults with the offenders in perpetual silence, or else so to speak of them as the vices and not the parties themselves may seem to be any more touched.

But hereof shall more be spoken (God willing) in the winding up of this matter. Now I will set down first the murdering of Master Saunders by George Brown, with Brown's apprehension, trial, and execution; then the trial and execution of Anne Saunders, the wife of the said George Saunders, of Anne Drewry widow, and of Roger Clement, called among them "trusty Roger," the servant of the said Anne Drewry; and lastly a brief rehearsal of certain sayings and dealings of the parties convicted, between the time of their apprehensions and the time of execution, which are not things proper and peculiar to the very body of the case, but yet incident and therefore necessary for the hearer, as whereby will appear the very original cause and first ground of this ungodly deed; and this rehearsal shall be shut up and concluded with a short admonition how we ought to deal in this and all other such cases.

The Tuesday in Easter week last past (which was the 24th day of March) the said George Brown, receiving secret intelligence by letter from Mistress Drewry that Master Saunders should lodge the same night at the house of one Master Barnes in Woolwich, and from thence go on foot to Saint Marie Cray the next morning, met him by the way a little from Shooters Hill, between seven and eight of the clock in the fore noon, and there slew both him and also one John Bean, the servant of the said Master Barnes.

As soon as Master Saunders felt himself to have his death's wound (for he was stricken quite and clean through at the first blow), he kneeled down and, lifting up his hands and eyes unto Heaven, said, "God have mercy upon me, and forgive me my sins, and thee too," (speaking to Brown, whom indeed he knew not, whatsoever report hath been made of former acquaintance betwixt them), and with that word he gave up the ghost.[6] And Brown, (as he himself confessed afterward) was thereat stricken with such a terror and agony of heart as he wist[7] not what to do, but was at the point to have fainted even then and oftentimes else that day, and could brook[8] neither meat nor drink that he received of all that day after. He was so abashed afterward at the sight of one of Master Saunders's little young children, as

[1] revoking drawing back, recalling.

[2] miscredit disbelief.

[3] bymatter side accident.

[4] fond humour foolish whims; "humour" refers to a person's mental disposition and dominant temperament.

[5] curious appetites i.e., those whose inclination is to be unduly and minutely inquisitive (in an unseemly way).

[6] he gave up the ghost died, expired.

[7] wist knew.

[8] brook endure or tolerate; literally, digest.

he had much ado to forbear from swownding[1] in the street, a notable example of the secret working of God's terrible wrath in a guilty and bloody conscience.

But Master Barnes's man, having ten or eleven deadly wounds and being left for dead, did by God's wonderful providence revive again and, creeping a great way on all four (for he could neither go nor stand) was found by an old man and his maiden (that went that way to seek their kine)[2] and conveyed to Woolwich, where he gave evident tokens and marks of the murderer; and so continuing still alive till he[3] had been apprehended and brought unto him died the next Monday after.

Immediately upon the deed doing, Brown sent Mistress Drewry word thereof by trusty Roger; he himself repaired forthwith to the Court at Greenwich,[4] and anon[5] after him came thither the report of the murder also. Then departed he thence unto London straightaways, and came to the house of Mistress Drewry, howbeit[6] he spoke not personally with her. But after conference had with him by her servant Roger, she provided him £20 the same day, for the which Mistress Drewry laid certain plate of her own and of Mistress Saunders to gage.[7]

And upon the next day being Thursday morning (having in the meantime had intelligence that Brown was sought for), they sent him £6 more by the said Roger, and warned him to shift for himself by flight, which thing he forslowed[8] not to do. Nevertheless the lords of the Queen's Majesty's Council caused so speedy and narrow[9] a search to be made for him in all places that upon the 28th of the same month he was apprehended in a man's house of his own name at Rochester by the mayor of the town; and being brought back again to the Court was examined by the Council, unto whom he confessed the deed, as you have heard, and that he had oftentimes before pretended and sought to do the same by the instigation of the said widow Drewry, who (as he said) had promised to make a marriage between him and Mistress Saunders (whom he seemed to love excessively), the desire of which hope hasted him forward to dispatch the fact.[10] Nevertheless he protested (howbeit untruly) that Mistress Saunders was not privy nor consenting thereunto. Upon this confession he was arraigned at the King's Bench in Westminster Hall[11] on Friday the 17th of April, where, acknowledging himself guilty, he was condemned as principal of the murder of Master Saunders, according to which sentence he was executed in Smithfield[12] on Monday the 20th of the same month, at which time (though untruly, as she herself confessed afterward) he laboured by all means to clear Mistress Saunders of committing evil of her body with him; and afterward was hanged up in chains[13] near unto the place where he had done the fact.

Thus much concerning the very case of the murder itself and the punishment of the principal doer thereof. As for the acknowledgment of the former wickedness of his life and the hearty repentance that he pretended[14] for the same, even to his very death, I defer them to the last part of this matter, to which place those things do more

---

1 swownding swooning, fainting.

2 kine cows.

3 he i.e., the murderer, Brown.

4 Court at Greenwich The ancient royal palace at Greenwich, one of Elizabeth I's favourite residences, was situated on the south bank of the Thames (in the county of Kent), between Woolwich (also on the Thames' south bank about 8 miles east of London)—near where Brown killed Saunders—and London; the Court was a place where one might reasonably expect to hear the latest news (Topographical Dict., pp. 235-36; 571).

5 anon straightaway, at once, instantly.

6 howbeit although.

7 plate utensils and tableware; originally made of gold or silver; gage pledge, pawn.

8 forslowed delayed.

9 narrow careful, strict, precise.

10 dispatch the fact promptly execute or accomplish the crime.

11 King's Bench in Westminster Hall the court of the King's Bench.

12 Smithfield In this case, West Smithfield in London, an open space of about five to six acres, the east side of which was occupied by the church and hospital of St. Bartholomew's; the open space was used for jousts, tournaments, horse and cattle markets, fairs and executions (Topographical Dict., pp. 471-72).

13 hanged up in chains i.e., his body was hung up as a warning to others and a public demonstration of justice.

14 pretended asserted, professed.

peculiarly pertain. In the meantime, Mistress Drewry and her man being examined and, as well by their own confessions as by the falling out of the matter in consequence,[1] and also by Browne's appeachment,[2] thought culpable, were committed to ward.[3] And anon after Mistress Saunders, being delivered of child and churched[4] (for at the time of her husband's death she looked presently to lie down[5]), was upon Mistress Drewry's man's confession and upon other great likelihoods and presumptions likewise committed to ward, and on Wednesday, the 6th of May, arraigned with Mistress Drewry at the Guild-hall,[6] the effect of whose several indictments is this:

That they had by a letter written been procurers of the said murder, and so accessories before the fact; and knowing the murder done, had by money and otherwise relieved and been aiding to the murderer, and so accessories also after the fact.

Whereunto they both of them pleaded not guilty. And Mistress Saunders, notwithstanding the avouchment of Mistress Drewry's man face to face and the great probabilities of the evidence given in against her by Master Geffrey, the Queen's Majesty's Sergeant,[7] stood so stoutly still to the denial of all things (in which stout denial she continued also a certain time after her condemnation) that some were brought in a blind belief that either she was not guilty at all, or else had but brought herself in danger of law through ignorance and not through pretenced[8] malice.

Howbeit, forasmuch as bare denial is no sufficient bar to discharge manifest matter[9] and apparent evidence, they were both condemned as accessories to Master Saunders's death, and executed in Smithfield the 13th of May, being the Wednesday in the Whitsun week,[10] at which time they both of them confessed themselves guilty of the fact[11] for which they were condemned, and with very great repentance and weakness received the reward of their trespass, in the presence of many personages of honour and worship, and of so great a number of people as the like hath not been seen there together in any man's remembrance. For almost the whole field, and all the way from Newgate,[12] was as full of folk as could well stand one by another; and besides that, great companies were placed both in the chambers nearabouts (whose windows and walls were in many places beaten down to look out at) and also upon the gutters, sides, and tops of the houses, and upon the battlements and steeple of Saint Bartholomew's.[13]

Mistress Drewry's man was arraigned at Newgate on Friday the 8th of May and, being there condemned as accessory, was executed with his mistress at the time and place foresaid.

Thus have ye heard the murdering of Master Saunders, with the apprehension, arraignment, condemnation, and execution of the principal and of the accessories to the same. Now let us proceed to the incidents that happened from the times of their apprehensions to the time of their deaths, and so to the admonition, which is the conclusion and fruit of this whole matter.

Whereas it was determined that Mistress Saunders and Mistress Drewry should have suffered upon the next Saturday after their condemnation,

---

1 falling out of the matter the course of events; in consequence as a result, consequently.

2 appeachment the fact of his having been criminally charged; impeachment.

3 ward custody, imprisonment.

4 churched said of a woman after childbirth when she offers thanks publicly for her safe delivery, usually in keeping with the service prescribed in the Book of Common Prayer.

5 presently to lie down i.e., shortly/soon to have her child.

6 Guild-hall the hall of the corporation of the city of London, where hearings often took place.

7 Sergeant an officer whose duty is to enforce the judgements of a tribunal, and arrest offenders or summon persons to appear in court.

8 pretenced intended, purposed, designed.

9 to discharge manifest matter to dismiss obvious charges.

10 Whitsun week the week in the English liturgical calendar beginning with Whitsunday, the seventh Sunday after Easter (now known as Pentecost Sunday).

11 fact crime.

12 Newgate a London prison, reserved for felons and debtors in the period.

13 Saint Bartholomew's See p. 540, note 12.

which was Whitsun even,[1] the matter was stayed till the Wednesday in Whitsun week upon these occasions ensuing. The book of Master Saunders's accounts and reckonings, whereupon depended the knowledge of his whole state, was missing. Certain sums of money were said to be in the hands of parties unknown, the intelligence whereof was desired and sought for to the behoof[2] of Master Saunders's children. The parties convicted were to be reformed to Godward,[3] and to be brought to the willing confessing of the things for which they had been justly condemned, and which as yet they obstinately concealed.

And besides all this, one Mell, a minister that had heretofore been suspended from his ministry, accompanying Mistress Saunders from her condemnation to Newgate, and conferring with her as it had been to give her good counsel and comfort, was so blinded with her solemn asseverations and protestations of innocency, that notwithstanding he had heard her indictment with the exact and substantial trial of her case; yet notwithstanding he persuaded himself that she was utterly clear and, thereupon falling in love with her, dealt with Mistress Drewry to take the whole guilt upon herself, undertaking to sue for Mistress Saunders's pardon. And so what by his terrifying of her with the horror of mischarging and casting away of an innocent, what with his promising of certain money to the marriage of her daughter, and with other persuasions, she was so wholly won that way that, as well before certain personages of honour as also before the Dean of Paul's[4] and others, she utterly cleared Mistress Saunders of the fact[5] or of consent to the same, taking the whole blame thereof to herself, and protesting to stand therein to the death, contrary to her former confession at the time of her arraignment.

Mistress Saunders also, after the laying of this plat,[6] stood so stoutly to her tackling[7] that when the Dean of Paul's gave her godly exhortation for the clearing of her conscience and for the reconciling of herself unto God, as the time and case most needfully required (as others had done before), he could obtain nothing at her hand. By means whereof, he was fain[8] to leave her that time, which was the Friday, not without great grief and indignation of mind to see her stubborn unrepentantness. In the meanwhile, the said Mell discovering his purpose and whole platform to an honest gentleman, whom he unskillfully took to have been a well-willer to obtain the pardon of Mistress Saunders, was partly by that means, and also by other follies of his own, cut off from his enterprise. For when he came to sue for her pardon—which thing he did with such outrage of doting affection that he not only proffered sums of money, but also offered his own body and life for the safety of the woman, whom he protested upon his conscience to be unguilty—the lords of the Council knowing her to be rightly condemned by good justice, and being privy to the state of the case beforehand, and also finding him out by his own unwise dealings (whereof among others one was, that he intended to marry her) not only frustrated his desire, but also adjudged him to stand upon the pillory with apparent notes and significations of his lewd and foolish demeanour.[9]

---

[1] Whitsun even the evening before Whitsunday; see p. 541, note 10.

[2] behoof use, benefit, advantage.

[3] Godward i.e., towards God.

[4] Dean of Paul's Alexander Nowell (c. 1516/17-1602) was dean of St Paul's Cathedral, London from 1560 to 1602. Although he received a number of important ecclesiastical positions, his views seem to have been too radical to allow for promotion to bishop; however, he was certainly a member of the Church of England establishment. He had a high reputation as a preacher, often preaching in such public and politically charged spaces as Paul's Cross and the Court. He also preached at funerals (he apparently did so at the funeral of Saunders's brother, Haddon [see p. 548]), and visited prisoners, such as Thomas Howard, fourth duke of Norfolk, and Anne Saunders. Nowell's Latin catechism and particularly its English translation (both published 1570) were central to the doctrinal development of the Church of England. See S. Lehmberg, "Alexander Nowell," DNB online, 2005.

[5] fact crime.

[6] plat plan of action; scheme, plot.

[7] stood ... tackling maintained her position, held her ground so firmly/unwaveringly.

[8] fain willing.

[9] pillory ... notes and significations ... demeanour Mell seems to have been exposed to the jeers of the crowd by being fastened to a stake by a ring around his neck and wrists, so that the sign proclaiming his crime could be easily read.

According to the which appointment, he was set upon a pillory by the place of execution at the time of their suffering, with a paper pinned upon his breast wherein were written certain words in great letters containing the effects of his fact to his open shame: Videlicet:[1] For practising to colour the detestable facts of George Saunders's wife. Which was a very good lesson to teach all persons to refrain from any devices or practises to deface or discredit the honourable proceedings of councillors, and public and lawful form of trials and judgments according to justice, or to hinder the beneficial course of so good examples.

By this occasion Mistress Saunders was utterly unprovided to die at that time, and therefore, as well in respect of mercy as for the considerations aforesaid, a further respite was given to them unwitting, and a reprieve was sent by Master Macwilliams for a time if need were. In the meantime (that is to wit[2] upon the Saturday morning), the constant[3] report goeth that as certain men came talking through Newgate, one happened to speak loud of the gallows that was set up, and of the greatness and strongness of the same, saying it would hold them both and more, the sound of which words did so pierce into the watchful ears of Mistress Saunders, who lay nearhand, that being stricken to the heart with the horror of the present death which she looked for that day, she went immediately to Mistress Drewry and, telling her that she knew certainly by the words which she had heard that they should by all likelihood be executed that day, asked her if she would stand to her former promise. But Mistress Drewry after better consideration of herself, counselling her to fall to plain and simple dealing: telling her that for her own part she was fully determined not to dissemble any longer, nor to hazard her own soul eternally for the safety of another body's temporal life.

Then Mistress Saunders—who had determined to acknowledge nothing against herself so long as she might be in any hope of life, howbeit that she always purposed to utter the truth whensoever she should come to the instant of death, as she herself confessed afterward—being stricken both with fear and remorse did by the advice of Master Cole, (who laboured very earnestly with her to bring her to repentance, and was come to her very early that morning, because it was thought they should have been executed presently) send for the Dean of Paul's again, and bewailing her former stubbornness declared unto him and Master Cole, Master Charke, and Master Yong[4] that she had given her consent and procurement to her husband's death, through unlawful lust and liking that she had to Brown, confessing her sinfulness of life committed with him, and humbly submitting herself to her deserved punishment besought them of spiritual comfort and counsel, which thing they were glad to perceive, and thereupon employed their travail[5] to do them good, and laboured very painfully to instruct them aright: for (God wot[6]) they found all the three prisoners very raw and ignorant in all things pertaining to God and to their soul health, yea and even in the very principles of the Christian religion.

Nevertheless, through God's good working with their labour, they recovered them out of Satan's kingdom unto Christ, insomuch that besides their voluntary acknowledging of their late heinous fact, they also detested the former sinfulness of their life, and willingly yielded to the death which they had shunned, uttering such certain tokens of their unfeigned repentance by all kind of modesty and meekness as no greater could be devised. For Mistress Saunders the same day sent for her husband's brothers and their wives and kinsfolk that were in the town, which came unto

---

1 Videlicet Latin, "that is to say" or "namely."

2 to wit to say, namely.

3 constant persistent.

4 Master Charke perhaps William Charke (d. 1617) preacher and religious controversialist. He was a leading Puritan reformer and fervent anti-Catholic; Master Yong perhaps John Young (c. 1532-1605), who held a number of important ecclesiastical positions, as well as being master of Pembroke College, Cambridge. He was present in London in 1572, and preached at the Convocation. He was later made bishop of Rochester. See B. Usher, "John Young," DNB online, 2005.

5 travail labour, effort.

6 wot knows.

her the day before her death, in whose presence she, kneeling mildly on her knees with abundance of sorrowful tears, desired them of forgiveness for bereaving them of their dear brother and friend. Whereunto Master Saunders the lawyer, in the name of them all, answered, that as they were very sorry both for the loss of their friend and also for her heinous fault, so they heartily forgave her, and in token thereof kneeled down altogether, praying to God with her and for her that he also would remit her sin.

Besides this pitiful submission, she also bewailed her offence towards her own kindred, whom she had stained by her trespass, and towards the whole world, whom she had offended by her crime, but especially her children, whom she had not only bereft both of father and mother, but also left them a corsie[1] and shame. Wherefore, after exhortation given to such of them as were of any capacity and discretion that they should fear God and learn by her fall to avoid sin, she gave each of those a book of Master Bradford's meditations,[2] wherein she desired the foresaid three preachers to write some admonition as they thought good. Which done, she subscribed them with these words: Your sorrowful mother Anne Saunders. And so blessing them in the name of God and of our Saviour Jesus Christ, she sent them away out of her sorrowful sight, and gave herself wholly to the settling of her grieved heart to the quiet receiving of the bitter cup,[3] which she drank of the next day, as hath been told before, howbeit, without doubt, to her everlasting comfort.

And Mistress Drewry no less careful of her own state, besides her humble repentance in the prison, and her earnest desiring of the people to pray for herself and the others with her as they came toward execution, did upon the cart[4] not only confess her guiltiness of the fact, as Mistress Saunders had done, but also with great lowliness and reverence, first kneeling down towards the Earl of Bedford[5] and other noblemen that were on horseback on the east side of the stage,[6] took it upon her death[7] that whereas it had been reported of her that she had poisoned her late husband Master Drewry, and dealt with witchcraft and sorcery, and also appeached divers[8] merchant men's wives of dissolute and unchaste living, she had done none of all those things, but was utterly clear both to God and the world of all such manner of dealing.

And then with like obeisance, turning herself to the Earl of Derby,[9] who was in a chamber behind her, she protested unto him before God, that whereas she had been reported to have been the [1] corsie a cause of sharp trouble or grief.

[2] Master Bradford's meditations John Bradford (c. 1510-55), evangelical preacher and martyr, was executed as a heretic for his reformist Protestant views under the regime of the Catholic Mary I. Golding probably refers here to Godly Meditations upon the Ten Commandments, the Articles of Faith, and the Lord's Prayer. Whereunto is Joined a Treatise against the Fear of Death: Also a Comparison between the Old Man and the New (1567), a particularly apt text for Anne Saunders given her situation and her reported ignorance of the most basic tenets of the Christian faith. See D.A. Penny, "John Bradford," DNB online, 2005.

[3] the bitter cup echoes Christ's comparison of his suffering and death to a cup from which he must drink. Those who would accompany him into the kingdom of Heaven must drink from the same bitter cup. See Matthew 20:22-23; Mark 10:38-39. Cf. Matthew 26:39; Mark 14:36; and Luke 22:42.

[4] cart used to convey convicts to the gallows.

[5] Earl of Bedford Francis Russell, second earl of Bedford (1526/27-85), member of the Privy Council (1558), warden of the Scottish Marches (1564), holder of a number of important county offices (lord lieutenant of the western counties), and generally a loyal servant of the Crown, as well as a zealous Protestant and supporter of Church reform. At the end of the treatise, Golding notes that Anne gave a copy of the prayer she said on the scaffold to Bedford. See W.T. MacCaffrey, "Francis Russell, second earl of Bedford," DNB online, 2005.

[6] stage raised platform, scaffold for the purpose of execution or exposure on the pillory.

[7] took it upon her death i.e., swore on her death that (the following is true).

[8] appeached charged with, accused of a crime; divers several.

[9] Earl of Derby Henry Stanley, fourth earl of Derby (1531-93). Although his father was Catholic, Derby was a committed Protestant. He was made a commissioner for ecclesiastical causes, and zealously prosecuted local Catholics throughout the 1570s. He held many important government positions: privy councillor (1585) commissioner in the trial of Mary, queen of Scots (1586), diplomat to Spain (1588), lord high steward (1589). He married, but was later separated from, Margaret Clifford, daughter of the second earl of Cumberland. See L.A. Knafla, "Henry Stanley, fourth earl of Derby," DNB online, 2005.

cause of separation betwixt him and my lady his wife, she neither procured nor consented to any such thing. But otherwise whereas in the time of her service in his house she had offended him in neglecting or contemning[1] her duty, she acknowledged her fault and besought him for God's sake to forgive her; who very honourably, and even with tears, accepted her submission, and openly protested himself to pray heartily to God for her.

Her servant also, having openly acknowledged his offence, kneeled meekly down, praying severally[2] with a preacher, as each of them had done at their first coming to the place. Which done, they were all put in a readiness by the executioner, and at one instant (by drawing away the cart whereon they stood) were sent together out of this world unto God.

And Brown also a good while afore, during the time of his imprisonment, coming to a better mind than he had been of in time past, confessed that he had not heretofore frequented sermons, nor received the Holy Sacrament,[3] nor used any calling upon God private or public, nor given himself to reading of Holy Scripture, or any books of godliness, but had altogether followed the appetites and lusts of his sinful flesh, even with greediness and outrageous contempt both of God and man. Nevertheless, God was so good unto him, and schooled him so well in that short time of imprisonment, as he closed up his life with a marvellous appearance of hearty repentance, constant trust in God's mercy through Jesus Christ, and willingness to forsake this miserable world.

Now remaineth to show what is to be gathered of this terrible example, and how we ought to apply the same to our own behoof.[4] First, I note with Saint Paul[5] that when men regard not to know God, or not to honour him when they know him, God giveth them over to their own lusts, so as they run on from sin to sin, and from mischief to mischief, to do such things as are shameful and odious, even in the sight of the world, to their own unavoidable perils. And when the measure of their iniquity is filled up, there is no way for them to escape the justice of God, which they have provoked. Insomuch that if they might eschew all bodily punishment, yet the very hell of their own conscience would prosecute them and the sting of their mind would be a continual prison, torment, and torture to them, wheresoever they went.

Again on the other side, we must mark the infinite greatness of God's wisdom and mercy, who, perceiving the perverse wilfulness of man's froward[6] nature to sinning, suffereth men sometimes to run so long upon the bridle till it seem to themselves that they may safely do what they list,[7] and to the world that they be past recovery unto goodness; and yet in the end catching them in their chief pride, he raiseth them by their overthrow, amendeth them by their wickedness, and reviveth them by their death, in such wise blotting out the stain of their former filth, that their darkness is turned into light, and their terror to their comfort.

Moreover, when God bringeth such matters upon the stage, unto the open face of the world, it is not to the intent that men should gaze and wonder at the persons as birds do at an owl, not that they should delight themselves and others with the fond and peradventure sinister reporting of them,[8] nor upbraid the whole stock and kindred with the fault of the offenders. No, surely God meaneth no such thing. His purpose is, that the execution of his judgements should by the terror of the outward sight of the example drive us to the inward consideration of ourselves. Behold, we be all made of the same mould, printed with the same stamp, and indued with the same nature that the offenders are. We be the imps

---

1 contemning despising, disdaining, scorning.

2 severally separately, individually.

3 the Holy Sacrament the Lord's Supper, Eucharist, or Holy Communion.

4 behoof benefit.

5 Saint Paul See Romans 1:1-2.9.

6 froward evilly disposed.

7 list please, desire.

8 fond and peradventure sinister reporting of them i.e., foolish and perhaps misleading, prejudiced, or malicious reporting of these persons.

of the old Adam,[1] and the venom of sin which he received from the old serpent[2] is shed into us all and worketh effectually in us all. Such as the root is, such are the branches, and the twigs of a thorn or bramble can bear no grapes.[3]

That we stand, it is the benefit of God's grace, and not the goodness of our nature nor the strength of our own will. That they are fallen, it was of frailty, wherefrom we be no more privileged than they, and that should we oversoon perceive by experience, if we were left to ourselves. He that looketh severely into other men's faults is lightly blind in his own. And he that either upbraideth the repentant that hath received punishment or reproacheth the kindred or offspring with the fault of the ancestor or ally,[4] how great soever the same hath been, showeth himself not to have any remorse of his own sins, nor to remember that he himself also is a man; but (which thing he would little think) he fully matcheth the crime of the misdoer, if he do not surmount it by his presumptuousness.

When it was told our Saviour Christ that Pilate had mingled the blood of certain men with their own sacrifice, what answer made he? Did he detest the offenders? Did he declaim against their doings? Did he exaggerate the fault of the one or the cruelty of the other? No. But framing and applying the example to the reformation of the hearer, "Suppose ye," said he, "that those Galileans were greater sinners than all the other Galileans, because they suffered such punishment? I tell you nay. But except ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish. Or think ye that those eighteen upon whom the tower in Silo fell and slew them were sinners above all that dwelt in Jerusalem? I tell you nay. But except ye repent, ye shall all perish likewise."[5]

Let us apply this to our present purpose. Were those whom we saw justly executed in Smithfield greater sinners than all other English people? Were they greater sinners than all Londoners? Were they greater sinners than all that looked upon them? No, verily. But except their example lead us to repentance, we shall all of us come to as sore punishment in this world, or else to sorer in the world to come. Their faults came into the open theatre and therefore seemed the greater to our eyes, and surely they were great indeed. Neither are ours the less, because they lie hidden in the covert[6] of our heart. God the searcher of all secrets seeth them, and if he list he can also discover them. He hath showed in some, what all of us deserve, to provoke us all to repentance, that all of us might have mercy at his hand, and show mercy one to another, and with one mouth and one heart glorify his goodness. It is said by the Prophet Samuel that disobedience is as the sin of witchcraft.[7] Let every of us look into himself (but first let him put on the spectacles of God's law, and carry the light of God's word with him) and he shall see such a gulf of disobedience in himself as he may well think there is none offender but himself.

I say not this as a cloaker of offences, that white should not be called white, and black, black; or as a patron of misdoers, that they should not have their deserved hire:[8] but to repress our hasty judgements and uncharitable speeches that we might both detest wickedness with perfect hatred and rue[9] the persons with Christian modesty, knowing that with what measure we met[10] unto others, with the same shall it be moten to us again.

---

[1] imps of the old Adam children of Adam, the first man. He is called "old Adam" in reference to the popular mode of biblical interpretation called typology, where people, places, things, and actions in the Old Testament were viewed as types or prefigurations of people, places, things, and actions in the New Testament. Thus, Christ is sometimes referred to as "the new Adam," the "man" who has redeemed Adam's original sin. In Romans 6:6, the "old man" refers to humanity's unregenerate condition.

[2] old serpent Satan.

[3] Such as the root is ... bear no grapes These popular proverbial expressions (Tilley T494 and T497) are based on Matthew 7:16-20, although Golding may also be alluding to their use in Romans 11:16-21.

[4] ally kindred, relations.

[5] See Luke 13:1-5.

[6] covert hiding place, shelter.

[7] Prophet Samuel ... witchcraft See 1 Samuel 15:23.

[8] hire payment.

[9] rue pity; regard with compassion.

[10] met past tense of "mete," and thus "measured, apportioned."

Finally, let all folks, both married and unmarried, learn hereby to possess and keep their vessel in honesty and cleanness.[1] For if the knot between man and wife (which ought to be inseparable) be once broken, it is seldom or never knit again. And though it be, yet is not the wound so thoroughly healed, but there appeareth some scar ever after. But if the sore rankle and fester inwardly (as commonly it doth except the more grace of God be), in the end it bursteth forth to the destruction or hurt of both parties, not lightly without great harm to others also besides themselves, as we see by this example. For when the body which was dedicated to God to be his temple and the tabernacle of his Holy Spirit is become the sink of sin and cage of uncleanness, the Devil ceaseth not to drive the parties still headlong unto naughtiness,[2] till they be fallen either into open shame and danger of temporal law, or into damnable destruction both of body and soul, according as Solomon[3] in his Proverbs sayeth, that "the steps of a harlot lead down unto death, and her feet pierce even unto hell." Therefore, good reader, so hear and read this present example as the same may turn to the bettering of thy state and not to occasion of slander, nor to the hurt of thine own conscience, nor to the offence of thy Christian brethren. Farewell.

A.G.

Anne Saunders's Confession as She Spoke It at the Place of Execution.

Good people, I am come hither to die the death whereunto I am adjudged as worthily and as deservedly as ever died any. I had a good husband, by whom I had many children, with whom I lived in wealth, and might have done still had not the Devil kindled in my heart first the hellish firebrand of unlawful lust, and afterward a murderous intent to procure my said husband to be bereaved of his life, which was also by my wicked means accomplished, as to the world is known.

And as I would if he could hear me, if it might be, prostrate upon the ground, at my husband's feet, ask mercy with plentiful tears of him, so that which I may and I ought to do, I ask mercy of God, I ask mercy of all men and women of the world, whom by my deed and example I have offended. And especially I bewail my husband, and ask mercy of my children whom I have bereaved of so good a father; I ask mercy of his kindred and friends whom I have hurt, and of all my friends and kindred, of whom I am abashed and ashamed. And being of myself unworthy of pity, yet I beseech them all, and you all, and all the whole world even for God's sake, and for our Saviour Christ's sake to forgive me.

And I thank God with my whole heart, he hath not suffered me to have the reign and bridle of sinning given me at my will to the danger of my eternal damnation, but that he hath found out my sin, and brought me to punishment in this world, by his fatherly correction to amend, to spare, and save me in the world to come. And I beseech him grant me his heavenly grace, that all who do behold or shall hear of my death may by the example thereof be frayed[4] from like sinning. And I beseech you all to pray for me and with me.

The Prayer Which Was Said by Anne Saunders at the Place of Execution, the Copy Whereof She Delivered unto the Right Honourable the Earl of Bedford.

As I do confess with great sorrow (O dear Father) that I have grievously and oftentimes sinned against Heaven and against thee, and am unworthy

[1] Finally ... cleanness "For this is the will of God, even your sanctification, that ye should abstain from fornication: That every one of you should know how to possess his vessel in sanctification and honour" (1 Thessalonians 4:3-4). "Vessel" means the body, especially as receptacle of the soul.

[2] naughtiness wickedness, depravity, viciousness.

[3] Solomon See Proverbs 5:5.

[4] frayed frightened, scared away.

to be called thy daughter,[1] so (O dear Father) I acknowledge thy mercy, thy grace, and love towards me, most wretched sinner, offered me in my Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, in whom thou givest me a heart to repent. And by repentance hast put away my sins, and thrown them into the bottom of the sea.[2] O dear Father, increase and continue this grace until the end and in the end. I testify this day (O Lord my God) thy love, O Lord, thy saving health is life everlasting and joy without end. And because thou hast touched my sinful heart with the displeasure of my sin and with a desire of thy kingdom, O dear Father, for thy Christ's sake, as I hope thou wilt, so I beseech thee to finish that good work in me. Suffer me not, merciful and loving Father, to be troubled with death when it layeth hold on me, nor with the love of life when it shall be taken away. O Lord, now as thou hast, so still lift up my soul as it were with an eagle's wings unto Heaven,[3] there to behold thee. Lord, into thy hands I commit my body that it be not troubled in death, and my soul that it see not damnation.[4] Come Lord Jesu, come assist me with thy Holy Spirit, a weak woman in a strong battle. Come Lord Jesu, come quickly.[5] Save thy handmaid that putteth her trust in thee.[6] Behold me in Christ, receive me in Christ, in whose name I pray saying, Our Father. &c.[7]

Anne Saunders dying to the world, and living to God.

After this she also said a godly prayer out of the Service Book, which is used to be said at the hour of death.[8]

Note of a Certain Saying Which Master Saunders Had Left Written with His Own Hand in His Study.

"Christ shall be magnified in my body, whether it be through life or else death. For Christ is to me life, and death is to me advantage."[9] These words were Master Nowell's theme which he preached at the burial of my brother Haddon upon Thursday being the 25th day of January Anno. Do.[10] 1570. Anno. Reginae Elizabeth. 13.

Among other things which he preached, this saying of his is to be had always in remembrance: that is, that we must all (when we come to pray)

[1] As I do confess ... thy daughter This echoes the words of Luke's Prodigal Son when he returns home and faces his father: "Father, I have sinned against heaven, and in thy sight, and am no more worthy to be called thy son" (15:21). The father celebrates his younger son's return, and in response to the elder son's anger at this expansive welcome says, "Son, thou art ever with me, and all that I have is thine. It was meet that we should make merry, and be glad: for this thy brother was dead, and is alive again; and was lost, and is found" (verse 32). It is often interpreted as a story about the forgiveness and jubilant response that the truly repentant sinner will receive from God.

[2] And by repentance ... bottom of the sea "Who is a God like unto thee, that pardoneth iniquity, and passeth by the transgression of the remnant of his heritage [i.e., Israel]? He retaineth not his anger forever, because he delighteth in mercy. He will turn again, he will have compassion upon us; he will subdue our iniquities; and thou wilt cast all their sins into the depths of the sea" (Micah 7:18-19).

[3] as it were with an eagle's wings unto Heaven "He giveth power to the faint; and to them that hath no might he increaseth strength. Even the youths shall faint and be weary, and the young men shall utterly fall: But they that wait upon the Lord shall renew their strength; they shall mount up with wings as eagles; they shall run, and not be weary; and they shall walk, and not faint" (Isaiah 40:29-31).

[4] Lord, into thy hands ... damnation See Psalm 31:5 ("Into thine hand I commit my spirit: thou hast redeemed me, O Lord God of truth") and Christ's echoing of the verse's first clause at the moment of his death (Luke 23:46).

[5] Come Lord Jesu, come quickly Christ says a number of times in the Book of Revelation that he is coming "quickly" (Revelation 3:11; 22:7; 22:12). In fact, the second last verse of Revelation is: "He which testifieth these things sayeth, Surely I come quickly. Amen. Even so, come, Lord Jesus" (22:20).

[6] Save thy handmaid ... thee "Handmaid" is a particularly resonant word in Scripture; Mary most famously describes herself as a handmaid of the Lord (Luke 1:38; 48).

[7] Our Father. &c She says the Lord's Prayer.

[8] out of the Service Book ... death In the Book of Common Prayer (1559) there is "A prayer to be said at the hour of death" included in the section "Certain Godly Prayers to Be Used for Sundry Purposes." Although this section was not an official part of the BCP, it was often included at the end of it. The prayer Saunders says appears in the 1567 and 1599 BCP.

[9] "According to my earnest expectation and my hope, that in nothing I shall be ashamed, but that with all boldness, as always, so now also Christ shall be magnified in my body, whether it be by life, or by death. For to me to live is Christ, and to die is gain" (Philippians 1:20-21).

[10] Anno. Do. abbreviation for "anno domini": the year of our Lord; Anno Regina Elizabeth the year of Queen Elizabeth's (reign).

first accuse and condemn ourselves for our sins committed against God before the seat of his justice, and then after cleave unto him by faith in the mercy and merits of our Saviour and Redeemer Jesus Christ, whereby we are assured of eternal salvation.

—1573

[The Murder of John Brewen]

The Truth of the Most Wicked and Secret Murdering of John Brewen, Goldsmith of London, Committed by His own Wife through the Provocation of One John Parker Whom She Loved: For Which Fact She Was Burned, and He Hanged in Smithfield, on Wednesday, the 28th of June, 1592, Two Years after the Murder Was Committed.

Imprinted at London for John Kid, and are to be sold by Edward White,[1] dwelling at the little North door of Paul's, at the Sign of the Gun. 1592.[2]

The Murder of John Brewen, Goldsmith of London, Who through the Enticement of John Parker, Was Poisoned of His Own Wife in Eating a Mess of Sugar Sops.

How hateful a thing the sin of murder hath been before the sight of the eternal God the Holy Scriptures do manifest; yet from the beginning we may evidently see how busy the Devil hath been to provoke men thereunto, insomuch that when there was but two brethren living in the world, the only sons of the first man, Adam, he provoked the one most unnaturally to murder the other. And albeit there was none in the world to accuse Cain for so foul a fact, so that in his own conceit[3] he might have walked securely and without blame, yet the blood of the just Abel cried most shrill in the ears of the righteous God for vengeance and revenge on the murderer. The Lord therefore ordained a law that the cruel and unjust blood-shedder should have his blood justly shed again;[4] of which law, although no man is ignorant, and that we see it put in execution daily before our eyes, yet doth the Devil so work in the hearts of a number that, without respect either of the fear of God or extreme punishment in this world, they do notwithstanding commit most heinous and grievous offences, to the great hazard of their souls, and the destructions of their bodies on earth, only through Satan's suggestions, as by this example following may evidently be proved.

There was of late dwelling in London a proper young woman named Anne Welles, which, for her favour and comely personage, as also in regard of her good behaviour and other commendable qualities, was beloved of divers young men, especially of two goldsmiths, which were bachelors, of good friends, and well-esteemed for fine workmanship in their trade. The one of them was called John Brewen, and the other John Parker, who although he was better beloved yet least deserved it (as the sequel hereafter will show). But as the truest lovers are commonly least regarded, and the plain-meaning man most scorned of undiscreet[5] maidens, so came it to pass by Brewen; who, notwithstanding his long and earnest suit, the gifts and favours which she received, was still disdained and cast off, albeit[6] he had the good will and favour of all her friends and kinsfolk. But no man

---

[1] John Kid John Kid (Kyd) [fl.1591-93?], London journeyman printer? (1584). He has only four entries in the STC proper (STC, vol. 3, p. 97); Edward White Edward White (fl. 1572?-1613), successful London bookseller (1572?), and publisher (almanacs, 1599/1600 and 1605/06). See STC, vol. 3, pp. 181-82.

[2] Lambeth Palace's copy of the text is signed on the title page and the last page with the name "Thomas Kydde." J.P. Collier was the first to attribute the text to Thomas Kyd, playwright and translator, author of the early drama, The Spanish Tragedy. Lambeth Palace's catalogue rejects this attribution and it remains conjectural. J.R. Mulryne's DNB entry does not include "John Brewen" among works attributed to Kyd. See J.P. Collier's 1863 reprint of this pamphlet in Illustrations of Early English Popular Literature, vol. I (reissued, 1966).

[3] For an account of the story of Cain and Abel, see Genesis 4; conceit judgement, estimation.

[4] Exodus 21:23-24.

[5] undiscreet without discernment or sound judgement.

[6] albeit even though it be (that); even though; although.

was so high in her books as Parker; he had her favours, whosoever had her frowns; he sat and smiled when others sobbed, and triumphant in the tears of the dispossessed. It came to pass that this nice[1] maiden had, upon a promise between them, received of Brewen both gold and jewels, which he willingly bestowed upon her, esteeming her the mistress and commandress of his life; but when he saw his suit despised and his goodwill nothing regarded, and seeing no hope of her goodwill and favour, he determined, that seeing his suit took no effect, to demand his gold and jewels again. And upon a time coming unto her, requested that he might have his gifts again, to whom disdainfully she made answer that he should stay[2] for it; and the young man, having been thus driven off[3] longer than he thought good of, made no more ado but arrested her for the jewels.

The stout damsel,[4] that had never before been in the like danger, was so astonished and dismayed that she concluded, on condition he would let his action fall and not to think ever the worse of her afterward, to marry him by a certain day, and to make him her husband; and this before good witness she vowed to perform. Brewen was hereof very joyful, and released his prisoner on his own peril,[5] being not a little glad of his good success. And thereupon, so soon as might be, made preparation for their marriage, albeit it proved the worst bargain that ever he made in his life. Now when Parker understood of this thing, he was most grievously vexed, and, as one having deep interest to the possession of her person, stormed most outrageously, and with bitter speeches so taunted and checked[6] her, that she repented the promise[7] she made to Brewen, although she could not any way amend it. Nevertheless, it kindled such a hatred in her heart against her new-made choice that at length it turned to Brewen's death and destruction. And this accursed Parker, although he was not as then in estate to marry[8] (notwithstanding he ere then had lain with her and gotten her with child), and would never let her rest, but continually urged her to make him away[9] by one means or other. Divers and sundry[10] times had they talk together of that matter; and although she often refused to work his death, yet, at length, the grace of God being taken from her, she consented by his direction to poison Brewen; after which deed done, Parker promised to marry her so soon as possibly he could.

Now she had not been married to Brewen above three days when she put in practice to poison him. And although the honest young man loved her tenderly, yet had she conceived such deadly hatred against him that she lay not with him after the first night of her marriage; neither could she abide to be called after his name, but still to be termed Anne Welles, as she was before. And to excuse her from his bed, she said she had vowed never to lie by him more till he had gotten her a better house. And the more to shadow[11] her treachery and to show the discontent she had of his dwelling, she lodged never a night but the first in his house, but provided her a lodging near to the place where this graceless Parker dwelt. By this means the villain had free access to practice[12] with her about the murder, who was so importunate and hasty to have it done that the Wednesday after she was married she wickedly went to effect it, even according as Parker had before given direction, which was in this sort. The varlet[13] had bought a strong deadly poison, whose working was to make speedy haste to the heart without any swelling of

---

1 nice fastidious, dainty, difficult to please.

2 stay wait.

3 driven off put off, deferred.

4 stout proud, haughty, arrogant; damsel a young unmarried woman; a maid, girl. There may be some deliberate archaism here since "damsel" is an unusual word in the context of the period's murder pamphlets.

5 on his own peril on his own responsibility [for any consequences].

6 checked rebuked, reproved, reprimanded.

7 "promised" in original 1592 text.

8 in estate to marry "to be in estate": to be in a position to do something; Parker is perhaps financially incapable of marrying Anne.

9 make him away i.e., murder Brewen.

10 Divers and sundry often occurring as a pair, meaning "a number of, several."

11 shadow conceal.

12 practice scheme, plan.

13 varlet knave, rogue, rascal.

the body, or other sign of outward confection.[1] This poison the wicked woman secretly carried with her to her husband's house with a merry pleasant countenance, and very kindly she asked her husband how he did, giving him the good morrow in most courteous manner, and asked if he would have, that cold morning, a mess of sugar sops (for it was the week before Shrovetide)?[2]

"I, marry,[3] with a good will, wife," quoth[4] he, "and I take it very kindly that you will do so much for me."

"Alas, husband!" quoth she. "If I could not find in my heart to do so small a matter for you (especially being so lately[5] married), you might justly judge me unkind." And therewithal went to make ready his last meat.[6]

The thing being done, she poured out a mess for him, and strewed secretly therein part of the poison; and having set the porringer[7] down beside her while she put the posnet[8] on the fire again, with her rising up from the fire, her coat cast down that mess which for her husband she had prepared.

"Out alas!" quoth she. "I have spilt a mess of as good sugar sops as ever I made in my life."

"Why," quoth her husband, "is there no more?"

"Yes," quoth she, "that there is, two as good as they, or I will make them as good; but it grieves me that any good thing should so unluckily be cast away."

"What, woman," quoth he, "vex not at the matter. Your ill luck go with them!"

"Marry, amen," quoth she; speaking, God knows, with a wicked thought, though the well-meaning man thought on no evil.

"But I pray you, John," said she, "shall I entreat you to fetch me a pennyworth of red herrings, for I have an earnest desire to eat some."

"That I will," quoth he, "with a good will."

This sly shift[9] she devised to have his absence, that she might the better perform her wicked intent; and by the time he came again she had made ready a mess of sugar sops for him, one for herself, and another for a little boy which she brought with her, but her husband's she had poisoned as before. When he was come, she gave her husband his mess, and she and the child fell also to eating of theirs. Within a pretty while[10] after he had eaten his, he began to wax[11] very ill about the stomach, feeling also a grievous griping of his inward parts, whereupon he told his wife he felt himself not well.

"How so?" quoth she. "You were well before you went forth, were you not?"

"Yes, indeed was I," said he; then he demanded if she were well.

She answered, "Aye"; so likewise said the child.

"Ah!" quoth her husband, "now I feel myself sick at the very heart." And immediately after, he began to vomit exceedingly, with such strains as if his lungs would burst in pieces. Then he requested her to have him to bed, never mistrusting[12] the treachery wrought against him.

Now when it drew somewhat late, she told her husband she must needs go home to her lodging, and when he requested her to stay with him, she said she could not, nor would not; and so unnaturally left the poisoned man all alone that whole night long without either comfort or company. All that night was he extreme sick, worse and worse, never ceasing vomiting till his entrails were all

---

1 confection unclear; OED notes that a "confection" can be "a prepared poison" or "deadly potion," so perhaps the word refers to the outward effects or physical symptoms of consuming such a poison.

2 mess a serving or portion of food; sugar sops a dish composed of slices of bread, sweetened and sometimes spiced, steeped in milk or some other liquid; Shrovetide a religious holiday, also called Shrove Tuesday, which preceded the first day of Lent (Ash Wednesday); traditionally, the last day on which eggs, butter, sugar, and other delicacies could be consumed before Lent's 40 days of fasting and abstinence.

3 marry interj., "indeed" or "certainly."

4 quoth said.

5 lately recently.

6 meat i.e., meal.

7 porringer a small basin from which soup, broth, porridge, etc. is eaten.

8 posnet a small metal pot or vessel for boiling food.

9 shift trick, deceitful stratagem.

10 pretty while relatively short time.

11 wax grow.

12 mistrusting suspecting.

shrunk and broken within him (as is since supposed). The next morning she came to him again, having been once or twice sent for, but made little semblance of sorrow; and when he quibed[1] her with unkindness for not staying with him one night, she asked him if he would have her forsworn?[2]

"Did I not," quoth she, "swear I would not stay in the house one night till you had gotten another?"

"Well, Anne," quoth he, "stay with me now, for I am not long to continue in this world."

"Now, God forbid," quoth she; and with that she made a show of great heaviness and sorrow, and then made him a caudle[3] with sugar and other spices. And so, on the Thursday immediately after he had eaten it he died, and on the Friday he was buried, no person as then suspecting any manner of evil done to him by his wife, but esteemed her a very honest women, although, through her youth, she knew not as then how to behave herself to her husband so kindly as she ought, which they imputed to her ignorance rather than to any malice conceived against her husband. Now you shall understand that within a small space after her husband was dead she was known with child, and safely delivered, every neighbour thinking it had been her husband's, although she since confessed it was not; but that child lived not long, but died.

The murder lying thus unespied, who was so lusty as Parker with the widow, being a continual resorter to her house, whose welcome was answerable to his desire. And so bold in the end he grew with her that she durst not deny him anything he requested, and became so jealous that had she looked but merely upon a man, she should have known the price thereof and have bought her merriment dearly. And yet was he not married unto her. Yea, to such slavery and subjection did he bring her that she must run or go wheresoever he pleased to appoint her, held he up but his finger at any time. If she denied him either money or whatsoever else he listed[4] to request, he would so haul and pull her as was pity to behold; yea, and threaten to stab and thrust her through with his dagger, did she not as he would have her in all things; so that he had her at commandment whensoever he would, and yet could she scant please him with her diligence. In this miserable case he kept her unmarried for the space of two years after her husband was dead. At length he got her with child again, which when the woman knew, she was careful, for the saving of her credit,[5] to keep it unspied so long as she could; in so much that she would not go forth of her doors for fear her neighbours should perceive her great belly. In the mean space[6] Parker coming unto her, she was, upon one day above the rest, most earnest with him to marry her.

"You see," quoth she, "in what case I am; and if you will not for your own credit, yea for my credit's sake marry me, and suffer me not to be a pointing mark for others and a shame among my neighbours."

The varlet, hearing the great moan she made unto him, was nothing moved therewith, but churlishly answered, she should not appoint him when to marry: "But if I were so minded," quoth he, "I would be twice advised how I did wed with such a strumpet[7] as thyself." And then reviled her most shamefully.

Whereunto she answered, she had never been strumpet but for him. "And woe worth thee," quoth she, "that ever I knew thee! It is thou, and no man else, that can triumph in my spoil, and yet now thou refusest to make amends for thy fault. My love to thee thou hast sufficiently tried,[8] although I never found any by thee."

"Out, arrant quean!"[9] quoth he. "Thou wouldst marry me to the end thou mightest poison me, as

---

1 quibed taunted, gibed at.

2 forsworn to have abandoned or renounced an oath.

3 caudle a warm drink consisting of a thin gruel, mixed with wine or ale, sweetened and spiced, and generally given to sick people, as well as visitors.

4 listed desired.

5 credit reputation.

6 mean space meantime.

7 strumpet whore, loose woman.

8 tried tested.

9 arrant quean notorious whore.

thou didst thy husband; but for that cause I mean to keep me as long out of thy fingers as I can, and accursed be I, if I trust thee, or hazard my life in thy hands."

"Why, thou arrant beast!" quoth she, "What did I then which thou didst not provoke me to do? If my husband were poisoned, thou knowest (shameless as thou art) it had never been done but for thee! Thou gavest me the poison, and after thy direction I did minister it unto him, and woe is me! It was for thy sake I did so cursed a deed."

These speeches, thus spoken between them in vehemency of spirit, was overheard of some that revealed it to the magistrates, whereupon the woman was carried before Alderman Haward[1] to be examined and the man before Justice Young,[2] who stood in the denial thereof very stoutly; neither would the woman confess anything till in the end she was made to believe that Parker had bewrayed the matter, whereupon she confessed the fact in order as I have declared. Then was she carried into the country to be delivered of her child, and after brought back to prison. And then she and Parker were both arraigned and condemned for the murder at the Sessions Hall near Newgate;[3] and the woman had judgement to be burned in Smithfield, and the man to be hanged in the same place before her eyes.[4] This was accordingly performed, and they were executed on Wednesday last, being the 28th of June 1592, two years and a half after the murder was committed. The Lord give all men grace by their example to shun the hateful sin of murder, for be it kept never so close, and done never so secret, yet at length the Lord will bring it out; for blood is an incessant crier in the ears of the Lord, and he will not leave so vile a thing unpunished.

—1592

The Examination, Confession, and Condemnation of Henry Robson, Fisherman of Rye, Who Poisoned His Wife in the Strangest Manner That Ever Hitherto Hath Been Heard Of.

AT LONDON.
Printed by Felix Kingston for R.W.[5] and are to be sold in Paternoster Row at the Sign of the Talbot.
1598.

The Epistle to the Reader.

Gentle readers, amongst all the cruel stratagems, poisonings, and homicides, I have here described one, which in my judgement passeth all that ever

[1] Alderman Haward probably Henry Heyward, London alderman and fishmonger. See S. Wright, "Simon Harward," DNB online, 2005.

[2] Justice Young perhaps Justice Richard Young, London magistrate and enthusiastic priest-hunter, who was involved in the prosecution of the Roman Catholic priest and poet, Robert Southwell (?1561-95), and in the questioning of the RC priest turned Church of England minister, Anthony Tyrrell (1552-1615).

[3] Sessions Hall near Newgate A court of justice, near the Newgate prison in London, a prison meant largely for felons and other serious criminals. See Survey London (1598), vol. 1, p. 34.

[4] Anne Welles and John Parker are both found guilty not simply of murder, but of what was known as "petty treason," where the murder of a husband by a wife, child, or retainer was thought so heinous and so unnatural, such an assault on the patriarchal order of the family (and by extension that of society as a whole), that it was legally and popularly perceived as analogous to high treason, an attack on the monarch or government. Punishment for petty treason differed on the basis of the murderer's gender. For a woman, the punishment for petty treason and high treason were (theoretically at least) the same: she would be executed by being burned alive. However, for a man, the punishment for petty treason was far less horrific than that for high treason; a man who murdered his master or who was an accessory to a woman's murder of her husband simply received the common punishment for murder: death by hanging; by contrast, a man convicted of high treason would be hanged, drawn, and quartered, a lengthy and spectacularly torturous process. Interestingly, a man who murdered his wife would find himself convicted simply of murder, and would receive the common punishment for murder: death by hanging. As the following pamphlets suggest, however, legal theory and practice in the period were quite different. Cf. the execution of Anne Saunders in The Murder of George Saunders (F. Dolan, Dangerous Familiars, pp. 20-31).

[5] Felix Kingston, prolific London printer (1597-1652), Dublin printer (1618-19), operator of the Parish Clerks' Press (1626-29); he was the son of John Kingston, also a London printer (from 1553) (STC, vol. 3, p. 99); R.W. STC identifies R.W. as Robert Walker, London Stationer (fl. 1597-99). He has only 3 entries in the STC proper (vol. 3, p. 176).

were invented, together with God's providence in bringing it to light. And the sooner have I penned it, that others may beware of being deceived by Satan to do the like, in hope it shall be concealed.

L.B.

At Rye in Sussex there dwelled a man whose name was Henry Robson. By trade he used fishing, and lived long time in very good estimation amongst his neighbours, till such time as through his lavish spending he came greatly in debt to his utter ruin. For when Lucifer had found a means how to accomplish his will, he never left him till by his devilish practises he had brought him to the gallows. For having lived there, and being happened into the danger of the law, his creditors began to put him in suit;[1] whom when he could no ways satisfy, he was cast into prison, where he long time remained languishing in woe.

This Robson had a wife, who for her honest dealing and good neighbourhood[2] was greatly beloved both of young and old. And although she could no ways redeem him, yet did she relieve him in such sort by her diligent labour that each one wondered at her endeavour. Yet nevertheless, he little weighed neither her kindness nor the laws of God, as hereafter shall manifestly appear, but devised continually how he might make her away;[3] who being dead, he determined to sell all that ever he could make, and being redeemed out of prison, to have conveyed himself over into the Low Countries[4] and there to have lived.

Whilest these mischievous thoughts harboured in his mind, the Devil stirred up the mind of one Glasier,[5] being then in prison, to be an instrument to put this his villainy in practise; who one day finding a fit opportunity, he thus began: "Faith, Harry, I am sorry to see thee live thus in prison, and hast been so well-beloved in this town."

"Tush, Glasier," said this Robson, "'tis too late now to be sorry when there is no remedy, for so long as my wife liveth, it is impossible that ever I should come out."

"Faith, then," said Glasier, "sure if my wife's death could procure my liberty, I would never be in bondage or imprisoned."

"No," said Robson, "why, my wishes can never the sooner procure her death."

"Aye, but" said the other, "your endeavour may, without being once suspected; and if you will take my counsel and be secret, I will warrant you she shall not long live."

Which words when Robson heard, greatly rejoicing at this good hap,[6] he not only vowed to be secret, but also to put this in speedy execution, and during life to remain Glasier's friend, if it sorted to good effect.[7] In short time after, Glasier was delivered, at which instant Robson put him in mind of his promise, which he promised presently to accomplish, and hasting down to one Fishers, a mercer in the town, bought a pennyworth of ratsbane. And coming to the prison again, in secret he delivered it to Robson, willing him to temper it with glass small beaten,[8] and wrapt in the skin of a shoulder of mutton, to the quantity of a half nut or less, and in the night when his wife should next come to lie with him, he should convey it into her privy parts,[9] which he would warrant[10] without danger to him should kill her. And so he departed.

Oh heinous crime and wicked counsel, the like whereof since Cain murdered the righteous Abel hath not been heard of! But now mark the event:[11] some seven days after, his wife (according to her accustomed order) came to the prison and finding her well-beloved husband, she saluted him, joying

---

1 his creditors began to put him in suit i.e., they prosecuted or took legal action against him.

2 neighbourhood good neighbourly conduct.

3 make her away i.e., murder her.

4 Low Countries a general term referring to Holland, Zeeland, and the Netherlands.

5 Glasier a proper name, but also obsolete form of "glazier," a person who manufactures glass or glazes windows.

6 hap chance, fortune.

7 sorted to good effect concluded or turned out well.

8 to temper it with glass small beaten i.e., mingle it with glass broken up into small pieces.

9 privy parts genitals; here specifically, the vagina.

10 warrant guarantee, promise.

11 mark the event i.e., consider closely the outcome.

of his welfare. But he, who minded nought[1] else but murder, saluted her with a dissembling show of friendship. And at night when she would have departed, he constrained her to stay all night, which was the dearest night's pleasure that ever woman had, for in the night he put in practise his former imaginations, which how it worked shall hereafter be declared.

In the morning without suspect, the poor silly[2] woman departing home, little thinking her death should so soon approach, falling close to her work,[3] she found herself grieved, and her body began to swell more and more. For now it began to run and eat into her veins, so that with the extreme pain she was constrained to go to bed, where she lay languishing some five days. Her neighbours resorting still to comfort her, and many physicians were sent for, all which agreed that she was poisoned. And therefore gave her many purgations, and using many other means, but all could not serve, for in their lives they had never seen nor heard of so strange an accident.[4] When they had used all the means they could, her days of life being now finished, she took her last adieu of the world and so died.

So soon as she was dead, according to the manner, they would have prepared for her burial. But the physicians hindered their purpose, and, having obtained license of the officers, they caused her to be ripped,[5] where they found in every vein both glass and ratsbane, and yet could not devise[6] how or by what means it should come thither, for that it could not be it should there happen by any conveyance in meat or drink. And therefore they determined to find out by some means who was the doer of this villainy. And incontinently[7] sending to every shop in the town to know who lately bought any ratsbane, at the said Fishers (aforesaid) they heard that one Glasier two weeks before had there bought a pennyworth. Whereupon they made search for the said Glasier, but he having heard of this news, and knowing himself guilty of the crime was fled away. Then they bethought how Glasier was then lately returned out of prison where Robson was, whose wife it was that was poisoned. And inquiring further when Robson's wife was with him in prison, they learned that she lay with him in the prison house not full a week before. This all being put together, they began to conjecture of the matter. And the mayor, jurats, and recorder[8] being assembled, they sent for Robson, who incontinent[9] was brought before them, and being come, the recorder (one Master Boulton) began thus:

"Neighbour Robson," said he, "we understand by one Glasier that you had certain poison of him which you caused him to buy. Now we have sent for you to know to what intent you bought it, for that you are suspected of the death of your wife, and by some manifestly accused." Which he hearing, began to use many protestations, that he was as ignorant both of any such poison or of the deed as the child newly born.

"Nay," said the recorder, "if you be so obstinate, we will bring Glasier forth, who to your shame shall testify it, and then you are not only guilty of the poison, but also of the act doing. And therefore confess the truth and shame the Devil."[10]

"Well," said Robson, "I had indeed ratsbane. But what of that?"

"Why didst thou deny it then?" said the recorder. "It shows a guilty conscience. But what

---

1 nought nothing.

2 silly pitiable, deserving of compassion; helpless, defenseless.

3 falling close to her work i.e., beginning to work attentively.

4 accident disaster, mishap, unfortunate event.

5 ripped clearly refers to the physicians' decision to perform an autopsy, but when the word is applied to the human body it usually denotes the body's violent and illegitimate tearing open: 3.a. "to slash up with a sharp instrument, to tear open with violence" (OED); also fig. "to open up, lay bare, disclose, make known, search into, examine" (OED).

6 devise conceive, imagine, guess.

7 incontinently immediately.

8 jurats jurors; recorder a magistrate or judge having criminal or civil jurisdiction in a city or borough.

9 incontinent immediately.

10 confess the truth and shame the Devil proverbial expression meaning, "to tell the truth boldly in defiance of temptation to the contrary" (cf. Tilley T566).

didst thou with it, and to what intent didst thou buy it?"

"Why," said he, "the courthouse is full of rats, and I bought it to kill them."

"That is not so," said the recorder, "but the Devil is the father of liars, and I fear thou art his son. Confess the truth what thou didst with it."

"Well," said Robson, "if you will needs know, I will truly resolve you. I have been long in prison, and I have often heard that poison will break open any iron lock, and therefore I bought it, thinking thereby to get my liberty. Now I have told the truth I hope you will pardon me."

"No," said the recorder, "thou hast not told the truth, for with it and glass mingled together thou didst poison thy wife. And therefore as thou lookest for any favour at our hands, confess how, and in what manner thou didst it, and who was thy counsellor in it."

"Well then I perceive," said Robson, "you glut[1] after my blood and if it will pleasure you, you shall have it." For they having told him truth, he could no longer deny it, and therefore, imagining that Glasier was taken and had confessed all, he openly declared the whole manner aforesaid, how and in what manner he had done it, and for what cause, and who was his counsellor, which they hearing greatly marvelled. And so for that time he was committed to prison, where he remained till the Sessions day,[2] where he was arraigned and condemned, and according to the law he was there adjudged to be hanged, which was performed.

The Lord of his infinite grace grant everyone better to withstand Satan's temptations and eschew his subtleties, that they be not led by his allurements nor entrapped in his snares, who seeketh by all means to bring everyone to confusion.

finis.

—1598

[1] glut long greedily for.

[2] the Sessions day the regular day on which a judicial sitting would take place, where a judge or judges would try legal cases; the specified day on which judicial trials or investigations were scheduled to take place.

THE MONSTROUS CHILDREN BROADSIDES

Linking monstrous births with other "issues that challenged the orderly, Protestant, hierarchical society of post-Reformation England," David Cressy argues that such births "disturbed the margins, cut across the grain, and set the authorities on edge."[3] Although the broadsides reprinted below are part of a European-wide interest in monsters, and take their grounding from classical and ancient treatments, as well as medieval bestiaries, they all evince the common Renaissance belief that monstrous births were significant in some symbolic way, sometimes embodying a divine warning against vice, sometimes constituting a warning of God's imminent wrath towards the English nation as a whole.[4]

EDITIONS: Anonymous, The true reporte of the forme and shape of a monstrous childe, borne at Muche Horkesleye. London: Thomas Marshe, 1562. STC 12207; Anonymous, A discription of a monstrous Chylde, borne at Chychester in Sussex. London: Leonard Askel for Frances Godlyf, 1562. STC 6177; John Barker, The true description of a monsterous chylde, borne in the Ile of Wight. London: William Griffith, 1564. STC 1422; H.B., The true discripcion of a childe with ruffes borne in the parish of Micheham in the cou[n]tie of Surrey. London: John Allde and Richard Jones, 1566. STC 1033; Anonymous, The forme and shape of a monstrous child, borne at Maydstone in Kent. London: John Awdeley, 1568. STC 17194.

ADDITIONAL ONLINE TEXTS: Anonymous Broadsides and Ballads. A New Ballad of the Strange and Most Cruel Whips (1588); A Ditty Delightful of Mother Watkins Ale (c. 1590); and Luke Hutton's Lamentation (1598).

[3] Agnes Bowker's Cat: Travesties and Transgressions in Tudor and Stuart England (Oxford, 2000), p. 1.

[4] There are (unsurprisingly) no editions of these various broadsides, given their ephemeral status in literary history. Further reading would have to turn to the originals or their digitized copies. The only readily available sixteenth-century text featuring monsters and marvels is a book, not a popular broadside: A. Paré's On Monsters and Marvels, trans. and ed. J.L. Pallister (Chicago, 1982).

[The Much Horkesley Monster]

The True Report of the Form and Shape of a Monstrous Child, Born at Much Horkesley, a Village Three Miles from Colchester, in the County of Essex, the 21st Day of April in This Year, 1562.

Oh praise ye God and bless his name
His mighty hand hath wrought the same.

This monstrous world that monsters breeds as rife[1]
As men tofore[2] it bred by native kind,
By births that show corrupted nature's strife
Declares what sins beset the secret mind.

I mean not this as though deformed shape
Were always linked with fraughted mind with vice,[3]
But that in nature God such draughts[4] doth shape
Resembling sins that so been had in price;[5]

So grossest faults brast[6] out in body's form
And monster caused of want or too much store
Of matter[7] shows the sea of sin: whose storm
O'erflows and whelms virtue's barren shore;

Faulty alike in ebb and eke in flood,
Like distant both from mean, both like extremes.[8]
Yet great'st excess the want of mean doth shroud
And want of mean excess from virtue's means.

So contrariest extremes consent in sin,
Which to bewray[9] to blindest eyes by sight
Behold a calf hath clapped[10] about his chin
His chauderne[11] reft whence nature placed it right;

And ruffed drives doubtful seers to prove by speech
Themselves not calves, and makes the fashion stale.[12]
In him behold by excess from mean our breach[13]
And midst excess yet want[14] of nature's shape.

To show our miss[15] behold a guiltless babe
Reft of his limbs (for such is virtue's want),
Himself and parents both infamous made
With sinful birth, and yet a worldling scant,[16]
Fears midwife's rout,[17] bewraying his parents' fault
In want of honesty and excess or sin.
Made lawful by all laws of man, yet halt[18]
Of limbs by God, 'scaped not the shameful mark

Of bastard son in bastard shape descried.[19]
Better, far better ungiven were his life
Than given so. For nature just envied
Her gift to him, and cropped with maiming knife

---

1 rife plentifully, abundantly.

2 tofore heretofore.

3 with fraughted mind with vice i.e., with a mind freighted or loaded with vice.

4 draughts perhaps, an image or representation.

5 had in price "to have in price": to have a sense or estimate of [a thing's] worth.

6 brast northern form of "burst."

7 caused of want or too much store / Of matter Renaissance medical texts sometimes explain monstrous births as caused by a lack of ("want of") or an excess of ("too much store of") seed or semen ("matter").

8 I.e., just as distant from the middle ground (the mean) and therefore just as extreme (far apart from each other) as the ebb and flow of the sea's tide.

9 bewray to reveal what has hitherto been kept secret, to disclose, reveal.

10 calf a term of endearment for a young boy, but also sometimes "a meek and inoffensive person"; clapped fastened energetically and promptly.

11 chauderne perhaps, an obsolete form of chawdron: the entrails of a beast, esp. as used for food.

12 ruffed ... stale i.e., those who are ruffed (wearing this article of fashionable clothing, which is here implicitly compared to an aspect of the infant's physical deformity) are anxious speak in order to prove that they are not beasts (i.e., calves) or fools (calf is also a slang term for "dolt"); the monstrous spectacle makes the fashion uninteresting, unfashionable. On ruffs, see p. 565, note 9.

13 I.e., by the deformed infant's distance from the physical mean of the human body, we may judge our breach in sin.

14 want lack.

15 miss sin.

16 yet a worldling scant i.e., "though [he is] scarcely of the world (since just born)," and "though [he is] scarcely a worldly person, a person whose particular sin is to be overly concerned about worldly matters [such as his and his parents' social reputations]."

17 rout shout (obviously of surprise and horror).

18 halt crippled, deformed.

19 descried disclosed, made known, revealed.

¶ The true reporte of the forme and shape of a monstrous childe, borne at Muche Horkesleye, a village three myles from Colchester, in the Countye of Esser, the .xxi. daye of Apryll in this yeare. 1562.

O, prayse ye God and blesse his name

His mightye hande hath wrought the same.

THis monstrous world that monsters brede as
Is men to fore it bred by native kinde (rife
By birthes that shewe corrupted natures strife
Declares what sinnes befel the secrete minde.
I meane not this as though deformed shape
Were alwayes linkd with straughted minde with vice
But that in nature god such draughtes doth shape
Resembling sinnes that so bin had in price,
So grossest faultes brast out in bodyes forme
And monster caused of want or to much store
Of matter, shewes the sea of sinne: whose forme
Oreflowes and whelmes vertues barren shore.
Faultye alike in ebbe and eke in flowd,
Like distaunt both from meane, both like extreames.
Yet greatest excesse the want of meane doth show de
And want of meane excesse from vertues meanes.
So contrarye st extreames consent in sinne
Which to bewray to blindest eyes by syght
Beholde a calfe hath clapt about his chinne
His chaudrone rest whence nature placed it right.
And ruffd dames doutfull seers to proue by speache
Them selues not calues, and makes the fashion stale.
In him behold by excesse from meane our breache
And middes excesse yet want of natures shape.

To shewe our misse beholde a guiltlesse babe
Reft of his limmes (for such is vertues want)
Him selfe and parentes both infamous made
With sinful byrth: and yet a worldlyng scant.
Feares midwyfes route: bewrayeng his parentes fault
In want of honestye and excesse of sinne.
Made lawfull by all lawes of man, yet halt
Of limmes by God, scapd not the shamefull marke
Of bastard sonne in bastard shape descryed.
Better farre better vnspuen were his lyfe
Than geuen so. For nature iust enuyed
Her gyft to him: and cropd with mayming knyfe
His limmes, to wreake her spyte on parentes sinne,
Which, if she spare vnwares so many scapes
As wycked world to breede wil neuer linne
Theyr liues declare theyr maims saued frō their shapes
Scorchd in theyr mindes (o cruel pitye mayme
That festreth styll, o vnrecured sore)
Where thothers quiting wyth theyr bodyes shame
Theyr parentes guilt, oft linger not theyr lyues
In lothed shapes but naked flye to skyes.
As this may do whose forme to fore thine eyes
Through want thou seest, a monstrous vglye shape
Whom frendly world to sinne doth terme a scape.

ON Tuysday being the .xxi. day of Apryll, in this yeare of our Lorde God a thousand fyue hundred thre score and two, there was borne a man childe of this maymed forme at Muche Horkesley in Esser, a village about three myles from Colchester, betwene a naturall father and a naturall mother hauing neyther hande, foote, legge, nor arme, but on the left syde it hath a Stumpe growynge out of the shoulder, and the ende thereof is rounde, and not so long as it should go to the elbowe, and on the ryghte syde no mencion of any thing where any arme should be, but a litel stumpe of one ynche in length, also on the left buttocke there is a stumpe comming out of the length of the thygh almost to the knee, and rounde at the ende, and groweth something ouerthwart towardes the place where the ryght legge should be, and where the ryghte legge should be, there is no mencion of anye legge or stumpe. Also it hath a Codde and stones but no yearde, but a lytell hole for the water to issue out. Finallye it hath by estimation no tounge, by reason whereof it sucketh not, but is succoured wyth liquide substaunce put into the mouth by droppes, and nowe begynneth to feede wyth pappe beyng very well fauoured, and of good and chearefull face.

¶ The aforesayde Anthony Smyth of Muche Horkelley husbandman and his wyfe, were both maryed to others before, and haue had dyuers chyldren, but this deformed childe is the fyrst that the sayd Anthony and his wyfe had betwene them two, it is a man chylde. This chylde was begot out of matrimony, but borne in matrimonye. And at the makynge hereof was liuing, and like to continue.

¶ Imprinted at London in Aldersgate strete nere to S. Dunstons church by Thomas Marshe.

The True Report of a Monstrous Child Born at Muche Horkesley, 1562. Reproduced by permission of the British Library. Shelfmark: HUTH. 50. (36.).

His limbs to wreak her spite on parents' sin.
Which, if she spare unwares so many scapes[1]
As wicked world to breed will never lin,[2]
Their lives declare their maims saved from their shapes

Scorched in their minds (O cruel privy maim[3]
That fest'reth still, O unrecured[4] sore)
Where th'others, quiting[5] with their bodies' shame
Their parents' guilt, oft linger not their lives
In loathed shapes but naked fly to skies.
As this may do whose form tofore[6] thine eyes
Through want thou seest a monstrous ugly shape,
Whom friendly world to sin doth term a scape.[7]

On Tuesday being the 21st day of April, in this year of our Lord God a thousand five hundred three score and two, there was born a man child of this maimed form at Much Horkesley in Essex, a village about three miles from Colchester, between a natural father and a natural mother, having neither hand, foot, leg, nor arm, but on the left side it hath a stump growing out of the shoulder, and the end thereof is round, and not so long as it should go to the elbow, and on the right side no mention of anything where any arm should be, but a little stump of one inch in length. Also on the left buttock there is a stump coming out of the length of the thigh almost to the knee, and round at the end, and groweth something overthwart[8] towards the place where the right leg should be, and where the right leg should be, there is no mention of any leg or stump. Also it hath a cod and stones but no yard, but a little hole for the water[9] to issue out. Finally it hath by estimation no tongue, by reason whereof it sucketh not, but is succored with liquid substance put into the mouth by drops, and now beginneth to feed with pap[10] being very well-favoured, and of good and cheerful face.

The aforesaid Anthony Smith of Much Horkesley, husbandman, and his wife, were both married to others before, and have had divers children, but this deformed child is the first that the said Anthony and his wife had between them two. It is a man child. This child was begot out of matrimony, but born in matrimony. And at the making hereof was living, and like to continue.

Imprinted at London in ... [illegible] street near to St Dunstan's Church by Thomas Marsh.[11]

—1562

[1] unwares unexpectedly; unintentionally; scapes a breaking out from moral restraint; thus, an outrageous sin; often applied to a breach of chastity.

[2] lin cease, leave off, desist from.

[3] privy maim secret wound; "maim" often refers to a serious, lasting and disabling injury.

[4] unrecured unhealed.

[5] quiting paying for, redeeming.

[6] tofore in front of, before.

[7] I.e., whom a world friendly to sin terms a scape; here the meaning contrasts with that above (p. 559, note 1), and refers to a transgression due to thoughtlessness, and thus a trivial fault or slip, not a moral outrage.

[8] overthwart askew, aslant.

[9] cod scrotum; stones testicles; yard penis; water urine.

[10] pap a mixture of bread and milk (or water), meant for infants or invalids.

[11] Thomas Marsh (Marshe, Marche), prolific London printer (1554-87, at least), father of Edward and Henry Marsh (also printers). He was granted a patent in 1572 for Latin grammar books (STC, vol. 3, p. 115). Marsh was not only the publisher of the first surviving edition of A Mirror for Magistrates (1559), but also of an important and influential collection of tragedies by the Roman playwright, Seneca. Paul Budra notes that while "he printed everything, from psalters to cookbooks," he favoured later in his career the genres of tragedy and history, perhaps on account of the success of the Mirror. See A Mirror for Magistrates and the de casibus tradition (Toronto, 2000), p. 11.

[The Chichester Monster]

A Description of a Monstrous Child, Born at Chichester in Sussex, the 24th Day of May. This Being the Very Length and Bigness of the Same. 1562.

When God for sin to plague hath ment,[1]
Although he long defarde,
He tokens truly strange hath sent
To make his foes a feared

That they thereby might take remorse
Of their ill life misspent
And more of love,[2] than fear or force
Their formal[3] faults repent.

Before the earth was overflowen
With waters huge throughout,
He sent them Noe,[4] that holy one,
Who daily went about

To call them then to godly life,
At whom they laughed and fumed.
He was contemned[5] of man and wife
Till they were all consumed.

Loth[6] did preach most earnestly,
But it did not prevail:
Then fire and brimstone verily
Upon them down did hail.

Pharaoh's[7] heart had no remorse,
Though wonders strange he saw,
But rather was therefore the worse
Without all fear or awe,

Until both he and his therefore
By justice sent of God
In raging seas were all forlore,[8]
And then he felt the rod.

Ten times truly were the Jews
In captive brought and led.[9]
Before each time, it God did use
His tokens strange we read.

The year before Vaspatian[10] came
The Jews a heifer dressed,[11]
Which being slain did calve a lame;[12]
This sign they soon did wrest[13]

---

[1] ment meant (i.e., when God means to punish, torment ["plague"] [us] for [our] sin, although he has long deferred ["defarde"] this punishment).

[2] of love i.e., on account of the love (they have for God).

[3] formal perhaps an adjective taken from the verb "formel" (to mention or speak of beforehand); i.e., former, earlier.

[4] Noe Noah, the Biblical patriarch who is saved (along with his family) from the general destruction of humanity in the great flood; when he tries to warn his neighbours of the coming catastrophe, they mock him.

[5] contemned despised.

[6] Loth Lot warns the men of Sodom against their intention to rape his two male visitors (disguised angels), and later warns his sons-in-law to flee with himself and his family since God has decided to destroy the city. They don't believe him and are destroyed in the general conflagration (Genesis 19:7, 14).

[7] Pharaoh's In Exodus 7:17-12:30, Pharaoh witnesses a number of plagues that are visited upon his country by God via his intermediary Moses, plagues which subvert the normal course of nature (e.g., hail falls from a clear sky and burns like fire upon the ground). His heart hardened by God, Pharaoh is unmoved.

[8] In raging seas were all forlore Although Pharaoh is finally forced to free the Israelites from their slavery in Egypt, he changes his mind and sets out after them with his army; catching up with them at the Red Sea, Pharaoh's army attempts to follow the Israelites onto the dry land in the midst of the sea which God has miraculously opened up. They are drowned when the sea flows back into its bed (Exodus 14).

[9] Ten times ... and led The Jews were conquered and enslaved a number of times, the most famous captivities were the "Assyrian Captivity," the "Babylonian Captivity," and the "Roman Captivity."

[10] Vaspatian Vespasian, Roman general and later emperor. In 66 CE he invaded Judaea in response to a Jewish insurrection which had already claimed the lives of a Roman garrison. In the subsequent siege of Jerusalem, more than half a million Jews perished and the Temple was completely destroyed (Catholic Encycl., online, 2005).

[11] dressed i.e., prepared for ritual sacrifice.

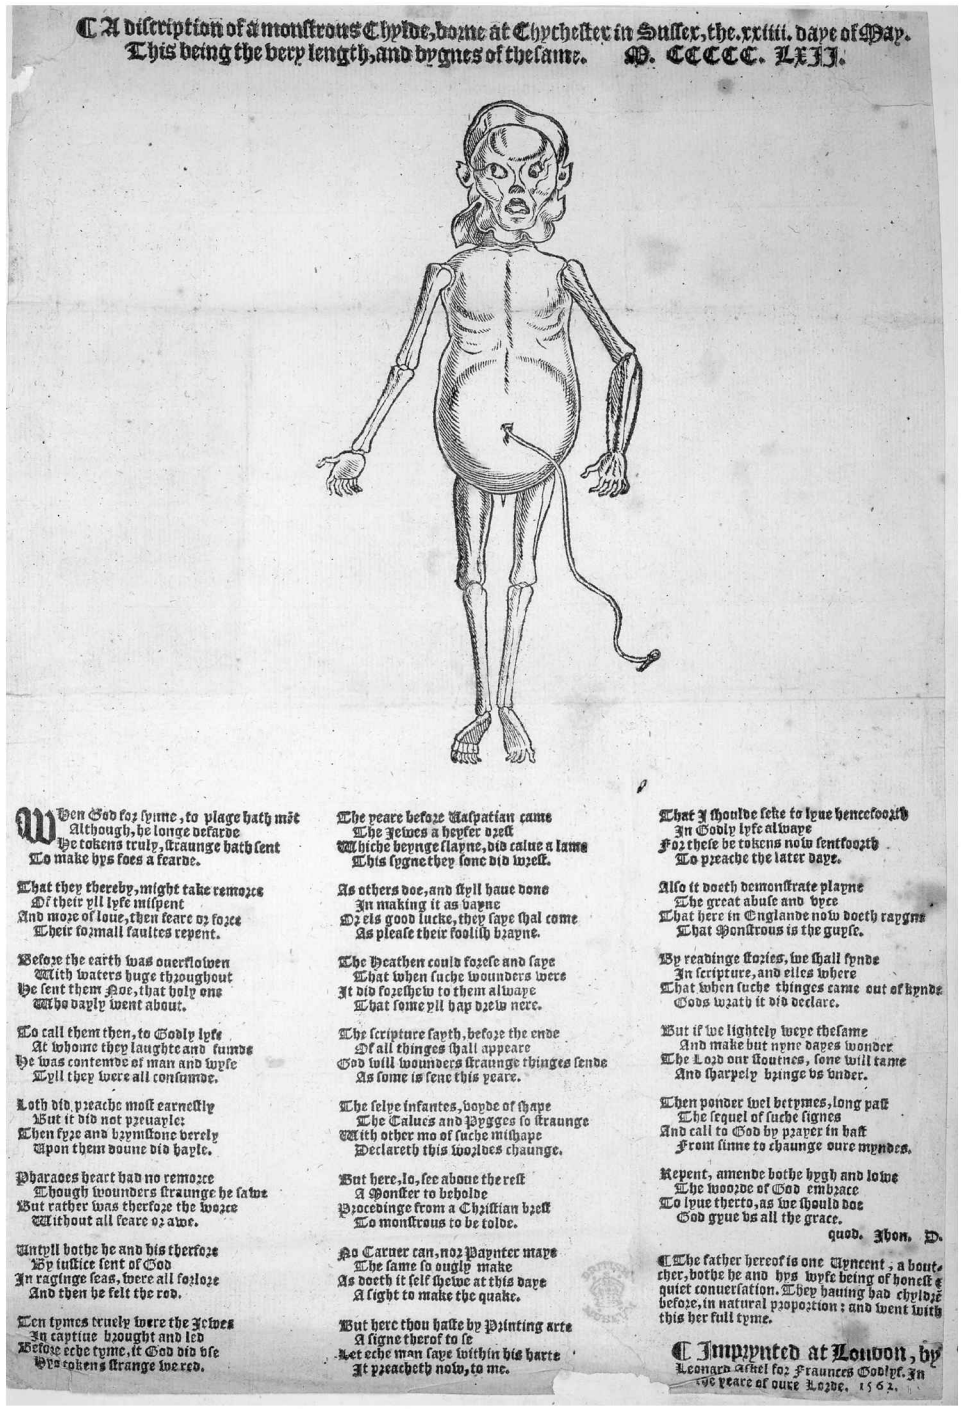
[12] calve a lame i.e., gave birth to a lamb; lame = obsolete form of "lamb." The mid-ninth century Jewish history Sefer Yosippon reports this as one of the signs given by God in the year before the Roman emperor Vespasian's troops arrived to put down the Jewish revolt and in the process destroy Jerusalem and its Temple. While the Jewish wise men knew that the sacrificial calf's giving birth to a sheep indicated a coming catastrophe, the common people misinterpreted it as a good omen.

[13] wrest misinterpret or twist, pervert the meaning of.



¶ A discription of a monstrous Chylde, borne at Chychester in Sussex, the xviii. daye of May. This being the very length, and bygnes of the same. M. CCCCC. LXII.

When God for tyme, to plage hath mēt
Although, he longe debarde
Ye tokens truly, straunge hath sent
To make hys foes a feard.

That they thereby, might take remorse
Of their yll lyfe mispent
And more of loue, then feare or force
Their formall faultes repent.

Before the earth was ouerflowen
With waters huge throughout
He sent them Noe, that holy one
Who daily went about.

To call them then, to Godly lyfe
At whome they laughte and skornde
He was contemde of man and wyfe
Tyll they were all consumde.

Loth did preache most earnestly
But it did not preuayle:
Then fyre and brymstone direly
Upon them doune did hayle.

Pharaoes heart had no remorse
Though wounders straunge he sawe
But rather was therfore the worse
Without all feare or awe.

Untyll bothe he and his therfore
By iustice sent of God
In raginge seas, were all forlore
And then he felt the rod.

Ten tymes truely were the Iewes
In captiue brought and led
Before ech tyme, it God did vse
Hys tokens straunge we red.

The yeare before Nabuchadnezzar came
The Iewes a heyfer dyed
Whiche beynge slayne, did calue a lame
This sygne they sone did wyeld.

As others doe, and styll haue done
In making it as vayne
Or els good lucke, they saye shal come
As please their foolish brayne.

The heathen could foresee and saye
That when suche wounders were
It did forshew to them alwaye
That some yll hap nere.

The scripture sayth, before the ende
Of all thinges shall appeare
God will wounders straunge thinges sende
As some is sene this yeare.

The selye infantes, voyde of shape
The Calues and Pygges so straunge
With other mo of suche mishape
Declareth this worldes chaunge.

But here, lo, see aboue the rest
A Monster to beholde
Procedinge from a Christian brest
To monstrous to be tolde.

No Caruer can, nor Paynter maye
The same so ougly make
As doeth it self shewe at this daye
A sight to make the quake.

But here thou haste by Printing arte
A signe therof to se
Let eche man saye within his harte
It preacheth now, to me.

That I shoulde seke to lyue henceforth
In Godly lyfe alwaye
For these be tokens now sentforth
To preache the latter daye.

Also it doeth demonstrate playne
The great abuse and vice
That here in Englande now doeth raygne
That Monstrous is the guyse.

By readinge stories, we shall fynde
In scripture, and elles where
That when suche thinges came out of kynde
Gods wrath it did declare.

But if we lightely wey the same
And make but nyne dayes wonder
The Lord our Sauiour, sone will tame
And sharpely bringe vs vnder.

Then ponder wel betymes, long past
The sequel of suche signes
And call to God by prayer in hast
From sinne to chaunge oure myndes.

Repent, amende bothe hygh and lowe
The woorde of God embrace
To lyue therto, as we should doe
God grue vs all the grace.

quod. Ihon. D.

¶ The father hereof is one Tyncent, a boutcher, bothe he and hys wyfe being of honest & quiet conuersation. They hauing had chyldre before, in natural proporcion: and went with this her full tyme.

¶ Imprynted at London, by Leonard Askel for Fraunces Godlyf. In the yeare of oure Lorde. 1562.

A Description of a Monstrous Child Born at Chichester, 1562.
Reproduced by permission of the British Library. Shelfmark: HUTH. 50. (33.).

As others do and still have done
In making it as vain,[1]
Or else good luck they say shall come,
As please their foolish brain.

The heathen could foresee and say
That when such wonders were
It did foreshow[2] to them alway
That some ill hap drew nere.[3]

The Scripture sayeth,[4] before the end
Of all things shall appear,
God will wonders[5] strange things send,
As some is seen this year.

The silly[6] infants, void of shape,
The calves and pigs so strange,
With other mo[7] of such misshape
Declareth this world's change.

But here, lo, see above the rest
A monster to behold,
Proceeding from a Christian breast,
Too monstrous to be told.

No carver can, nor painter may
The same so ugly make,
As doth itself show at this day,
A sight to make thee quake.[8]

But here thou hast by printing art
A sign thereof to see.
Let each man say within his heart,
It preacheth now to me
That I should seek to live henceforth
In godly life alway.
For these be tokens now sent forth
To preach the Latter Day.[9]

Also it doth demonstrate plain
The great abuse and vice
That here in England now doth reign,
That monstrous is the guise.

By reading stories we shall find
In Scripture and elsewhere
That when such things came out of kind[10]
God's wrath it did declare.

But if we lightly weigh the same
And make but nine days' wonder,[11]
The Lord our stoutness[12] soon will tame
And sharply bring us under.

Then ponder well betimes[13] long past
The sequel of such signs,
And call to God by prayer in hast[14]
From sin to change our minds.

Repent, amend both high and low,
The word of God embrace.
To live thereto as we should do
God give us all the grace.

quod. Ihon. D.[15]

---

1 making it as vain i.e., interpreting it as empty or meaningless.
2 foreshow foretell, predict.
3 ill hap misfortune; nere near.
4 The Scripture sayeth Revelation 6-20.
5 wonders wondrous.
6 silly innocent.
7 mo more.
8 See stanza 9 of "The True Description of a Monstrous Child Born in the Isle of Wight."
9 Latter Day the day of the Last Judgement. See Revelation and Matthew 25:31ff.
10 came out of kind i.e., when such creatures were born which cross what we might now call "the species barrier."
11 nine days' wonder proverbially, an event that causes a huge but temporary sensation; it is implied that the response to this event is unthinking and trivializing ("A wonder lasts but nine days" [Tilley W728]).
12 stoutness pride, arrogance.
13 ponder well betimes i.e., meditate deeply and in due time or before it is too late (betimes).
14 hast haste.
15 quod Ihon D. "said John D."

The father hereof is one Vincent, a butcher, both he and his wife being of honest and quiet conversation. They having had children before in natural proportion, and went with this her full time.[1]

Imprinted at London, by Leonard Askel for Frances Godlyf.[2]
In the year of our Lord, 1562

—1562

[The Isle of Wight Monster]

The True Description of a Monstrous Child Born in the Isle of Wight, in This Present Year of Our Lord God 1564, the Month of October, after This Form with a Cluster of Long Hair about the Navel. The Father's Name is James Johnson, in the Parish of Freswater.

For mercy, Lord, with one accord,
To thee we call and cry,
That so doth show in earth below
Thy wondrous works daily.

Within the rase[3] of five years space
Much monstrous sights hath bin:[4]
Of sundry kind, man bear in mind,
And soon turn from thy sin.

Repent and pray, amend I say,
Leave off thy wicked ways.
The time draws on, thou must be gone,
Behold this latter days.[5]

Of infants young, agone not long,
With calves and pigs which were:
The tokens lo, misshapen so,
Which crieth to us great fear.

Now this late sight in Isle of Wight,[6]
Strangely it is to tell:
Two children born, never beforn,[7]
Such wonders there befell.

The one I find of womankind,
Having her shape all right;
The other is transposed this,[8]
As pleaseth the Lord of might.

Where nature's art doth not her part,
In working of her skill,
To shape aright each lively wight:[9]
Behold it is God's will.

Lo here you see, before your eye,
A man child to behold,
A babe guiltless, deformed this,
Most wonderous to be told.

No carver can nor painter than
The shape more ugly make:
As itself doth declare the truth,
A sight to make us quake.

Let us all fear, and in mind bear,
This form so monsterous,
That no hurt wrought, nor evil hath thought.
What shall become of us

---

1 went with this her full time i.e., the child was not premature.

2 Leonard Askell (fl. 1562-63), London printer (1556). He has only 2 entries in the STC proper (vol. 3, p. 6); Francis Godlif (Godly), London bookbinder, 1562-96; Chester bookbinder, 1566-67. He has only 2 entries in the STC proper (vol. 3, p. 69).

3 rase perhaps "race" or "quick passage;" or "rase" as in "erase."

4 bin been.

5 latter days a reference to the "end times" or apocalypse prophesied in the Book of Revelation; these "latter days" are a herald of the end of the world and the Last Judgement; see also "the day of wrath," below, l.43.

6 Isle of Wight a small island off the coast of southwest England; now a popular holiday resort.

7 beforn before.

8 transposed this i.e., transformed into this shape (with the additional sense that this transformation is a perversion or corruption of the original).

9 wight person.

The true description of a monsterous Chylde/

Borne in the Ile of wight, in this present yeare of oure Lord God, M. D. LXIIII. the month of October, after this forme with a cluster of longe heare about the Nauell. the Fathers name is Iames Johnson, in the parys of Frelwater.

FOr mercy Lorde, with one accorde,
To the we call and crye:
That so doth show, in earth below,
Thy wonderous workes daylye.

Within the rase, of fyue yeres space
Moche monsterous sights hath byn:
Of sundry kynde, man bare in mynde,
And lone turne from thy syn.

Repent and pray, a mende I say,
Leue of thy wicked wayes:
The tyme drawes on, thou must be gone,
Beholde this later dayes.

Of Infans yonge, agone not longe,
With calues and pigges which were:
The tookens loo, mishappen soo,
Whiche cryeth to vs great feare.

Now this late syght in Ile of Wight.
Straungely it is to tell:
Two children borne, neuer before,
Suche wonders there be fell.

The one Kynde, of Woman kynde,
Varying her shape all right:
The other is, transposed this,
As pleaseth the Lorde of myght.

Where natures art, doth not her part,
In working of her skylle:
To shape a right, eche lyuely wight,
Behold it is Gods will.

Loo here you see, before your eye,
A man childe to beholde:
A babe goodlies, deformyd this,
Moste wonderous to be tolde.

No carner can, nor paynter then,
The shape more ugly make:
As it selfe doth, declare the truthe,
A syghte to make vs quake.

Let vs all feare, and in mynde beare,
This forme so monsterous:
That no hurt waught, nor euill hath thought,
What shall become of vs.

That doth still syn, and neuer lyn,
As men heapyng by treasure:
Against the day, of wrath to aye,
Of Gods heauy displeasure.

Nowe praye wee all, bothe great and small,
Vnto the Lorde of myght:
To gyue vs grace in Heauen a place,
There to attayne his syght.

ALl ye that dothe beholde and see, this monstrous sight so straunge,
Let it to you a preachyng be, from synfull lyfe to chaunge:
For in this latter dayes trulye, the Lord straunge sights doth showe,
By tokens in the Heauens hye, and on the yearth belowe.
This dothe demonstrate to vs, the lyfe whiche we lyue in,
A Monster oughly to beholde, conceyued was in syn:
In shape vnparfett here to bewe, that nature hathe not dreft,
A chylde now borne by poyte moste true, this from the mothers brefl:
For he that doth this shape beholde, and his owne state will knowe,
Will make the proude Peacocke to bolde, beare downe his tayll full lowe:
Nowe Lorde sende downe thy holy spyrite, the Comforter of Joye,
For to direct oure wayes aright, to dwell with thee for aye:
And graunt we maye amende our lyfe, accordyng to thy worde,
In euery age bothe Manne and Wyfe, nowe graunt vs this good Lorde.

Finis quod John Barker.

Imprynted at London in Fletestrete: at the Sygne of the Faucon, by William Gryffith, and are to be solde at his shop in saint Dunstons churchyarde, in the weft of London. the viii. daye of Nouember.

The True Description of a Monstrous Child Born in the Isle of Wight, 1564. Reproduced by permission of the British Library. Shelfmark: HUTH. 50. (40.).

That doth still sin, and never lin,[1]
As men heaping up treasure,
Against the day of wrath for aye[2]
Of God's heavy displeasure.

Now pray we all, both great and small,
Unto the Lord of might:
To give us grace, in Heaven a place,
There to attain his sight.

All ye that doth behold and see this monstrous sight so strange,
Let it to you a preaching be from sinful life to change:
For in this latter days truly, the Lord strange sights doth show,
By tokens in the heavens high and on the earth below.
This doth demonstrate to us, the life which we live in,
A monster ugly to behold, conceived was in sin:
In shape unparfett[3] here to view, that nature hath not dressed,
A child now born by port most true,[4] this from the mother's breast.
For he that doth this shape behold, and his own state will know,
Will make the proud peacock so bold bear down his tail full low.
Now Lord send down thy Holy Sprite,[5] the comforter of joy,
For to direct our ways aright, to dwell with thee for aye:
And grant we may amend our life according to thy word,
In every age both man and wife, now grant us this good Lord.

Finis quod John Barker.[6]

Imprinted at London in Fleetstreet: at the Sign of the Faucon,[7] by William Griffith,[8] and are to be sold at his shop in Saint Dunston's Churchyard, in the west of London, the 8th day of November.

—1564?

[The Ruffs Monster]

The True Description of a Child with Ruffs[9] Born in the Parish of Micheham in the County of Surrey in the Year of Our Lord 1566.

The fore part
and the back part[10]

This present year of our Lord 1566, the 7th day of June, one Helene Jermin, the wife of John Jermin, husbandman,[11] dwelling in the parish of Micheham, was delivered of a woman child named Christian being after this manner and form following. That is to say, the face comely and of a cheerful countenance. The arms and hands, legs and feet of right shape, and the body, with all other members thereunto appertaining, well-proportioned in due form and order, saving that it is as it

---

1 lin obsolete verb, "to cease, desist."

2 for aye for ever, for all eternity.

3 unparfett imperfect.

4 born by port most true i.e., the birth was a normal vaginal birth; "port" here is used in its figurative sense, meaning door or gateway (cf. Raynolde, The Birth of Mankind [1564]: "The entrance of the matrix or womb, is named the womb port or the mother port" [G2v]).

5 Holy Sprite the Holy Spirit or Holy Ghost, the third person in the Trinity (along with God the Father and God the Son).

6 Finis quod John Barker "the end says John Barker." John Barker published three other ballads between 1561 and 1570: "A ballad declaring how neighbourhood, love, and true dealing is gone"; "Of the horrible and woeful destruction of Jerusalem"; and "The plagues of Northumberland."

7 Faucon Falcon.

8 William Griffith William Griffith (Gryffyth), London bookseller and printer, 1552?-71. He has some 29 entries in the STC proper (vol. 3, pp. 72-73).

9 Ruffs an article of neckwear usually consisting of starched linen or muslin arranged in horizontal flutings and standing out all around the neck, worn especially in the reigns of Elizabeth I and James I.

10 the labels for the two views of the Child with Ruffs. See accompanying facsimile.

11 husbandman farmer.

¶ The true discription of a Childe with Ruffes borne in the parish of Micheham in the Coũtie of Surrey in the yeere of our Lord. M. D. LVI.

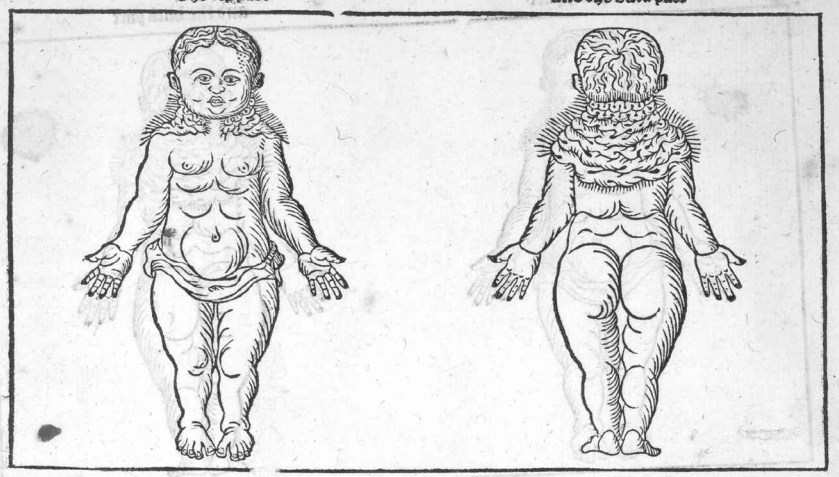
The for part and the back part



THis present yeere of our Lor M. D. LVI the .vii. day of June one Helene Jermin the wife of John Jermin Husbandman dwelling in the parishe of Micheham was deliuered of a Woman Childe named Christiã beeing after this maner & fourme following. That is to say, the face comly & of a cheerful countenaũce. The Armes and hands, Leggs and Feet of right shape, and the Body w all other members therunto appertenig, wel proporcioned in due fourme & order, sauing þ it is as it were wunderfully clothed with suche a Fleshy skin as the like at no time hath ben seene. For it hath the said fleshy skin behinde like vnto a Neckerchef growing from the veriey of the Back vp vnto the neck as it were with many Ruffes set one after another and beeing as it were somthing gathered, euery Ruf about an inche brode hanig here growing on the edges of the same, & so w Ruffes cõming ouer þ Shoulders and couering some part of þ Armes proceding vp vnto the nape of the neck behinde and almoste round about the neck, like as many womens Gownes be, not close to gither before: but that the thyrde beeing (with a faire white skin) bare betweene bothe the sides of the ruffes, the said ruffes about the neck beeing double and as it were thick gathered, muche like vnto the Ruffes that many do vse to weare about their necks.

¶ This Childe before said (the day of the date vnder written) was tobe seene in Glene Alley in Suthwark beeing aliue and .v. weeks olde and iii. dayes not vnlikly to liue long.

¶ An Admonition vnto the Reader,

THis picture preſt in paper white,
our natures doth declare:
Whose fourme so straunge by nature may lerne vs to beware. (tures spite

¶ By natures spite, what do I saye?
doth nature rule the roste?
Nay god it is say wel I may:
by whom nature is tost.

¶ The face ful faire, the members all,
in order stand and place:
But yet to muche: by natures thrall,
doth worke a great disgrace.

¶ This ruffeling world in ruffes al rolde,
doth God detest and hate:
As we may lerne the tale wel tolde,
of Childzen borne of late.

¶ What meanes this childe by natures
thus Ruffed for to be: (worke:
But by these Ruffes our natures spurk,
we might be holde and see.

¶ Her squares our squaring doth set out,
this here our heres doth checke:
This monstrouse monster out of dout,
agreeth in eche respect.

¶ Our filthy liues in Pigg's are theiwd,
our Pride this Childe doth bere:
Our ragg's and Ruffes that are so lewd, beholde her flesthe and here.

¶ Our Weall's and Cattel plagued are,
all monstrouse in their shape:
And eke this Childe doth wel declare,
the pride we vse of late.

¶ Our curled here her here doth preche
our ruffes and giles gate:
Our straunge attire wherto we reche,
our flesthe that plese we may.

¶ The poet telleth how Daphenes was,
transformd into a tre:
And Io to a Cow did passe,
a straunge thing for to se.

¶ But poets tales may passe and go,
as trifels and vntrueth:
When ruffes of flesthe as I do trowe, shall moue vs vnto ruthe.

¶ Deformed are the things we were,
deformed is our hart:
The Lord is wroth with all this gere,
repent for fere of smarte.

¶ Pray we the Lord our hart's to turn,
whiles we haue time and space:
Lest that our soules in hel do burn,
for voiding of his grace.

¶ And þ O England whose womãkinde, in ruffes do walke to oft:
Parswade them ful to bere in minde,
this Childe with ruffes so soft.

¶ In fourme as they in nature so,
a maid she is in deed:
God graunt vs grace how euer we go,
for to repent with speed.

FINIS. Q H B.

¶ Imprinted at London by John Allde and Richarde Johnes and are to be solde at the Long Shop adioining vnto S. Mildreds Churche in the Poultrie and at the litle shop adioining to the Northwest doore of Paules Churche. Anno domini. M. D. LVI. the .xx. of August were wonderfully clothed with such a fleshy skin as the like at no time hath been seen. For it hath the said fleshy skin behind like unto a neckerchief, growing from the reins of the back[1] up unto the neck as it were with many ruffs set one after another and being as it were something gathered, every ruff about an inch broad having here growing on the edges of the same, and so with ruffs coming over the shoulders and covering some part of the arms proceeding up unto the nape of the neck behind and almost round about the neck, like as many women's gowns be, not close together before; but that the throat being (with a fair white skin) bare between both the sides of the ruffs, the said ruffs about the neck being double and as it were thick-gathered, much like unto the ruffs that many do use to wear about their necks.

The True Description of a Child with Ruffs Born in Micheham, 1566.
Reproduced by permission of the British Library. Shelfmark: HUTH. 50. (34.).

This child beforesaid (the day of the date under written) was to be seen in Glene Alley in Southwark,[2] being alive and 10 weeks old and 4 days not unlikely to live long.

An Admonition unto the Reader

This picture pressed in paper white
our natures doth declare,
Whose form so strange by nature's spite may learn us to beware.

By nature's spite, what do I say?
doth nature rule the rost?[3]
Nay God it is, say well I may,
by whom nature is tossed.

The face full fair, the members all
in order stand and place:
But yet too much: by nature's thrall,[4]
doth work a great disgrace.

This ruffling[5] world in ruffs all rolled
doth God detest and hate,
As we may learn the tale well told of children born of late.[6]

What means this child by nature's work
thus ruffed for to be?
But by these ruffs our nature's spurk[7]
we might behold and see.

Her squares our squaring[8] doth set out,
this hair our hairs doth check;[9]
This monstrous monster out of doubt agreeth in each respect.

Our filthy lives in pigs are showed,
our pride this child doth bear.
Our rags[10] and ruffs that are so lewd—
behold her flesh and hair.

Our beasts and cattle plagued are,
all monstrous in their shape,
And eke[11] this child doth well declare
the pride we use of late.

Our curled hair her hair doth preach,
our ruffs and guises gay,[12]
Our strange attire whereto we reach[13]
our flesh that please we may.

---

1 reins of the back i.e., the region of the kidneys; the loins.

2 Southwark was on the south bank of the Thames, and it became a ward of the city of London in 1550; associated with disorder and license, Southwark was the location for the city's theatres and houses of prostitution.

3 rost roost.

4 thrall enslavement.

5 ruffling making a great stir or display; swaggering, bearing oneself proudly or arrogantly; in this context, an obvious pun on the article of clothing (i.e., one who wears ruffs is also likely to ruffle).

6 of late recently.

7 spurk sprout or shoot; perhaps, though, "spark."

8 squares criteria, rules, standards, patterns; squaring quarrelling, arguing.

9 this ... check i.e., the spectacle of the child's hair checks ("reproves" or "criticizes") our hair (which is described just three stanzas later as an emblem of vanity and pride).

10 rags here, a contemptuous word for fine clothing, rather than one implying torn or otherwise worn clothing.

11 eke also.

12 guises styles or fashions of attire and personal adornment; gay fine, showy, brightly coloured.

13 reach aspire.

The poet telleth how Daphenes was transformed into a tree;
And Io[1] to a cow did pass,
a strange thing for to see.

But poets' tales may pass and go
as trifles and untruth,
When ruffs of flesh as I do trow[2]
shall move us unto ruth.[3]

Deformed are the things we wear, deformed is our heart.
The Lord is wroth[4] with all this gear;[5]
repent for fear of smart.[6]

Pray we the Lord our hearts to turn,
whilst we have time and space,
Lest that our souls in Hell do burn
for voiding of his grace.

And ye, O England, whose womankind in ruffs do walk too oft:
Persuade them still to bear in mind
this child with ruffs so soft.

In form as they in nature so,
a maid she is indeed.
God grant us grace, however we go,
for to repent with speed.

finis. the.

Imprinted at London by John Allde and Richard Jones[7] and are to be sold at the Long Shop adjoining unto St. Mildred's Church in the Poultry and at the little shop adjoining to the Northwest door of Paul's Church. Anno domini.[8] 1566, the 20th of August.

—1566

[The Maidstone Monster]

The Form and Shape of a Monstrous Child Born at Maidstone in Kent, the 24th of October. 1568.[9]

At Maidstone in Kent there was one Margaret Mere, daughter to Richard Mere of the said town of Maidstone, who being unmarried played the naughty pack[10] and was gotten with child, being delivered of the same child the 24th day of October last past, in the year of our Lord 1568 at seven of the clock in the afternoon of the same

[1] Daphenes In Ovid, Apollo, the sun god, fell in love with the beautiful nymph, Daphne; pursued by him, she cried out to her father, the river god Peneus, to save her from being ravished; Peneus responded by transforming her into the laurel tree, which became the emblem of Apollo, and in turn of victorious generals and poets; Io nymph, daughter of the river god Inachus; after Zeus (Jupiter), king of the gods, had raped her, he transformed her into a heifer to keep his "dalliance" a secret from his wife, Hera (Juno).

[2] trow believe, think.

[3] ruth grief, sorrow, pity.

[4] wroth angry, wrathful.

[5] gear apparel, attire; here, in a contemptuous and dismissive sense: "rubbish."

[6] smart injury, punishment, suffering.

[7] John Allde (fl. 1555-92), a successful printer and stationer, who specialized in ballads and almanacs and other popular works; Richard Jones (Johnes), fl. 1564-1602, a printer who specialized in various genres of popular literature, particularly ballads for which he had license to print large numbers.

[8] Anno domini Latin, "the year of our Lord."

[9] The boxes which surround the figures in the facsimile following are (beginning at the left hand side of the picture):

As ye this shape abhor
In body for to have

So flee such vices far
As might the soul deprave

In God's power
all flesh stands
As the clay in the Potter's hands.

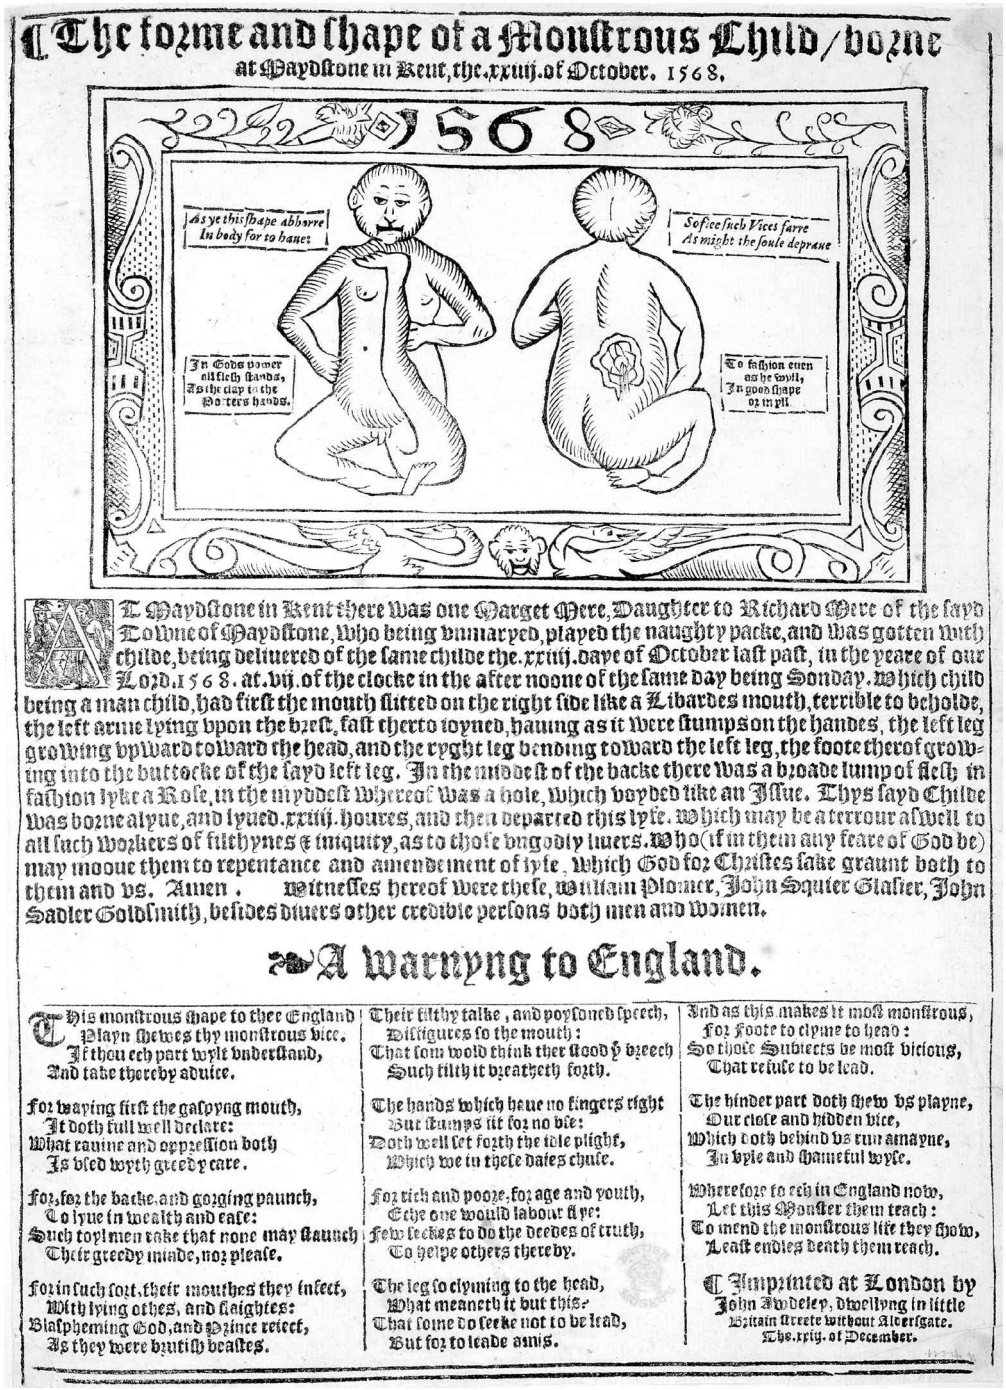
To fashion even
as he will,
In good shape
or in ill.

[10] naughty pack a slang term of dubious origin; when applied to a person, though, "pack" is almost always accompanied by "naughty"; a person of low moral character.



The forme and shape of a Monstrous Child/borne at Maydstone in Kent, the.xxiij. of October. 1568.

1568

As ye this shape abhorre
In body for to haue:

So fice such Vices farre
As might the soule deprane

In Gods power
all flesh standes,
As the clay in the
Potters handes.

To fashion euen
as he will,
In good shape
or in ill

AT Maydstone in Kent there was one Margret Mere, Daughter to Richard Mere of the sayd Towne of Maydstone, Who being vnmaryed, played the naughty packe, and was gotten with childe, being deliuered of the same childe the.xxiij. daye of October last past, in the yeare of our Lord. 1568. at. vij. of the cloche in the after noone of the same day being Sonday. Which child being a man child, had first the mouth slitted on the right side like a Libardes mouth, terrible to beholde, the left arme lying vpon the brest, fast therto ioyned, hauing as it were stumps on the handes, the left leg growing vpward toward the head, and the right leg bending toward the left leg, the foote therof growing into the buttocke of the sayd left leg. In the middest of the backe there was a broade lump of flesh in fashion lyke a Rose, in the myddest Whereof was a hole, which voyded like an Issue. Thys sayd Childe was borne alyue, and lyued. xxiij. houres, and then departed this lyfe. Which may be a terrour aswell to all such Workers of filthynes & iniquity, as to those vngodly liuers. Who (if in them any feare of God be) may mooue them to repentance and amendement of lyfe. Which God for Christes sake graunt both to them and vs. Amen. Witnesses hereof were these, William Plomer, John Squier Glasier, John Sadler Goldsmith, besides diuers other credible persons both men and women.

A warnyng to England.

THis monstrous shape to thee England
Playn shewes thy monstrous vice.
If thou eche part wyll vnderstand,
And take thereby aduice.

For waying first the gaspyng mouth,
It doth full well declare:
What rauine and oppression both
Is vsed wyth greedy care.

For, for the backe and gorging paunch,
To lyue in wealth and ease:
Such toplmen take that none may staunch
Their greedy minde, nor please.

For in such sort their mouthes they infect,
With lying othes, and sleightes:
Blaspheming God, and Prince reiect,
As they were brutish beastes.

Their filthy talke, and poysoned speech,
Disfigures so the mouth:
That some would think ther vtterd breech
Such filthy it breatheth forth.

The hands which haue no fingers right
But stumps fit for no vse:
Doth well set forth the vile plight,
Which we in these dayes chuse.

For rich and poore, for age and youth,
Eche one would labour fre:
Few seeke to do the deedes of truth,
To helpe others thereby.

The leg so clyming to the head,
What meaneth it but this:
That some do seeke not to be lead,
But for to leade amis.

And as this makes it most monstrous,
For foote to clyme to head:
So those Subiects be most vicious,
That refuse to be lead.

The hinder part doth shew vs playne,
Our close and hidden vice,
Which doth behind vs run amayne,
In vyle and shameful wyse.

Wherefore to eche in England now,
Let this Monster them teach:
To mend the monstrous life they show,
Least endles death them reach.

Imprinted at London by John Awdeley, dwellyng in little Britain streete without Aldersgate. The.xvij. of December.

The Form and Shape of a Monstrous Child Born at Maidstone, 1568.
Reproduced by permission of the British Library. Shelfmark: HUTH. 50. (38.).

day, being Sunday. Which child, being a man child, had first the mouth slitted on the right side like a libard's[1] mouth, terrible to behold; the left arm lying upon the breast, fast thereto joined, having as it were stumps on the hands; the left leg growing upward toward the head, and the right leg bending toward the left leg, the foot thereof growing into the buttock of the said left leg. In the middest of the back there was a broad lump of flesh in fashion like a rose, in the middest whereof was a hole, which voided like an issue.[2] This said child was born alive, and lived 24 hours, and then departed this life. Which may be a terror as well to all such workers of filthiness and iniquity, as to those ungodly livers. Who (if in them any fear of God be) may move them to repentance and amendment of life. Which God for Christ's sake grant both to them and us. Amen.

Witnesses hereof were these: William Plomer; John Squier, glazier; John Sadler, goldsmith; besides divers[3] other credible persons both men and women.

A Warning to England.

This monstrous shape to thee, England,
Plain shows thy monstrous vice,
If thou each part wilt understand,
And take thereby advice.

For weighing first the gasping mouth,
It doth full well declare,
What ravine[4] and oppression both
Is used with greedy care.

For, for the back, and gorging paunch,
To live in wealth and ease:
Such toil men take that none may staunch
Their greedy mind nor please.

For in such sort, their mouths they infect
With lying oaths and slaightes,[5]
Blaspheming God, and prince reject,
As they were brutish beasts.

Their filthy talk and poisoned speech
Disfigures so the mouth,
That some would think there stood the breech[6]
Such filth it breatheth forth.

The hands which have no fingers right
But stumps fit for no use
Doth well set forth the idle plight
Which we in these days chuse:[7]

For rich and poor, for age and youth,
Each one would labour fly.
Few seckes[8] to do the deeds of truth,
To help others thereby.

The leg so climbing to the head,
What meaneth it but this?
That some do seek not to be led,
But for to lead amiss.

And as this makes it most monstrous
For foot to climb to head,
So those subjects be most vicious
That refuse to be led.

The hinder part doth show us plain[9]
Our close and hidden vice,
Which doth behind us run amain[10]
In vile and shameful wise.[11]

---

1 libard obsolete form, leopard.

2 issue a discharge of blood or other matter from the body, either due to disease or produced medically through an incision or artificially created ulcer; to void to discharge matter from the body.

3 divers several.

4 ravine ravin: gluttony, voracity; but perhaps also, "robbery, rapine."

5 slaightes obsolete form of "sleight": artifice, strategy, trickery.

6 breech buttocks; specifically here, the anus; so-called because it is the part of the body which the breeches (or trousers) normally covered.

7 chuse choose.

8 seckes obsolete form, "seeks."

9 hinder part doth show us plain a reference to the open, running sore on the back of the figure on the right-hand side of the drawing.

10 amain with full force, violently, excessively.

11 wise way; here, "vilely" and "shamefully."

Wherefore to each in England now,
Let this monster them teach
To mend the monstrous life they show,
Lest endless death them reach.

Imprinted at London by John Awdeley,[1] dwelling in little Britain street without Aldersgate.[2] The 23rd of December.

—1568

WITCHCRAFT: LEGAL AND POPULAR DISCOURSES

The sixteenth century was a dark time for witches. Laws against witchcraft changed with each monarch; Edward VI repealed the strict laws made in the reign of Henry VIII, but Elizabeth reinstated them, and James reissued them with harsher punishments for first time offences. Punishments extended from imprisonment and pillorying to hanging and burning at the stake. Witchcraft was especially feared when connected with actions against the monarch; in such circumstances it was always treated as treason and the harshest penalties were exacted. An act passed in Elizabeth's reign reveals the very real threat witches posed to those in authority. An example of a trial of the witches at Chelmsford was recorded in a blackletter pamphlet—"blackletter" indicating a form of typography—and combines a serious, detailed transcription of the court proceedings with plenty of scandalous particulars to produce an example of early modern tabloid.

The frequent connection of witchmongering with Roman Catholicism is seen in both the Chelmsford trial and the writings of Reginald Scott in his treatise The Discovery of Witchcraft. Scott ridicules the belief in (and thus the persecution of) witches, essentially by denying the supernatural, which incriminates Scott in charges of atheism. James VI's tract Daemonology speaks against Scott's assertions. Daemonology was influenced by the King's experiences in 1590 with the treasonous North Berwick coven led by Francis Stewart, earl of Bothwell, who conspired to drown James as he returned from Denmark with his new bride. For most in the period, witchcraft was the revelation of the Devil at work. What remained problematic was how to distinguish between genuine witches and the hapless individuals accused of devilry by vengeful neighbours.

EDITIONS: An Act against Conjurations, Enchantments and Witchcrafts, in Statutes of the Realm, London (1819),Vol. 4, Pt. 1, Chpt. 16, pp. 446-47 at The Internet Archive (<http://www.archive.org/stream/statutesrealm00etcgoog#page/n8/mode/2up>); Anonymous, The Examination and confession of certaine wytches at Chensforde in the countie of Essex. London: By William Powell for William Pickering, 1566. STC 19869.5; Reginald Scot, The discoverie of witchcraft wherein the lewde dealing of witches and witchmongers is notablie detected ... London: By [Henry Denham for] William Brome, 1584. STC 21864; James VI, Daemonologie in the forme of a dialogue, divided into three bookes. Edinburgh: Printed by Robert Walgrave, printer to the King's Majesty, 1597. STC 14364.

An Act against Conjurations, Enchantments, and Witchcrafts[3]

Where at this present there is no ordinary nor condign[4] punishment provided against the practisers of the wicked offences of conjurations and invocations of evil spirits, and of sorceries, enchantments, charms and witchcrafts, the which offences by force of a statute[5] made in the 33rd year of the reign of the late King Henry the Eighth were made to be felony, and so continued until the said statute was repealed by the Act and Statute of Repeal made in the first year of the reign of the late King Edward the VIth; since the repeal whereof many fantastical and devilish

[1] John Awdeley (fl. 1559-77), a publisher of popular works, such as "ballads, news sheets and religious tracts," as well as the author of The Fraternity of Vagabonds (1565), an early example of the period's "rogue" literature (DNB, vol. 1, p. 748).

[2] without Aldersgate outside Aldersgate, one of the principal gates of London.

[3] This act of Parliament was passed in Queen Elizabeth's reign, 1563.

[4] condign appropriate.

[5] statute law or decree made by a sovereign or legislative authority.

persons have devised and practised invocations and conjurations of evil and wicked spirits, and have used and practised witchcrafts, enchantments, charms and sorceries, to the destruction of the persons and goods of their neighbours and other subjects of this realm, and for other lewd intents and purposes contrary to the laws of almighty God, to the peril of their own souls, and to the great infamy and disquietness of this realm. For reformation whereof be it enacted by the Queen's Majesty with the assent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal and the Commons in this present Parliament assembled, and by authority of the same, that if any person or persons after the first day of June next coming use, practise, or exercise any invocations or conjurations of evil and wicked spirits to or for any intent or purpose; or else if any person or persons after the said first day of June shall use, practise or exercise any witchcraft, enchantment, charm, or sorcery, whereby any person shall happen to be killed or destroyed, that then as well every such offender or offenders in invocations or conjurations as is aforesaid, their counsellors and aiders, as also every such offender or offenders in witchcraft, enchantment, charm, or sorcery whereby the death of any person doth ensue, their aiders and counsellors, being of either of the said offences lawfully convicted and attainted,[1] shall suffer pains of death as a felon or felons, and shall lose the privilege and benefit of sanctuary and clergy,[2] saving to the wife of such person her title of dower, and also to the heir and successor of such person his or their titles of inheritance, succession and other rights, as though no such attainder of the ancestor or predecessor had been had or made.[3]

And further be it enacted by the authority aforesaid, that if any person or persons, after the said first day of June next coming, shall use, practise, or exercise any witchcraft, enchantment, charm, or sorcery, whereby any person shall happen to be wasted, consumed, or lamed in his or her body or member, or whereby any goods or chattels[4] of any person shall be destroyed, wasted, or impaired, then every such offender or offenders, their counsellors and aiders, being thereof lawfully convicted, shall for his or their first offence or offences, suffer imprisonment by the space of one whole year, without bail or mainprize,[5] and once in every quarter of the said year shall in some market town, upon the market day, or at such time as any fair shall be kept there, stand openly upon the pillory[6] by the space of six hours and there shall openly confess his or her error and offence; and for the second offence, being as is aforesaid lawfully convicted or attainted, shall suffer death as a felon, and shall lose the privilege of clergy and sanctuary. [...]

Provided always, that if the offender, in any of the cases aforesaid for which the pains of death shall ensue, shall happen to be a peer of this realm, then his trial therein to be had by his peers, as it is used in cases of felony or treason and not otherwise.

And further to the intent that all manner of practise, use, or exercise of witchcraft, enchantment, charm, or sorcery, should be from henceforth utterly avoided, abolished and taken away, be it enacted by the authority of this present Parliament that if any person or persons shall from and after the said first day of June next coming, take upon him or them, by witchcraft, enchantment, charm, or sorcery, to tell or declare in what place any treasure of gold or silver should or might be found or had in the earth or other secret places, or where goods or things lost or stolen should be found or become, or shall use or practise any sorcery, enchantment, charm, or witchcraft to the

---

1 attainted convicted.

2 benefit of sanctuary and clergy Fugitives could take refuge in churches or other sacred places; the benefit of clergy was the advantage of belonging to a privileged order which was exempted from the sentence of ordinary courts of law.

3 The law does not take away the titles or inheritance of the family members of the convicted; attainder conviction.

4 chattels possessions, goods; also, cattle.

5 mainprize a person who stands surety for a prisoner's appearance in court at a specified time.

6 pillory a wooden or occasionally metal framework through which any of the head, hands, or feet of the offender were thrust.

intent to provoke any person to unlawful love, or to hurt or destroy any person in his or her body, member or goods, that then every such person or persons so offending, and being thereof lawfully convicted, shall for the said offence suffer imprisonment by the space of one whole year without bail or mainprize, and once in every quarter of the said year shall in some market town, upon the market day, or at such time as any fair shall be kept there, stand openly upon the pillory by the space of six hours, and there shall openly confess his or her error and offence [...] every such offender being thereof the second time convicted as is aforesaid, shall forfeit unto the Queen's Majesty, her heirs and successors, all his goods and chattels and suffer imprisonment during life.

—1563

Anonymous, The Examination and Confession of Certain Witches at Chelmsford in the County of Essex before the Queen's Majesty's Judges, the 26th Day of July, Anno 1566.

The Examination of Them with Their Confession before Doctor Cole and Master Fortescue at the Same Assize[1] Verbatim, as Near as Could Be Gathered and First of Elizabeth Francis, Who Said as Here Follows.

First, she learned this art of witchcraft, at the age of 12 years, of her grandmother, whose name was Mother Eve of Hatfield Peverel, deceased.

Item:[2] when she taught it her, she counselled her to renounce God and his word, and to give of her blood to Satan (as she termed it), which she delivered her in the likeness of a white spotted cat, and taught her to feed the said cat with bread and milk, and she did so. Also, she taught her to call it by the name of Satan and to keep it in a basket.

When this Mother Eve had given her the cat Satan, then this Elizabeth desired first of the said cat (calling it Satan) that she might be rich and to have goods, and he promised her she should, asking her what she would have, and she said "sheep" (for this cat spoke to her, as she confessed, in a strange hollow voice, but such as she understood by use), and this cat forthwith brought sheep into her pasture to the number of 18, black and white, which continued with her for a time, but in the end did all wear away, she knew not how.

Item: when she had gotten these sheep, she desired to have one Andrew Byles to her husband, which was a man of some wealth, and the cat did promise she should, but that he said she must first consent that this Andrew should abuse[3] her, and she so did.

And after, when this Andrew had thus abused her, he would not marry her, wherefore she willed Satan to waste his goods, which he forthwith did, and yet not being contented with this, she willed him to touch his body, which he forthwith did, whereof he died.

Item: that every time that he did anything for her, she said that he required a drop of blood, which she gave him by pricking herself, sometime in one place and then in another, and where she pricked herself there remained a red spot, which was still to be seen.

Item: when this Andrew was dead, she, doubting[4] herself with child, willed Satan to destroy it, and he bade her take a certain herb and drink it, which she did, and destroyed the child forthwith.

Item: when she desired another husband he promised her another, naming this Francis whom she now hath, but said he is not so rich as the other, willing her to consent unto that Francis in fornication, which she did, and thereof conceived a daughter that was born within a quarter of a year after they were married.

After they were married they lived not so quietly as she desired, being stirred (as she said) to much unquietness and moved to swearing and

[1] Assize trial, legal inquest.

[2] Item "likewise"; used to introduce a new fact or statement, especially in a formal document.

[3] abuse use improperly (sexually).

[4] doubting fearing.

cursing, wherefore she willed Satan her cat to kill the child, being about the age of half a year old, and he did so, and when she yet found not the quietness that she desired, she willed it to lay a lameness in the leg of this Francis her husband, and it did in this manner: it came in a morning to this Francis' shoe, lying in it like a toad, and when he perceived it, putting on his shoe, and had touched it with his foot, he, being suddenly amazed asked of her what it was, and she bade him kill it, and he was forthwith taken with a lameness whereof he cannot [be] healed.

After all this, when she had kept this cat by the space of 15 or 16 year, and, as some say (though untruly) being weary of it, she came to one Mother Waterhouse her neighbour (a poor woman) when she was going to the oven,[1] and desired her to give her a cake and she would give her a thing that she should be the better for so long as she lived. And this Mother Waterhouse gave her a cake, whereupon she brought her this cat in her apron and taught her as she was instructed before by her grandmother Eve, telling her that she must call him Satan and give him of her blood and bread and milk as before. And at this examination would confess no more.

Mother Waterhouse of Hatfield Peverel of the Age of 64 Years Being Examined the Same Day Confessed as Follows, and the 29th Day Suffered.

First, she received this cat of this Francis's wife in the order as is before said, who willed her to call him Satan, and told her that if she made much of him he would do for her what she would have him to do.

Then, when she had received him she (to try him what he could do) willed him to kill a hog of her own, which he did, and she gave him for his labour a chicken, which he first required of her and a drop of her blood. And this she gave him at all times when he did anything for her, by pricking her hand or face and putting the blood to his mouth, which he sucked, and forthwith would lie down in his pot again, wherein she kept him, the spots of all the which pricks are yet to be seen in her skin.

Also she saith that another time, being offended with one Father Kersey, she took her cat Satan in her lap and put him in the wood before her door, and willed him to kill three of this Father Kersey's hogs, which he did, and returning again told her so, and she rewarded him as before, with a chicken and a drop of her blood, which chicken he ate up clean as did all the rest, and she could find remaining neither bones nor feathers.

Also she confessed that, falling out with one Widow Gooday, she willed Satan to drown her cow and he did so, and she rewarded him as before.

Also, she falling out with another of her neighbours, she killed her three geese in the same manner.

Item: she confessed that because she could have no rest (which she required), she caused Satan to destroy the brewing at that time.[2]

Also, being denied butter of another, she caused her to lose the curds 2 or 3 days after.

Item: falling out with another of her neighbours and his wife, she willed Satan to kill him with a bloody flux,[3] whereof he died, and she rewarded him as before.

Likewise she confessed that because she lived somewhat unquietly with her husband, she caused Satan to kill him, and he did so about nine years past, since which time she hath lived a widow.

Also she said that when she would will him to do anything for her, she would say her paternoster[4] in Latin.

Item: this Mother Waterhouse confessed that she first turned this cat into a toad by this means: she kept the cat a great while in wool in a pot, and at length being moved by poverty to occupy[5] the

[1] going to the oven the communal baking oven.

[2] This may indicate that Mother Waterhouse was a brewer of beer.

[3] bloody flux an abnormally copious flowing of blood or other discharge.

[4] paternoster "Our Father" or the Lord's Prayer.

[5] occupy to make use of.

wool, she prayed in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost that it would turn into a toad, and forthwith it was turned into a toad, and so [she] kept it in the pot without wool.

Also she said, that going to Braxted a little before her apprehension, this Satan willed her to hie[1] her home, for she should have great trouble, and that she should be either hanged or burned shortly. More at this time she would not confess.

Joan Waterhouse, Daughter to This Mother Waterhouse, Being of the Age of 18 Years, and Examined, Confesses as Follows.

First, that her mother this last winter would have learned her this art, but she learned it not, neither yet the name of the thing. She saith she never saw it but once in her mother's hand, and that was in the likeness of a toad, and at that time coming in at a sudden when her mother called it out to work something withal, she heard her to call it Satan, for she was not at any time truly taught it, nor did never exercise it before this time as follows.

Item: she confessed that when her mother was gone to Braxted, in her absence lacking bread, she went to a girl, a neighbour's child, and desired her to give her a piece of bread and cheese, which when she denied and gave her not, or at the least not so much as would satisfy her, she going home did as she had seen her mother do, calling Satan, which came to her (as she said) she thought out of her mother's shoe from under the bed in the likeness of a great dog, demanding what she would have.

Wherewithal she being afeared, said she would have him to make such a girl afeared, naming this girl. Then asked he her what she would give him, and she said a red cock; then said he no, but thou shalt give me thy body and soul. Whereby, she being sore feared and desirous to be rid of him, said she would. And herewith he went to this girl in the likeness of an evil-favoured dog with horns on his head, and made her very much afeared, and doth yet haunt her, now cannot these witches (as they say) call him in again, because they did not let him out. And more (saith she) she never did, but this her doing was the revealing of all the rest.

[1] hie hasten.

The Second Examination and Confession of Mother Agnes Waterhouse and Joan Her Daughter upon Her Arraignment,[2] with the Questions and Answers of Agnes Brown the Child, on Whom the Spirit Haunteth at This Present, Deliberately Declared before Justice Southcote and Master Gerard the Queen's Attorney, the 27th Day of July, Anno 1566, No Less Wonderful than Most True.

First, being demanded whether that she [Mother Agnes Waterhouse] were guilty or not guilty upon her arraignment of the murdering of a man, she confessed that she was guilty, and then upon the evidence given against her daughter Joan Waterhouse, she said that she had a white cat, and willed her cat that he should destroy many of her neighbour's cattle, and also that he should kill a man, and so he did, and then after she must go two or three mile from her house, and then she took thought how to keep her cat. Then she and her cat concluded that he the said cat would become a toad, and then she should keep him in a close house and give him milk, and so he would continue till she came home again.

And then being gone forth, her daughter, having been at a neighbour's house thereby, required of one Agnes Brown, of the age of 12 years or more, a piece of bread and cheese, and the said Agnes said that she had none, and that she had not the key of the milkhouse door, and then the said Joan went home and was angry with the said Agnes Brown and she said that she remembered that her mother was wont to go up and down in her house and to call "Satan, Satan." She said she would prove[3] the like, and then she went up and down the house and called "Satan," and then there came a black dog to her and asked her what she would have. And then she said she was afeared, and said, "I would have thee to make one Agnes Brown afraid." And then he asked her what she would give him and she said she would give him a red cock, and he said he would have none of that, and she asked him what he would have then, and he said he would have her body and soul, and so upon request and fear together she gave him her body and soul.

[2] Arraignment where one must answer a criminal charge.

[3] prove test.

And then said the Queen's attorney, "How wilt thou do before God?" "Oh my lord, I trust God will have mercy upon me." And then he said, "Thou sayest well."

And then he [the dog] departed from her, and then she said that she heard that he made the said Agnes Brown afeared.

The said Agnes Brown was then demanded and called for, and then she came in, and being asked what age she was of, she said she thought she was 12 years old, and then the Queen's attorney asked her what she could say, and then she said that at such a day, naming the day certain, that she was churning of butter, and there came to her a thing like a black dog with a face like an ape, a short tail, a chain and a silver whistle (to her thinking) about his neck, and a pair of horns on his head, and brought in his mouth the key of the milkhouse door. "And then, my lord," she said, "I was afeared, for he skipped and leaped to and fro, and sat on the top of a nettle, and then I asked him what he would have, and he said he would have butter, and I said I had none for him, and then he said he would have some or[1] he went. And then he did run to put the key into the lock of the milkhouse door, and I said he should have none, and he said he would have some, and then he opened the door and went upon the shelf, and there upon a new cheese laid down the key, and being awhile within he came out again, and locked the door, and said that he had made flap butter[2] for me, and so departed." And then she said she told her aunt of it and then she sent for the priest, and when he came he bade her to pray to God and call on the name of Jesus.

"And so the next day, my lord, he came again to me with the key of our milkhouse door in his mouth, and then I said, 'In the name of Jesus, what hast thou there?' And then he laid down the key and said that I spoke evil words in speaking of that name, and then he departed, and so my aunt took up the key, for he had kept it from us two days and a night, and then we went into the milkhouse, and there we did see the print of butter upon the cheese. And then within a few days after he came again with a bean pod in his mouth—" And then the Queen's attorney asked what that was, and so the other justices declared, and then she said, "My lord, I said, 'In the name of Jesus, what hast thou there?' And so then he laid it down, and said I spoke evil words and departed, and came again by and by with a piece of bread in his mouth, and I asked him what he would have, and he said butter it was that he would have, and so he departed, and my lord, I did not see him no more till Wednesday last, which was the 24th day of July."

"Why," said the Queen's attorney, "was he with thee on Wednesday last?" "Yea," she said. "What did he then to thee?" said he. "My lord," said she, "he came with a knife in his mouth and asked me if I were not dead, and I said, 'No, I thanked God,' and then he said if I would not die that he would thrust his knife to my heart but he would make me to die, and then I said, 'In the name of Jesus, lay down thy knife,' and he said he would not depart from his sweet dame's knife as yet, and then I asked of him who was his dame, and then he nodded and wagged his head to your house, Mother Waterhouse."

Then the Queen's attorney asked of the said Agnes Waterhouse what she said to it. Then she demanded what manner knife that it was, and Agnes Brown said it was a dagger knife. "There thou liest," said Agnes Waterhouse. "Why?" quoth the Queen's attorney. "Marry, my lord" (quoth she), "she saith it is a dagger knife and I have none such in my house but a great knife, and therein she lieth."

---

[1] or before.

[2] flap butter butter formed by flapping or beating, or perhaps a broad pat of butter.

"Yea, yea, my lord," quoth Joan Waterhouse, "she lieth in that she saith that it had a face like an ape, for this that came to me was like a dog."

"Well," said the Queen's attorney, "well, can you make it come before us now? If ye can, we will dispatch you out of prison by and by." "No, faith," said Agnes Waterhouse, "I cannot, for in faith if I had let him go as my daughter did I could make him come by and by, but now I have no more power over him." Then said the Queen's attorney, "Agnes Waterhouse, when did thy cat suck of thy blood?" "Never," said she. "No?" said he, "let me see." And then the jailer lifted up her kercher[1] on her head and there [were] divers spots in her face and one on her nose. Then said the Queen's attorney, "In good faith, Agnes, when did he suck of thy blood last?" "By my faith, my lord," said she, "not this fortnight." And so the jury went together for that matter.

The End and Last Confession of Mother Waterhouse at Her Death, Which Was the 29th Day of July, Anno 1566.

First (being ready prepared to receive her death), she confessed earnestly that she had been a witch and used such execrable sorcery the space of 15 years, and had done many abominable deed[s], the which she repented earnestly and unfeignedly, and desired almighty God forgiveness in that she had abused his most holy name by her devilish practices, and trusted to be saved by his most unspeakable mercy. And being demanded of the bystanders, she confessed that she sent her Satan to one Wardol, a neighbour of hers, being a tailor (with whom she was offended) to hurt and destroy him and his goods. And this her Satan went thereabout for to have done her will, but in the end he returned to her again, and was not able to do this mischief. She asked the cause, and he answered because the said Wardol was so strong in faith that he had no power to hurt him. Yet she sent him divers and sundry time[s] (but all in vain) to have mischiefed him.

And being demanded whether she was accustomed to go to church to the common prayer or divine service, she said "Yea." And being required what she did there, she said she did as other women do, and prayed right heartily there, and when she was demanded what prayer she said, she answered, "The Lord's Prayer, the Ave Maria, and the Belief."[2] And then they demanded whether in Latin or in English, and she said, "In Latin." And they demanded why she said it not in English but in Latin, seeing that it was set out by public authority and according to God's word that all men should pray in the English and mother tongue that they best understand, and she said that Satan would at no time suffer her to say it in English, but at all times in Latin. For these and many other offences which she hath committed, done and confessed, she bewailed, repented and asked mercy of God, and all the world forgiveness, and thus she yielded up her soul, trusting to be in joy with Christ her Saviour, which dearly had bought her with his most precious blood. Amen.

—1566

Reginald Scott, from The Discovery of Witchcraft[3]

BOOK XVI, CHAPTER VI

[...] when with all their familiars,[4] their ointments, etc. whereby they ride invisibly, nor with all their charms, they can neither convey themselves from the hands of such as lay wait for them; nor can get out of prison that otherwise can go in and out at a mouse hole; nor finally can save themselves from

[1] kercher kerchief.

[2] Ave Maria salutation to the Virgin Mary; the Belief creed, confession of faith.

[3] Reginald Scott [Scot] (d. 1599), writer, engineer, and MP for New Romney (1589). The Discovery of Witchcraft is divided into sixteen books, each of which contains many chapters. Here Scott questions the existence of witches.

[4] familiars demons associated with or under the power of humans; often in animal form.

the gallows that can transubstantiate[1] their own and others' bodies into flies or fleas, etc.; who seeth not that either they lie or are belied[2] in their miracles? When they are said to transfer their neighbours' corn into their own ground and yet are perpetual beggars, and cannot enrich themselves either with money or otherwise, who is so foolish as to remain longer in doubt of their supernatural power? When never any yet from the beginning of the world till this day hath openly showed any other trick, conceit, or cunning point of witchcraft than legerdemain[3] or cozenage,[4] who will tarry any longer for further trial? When both the common law and also the injunctions do condemn prophesying and likewise false miracles and such as believe them in these days, who will not be afraid to give credit to those knaveries? When hereby they make the devil to be a god that heareth the prayers and understandeth the minds of men, who will not be ashamed, being a Christian, to be so abused by them? [...] When in all the New Testament we are not warned of these bodily appearances of devils as we are of his other subtleties, etc., who will be afraid of their bugs? When no such bargain is mentioned in the scriptures, why should we believe so incredible and impossible covenants,[5] being the ground of all witchmongers' religion, without the which they have no probability in the rest of their foolish assertions? When as if any honest man's conscience be appealed unto, he must confess he never saw trial of such witchcraft or conjuration to take effect as is now so certainly affirmed, what conscience can condemn poor souls that are accused wrongfully, or believe them that take upon them impiously to do or work those impossible things? When the whole course of the scripture is utterly repugnant to these impossible opinions, saving a few sentences, which nevertheless rightly understood relieve them nothing at all, who will be seduced by their fond arguments? When as now that men have spied the knavery of oracles and such pelf,[6] and that there is not one oracle in the world remaining, who cannot perceive that all the residue heretofore of those devices have been cozenages, knaveries and lies? When the power of God is so impudently transferred to a base creature, what good Christian can abide to yield unto such miracles wrought by fools? When the old women accused of witchcraft are utterly insensible and unable to say for themselves, and much less to bring such matters to pass as they are accused of, who will not lament to see the extremity used against them? When the foolisher sort of people are always most mistrustful of hurt by witchcraft, and the simplest and dotingest[7] people mistrusted to do the hurt, what wise man will not conceive all to be but folly? When it were an easy matter for the devil, if he can do as they affirm, to give them great store of money and make them rich and doth it not, being a thing which would procure him more disciples than any other thing in the world, the wise must needs condemn the devil of folly and the witches of peevishness[8] that take such pains and give their souls to the devil to be tormented in hell fire and their bodies to the hangman to be trussed on the gallows for nickels in a bag.

BOOK XVI, CHAPTER VII

By this time all kentishmen[9] know (a few fools excepted) that Robin Goodfellow[10] is a knave. All wise men understand that witches' miraculous enterprises, being contrary to nature, probability and reason, are void of truth or possibility. All Protestants perceive that popish charms, conjura-

[1] transubstantiate change from one substance to another.
[2] belied misrepresented, proven false.
[3] legerdemain "light of hand"; sleight of hand, trickery.
[4] cozenage act of cheating, deception, fraud.
[5] covenants compacts, contracts, bargains.
[6] pelf trumpery, lies.
[7] dotingest most weak, enfeebled in intellect.
[8] peevishness foolishness, perverseness.
[9] kentishmen men from Kent, a county in England; here possibly a term for Englishmen generally; perhaps a reference to kenning, or knowing ("knowledgeable men").
[10] Robin Goodfellow also known as Hobgoblin or Puck; a fairy or goblin believed to haunt the English countryside.

tions, execrations[1] and benedictions are not effectual, but be toys and devices only to keep the people blind and to enrich the clergy. All Christians see that to confess witches can do as they say were to attribute to a creature the power of the Creator. All children well brought up conceive and spy, or at the least are taught, that jugglers' miracles do consist of legerdemain and confederacy. The very heathen people are driven to confess that there can be no such conference between a spiritual devil and a corporal witch as is supposed. For no doubt all the heathen would then have every one his familiar devil, for they would make no conscience to acquaint themselves with a devil that are not acquainted with God.

I have dealt and conferred with many (marry I must confess papists for the most part) that maintain every point of these absurdities. And surely I allow better of their judgements than of others unto whom some part of these cozenages are discovered and seen, and yet, concerning the residue, they remain as wise as they were before: specially being satisfied in the highest and greatest parts of conjuring and cozening, to wit, in popery, and yet will be abused with beggarly juggling and witchcraft.

—1584

James VI (1566-1625), from Daemonology[2]

The Preface to the Reader

The fearful abounding at this time in this country of these detestable slaves of the Devil, the witches or enchanters, hath moved me (beloved reader) to dispatch in post[3] this following treatise of mine, not in any wise (as I protest) to serve for a show of my learning and engine,[4] but only (moved of conscience) to press thereby, so far as I can, to resolve the doubting hearts of many, both that such assaults of Satan are most certainly practised and that the instruments thereof merit most severely to be punished, against the damnable opinions of two principally in our age, whereof the one called Scott,[5] an Englishman, is not ashamed in public print to deny that there can be such a thing as witchcraft, and so maintains the old error of the Sadducees[6] in denying of spirits. [...]

THE SECOND BOOK. CHAPTER III

Argument: The witches' actions divided in two parts. The actions proper to their own persons. Their actions toward others. The form of their conventions and adoring of their master.

PHILOMATHES: [...] It rests then that ye discourse upon their practices from they be passed prentices,[7] for I would fain hear what is possible to them to perform in very deed. Although they serve a common master with the necromancers[8] (as I have before said), yet serve they him in another form. For as the means are diverse which allure them to these unlawful arts of serving of the Devil, so by diverse ways use they their practices, answering to these means, which first the Devil used as instruments in them, though all tending to one end: to wit, the enlarging of Satan's tyranny, and crossing of the propagation of the kingdom of Christ, so far as lieth in the possibility either of the one or other sort, or of the Devil their master. For where the magicians, as allured

[1] execrations curses.

[2] Daemonology is written in the form of a dialogue between Philomathes and Epistemon, and is divided into three books. It was first published in Edinburgh in 1597, but went through multiple editions for an English readership in 1603.

[3] in post with speed.

[4] engine wit, skill.

[5] Scott i.e., Reginald Scott, author of the previous entry, The Discovery of Witchcraft.

[6] Sadducees one of three sects into which the Jews were divided in the time of Christ; they denied the existence of angels and spirits, as well as the resurrection of the dead.

[7] from they be passed prentices i.e., after they have become apprentices.

[8] necromancers those practising the art of revealing the future by means of communication with the dead.

by curiosity in the most part of their practices seek principally the satisfying of the same, and to win to themselves a popular honour and estimation, these witches on the other part, being enticed either for the desire of revenge or of worldly riches, their whole practices are either to hurt men and their goods or what they possess, for satisfying of their cruel minds in the former, or else by the wrack in whatsoever sort of any whom God will permit them to have power of, to satisfy their greedy desire in the last point.

EPISTEMON: In two parts their actions may be divided: the actions of their own persons and the actions proceeding from them towards any other. And this division being well understood will easily resolve you what is possible to them to do. For although all that they confess is no lie upon their part, yet doubtlessly in my opinion a part of it is not indeed according as they take it to be, and in this I mean by the actions of their own persons. For as I said before, speaking of magic, that the Devil illudes the senses of these scholars of his in many things, so say I the like of these witches.

PHILOMATHES: Then I pray you, first to speak of that part of their own persons, and then you may come next to their actions towards others.

EPISTEMON: To the effect that they may perform such services of their false master as he employs them in, the Devil, as God's ape,[1] counterfeits in his servants this service and form of adoration that God prescribed and made his servants to practise. For as the servants of God publically use to convene for serving of him, so makes he [the Devil] them in great numbers to convene (though publically they dare not) for his service. As none convenes to the adoration and worshipping of God except they be marked with his seal, the sacrament of Baptism, so none serves Satan and convenes to the adoring of him that are not marked with that mark,[2] whereof I already spoke. As the minister sent by God teacheth plainly at the time of their public conventions how to serve him in spirit and truth, so that unclean spirit in his own person teacheth his disciples at the time of their convening how to work all kind of mischief, and craves compt[3] of all their horrible and detestable proceedings passed for advancement of his service. Yea, that he may the more vively[4] counterfeit and scorn God, he oft times makes his slaves to convene in these very places which are destined and ordained for the convening of the servants of God (I mean by churches). But this far, which I have yet said, I not only take it to be true in their opinions, but even so to be indeed. For the form that he used in counterfeiting God amongst the gentiles makes me so to think. As God spoke by his oracles, spoke he not so by his? As God had as well bloody sacrifices as others without blood, had not he the like? As God had churches sanctified to his service, with altars, priests, sacrifices, ceremonies, and prayers, had he not the like polluted to his service? As God gave responses by Urim and Thrummim,[5] gave he not his responses by the entrails of beasts, by the singing of fowls, and by their actions in the air? As God by visions, dreams, and ecstasies revealed what was to come and what was his will unto his servants, used he not the like means to forewarn his slaves of things to come? Yea, even as God loved cleanness, hated vice and impurity, and appointed punishments therefore, used he not the like (though falsely I grant, and but in eschewing[6] the less inconvenient to draw them upon a greater), yet dissimulated he not I say, so far as to appoint his priests to keep their bodies clean and undefiled before their asking responses of him? And feigned he not God to be a protector of every virtue, and a just revenger of the contrary? This reason then moves me, that as he is that same devil, and as crafty now as he was then, so

[1] God's ape God's fool, but also someone who imitates God.

[2] that mark the mark of Satan. See Revelation 13:16-18; a mark on the right hand or the forehead. The number "of the beast" is "six hundred three score and six."

[3] compt account.

[4] vively lively.

[5] Urim and Thrummim sacred symbols worn on the breastplates of the high priest. Exodus 28:30. While the exact nature of these symbols is uncertain, they apparently helped the priest understand God's decisions in difficult matters.

[6] eschewing avoiding.

will he not spare as pertly[1] in these actions that I have spoken of concerning the witches' persons. But further, witches oft times confess not only his convening in the church with them, but his occupying of the pulpit; yea, their form of adoration to be the kissing of his hinder parts, which though it seem ridiculous, yet may it likewise be true, seeing we read that in Calicut[2] he, appearing in form of a goat-buck, hath publically that un-honest homage done unto him by every one of the people. So ambitious is he and greedy of honour (which procured his fall) that he will even imitate God in that part, where it is said that Moses could see but the "hinder parts of God, for the brightness of his glory" (Exodus 33).[3] [...]

THE SECOND BOOK. CHAPTER V

Argument: Witches' actions towards others. Why there are more women of that craft nor[4] men. What things are possible to them to effectuate[5] by the power of their master. The reasons thereof. What is the surest remedy of the harms done by them.

[...] EPISTEMON: In their actions used towards others, three things ought to be considered: first, the manner of their consulting thereupon; next, their part as instruments; and last, their master's part, who puts the same in execution. As to their consultations thereupon, they use them oftest in the churches where they convene for adoring, at what time their master, enquiring at them what they would be at, every one of them propones[6] unto him what wicked turn they would have done, either for obtaining of riches or for revenging them upon any whom they have malice at; who granting their demand, as no doubt willingly he will, since it is to do evil, he teacheth them the means whereby they may do the same. As for little trifling turns that woman have ado with, he causeth them to joint[7] dead corpses and to make powders thereof, mixing such other things there amongst as he gives unto them.

PHILOMATHES: But before ye go further, permit me I pray you to interrupt you one word which ye have put me in memory of by speaking of women. What can be the cause that there are twenty women given to that craft where there is one man?

EPISTEMON: The reason is easy, for as that sex is frailer than man is, so is it easier to be entrapped in these gross snares of the Devil, as was over-well proved to be true by the serpent's deceiving of Eve at the beginning, which makes him the homelier with that sex sensyne.[8]

PHILOMATHES: Return now where ye left.

EPISTEMON: To some others at these times he teacheth how to make pictures[9] of wax or clay, that by the roasting thereof, the persons that they bear the name of may be continually melted or dried away by continual sickness. To some he gives such stones or poulders[10] as will help to cure or cast on diseases, and to some he teacheth kinds of uncouth[11] poisons, which mediciners understand not (for he is far cunninger than man in the knowledge of all the occult properties of nature), not that any of these means which he teacheth them (except the poisons which are composed of things natural) can of themselves help anything to these turns that they are employed in, but only being God's ape, as well in that as in all other things. Even as God by his sacraments, which are earthly of themselves, works a heavenly effect, though no ways by any cooperation in them, and

---

1 pertly boldly, shamelessly

2 Calicut one of the ports on the Malabar Coast of India.

3 The biblical notations in parentheses are included in the margins of the text.

4 nor than.

5 effectuate to bring to pass.

6 propones proposes.

7 to joint to divide into joints, to dismember.

8 homelier familiar; sensyne since then.

9 pictures images.

10 poulders powders.

11 uncouth unknown, strange.

as Christ by clay and spittle[1] wrought together "opened the eyes of the blind man" (John 9), suppose there was no virtue in that which he outwardly applied, so the Devil will have his outward means to be shows as it were of his doing, which hath no part of cooperation in his turns with him, how far that ever the ignorants be abused in the contrary. And as to the effects of these two former parts, to wit the consultations and the outward means, they are so wonderful as I dare not allege any of them without joining a sufficient reason of the possibility thereof. For leaving all the small trifles among wives, and to speak of the principal points of their craft, for the common trifles thereof they can do without converting well enough by themselves, these principal points I say are these: they can make men or women to love or hate other, which may be very possible to the Devil to effectuate, seeing he being a subtle spirit knows well enough how to persuade the corrupted affection of them whom God will permit him so to deal with; they can lay the sickness of one upon another, which likewise is very possible unto him, for since by God's permission he laid sickness upon Job, why may he not far easilier lay upon any other? For as an old practician,[2] he knows well enough what humour domines[3] most in any of us, and as a spirit he can subtly waken up the same, making it peccant,[4] or to abound as he thinks meet for troubling of us, when God will so permit him. And for the taking off of it, no doubt he will be glad to relieve such of present pain as he may think by these means to persuade to be caught in his everlasting snares and fetters. [...] They can raise storms and tempests in the air, either upon sea or land, though not universally, but in such a particular place and prescribed bounds as God will permit them so to trouble, which likewise is very easy to be discerned from any other natural tempests that are meteors, in respect of the sudden and violent raising thereof, together with the short enduring of the same. And this is likewise very possible to their master to do, he having such affinity with the air as being a spirit and having such power of the forming and moving thereof as ye have heard me already declare, for in the Scripture that style of "the prince of the air" (Ephesians 2) is given unto him. They can make folks to become frenetic or maniac, which likewise is very possible to their master to do since they are but natural sicknesses, and so he may lay on these kinds as well as any others. They can make spirits either to follow and trouble persons or haunt certain houses, and affray[5] oftentimes the inhabitants, as hath been known to be done by our witches at this time. And likewise they can make some to be possessed with spirits and so to become very demoniacs, and this last sort is very possible likewise to the Devil their master to do since he may easily send his own angels to trouble in what form he pleases any whom God will permit him so to use.

PHILOMATHES: But will God permit these wicked instruments, by the power of the Devil their master, to trouble by any of these means any that believes in him?

EPISTEMON: No doubt, for there are three kinds of folks whom God will permit so to be tempted or troubled: the wicked for their horrible sins, to punish them in the like measure; the godly that are sleeping in any great sins or infirmities and weakness in faith, to waken them up the faster by such an uncouth form; and even some of the best, that their patience may be tried before the world, as Job's was. For why may not God use any kind of extraordinary punishment when it pleases him, as well as the ordinary rods of sickness or other adversities?

PHILOMATHES: Who then may be free from these devilish practices?

---

1 spittle spit.

2 practician practitioner.

3 domines dominates.

4 peccant corrupt, sinning.

5 affray frighten.

EPISTEMON: No man ought to presume so far as to promise any impunity to himself, for God hath before all beginnings preordinated,[1] as well the particular sorts of plagues as of benefits, for every man, which in the[ir] own time he ordains them to be visited with, and yet ought we not to be the more afraid for that of anything that the Devil and his wicked instruments can do against us, for we daily fight against the Devil in a hundred other ways. [...]

PHILOMATHES: Is it not lawful then by the help of some other witch to cure the disease that is casten on by that craft?

EPISTEMON: No ways lawful. [...]

PHILOMATHES: How then may these diseases be lawfully cured?

EPISTEMON: Only by earnest prayer to God, by amendment of their lives, and by sharp pursuing, every one according to his calling, of these instruments of Satan, whose punishment to the death will be a salutary[2] sacrifice for the patient. And this is not only the lawful way, but likewise the most sure, for by the Devil's means "can never the Devil be casten out" (Mark 3), as Christ sayeth. And when such a cure is used it may well serve for a short time, but at the last it will doubtlessly tend to the utter perdition of the patient both in body and soul.

—1597

JESTBOOKS

Collections of comic and witty tales and riddles were popular in the sixteenth century. The selection here includes A Hundred Merry Tales (1526), printed by John Rastell, a lawyer, playwright, and brother-in-law of Sir Thomas More. Merry Tales, Witty Questions and Quick Answers was first published in the 1530s; the selections printed here are from the expanded publication of 1567. Merry Tales (1567) was not, despite its claim, "newly imprinted and made by Master Skelton, Poet Laureat," although it focuses on Skelton as a main character. There may be some biographical bases for the jests, but they are mainly fictional. The Mirror of Mirth (1583) was a translation of a French jestbook by Bonaventure Des Periers; the translation, by T.D., has been attributed to Thomas Deloney.

EDITIONS: A, C, mery talys [A Hundred Merry Tales]. London: [by J. Rastell for P. Treveris], 1526. STC 23664; Mery tales, wittie questions, and quicke answeres. London: H. Wykes, 1567. STC 23665.5; Merie tales newly imprinted [and] made by Master Skelton, Poet Laureat. London: Thomas Colwell, 1567. STC 22618; The mirrour of mirth. London: Printed by Roger Warde, 1583. STC 6784.5.

from A Hundred Merry Tales

3[3]

A wife there was which had appointed her 'prentice[4] to come to her bed in the night, which servant had long wooed her to have his pleasure, which according to the appointment came to her bedside in the night, her husband lying by her. And when she perceived him there, she caught him by the hand and held him fast, and incontinent[5] wakened her husband and said, "Sir, it is so ye have a false and an untrue servant to you which is William your 'prentice, and has long wooed me to have his pleasure, and because I could not avoid his importunate request, I have appointed him this night to meet me in the garden in the herber.[6] And if ye will array[7] yourself in mine array and go thither, ye shall see the proof thereof, and then ye may rebuke him as ye think best by your discretion."

[1] preordinated predestined.

[2] salutary conducive to well-being or salvation.

[3] The tales are not numbered in the original.

[4] 'prentice apprentice, servant.

[5] incontinent immediately.

[6] herber arbour.

[7] array dress.

This husband thus advertised[1] by his wife put upon him his wife's raiment and went to the arbour, and when he was gone thither, the 'prentice came into bed to his mistress, where for a season they were both content and pleased each other by the space of an hour or two. But when she thought time convenient, she said to the 'prentice: "Now go thy way into the arbour and meet him, and take a good waster[2] in thy hand, and say thou didst it but to prove whether I would be a good woman or no, and reward him as thou thinks best."

This 'prentice, doing after his mistress' counsel, went to the arbour where he found his master in his mistress' apparel and said, "A, thou harlot! Art thou come hither? Now I see well, if I would be false to my master, thou wouldst be a strong whore. But I had lever[3] thou were hanged than I would do him so traitorous a deed. Therefore I shall give thee some punishment as thou, like a whore, hast deserved." And therewith lapped him well about the shoulders and back and gave him a dozen or two good stripes. The master, feeling himself somewhat to smart,[4] said, "Peace, William, mine own true good servant, for God's sake, hold thy hands, for I am thy master and not thy mistress!" "Nay, whore," quoth he, "thou liest. Thou art but an harlot, and I did but to prove[5] thee," and smote him again. "Alas, man," quoth the master, "I beseech thee, no more, for I am not she, for I am thy master. Feel, for I have a beard!" And therewith he spared his hand and felt his beard. "Alas, master," quoth the 'prentice, "I cry you mercy."

And then the master went unto his wife and she asked him how he had sped and he answered: "I wis,[6] wife, I have been shrewdly beaten. Howbeit, I have cause to be glad, for I thank God I have as true a wife and as true a servant as any man hath in England."

By this tale ye may see that it is not wisdom for a man to be ruled always after his wife's counsel.

17

A rich, covetous merchant there was that dwelled in London which ever[7] gathered money and could never find in his heart to spend nought upon himself nor upon no man else, which fell sore sick, and as he lay on his death bed had his purse lying at his bed's head, and had such a love to[8] his money that he put his hand in his purse and took out thereof ten or twelve pounds in nobles[9] and put them in his mouth. And because his wife and others perceived him very sick and like to die, they exhorted him to be confessed and brought the curate unto him, which, when they had caused him to say Benedicte,[10] the curate bad[11] him cry God mercy and show his sins. Then the sick man began to say, "I cry God mercy. I have offended in the Seven Deadly Sins and broken the Ten Commandments," and because of the gold in his mouth, he muffled so in his speech that the curate could not well understand him, wherefore[12] the curate asked him what he had in his mouth that letted[13] his speech.

"I wis, master parson," quoth the sick man muffling, "I have nothing in my mouth but a little money because I wot[14] not whether I shall go. I thought I would take some spending money with me, for I wot not what need I shall have thereof," and incontinent after that saying, died before he was confessed or repentant that any man could perceive, and so by likelihood went to the Devil.

By this tale ye may see that they that all their lives will never do charity to their neighbours, that God in time of their death will not suffer them to have grace of repentance.

---

1 advertised informed, warned.
2 waster cudgel, club.
3 lever rather.
4 to smart to feel pain.
5 to prove to test.
6 I wis certainly.
7 ever always.
8 to of.
9 nobles gold coins.
10 Benedicte a blessing.
11 bad bid, requested.
12 wherefore for which reason.
13 letted hindered.
14 wot know.

19

In the old world when all things could speak,[1] the four elements[2] met together for many things which they had to do, because they must meddle always one with another and had communication together of all divers[3] matters. And because they could not conclude all their matters at that season, they appointed to break communication for that time and to meet again another time. Therefore, each one of them showed to [the] other where their most abiding[4] was and where their fellows should find them if need should require.

And first the earth said, "Brethren, ye know well, as for me I am permanent always and not removable. Therefore, ye may be sure to have me alway[s] when ye list."[5]

The water said, "If ye list to seek me, ye shall be sure ever to have me under a tuft of green rushes or else in a woman's eye."

The wind said, "If ye list to seek me, ye shall be sure ever to have me among aspen leaves or else in a woman's tongue."

Then quoth the fire, "If any of you list to seek me, ye shall ever be sure to find me in a flintstone or else in a woman's heart."

By this tale ye may learn as well the properties of the four elements as the properties of a woman.

27

A merchant's wife there was in Bow Parish[6] in London, somewhat steeped in age, to whom her maid came on a Sunday in Lent after dinner and said, "Mistress," quoth she, "they ring at Saint Thomas of Acres,[7] for there shall be a sermon preached anon."[8] To whom the mistress answered and said, "Marry,[9] God's blessing on thy heart for warning me thereof, and because I slept not well all this night, I pray thee bring my stole[10] with me, for I will go thither to look whether I can take a nap there while the priest is preaching."

By this ye may see that many one goes to church as much for other things as for devotion.

32

A young gentleman of the age of twenty years, somewhat disposed to mirth and game, on a time talked with a gentlewoman which was right wise and also merry. This gentlewoman, as she talked with him, happened to look upon his beard, which was but young and grown somewhat upon the overlip[11] and but little grown beneath, as all young men's beards commonly used to grow, said to him, thus "Sir, ye have a beard above and none beneath."

And he, hearing her say so, said in sport, "Mistress, ye have a beard beneath and none above."

"Marry," quoth she, "then set the one against the t'other." Which answer made the gentleman so abashed that he had not one word to answer.

41

It fortuned there was a great variance between the Bishop of Norwich and one Master Skelton, a poet laureate, insomuch that the Bishop commanded him that he should not come in at his gates. This Master Skelton did absent himself for a long season, but at the last he thought to do his duty to him and studied ways how he might obtain the Bishop's favour, and determined himself that he would come to him with some present and humble himself to the Bishop, and got a couple of

---

1 when all things could speak The belief that before the fall of Adam and Eve, all animals—and here inanimate objects—could speak.

2 four elements In ancient and medieval philosophy, the simple substances of which all material bodies are compounded were believed to be earth, water, air, and fire.

3 divers diverse.

4 most abiding usual dwelling.

5 list please, wish.

6 Bow Parish the parish of Bow Church, in Cheapside, near the centre of London.

7 Saint Thomas of Acres the name of a church.

8 anon immediately, soon.

9 Marry a mild oath, referring to the Virgin Mary.

10 stole a garment worn over the shoulders, hanging down to the feet.

11 overlip upper lip.

pheasants and came to the Bishop's place[1] and required the porter[2] he might come in to speak with my lord. This porter, knowing his lord's pleasure, would not suffer him to come in at the gates, wherefore this Master Skelton went on the backside to seek some other way to come into the palace. But the palace was moated that he could see no way to come over, except in one place where there lay a long tree over the moat, in manner of a bridge, that was fallen down with wind. Wherefore this Master Skelton went along upon the tree to come over. And when he was almost over, his foot slipped for lack of sure footing and fell into the moat up to the middle. But at the last he recovered himself and, as well as he could, dried himself again and soddenly[3] came to the Bishop, being in his hall then lately risen from dinner, which, when he saw Skelton coming soddenly to him, said to him, "Why, thou caitiff,[4] I warned thee thou shouldst never come in at my gates, and charged my porter to keep thee out."

"Forsooth,[5] my lord," quoth Skelton, "though ye gave such charge and though your gates be never so surely kept, yet it is not more possible to keep me out of your doors than to keep out crows or pies,[6] for I came not in at your gates, but I came over the moat that I have been almost drowned for my labour," and showed his clothes, how evil[7] he was arrayed, which caused many that stood thereby to laugh apace.[8] Then quoth Skelton, "If it like your lordship, I have brought you a dish to your supper, a couple of pheasants."

"Nay," quoth the bishop, "I defy thee, and thy pheasants also. And, wretch as thou art, pick thee[9] out of my house, for I will none of thy gift."

Howbeit, with as humble words as he could, this Skelton desired the Bishop to be his good lord and to take his little gift of him. But the Bishop called him daw[10] and fool oftentimes, and in no wise[11] would receive that gift. This Skelton, then considering that the Bishop called him fool so oft, said to one of his familiars thereby that though it were evil to be christened a fool, yet it was much worse to be confirmed[12] a fool of such a Bishop, for the name of confirmation must needs abide. Therefore he imagined how he might avoid that confirmation, and mused a while, and at the last, he said to the Bishop thus: "If your lordship knew the names of these pheasants, ye would be content to take them."

"Why, caitiff?" quoth the Bishop hastily and angrily. "What be their names?"

"I wis, my lord," quoth Skelton, "this pheasant is called 'alpha,' viz.[13] primus, the first; and this is called 'o[mega],' viz. novissimus, the last. And for the more plain understanding of my mind, if it please your lordship to take them I promise you this 'alpha' is the first that ever I gave you, and this 'omega' is the last that ever I will give you while I live." At the which answer, all that were by made great laughter and all desired the Bishop to be good lord to him for his merry conceits, at whose request ere[14] they went the Bishop was content to take him unto his favour again.

By this ye may see that merry conceits do a man more good than to fret himself with anger and melancholy.

62

There was a man that married a woman which had great riches and beauty. Howbeit, she had such an impediment of nature that she was dumb and could not speak, which thing made him full oft to be right pensive and sad. Wherefore upon a day as he walked alone right heavy in heart, thinking

1 place could be "palace."
2 porter gate keeper.
3 soddenly looking sodden or wet.
4 caitiff wretch.
5 Forsooth truly.
6 pies magpies, a common bird of the crow family.
7 evil unfortunately, wretchedly.
8 apace quickly.
9 pick thee take yourself.
10 daw simpleton.
11 in no wise in no manner.
12 confirmed established, but playing with the idea of spiritual confirmation.
13 viz. Latin, videlicet ("namely)."
14 ere before.

upon his wife, there came one to him and asked him what was the cause of his heaviness, which answered that it was only because his wife was born dumb. To whom this other said, "I shall show ye soon a remedy and a medicine therefore that is thus: go take an aspen leaf and lay it under her tongue this night, she being asleep, and I warrant thee that she shall speak on the morrow." Which man, being glad of this medicine, prepared therefore and gathered aspen leaves, whereof he laid three of them under her tongue when she was asleep. And upon the morrow when he himself waked, he, desirous to know how his medicine wrought, being in bed with her, he demanded of her how she did. And suddenly she answered and said, "I beshrew[1] your heart for waking me so early!" And so by virtue of that medicine she was restored to her speech.

But in conclusion, her speech so increased day by day and she was so cursed of condition, that every day she brawled and chid with her husband so much that at the last he was more vexed, and had much more trouble and disease[2] with her shrewd words than he had before when she was dumb. Wherefore, as he walked another time alone, he happened to meet again with the same person that taught him the said medicine, and said to him this wise:[3]

"Sir, ye taught me a medicine but late[4] to make my dumb wife to speak, bidding me lay an aspen leaf under her tongue when she slept. And I laid three aspen leaves there, wherefore now she speaks. But yet she speaks so much and so shrewdly that I am more weary of her now than I was before when she was dumb. Wherefore I pray you teach me a medicine to modify her that she speak not so much."

This other answered and said thus: "Sir, I am a devil of hell, but I am one of them that have the least power there. Albeit yet I have power to make a woman speak, but yet if a woman begin once to speak, I nor all the devils in hell that have the most power be not able to make a woman to be still nor to cause her to leave her speaking."

By this tale ye may note that a man oftimes desires and covets too much that thing that oft turns to his displeasure.

67

A certain confessor in the holy time of Lent enjoined his penitent to say daily for his penance this prayer: "Agnus dei miserere mei," which was as much to say in English as "The Lamb of God have mercy upon me." This penitent, accepting his penance, departed and that time twelve-month after came again to be confessed of the same confessor, which demanded of him whether he had fulfilled his penance that he him enjoined the last year. And he said thus: "Yea, sir, I thank God, I have fulfilled it, for I have said thus today morning and so daily: 'The Sheep of God have mercy upon me.'" To whom the confessor said, "Nay, I bad ye say, 'Agnus dei miserere mei,' that is, 'The Lamb of God have mercy upon me'!" "Yea, sir," quoth the penitent, "ye say truth. That was the last year, but now it is at twelve month since, and it is a sheep by this time. Therefore I must needs say now, 'The Sheep of God have mercy upon me.'"

By this tale ye may perceive that if Holy Scripture be expounded to rude lay[5] people only in the literal sense, peradventure[6] it shall do but little good.

69

A rich franklin[7] in the country, having by his wife but one child and no more, for the great affection that he had to his said child, found[8] him at Oxford to school by the space of two or three years. This young scholar in a vacation time, for his disport,[9] came home to his father. It fortuned afterward in

1 beshrew curse.
2 disease i.e., dis-ease, or trouble.
3 this wise this manner of thing.
4 but late lately.
5 rude lay unlearned and unprofessional.
6 peradventure perhaps.
7 franklin a freeholder or landowner, ranking just below the gentry.
8 found established and maintained.
9 disport amusement.

a night, the father, the mother, and the said young scholar sitting at supper, having before them no more meat but only a couple of chickens, the father said this wise: "Son, so it is that I have spent much money upon thee to find thee to school, wherefore I have great desire to know what you have learned."

To whom the son answered and said, "Father, I have studied sophistry,[1] and by that science I can prove that these two chickens in the dish be three chickens."

"Marry," said the father, "that would I fain see."

The scholar took one of the chickens in his hand and said, "Lo, here is one chicken." And incontinent he took both the chickens in his hand jointly and said, "Here is two chickens, and one and two makes three. Ergo,[2] here is three chickens!"

Then the father took one of the chickens to himself and gave another to his wife, and said thus: "Lo, I will have one of the chickens to my part, and thy mother shall have another, and because of thy good argument, thou shalt have the third to thy supper, for thou gettest no more meat here at this time," which promise the father kept and so the scholar went without his supper.

By this tale men may see that it is great folly to put one to school to learn any subtle science which hath no natural wit.

—1526

from Merry Tales, Witty Questions and Quick Answers

Of Him that Rode Out of London and Had His Servant Following on Foot.

A man that on a[3] time that rode five miles out of London and had his servant following after him on foot, which came so near, that the horse struck him a great stroke upon the thigh. The servant, thinking to be revenged, took a great stone and threw [it] at the horse and hit his master on the rains[4] of the back, who thought it had been his horse. He within a while looked back and chid his servant because he came halting so far behind. The servant answered, "Sir, your horse hath given me such a stroke upon my thigh that I can go no faster."

"Truly," said the master, "the horse is a great kicker, for likewise with his heel right now he gave me a great stroke upon the rains of my back."

Of the Chaplain that Said Our Lady Matins Abed[5]

A chaplain boasted, sitting at his lord's table, that he said our Lady matins every morning besides all his other service and orisons.[6] The lord, to prove whether his chaplain did as he said, arose early a morning and went to his chaplain's chamber and called him, saying, "Where be ye, Sir William?"

"Here, and please your lordship," quoth he, "in my bed."

"Why," said the lord, "I thought ye had been up and saying of Our Lady matins."

"I am now saying it," quoth the chaplain.

"What, lying in your bed?" quoth the lord.

"Why, sir," said the chaplain, "where should women be served but abed?"

Of the Jealous Man

A man that was right jealous on[7] his wife dreamed on a night as he lay abed with her and slept that the Devil appeared unto him and said, "Wouldst thou not be glad that I should put thee in surety of thy wife?"[8]

---

[1] sophistry the use of specious reasoning as an art or dialectic exercise; often employed with the intent to deceive, and so often a term of disparagement.

[2] Ergo therefore.

[3] on a one.

[4] rains kidneys.

[5] Our Lady Matins Abed prayers to the Virgin Mary, often recited in the morning (and here while still in bed).

[6] orisons prayers.

[7] on of.

[8] put thee in surety of thy wife i.e., assure you of your wife's fidelity or chastity.

"Yes," said he.

"Hold," said the Devil, "as long as thou hast this ring upon thy finger no man shall make thee cuckold."[1] The man was glad thereof, and when he awaked, he found his finger in his wife's tail.[2]

Of King Louis of France and the Husbandman[3]

What[4] time King Louis of France, the eleventh of that name, because of the trouble that was in the realm kept himself in Bourgoyne,[5] he chanced by occasion of hunting to come acquainted with one Conon, a homely husbandman and a plain-meaning fellow, in which manner of men the high princes greatly delight them. To this man's house the King oft resorted from hunting, and with great pleasure he would eat radish roots with him. Within a while after, when Louis was restored home and had the governance of France in his hand, this husbandman was counselled by his wife to take a goodly sort of radish roots and to go and give them to the King and put him in mind of the good cheer that he had made him at his house. Conon, unwilling so to do, answered, "What, foolish woman. Trowest[6] thou the great princes remember such small pleasures?" But for all that she would not rest till Conon chose out a great sight of the fairest roots and took his journey toward the court. But as he went by the way, he ate up all the radish-roots save one of the greatest.

Conon peaked[7] into the court and stood where the King should pass by. By and by, the King knew him and called him to him. Conon stepped to the King and presented his root with a glad cheer. And the King took it more gladly and bad one that stood nearest to him to lay it up among those jewels that he most loved, and then commanded Conon to dine with him. When dinner was done, he thanked Conon, and when the King saw that he would depart home, he commanded to give him a thousand crowns of gold for his radish root.

When this was known in the King's house, one of the court gave the King a proper minion[8] horse. The King, perceiving that he did it because of the liberality showed unto Conon, with very glad cheer he took the gift and counseled with his lords how and with what gift he might recompense the horse that was so goodly and fair. This meanwhile,[9] the pickthank[10] had a marvellous great hope and thought in his mind thus: "If he so well recompensed the radish root that was given of a rustical[11] man, how much more largely will he recompense such an horse that is given of me that am of the court?" When every man had said his mind, as though the King had counselled about a great weighty matter, and that they had long fed the pickthank with vain hope, at last the King said, "I remember now what we shall give him." And so he called one of his lords and bad him in his ear go fetch that that he found in his chamber (and told him the place where) featly[12] folded up in silk.

Anon, he came and brought the radish root and even as it was folded up, the King with his own hand gave it to the courtier, saying, "We suppose your horse is well recompensed with this jewel, for it hath cost us a thousand crowns." The courtier went his way never[13] so glad, and when he had unfolded it, he found none other treasure but the radish root almost withered.

Of Another Pickthank and the Same King

Upon a time, a servant of the forenamed King, seeing a louse creep upon the King's robe, kneeled down and put up his hand as though he would do somewhat, and as the King bowed himself a little, the man took the louse and conveyed her away

---

1 cuckold a man whose wife is unfaithful.
2 Some editions have "arse" instead of "tail."
3 husbandman farmer.
4 What at the.
5 Bourgoyne Burgundy, a region in central France.
6 Trowest believe.
7 peaked slunk, stole, or crept into.
8 minion dainty, elegant.
9 This meanwhile during this time.
10 pickthank one who curries favour with another; a flatterer.
11 rustical country.
12 featly elegantly.
13 never ever.

privily. The King asked him what it was; he was ashamed to show. So much the King instanted[1] him that at last he confessed it was a louse. "Oh" (quoth the King), "it is good luck, for this declares me to be a man, for that kind of vermin principally grieves mankind, specially in youth." And so the King commanded to give him fifty crowns for his labour.

Not long after, another, seeing that the King gave so good a reward for so small a pleasure, came and kneeled down and put up his hand and made as though he took and conveyed somewhat privily away. And when the King constrained him to tell what it was, with much dissembling shamefastness,[2] he said it was a flea. The King, perceiving his dissimulation, said to him, "What, wouldst thou make me a dog?" And so, for his fifty crowns that he prowled for, the King commanded to give him fifty stripes.[3]

Whereby ye may note that there is great difference between one that doth a thing of good will and mind, and him that doth a thing by craft and dissimulation, which thing this noble and most prudent Prince well understood. And one ought to be well ware[4] how he has to do with high princes and their business. And if Ecclesiastes forbid that one shall mind none ill to a king,[5] how should any dare speak or do ill?

Of the Uplandish[6] Man that Saw the King

An uplandish man, nourished in the woods, came on a time to the city when all the streets were full of people and the common voice among them was, "The King cometh!" This rural man, moved with novelty of that voice, had great desire to see what that multitude hoved[7] to behold. Suddenly the King, with many nobles and 'states[8] before him, came riding royally. Then the people all about steadfastly beheld the King and cried aloud, "God save the King! God save the King!"

This villein[9] hearing them cry so said, "Oh, where is the King? Where is the King?"

Then one, showing him the King said, "Yonder is he that rides upon the goodly white horse."

"Is that the King?" quoth the villein. "What, thou mocks me, I ween,"[10] quoth he. "Methink that is a man in a painted garment."

By this tale ye may perceive (as Lycurgus proved by experience)[11] that nourishing, good bringing up and exercise be more apt to lead folk to humanity and the doing of honest things than nature herself. They for the most part are noble, free and virtuous which in their youth have been well brought up and virtuously endoctrined. And the book saith, "My son, receive doctrine from thy youth up; so shalt thou find wisdom."

—1567

from Merry Tales Newly Imprinted and Made by Master Skelton, Poet Laureate

How the Vintner's Wife Put Water into Skelton's Wine

Skelton did love well a cup of good wine. And on a day, he did make merry in a tavern in London. And the morrow after, he sent to the same place again for a quart of the same wine he drunk of before, the which was clean changed and brewed again.

Skelton, perceiving this, went to the tavern and did sit down in a chair and did sigh very sore and made great lamentation. The wife of the house,

---

1 instanted urged.

2 shamefastness modesty, bashfulness.

3 stripes lashes with the whip.

4 ware cautious.

5 if Ecclesiastes … ill to a king Ecclesiastes 10:20; mind none ill to think no ill of.

6 uplandish rustic, uncultivated, boorish.

7 hoved heaved, swelled.

8 'states people of high estate or rank.

9 villein peasant.

10 ween think.

11 as Lycurgus proved by experience Lycurgus ruled Sparta (c. 800 BCE); this reference may be to Lycurgus's emphasis on the education and training of the people.

perceiving this, said to Master Skelton, "How is it with you, Master Skelton?"

He answered and said, "I did never so evil." And then he did reach another great sigh, saying, "I am afraid that I shall never be saved nor come to Heaven."

"Why," said the wife, "should you despair so much in God's mercy?"

"Nay," said he, "it is past all remedy."

Then said the wife, "I do pray you break your mind unto me."

"Oh," said Skelton, "I would gladly show you the cause of my dolour[1] if that I wist[2] that you would keep my counsel."

"Sir," said she, "I have been made of counsel of greater matters than you can show me."

"Nay, nay," said Skelton. "My matter passes all other matters, for I think I shall sink to Hell for my great offences. For I sent this day to you for wine to say mass withal, and we have a strong law that every priest is bound to put into his chalice, when he does sing or say mass, some wine and water, the which does signify the water and blood that did run out of Christ's side when Longeous the blind knight[3] did thrust a spear to Christ's heart. And this day I did put no water into my wine when that I did put wine into my chalice."

Then said the vintner's wife, "Be merry, Master Skelton, and keep my counsel, for by my faith, I did put into the vessel of wine that I did send you of today ten gallons of water. And therefore take no thought, Master Skelton, for I warrant you."

Then said Skelton, "Dame, I do beshrew[4] thee for thy labour, for I thought so much before."

For through such uses and brewing of wine may men be deceived and be hurt by drinking of such evil wine. For all wines must be strong and fair and well coloured. It must have a redolent savour. It must be cold and sprinkling in the piece or in the glass.

Thus endeth the merry tales of Master Skelton, very pleasant for the recreation of the mind.

—1567

from The Mirror of Mirth[5]

To the Courteous and Gentle Readers

It was the custom of a certain philosopher (right gentle and courteous readers) when he perceived the people to wax weary by his long and tedious orations, and to drop out of doors ere he had done, to take his harp in hand, which he so finely fingered that the sweet and pleasant sound thereof procured the people to come running in faster than before they went forth, whose dulled spirits being revived with that pleasant melody and their minds, before cloyed with over-many circumstances of gravity, being by this means marvellously delighted, did the better and with greater ease continue the time of his conclusion: whose excellent policy in this point has attained so great commendation that it is set forth for an example to all posterities. If then you find yourselves overladen, either by the means of worldly cares or with the intolerable burden of over-great studies (if the deeds of this philosopher were to be followed), I would wish you no greater or better pleasure than he showed to his people: considering that mirth and melody cuts off care, unburdens the mind of sorrow, heals the grieved heart, and fills both soul and body with inestimable comfort. And therefore many mighty and excellent princes, whose heads are troubled with divers and sundry enormities, do for this cause entertain and accept of such persons whose pleasant nature and disposition may move them to delight. Since, then, moderate pleasure is not only convenient but also profitable and necessary for us, I have presumed here upon your courtesy for the recreation of your minds to send unto your sight this simple and [1] dolour suffering.

[2] wist knew.

[3] Longeous the blind knight Longinus is the name traditionally given to the Roman knight who thrust his spear into Christ's side (John 19:34). In some legends, his blindness is cured by the water and blood.

[4] beshrew curse.

[5] The early edition had no paragraphing.

rude work, the grace and beauty whereof, being stripped from his country guise, and now newly wrapped in this strange attire,[1] is not only blemished by means of the translator's unskillfulness, but, as it were, spoiled both of favour and fashion. Yet if it please you to pardon his imperfection and to accept his good will, he shall not only be encouraged to mend his amiss,[2] but also hereafter present you with such as may better countervail[3] your courtesy and save his own credit. Thus, loath to be over-tedious in so mean a matter, I commend you to the protection of the celestial powers, and this to your friendly consideration.

Yours in all humility, T.D.

Of the Three Sisters Newly Married that Did Each of Them Make a Good Answer to Their Husbands the First Night of Their Wedding

In the country of Anjou[4] there was in times past a gentleman that was rich and of a good stock,[5] but he was somewhat subject to his pleasure. This gentleman had three daughters that were fair and well nurtured, and of such age and years that the youngest might well enough resist the violence of a man. It happened so, that they were without a mother, and because their father was yet of lusty years, he used still his old customs, which were to keep a good house and to entertain and receive merry and pleasant company, where the order was to play, to dance, to revel, and to make good cheer. And for that he was negligent and not careful in the ordering of his house and overseeing of his household, his daughters had opportunity, leisure, and liberty enough to talk and laugh with young gentlemen, whose talk, I warrant you, was not how to make cheap corn,[6] neither concerning the government of the public wealth, as the sequel shows. Also their father on his part played the lover as well as others, which made the young gentlewomen the more bolder to love and to be beloved—for as the old cocks crow, the young ones learn. And they, having gentle hearts, knowing that they were gentlewomen of a good house, thought it a thing very ungrateful and full of reproach to be beloved and not to love again. These reasons therefore considered—being all three of them prayed, entertained, loved, and followed every day and hour—at length they suffered themselves to be taken and snared in love, taking such compassion on their paramours[7] that they spared not to pleasure them in whatsoever they did demand. At which play and sport they sped so well that the marks and signs began to appear. For the eldest daughter (being somewhat more forward than the rest) was greatly abashed because there was no way to keep it secret. For in a house where the mother is missing, there is small regard of the daughter's doings: or at the least, if there happen a mischance, they know ways and remedies to prevent it. But the maiden knowing no way to hide this from her father, determined to make him privy to her secret practices, which, when he understood, he was at the first very sorry and greatly displeased, but he despaired not, for that he was of that stamp of men that take not things to the heart. And to say the truth, what need a man torment and vex himself for a thing when it is done; it is but rather to make it worse.

Well, he sent his daughter into the country, three or four miles off, to an aunt that she had under colour of sickness, because that by the counsel of the physicians, the change of the air was very good for her, tarrying there until she was delivered with child. But as it is commonly seen, one misfortune falls upon another's neck, for as his eldest daughter had in a manner dispatched her business and emptied her belly, the second sister was also sped.[8] The father perceiving this said, "I see that my daughters would not that the

---

1 being stripped … strange attire i.e., being translated from the original French into English.

2 amiss error.

3 countervail equal.

4 Anjou region in northwest France.

5 stock descent, family.

6 corn more generally, "grain."

7 paramours lovers.

8 sped successful (i.e., pregnant).

world should be left desolate." And upon this event[1] (doubting belike[2] the worst), he came to his youngest daughter, who was not yet with child, but she had done her good will in the matter to her power. "Well, daughter," said he, "how dost thou? Hast not thou followed thy elder sisters' steps?" The young damsel began to change colour and to blush, which the father took for open confession. "Very well," said he, "God send us good luck and keep us from evil." Yet nevertheless he thought it high time to provide for his affairs, and therefore he determined to marry his three daughters. But here was the mischief: he knew not to whom. For to offer them to his neighbours it was in vain, because their doings in his house was known, or at the least suspected. On the other side, to marry them to those that had abused his daughters was a thing that could not well be done, for it may be that each of them had more than one.[3] And if peradventure there was but one man that had done the deed, ye know few men will put their trust in one that will so willingly lay her legs open before she knows who shall be her husband. And for these considerations, the father thought it more expedient and necessary to seek his sons-in-law further from home. And as those men which of nature are pleasant and merry and love to frequent company are happy and fortunate in their doings, even so this gentleman failed not of his purpose to find out that which he sought for, which was in the country of Brittaine,[4] where he was well known, as well for the name of his house as for the lands and goods he had in that country, not far from the town of Nantes,[5] by means whereof he had good occasion to make his journey thither. To conclude, when he was in the said country, as well by friends that he made as through himself, he preferred the marriage of his three daughters, to which the Brittains gave some ear,[6] so that there was choice enough.

But amongst all the rest there was one gentleman of Brittaine who was rich and of a good stock, the which had three sons of good years and well made like men, good dancers, clean legged, well footed, and excellent at all games, whose like was not to be had in all the whole country, whereof this gentleman was very glad. And because the prolonging of the time was not best, he concluded the match with the father of these young men, that his three sons should marry his three daughters, and that one bridal should serve for all: that is, they should all three be married on one day. And to bring this to pass, the three brethren prepared themselves with all speed to depart into Anjou with the gentleman father of the three daughters. Now you must note that although they were Brittains, there was not one of the three but knew fashions, for they had played youthful pranks with the Brittainish maids, which are of a good inclination that way, as the talk goes. But to our matter.

When they were come to the gentleman's house, they beheld the countenances of the three gentlewomen, every one his, and found them all fresh, fair, and pleasant, and also wise and well spoken. Well, the marriage was concluded and all things prepared. But the night before the wedding should be, the father called his three daughters aside into a chamber and said unto them these words: "Ye know what fault you have all three committed and what pain you have put me unto. If I had been of the nature of these rigorous, cruel and hard-hearted fathers, I had cast you off, and you should never have enjoyed any of my goods. But for my part, you see, I had rather redress things that are amiss than to put you to shame and myself in perpetual trouble through your follies. I have here brought for each of you a husband. Therefore prepare yourselves to make much of them and cherish them, and pluck up good hearts; you shall have no harm. If they happen to perceive or spy

---

1 event incident.

2 doubting belike fearing in all likelihood.

3 that each … than one that each daughter had had sex with more than one man.

4 Brittaine the duchy of Brittany or Bretagne in western France.

5 Nantes on the Loire in western France.

6 gave some ear listened to him.

anything by any of you, to your own peril be it. Nevertheless, you have as yet done them no offence. And therefore henceforth take heed to yourselves and govern yourselves so that there may be found no fault in your doings. And I promise you for my part that I will both forget and forgive all faults past. And besides all this, I assure you, she that can give unto her husband the best answer to please him the first night, being in bed together, should have for her part two hundred crowns more than the others. Now, therefore, go your ways and remember my words." After these wholesome admonitions he went to bed and his daughters also, being nothing oblivious in this matter.

The bridal day was the next morrow. They went to the church and were married early in the morning. There was great cheer, with dancing and leaping about the house, which being past, the beds were made wherein the brides were bravely[1] laid, unto whom their husbands shortly after came. What time,[2] the eldest, sporting with his new bedfellow and feeling her belly very lank,[3] merely put forth these speeches: "I doubt,[4] my beloved, the birds be fled and gone." Unto whom she presently replied, "Keep you then the nest."

The second sister's husband handling her, feeling her belly hard and round, began thus: "How now, wife. The barn is already full." "Beat then at the gate," quoth she.

The third sister's husband, in sporting himself in the like sort and finding his wife skillful in the game, presently spoke in this manner: "I perceive the way was beaten before." The damsel answered, "You may the better find the path."

The night being past and the day come, they came all three before their father and declared unto him what had chanced, and what was their answers. Now would I know to which of the three he ought to give the two hundred crowns. If therefore your skill be so good, declare the truth of this difficult matter.

[1] bravely finely dressed, splendidly.

[2] What time at which time.

[3] lank loose.

[4] doubt fear.

Of a Certain Student in the Law and of the 'Pothecary that Taught Him Physic[5]

There was upon a time a certain scholar that had dwelled at Toulouse[6] a certain time, passing by a little town not far from Cahors in Quercy named Saint Antony's,[7] therefore to practise his texts of law, not that he had greatly therein profited, for he had most studied humane letters,[8] wherein he had very good knowledge. But he thought, seeing he began to profess the law, not to stray or wander from the same until he could answer therein as well as another.

So soon as he was come to Saint Antony's (as in such little towns a man is quickly spied and marked), there came a 'pothecary to be acquainted with him, saying, "Sir, you are welcome to the town," and so began to fall in talk with him, who amongst other talk spoke certain words as touching physic. When the 'pothecary had heard him speak, he said unto him, "Sir, so far as I can perceive, you are a physician."

"No, that I am not," said he. "But I have read somewhat of physic."

"I know well enough, sir, that you will not declare what you are, because you mean not to tarry long in this town. But truly, sir, if you would, you should not find it least for your profit. We have at this present never a physician in these quarters. He that we had is lately dead, and died worth three or four thousand pound. If that you will remain and dwell here (for here is good being),[9] I will lodge you in my house and so you and I shall live well when ye are once known. Sir, (said the 'pothecary) I pray you take the pains to come and dine with me." The scholar, understanding the 'pothecary's words, that was no fool, for he had traveled into many places to see and [5] 'Pothecary apothecary, one who prepares and sells drugs; pharmacist; physic medicine.

[6] Toulouse in southern France.

[7] Cahors in Quercy named Saint Antony's Cahors is the capital of Quercy, near Toulouse.

[8] humane letters branches of study such as the ancient classics, rhetoric, poetry.

[9] good being a good life, a good income.

know fashions, was content to go with him to dinner and thought this to himself: "I will try the chance, and if this man will do as he says, I shall make good shift,[1] for this is a rude country and there is not one body that knows me. And therefore we will see what will come to pass." The 'pothecary brought him to his house to dinner. After dinner, having always this talk in their mouths, they agreed together to be cousins. And for to make our tale short, the 'pothecary made the scholar believe that he was a physician.

And then the scholar said unto him, "First of all, you shall understand that I never had great practice in our art as you do think. But my mind was to have gone to Paris, to have studied another year and then to have fallen to the practice at the town from whence I came. But seeing I have found you, and that I know you are a man that can show me pleasure, and I in like manner unto you, let us look about to do our business, for I am content at your request to tarry."

"Sir," said the 'pothecary, "take no care. I will teach you all the practice of physic in less than fifteen days. I have of a long time used[2] the company of physicians, both in France and in other places. I know their fashions and their receipts[3] all by heart. Moreover, in this country ye need but set a good countenance on it and go by guess and you shall be counted the best physician in all the world."

And then the 'pothecary began to teach him how he should write an ounce, half ounce, a quarter of an ounce, a dram, a handfull, a quantity. And another day he taught him the names of drugs that were most common, and to mix, to strain, to 'still,[4] to make compounds and simples[5] and such like things. This continued ten or twelve days, during the which time he kept his chamber, causing the 'pothecary to say that he was not well. The which 'pothecary blazed[6] abroad that this physician was the best learned man that ever came to that town, whereof they of the town were very glad and began to entertain him and to make much of him so soon as he came abroad, they striving who should make him the best cheer. And you would have said that already they longed to be sick to try this new physician and to set him a-work to the end he might have a better will and desire to tarry there. But M.[7] Doctor made himself to be sought for and entered not haunting[8] the company of many folks, but kept a great countenance and set a good face on the matter, and above other things he did not depart from the 'pothecary that had taught him his cunning.[9] In short time, there came urines to him from all parts. Now, in those places, they must judge by the urines whether the patient be a man or a woman, and in what part their pain and sickness lay, and of what age they were, but this physician could do more than that, for he could tell them who was their father and mother and whether they were married or no, and how many children they had. To conclude, he could tell all even from the old to the new, and all by the help of his M. the 'pothecary. For when he saw anybody [bring] a water,[10] the 'pothecary would question with them whilst the physician was above and would ask them from end to end all these former things. And then he caused them stay until he was gone up and declared to M. Doctor all that he had learned of them that brought the urines. The physician, taking[11] their waters, would hold them up and look on them, putting his hand between the urinal and the light, and would shake it and turn it with all the gestures in such cases required. Then he would say, "It is a woman's water." "Yea, truly, sir, it is so." "She had a great pain in her left side under the breast," or "Pain in the head" (as the 'pothecary

[1] shift manner of livelihood (often associated with subterfuge).
[2] used kept.
[3] receipts prescriptions, formulas.
[4] to 'still to distill.
[5] compounds and simples medical preparations: compounds have two or more ingredients, simples only one.
[6] blazed proclaimed.
[7] M. monsieur.
[8] entered not haunting did not begin keeping.
[9] cunning knowledge, here with a sense of craftiness.
[10] a water urine sample.
[11] taking taking account of.

had given him instructions). "It is not three months since she was delivered of a daughter." The bringer of this urine did begin greatly to marvel at his great knowledge and would go away and declare unto everybody what the physician had said. So that from mouth to mouth the report went that there to the town was come such an odd fellow that there was not his like to be found. And if by fortune his 'pothecary was not by or at hand, then would he draw the worm out of their nose[1] himself, in saying, "Very sick." To which the bringer of the urine would say "he" or "she," by the means whereof he would say after a little pausing, "Is not this a man's water?" "Yea, truly, sir, it is a man's water," would the bringer say. "I spied that," by-and-by would the physician say, but when he came to minister and give physic unto anyone, then would he have always his 'pothecary, who spoke one unto another physic Latin, which was in those days fine stuff. And under this Latin the 'pothecary would name him the whole receipt, making a show as though they spoke of other things. In the which, I leave you to consider whether it were not a good sight to see a physician write under a 'pothecary.

In effect, whether it was because of the good opinion the people had on[2] him or by any other chance, those that were sick felt themselves well by his ordinances and appointments, they thought not themselves well that came not to this physician, and they were persuaded that it was good being sick whilst he was there; for they thought if he went once his way, they should never recover again the like, and happy was he that could present him with the greatest gifts. So that in six or seven months, he had gotten a good store of crowns, and also his 'pothecary, by means one of another,[3] and therefore he prepared himself to depart from Saint Antony's, saying that he had received letters from his country by the which he heard news that he must needs depart for a time, but he would not fail to return again shortly.

It was to Paris that he came, where afterwards he fell to study physic. And it may be afterward, for all his further knowledge, he was not so good a physician as when he was 'prentice: I mean his doings came not so prosperously to pass, and many times fortune helps more those that are ignorant than those that have knowledge and skill. For a man of knowledge uses too much discretion in his doings; he thinks of the circumstance and has a fear and a doubt, which gives unto men a mistrust in themselves that does discourage them to deal in many things. And as it is commonly said, better it is to fall into the hands of a lucky physician than to him that is learned and has good skill.

The physician of Italy knew this well enough who, when he had nothing to do, did write two or three hundred kinds of receipts for divers sicknesses and diseases, of the which he took a great number and put them in the pocket of his coat or into his bosom, so that when anybody came unto him with urines he drew out one of the receipts by chance (as the lots are drawn at the lottery) and gave it to the bringer of the urine, saying unto him or her, "Dio te la daga buona,"[4] and if it sped well so it was, and if it sped ill—"Suo damno."[5] For thus goes the world.

—1583

[1] draw the worm out of their nose i.e., draw the information out of them.

[2] on of.

[3] by means one of another by each other's means.

[4] Dio te la daga buona "Let's hope for the best."

[5] Suo damno "damno" is a typo, but contains the understanding of "you're damned"; Suo danno means "that's the damage."

James VI, king of Scotland
1566-1625

James was the only child of Mary Stuart, queen of Scots and Henry Stuart, Lord Darnley. He succeeded as king of Scotland in 1567 following the forced abdication of Mary. Scotland was ruled by regents until James came of age, and one of his first statements of power was the publication of a collection of poetry, The Essays of a Prentice in the Divine Art of Poesy, in 1584. This collection marked the beginning of a new Court poetry in Scotland, and contained a treatise on Scottish poetry. The King was not simply a patron, but wished to represent himself as a poet, and published a further collection in 1591, His Majesty's Poetical Exercises at Vacant Hours. A third collection was prepared for publication, but was not printed during James's lifetime. The connection of poetry to political power was very much part of the King's Scottish rule. James also wrote two political treatises on kingcraft, selections from which are presented here; for his treatise Daemonology, see above, pp. 579-83. When James succeeded to the English throne after the death of Elizabeth I in 1603, he was joyously welcomed by many hopeful English poets. Ben Jonson hailed him with "How, best of kings, dost thou a sceptre bear! / How, best of poets, dost thou laurel wear!" James seldom wrote poetry during his English reign, but remained involved with the arts, and became the patron of Shakespeare's theatre company, the King's Men.

EDITIONS: "Sonnet 4," "Sonnet Deciphering the Perfect Poet," and "A Short Treatise, Containing Some Rules and Cautels to be Observed and Eschewed in Scottish Poetry" in The essayes of a prentise, in the divine art of poesie. Edinburgh: Printed By Thomas Vautroullier, 1584. STC 14373; The true lawe of free monarchies: or The reciprock and mutuall dutie betwixt a free king and his naturall subjectes. Edinburgh: Printed by Robert Waldegrave, printer to the King's Majesty, 1598. STC 14409; Basilikon Doron, Devided into three bookes. Edinburgh: Printed by Robert Waldegrave, printer to the King's Majesty, 1599. STC 14348; Basilikon doron. Or His Majesties instructions to his dearest sonne, Henry the prince. London: Imprinted by Felix Kingston, for John Norton, 1603. STC 14350 (see also STC 14354).

To the Queen[1]

As on the wings of your enchanting fame,
I was transported over the stormy seas,
Who could not quench that restless burning flame,
Which only you by sympathy did mease,[2]
So can I troubled be with no disease,
But you my only medicinar[3] remains,
And easily, whenever that you please,
May salve my sores and mitigate my pains.
Your smiling is an antidote agains[4]
The melancholy that oppresseth me,
And when a raging wrath into me reigns,[5]
Your loving looks may make me calm to be.
How oft you see me have an heavy heart,
Remember then, sweet doctor, on your art.

—composed, c. 1589

[1] from the unpublished collection (British Library Add. MS. 24195). This poem was composed shortly after James met Anne of Denmark, in 1589. James travelled to Norway (alluded to in the second line) to collect his bride after the fleet conveying her to Scotland was scattered by a storm.

[2] mease appease, quench.

[3] medicinar doctor.

[4] agains against.

[5] reigns flourishes, predominates.

from The Essays of a Prentice

Sonnet 4[1]

And grant I may so vively[2] put in verse
The summer, when I like thereof to treat,[3]
As when in writ I do thereof rehearse,
Let readers think they feel the burning heat,
And graithly see the earth, for lack of weit,[4]
With withering drouth and sun so gaigged[5] all,
As for the grass on field, the dust in streit[6]
Doth rise and flee aloft, long or[7] it fall.
Yea, let them think they hear the song and call
Which Flora's winged musicians[8] make to sound,
And that to taste and smell, believe they shall
Delicious fruits, which in that time abound.
And shortly all their senses so bereaved,
As eyes and ears and all may be deceived.

Sonnet Deciphering the Perfect Poet[9]

A ripe engine,[10] a quick and wakened wit,
With sommair reasons, suddenly applyit;[11]
For every purpose using reasons fit,
With skillfulness, where learning may be spyit;
With pithy words, for to express you by it
His full intention in his proper leed,[12]
The purity whereof, well has he tryit;
With memory to keep what he does read,
With skillfulness and figures,[13] which proceed
From rhetoric; with everlasting fame;
With others woundring,[14] pressing with all speed
For to attain to merit such a name.
All this into the perfect poet be.
God grant I may obtain the laurel tree.[15]

A Short Treatise, Containing Some Rules and Cautels to Be Observed and Eschewed in Scottish Poetry[16]

CHAPTER VII

But since invention is one of the chief virtues in a poet, it is best that you invent your own subject yourself, and not to compose of sene[17] subjects. Especially translating anything out of other languages, which doing, you not only assay[18] not your own engine of invention, but by the same means you are bound as to a stake to follow that book's phrases which you translate.

You must also beware of writing anything of matters of common weal,[19] or other such grave sene subjects (except metaphorically, of manifest truth openly known, yet notwithstanding using it very seldom) because not only you assay not your own invention, as I spoke before, but likewise they

---

[1] This is the fourth of twelve sonnets which introduce James's first collection of poetry, The Essays of a Prentice. These sonnets are dedicated to the gods and reveal James's belief in the power of language to capture meaning and to shape his readers' vision through their senses.

[2] vively lively, vividly.

[3] treat discuss or handle.

[4] graithly really, carefully; weit wet.

[5] drouth drought; gaigged cracked, chapped.

[6] streit narrow. This might refer to the fields or the "streets."

[7] or before.

[8] Flora's winged musicians Flora is the goddess of flowers; her winged musicians are birds.

[9] from The Essays of a Prentice. The Scottish spellings have been anglicized.

[10] engine native or natural talent.

[11] sommair predominately a legal term meaning "summary," but in these two lines, James appears to be using the adjective to indicate that the words leap to the poet's mind, inspired by his previous study and preparation; applyit applied. This sonnet has interlocking rhyme between the quatrains, which demands keeping the old "it" endings rather than modernized "ed" endings.

[12] leed speech of a person or class of persons; manner of speaking.

[13] figures figures of speech; forms of expression adopted to give beauty, variety, and force to a composition.

[14] woundring wondering (with others wondering at you) or winding (winding or combining with other concerns).

[15] laurel tree The foliage of the laurel tree was a symbol of distinction in poetry (e.g., the poet "laureate").

[16] from The Essays of a Prentice. This is perhaps the only treatise ever written on Scottish poetry, and explains what James believed Court poetry should be. Chapter VII is interesting not only for its comments on invention—or the imagination—but for its warnings against writing about political matters; cautels stratagems. The Scottish spellings have been anglicized.

[17] sene obvious, easily seen.

[18] assay test.

[19] matters of common weal matters of [the] commonwealth, or matters pertaining to the public interest, be they political or religious.

are too grave matters for a poet to mell[1] in. But because you cannot have the invention except it comes of nature, I remit it thereunto as the chief cause not only of invention, but also of all the other parts of poesy. For art is only but an help and a remembrance to nature. [...]

—1584

from The True Law of Free Monarchies: or the Reciprocal and Mutual Duty betwixt a Free King and His Natural Subjects

An Advertisement to the Reader

Accept, I pray you (my dear countrymen), as thankfully this pamphlet that I offer unto you, as lovingly it is written for your weal.[2] I would be loath both to be factious and feckless,[3] and therefore, if it be not sententious,[4] at least it is short. It may be you miss many things that you look for in it, but for excuse thereof, consider rightly that I only lay down herein the true grounds to teach you the right way, without wasting time upon refuting the adversaries. And yet I trust, if you will take narrow tent,[5] you shall find most of their great guns paid home again,[6] either with contrary conclusions or tacit objections, suppose in a dairned[7] form and indirectly. For my intention is to instruct and not irritate, if I may eschew[8] it. The profit I would wish you to make of it is as well so to frame all your actions according to these grounds as may confirm you in the course of honest and obedient subjects to your king in all times coming, as also, when you shall fall in purpose with any that shall praise or excuse the by-past rebellions that broke forth, either in this country or in any other, you shall herewith be armed against their siren songs,[9] laying their particular examples to the square of these grounds.[10] Whereby you shall soundly keep the course of righteous judgement, discerning wisely of every action only according to the quality thereof, and not according to your prejudged conceits of the committers. So shall ye, by reaping profit to yourselves, turn my pain into pleasure. But lest the whole pamphlet run out at the gaping mouth of this preface, if it were any more enlarged, I end with committing you to God, and me to your charitable censures.

The True Law of Free Monarchies

[...] there is not a thing so necessary to be known by the people of any land, next the knowledge of their God, as the right knowledge of their allegiance according to the form of government established among them, especially in a monarchy (which form of government, as resembling the Divinity, approacheth nearest to perfection, as all the learned and wise men from the beginning have agreed upon, unity being the perfection of all things). [...]

Kings are called gods by the prophetical King David[11] because they sit upon God's throne in the earth, and have the count of their administration to give unto him. [...] And therefore in the coronation of our own kings, as well as of every Christian monarch, they give their oath: first to maintain the religion presently professed within their country, according to their laws whereby it is established, and to punish all those that should press to alter or disturb the profession thereof; and next to maintain all the lowable[12] and good laws made by their predecessors, to see them put

---

1 mell interfere, meddle.

2 weal welfare, prosperity.

3 factious seditious; feckless ineffective, weak.

4 sententious full of meaning or wisdom.

5 take narrow tent pay close attention.

6 great guns paid home again i.e., their attacks answered.

7 dairned derned: secret or reserved.

8 eschew avoid.

9 siren songs In classical mythology, a siren was one of several fabulous monsters who were supposed to lure sailors to destruction by their enchanted singing. These monsters are often confused with mermaids.

10 laying ... grounds judging their examples by these standards; a "square" is a carpenter's tool used for measuring right angles.

11 King David the king of Israel and reputed author of the Psalms.

12 lowable permissible, desirable.

in execution, and the breakers and violators thereof to be punished according to the tenor of the same; and lastly, to maintain the whole country and every state therein in all their ancient privileges and liberties, as well against all foreign enemies as among themselves; and shortly, to procure the weal and flourishing of his people, not only in maintaining and putting to execution the old lowable laws of the country, and by establishing of new (as necessity and evil manners will require), but by all other means possible to foresee and prevent all dangers that are likely to fall upon them, and to maintain concord, wealth, and civility among them as a loving father and careful watchman, caring for them more than for himself, knowing himself to be ordained for them, and they not for him, and therefore countable[1] to that great God who placed him as his lieutenant over them upon the peril of his soul to procure the weal of both souls and bodies, as far as in him lieth, of all them that are committed to his charge. And this oath in the coronation is the clearest civil and fundamental law whereby the king's office is properly defined. [...]

Shortly then, to take up in two or three sentences grounded upon all these arguments out of the law of God, the duty and allegiance of the people to their lawful king: their obedience, I say, ought to be to him as to God's lieutenant in earth, obeying his commands in all things, except directly against God, as the commands of God's minister, acknowledging him as a judge set by God over them, having power to judge them, but to be judged only by God, whom to only he must give count of his judgement, fearing him as their judge, loving him as their father, praying for him as their protector, for his continuance if he be good, for his amendment if he be wicked, following and obeying his lawful commands, eschewing and flying his fury in his unlawful without resistance, but by sobs and tears to God. [...]

The king towards his people is rightly compared to a father of children and to a head of a body composed of diverse members. For as fathers the good princes and magistrates of the people of God acknowledged themselves to their subjects. And for all other well-ruled commonwealths, the style of pater patriae[2] was ever, and is commonly, used to kings. And the proper office of a king towards his subjects agrees very well with the office of the head towards the body and all members thereof, for from the head, being the seat of judgement, proceedeth the care and foresight of guiding, and preventing all evil that may come to the body or any part thereof. The head cares for the body; so does the king for his people. As the discourse and direction flow from the head, and the execution according thereunto belongs to the rest of the members, every one according to their office, so it is betwixt a wise prince and his people. As the judgement coming from the head may not only employ the members, every one in their own office, as long as they are able for it, but likewise, in case any of them be affected with any infirmity, must care and provide for their remedy, in case it be curable, and if otherwise, gar cut them off[3] for fear of infecting of the rest: even so is it betwixt the prince and his people.

[...]

And for the similitude of the head and the body, it may very well fall out that the head will be forced to gar cut off some rotten member [...] to keep the rest of the body in integrity, but what state the body can be in if the head, for any infirmity that can fall to it, be cut off, I leave it to the readers' judgement.

—1598

[1] countable accountable, answerable.

[2] pater patriae Latin, "father of the fatherland."

[3] gar cut them off must cause them to be cut off.

from Basilikon Doron, or His Majesty's Instructions to His Dearest Son, Henry the Prince[1]

God gives not kings the style of gods in vain,
For on His throne His sceptre do they sway,
And as their subjects ought them to obey,
So kings should fear and serve their God again.
If then ye would enjoy a happy reign,
Observe the statutes of your heavenly King,
And from His law, make all your laws to spring.
Since His lieutenant here ye should remain,
Reward the just, be steadfast, true, and plain,
Repress the proud, maintaining aye[2] the right,
Walk always so, as ever in His sight,
Who guards the godly, plaguing the profane:
And so ye shall in princely virtues shine,
Resembling right your mighty King divine.

To the Reader[3]

Charitable reader, it is one of the golden sentences which Christ our Saviour uttered to his apostles, that there is nothing so covered that shall not be revealed, neither so hid that shall not be known; and whatsoever they have spoken in darkness, should be heard in the light, and that which they had spoken in the ear in secret place, should be publicly preached on the tops of the houses.[4] And since he hath said it, most true must it be, since the author thereof is the fountain and very being of truth, which should move all godly and honest men to be very wary in all their secretest actions and whatsoever middesses[5] they use for attaining to their most wished ends; lest otherwise how avowable[6] soever the mark be whereat they aim, the middesses being discovered to be shameful whereby they climb, it may turn to the disgrace both of the good work itself and of the author thereof, since the deepest of our secrets cannot be hid from that all-seeing eye and penetrant[7] light, piercing through the bowels of very darkness itself.

But as this is generally true in the actions of all men, so is it more specially true in the affairs of kings. For kings, being public persons by reason of their office and authority, are, as it were, set (as it was said of old) upon a public stage in the sight of all the people, where all the beholders' eyes are attentively bent to look and pry in the least circumstance of their secretest drifts,[8] which should make kings the more careful not to harbour the secretest thought in their mind, but such as in the[ir] own time they shall not be ashamed openly to avouch, assuring themselves that time, the mother of verity, will in the due season bring her own daughter to perfection.

Of a King's Christian Duty towards God

[...] first of all things, learn to know and love that God, whom-to you[9] have a double obligation: first, for that he made you a man; and next, for that he made you a little God to sit on his throne and rule over other men. Remember that as in dignity he hath erected you above others, so ought you in thankfulness towards him go as far beyond all others. A mote in another's eye is a beam into yours; a blemish in another, is a leprous bile into you; and a venial sin (as the papists[10] call it) in another is a great crime into you. Think not, therefore, that the highness of your dignity diminisheth your faults (much less giveth you a license to sin), but, by the contrary, your fault shall be aggravated

---

1 Basilikon Doron, or "The King's Gift," was written for James's first son Henry as a guide to kingcraft. Only seven copies were published in 1599, but in 1603 the text was republished for his English audience and became a best seller. Henry died at the age of 18 in 1612, leaving Charles in line for the throne.

2 aye ever, always.

3 The following sections are from the widely distributed 1603 edition.

4 Luke 12:2-3.

5 middesses "mids" (means).

6 avowable approved, sanctioned.

7 penetrant penetrating.

8 drifts purposes, meanings.

9 you Henry.

10 venial sin light as opposed to deadly or mortal sins; papists derogatory term for Roman Catholics.

according to the height of your dignity, any sin that you commit not being a single sin, procuring but the fall of one, but being an exemplar[1] sin, and therefore drawing with it the whole multitude to be guilty of the same. Remember then that this glistering[2] worldly glory of kings is given them by God to teach them to press so to glister and shine before their people in all works of sanctification and righteousness, that their persons as bright lamps of godliness and virtue may, going in and out before their people, give light to all their steps. Remember also that by the right knowledge and fear of God (which is the beginning of wisdom, as Solomon saith),[3] you shall know all the things necessary for the discharge of your duty, both as a Christian and as a king, seeing in him, as in a mirror, the course of all earthly things, whereof he is the spring and only mover.

Now, the only way to bring you to this knowledge is diligently to read his word and earnestly to pray for the right understanding thereof. [...] But above all, beware you wrest not the word to your own appetite, as over many do, making it like a bell to sound as you please to interpret, but by the contrary, frame all your affections to follow precisely the rule there set down. [...]

Of a King's Duty in His Office

[...] But it is not enough to a good king by the sceptre of good laws well executed to govern, and by force of arms to protect his people, if he join not therewith his virtuous life in his own person, and in the person of his Court and company, by good example alluring his subjects to the love of virtue and hatred of vice. And therefore (my son) since all people are naturally inclined to follow their prince's example [...] let it not be said that you command others to keep the contrary course to that which in your own person you practise, making so your words and deeds to fight together, but by the contrary, let your own life be a law-book and a mirror to your people, that therein they may read the practice of their own laws, and therein they may see, by your image, what life they should lead. [...]

Remember also that marriage is one of the greatest actions that a man does in all his time, especially in taking of his first wife, and if he marry first basely beneath his rank, he will ever be the less accounted of thereafter. And lastly, remember to choose your wife as I advised you to choose your servants: that she be of the whole and clean race, not subject to the hereditary sicknesses either of the soul or the body. For if a man will be careful to breed horses and dogs of good kinds, how much more careful should he be for the breed of his own loins? So shall you in your marriage have respect to your conscience, honour, and natural weal in your successors.

When you are married, keep inviolably your promise made to God in your marriage, which standeth all in doing of one thing and abstaining from another: to treat her in all things as your wife and the half of yourself, and to make your body (which then is no more yours, but properly hers) common with none other. I trust I need not to insist here to dissuade you from the filthy vice of adultery. Remember only what solemn promise you make to God at your marriage, and since it is only by the force of that promise that your children succeed to you, which otherwise they could not do, equity and reason would you should keep your part thereof. [...]

And for your behaviour to your wife, the Scripture can best give you counsel therein. Treat her as your own flesh, command her as her lord, cherish her as your helper, rule her as your pupil, and please her in all things reasonable, but teach her not to be curious in things that belong [to] her not. You are the head; she is your body. It is your office to command and hers to obey, but yet with such a sweet harmony as she should be as ready to obey as you to command, as willing to follow as you to go before, your love being wholly knit unto her and all her affections lovingly bent to follow your will. [...]

---

1 exemplar likely to become an example.

2 glistering sparkling, brilliant.

3 Proverbs 9:10.

Of a King's Behaviour in Indifferent[1] Things

It is a true old saying that a king is as one set on a stage,[2] whose smallest actions and gestures all the people gazingly do behold, and therefore, although a king be never so precise in the discharging of his office, the people, who seeth but the outward part, will ever judge of the substance by the circumstances; and according to the outward appearance, if his behaviour be light or dissolute, will conceive preoccupied conceits of the king's inward intention, which although with time (the trier of all truth) it will evanish[3] by the evidence of the contrary effects, yet interim patitur justus,[4] and prejudged conceits will in the meantime breed contempt, the mother of rebellion and disorder. And besides that, it is certain that all indifferent actions and behaviour of a man have certain holding and dependence either upon virtue or vice according as they are used or ruled, for there is not a middes[5] betwixt them, no more than betwixt their rewards: Heaven and Hell.

Be careful then, my son, so to frame all your indifferent actions and outward behaviour as they may serve for the furtherance and forth-setting of your inward virtuous disposition. [...]

[...] In your language be plain, honest, natural, comely,[6] clean, short, and sententious, eschewing both the extremities, as well in not using any rustical corrupt leed,[7] as book language and pen and ink-horn[8] terms, and least of all migniard[9] and effeminate terms. But let the greatest part of your eloquence consist in a natural, clear, and sensible form of the delivery of your mind, built ever upon certain and good grounds, tempering it with gravity, and quickness, or merriness according to the subject and occasion of the time, not taunting in theology, nor alleging and profaning the Scripture in drinking purposes,[10] as over many do.

Use also the like form in your gesture, neither looking sillily, like a stupid pedant, nor unsettledly, with an uncouth morgue,[11] like a new-come-over cavalier,[12] but let your behaviour be natural, grave, and according to the fashion of the country. Be not over-sparing in your courtesies, for that will be imputed to incivility and arrogance, nor yet over prodigal in jouking[13] or nodding at every step, for that form of being popular becometh better aspiring Absaloms[14] than lawful kings, framing ever your gesture according to your present actions: looking gravely and with a majesty when you sit in judgement or give audience to ambassadors, homely when you are in private with your own servants, merrily when you are at any pastime or merry discourse, and let your countenance smell of courage and magnanimity when you are at the wars. [...]

Now as to your writing, which is nothing else but a form of enregistrate[15] speech, use a plain, short, but stately style, both in your proclamations and missives, especially to foreign princes. And if your engine spur you to write any works either in verse or prose, I cannot but allow you to practise it, but take no longsome works in hand, for distracting you from your calling. [...]

If you would write worthily, choose subjects worthy of you that be not full of vanity, but of virtue, eschewing obscurity and delighting ever to be plain and sensible. And if you write in verse, remember that it is not the principal part of a poem to rhyme right and flow well with many

---

1 Indifferent non-essential, although James points out how important these matters can be; "indifferent" can also mean "different" or "various."

2 stage The 1599 version reads "scaffold."

3 evanish vanish or dissipate.

4 interim patitur justus Latin, "meanwhile the just man suffers."

5 middes middle.

6 comely pleasing.

7 leed speech of a person or class of persons; manner of speaking.

8 pen and ink-horn pedantic.

9 migniard dainty, mincing.

10 alleging quoting or diminishing; profaning the Scripture in drinking purposes profaning Scripture either by discussing it while being drunk, or citing it in drinking songs.

11 morgue haughty demeanour, pride.

12 new-come-over cavalier a newly arrived gentleman or courtier.

13 jouking cringing, fawning, bowing the head.

14 Absalom David's third son aspired to become king. See 2 Samuel 13-18.

15 enregistrate placed on permanent record.

pretty words, but the chief commendation of a poem is that when the verse shall be shaken sundry[1] in prose, it shall be found so rich in quick inventions and poetic flowers, and in fair and pertinent comparisons, as it shall retain the lustre of a poem, although in prose. And I would also advise you to write in your own language, for there is nothing left to be said in Greek and Latin already, and enough of poor scholars would match you in these languages, and besides that, it best becometh a king to purify and make famous his own tongue, wherein he may go before all his subjects, as it setteth him well to do in all honest and lawful things.

[...]

—1599, 1603

[1] sundry separately, asunder.

Anne Cecil de Vere, countess of Oxford
1556-1588

Daughter of Mildred Cooke and William Cecil, Lord Burghley, Anne Cecil was raised in her father's politically prominent and religiously conservative household. As Elizabeth I's chief minister, Burghley might have married Anne to any number of eligible young men; however, Anne's letters suggest that she herself was very much enamoured of Edward de Vere, the seventeenth earl of Oxford, from the time of her first entrance into the world of the Court. Nevertheless, both Burghley's reasons for allowing his daughter's match with Oxford and Oxford's reasons for agreeing to it remain matters of some speculation. Oxford may have hoped that an alliance with the increasingly influential Cecil family would mean the swift payment of his pressing debts and perhaps even a reprieve for his cousin, the duke of Norfolk, under sentence of death for his involvement in a plot to overthrow Elizabeth in favour of Mary, queen of Scots. When Cecil neither paid Oxford's debts nor saved Norfolk from the scaffold, Oxford is reported to have said that his subsequent desertion of Anne and his accusations that she was an adulteress were his revenge on his father-in-law. Claiming that their daughter, Elizabeth, born five years after their marriage in 1571, was not his child, Oxford retreated to the Continent. Here he converted secretly to Catholicism. Returning to court in 1578, Oxford proceeded to patronize a number of writers, some with Catholic sympathies. His support of John Lyly (see above, 458-85), for example, helped make euphuism an indispensable mark of the fashionable man or woman at court. However, Oxford's brief moment of political and social influence soon waned, especially when it came to light that he had seduced and impregnated one of Elizabeth's maids of honour, Ann Vavasour. Returning to her husband in 1582, Anne gave birth the next year to the son (Lord Bulbeck) for whom she wrote the following sonnets; he lived only two days.

Published in John Southern's Pandora, The Music of the Beauty of his Mistress Diana (1584), Anne Cecil de Vere's elegiac sonnets for her young son have been the subject of some debate concerning their actual authorship, even though Southern himself clearly attributes them to the Countess.

EDITION: "Four Epitaphs" and "Others of the Four Last Lines, of Other That She Made Also." Contained in John Southern's Pandora, the musyque of the beautie, of his mistresse Diana. London: [Printed by John Charlewood] for Thomas Hackett, 1584. STC 22928.

Four Epitaphs Made by the Countess of Oxenford after the Death of Her Young Son, the Lord Bulbeck.

1.

Had with morning[1] the gods left their wills undone,
They had not so soon 'herited[2] such a soul;
Or if the mouth, time, did not glutton up all,
Nor I, nor the world, were deprived of my son,
Whose breast Venus,[3] with a face doleful and mild,
Doth wash with golden tears, inveighing[4] the skies;
And when the water of the goddess's eyes,
Makes almost alive the marble of my child,[5]

[1] Some editors choose "mourning" here.

[2] 'herited i.e., inherited.

[3] Venus Although Venus is most famous as the goddess of erotic love, de Vere refers here to her representation as Venus Genetrix, Venus as mother and generative principle.

[4] inveighing railing against.

[5] Makes almost alive the marble of my child referring to the white coldness of the dead child's body as well as to his funeral monument; de Vere also plays on Venus' pity for the sculptor, Pygmalion, who created the statue of a woman so lovely that he fell helplessly in love with it. The goddess caused the statue to come to life, and Pygmalion named her Galateia; they had a son together, named Paphus. See p. 606, note 2.

One bids her leave still her dolour[1] so extreme,
Telling her it is not her young son Papheme.[2]
To which she makes answer with a voice inflamed,
(Feeling therewith her venom, to be more bitter):
"As I was of Cupid, even so of it mother.
And a woman's last child is the most beloved."

2.

In doleful ways I spend the wealth of my time,
Feeding on my heart, that ever comes again,
Since the ordinance of the Destins[3] hath been
To end of the seasons of my years the prime.
With my son, my gold, my nightingale, and rose,[4]
Is gone: for t'was in him and no other where.[5]
And well though mine eyes run down like fountains here,
The stone will not speak yet, that doth it enclose.
And Destins and gods, you might rather have ta'en[6]
My twenty years than the two days of my son.
And of this world what shall I hope, since I know
That in his respect it can yield me but moss.[7]
Or what should I consume any more in woe,
When Destins, gods, and worlds, are all in my loss.

3.

The heavens, death, and life have conjured my ill:
For death hath ta'en away the breath of my son.
The heavens receive and consent that he hath done:[8]
And my life doth keep me here against my will.

[1] dolour sorrow, grief.

[2] Papheme Venus' son Cupid (after one of Venus' epithets).

[3] Destins the Destinies or Fates. See p. 607, note 8.

[4] my gold, my nightingale, and rose "Gold, the best of all metals. Nightingale, the sweetest of all birds. And Roses the fairest of all flowers" [Pandora's note].

[5] where place.

[6] ta'en i.e., taken.

[7] in his respect with regard to him; moss fig., rubbish, trash; unlike the rose, moss is a plant with no colour or vitality.

[8] he hath done The "he" refers back both to "death" in line 2 and to the "son" in the same line; "death has finished (i.e., done) with her son" and equally "her son has died."

But if our life be caused with moisture and heat,[9]
I care neither for the death, the life, nor skies:
For I'll sigh him warmth, and wet him with my eyes:
(And thus I shall be thought a second Promët)[10]
And as for life, let it do me all despite:
For if it leave me, I shall go to my child,
And it[11] in the heavens, there is all my delight.
And if I live, my virtue is immortal:
So that the heavens, death and life, when they do all
Their force, by sorrowful virtue th'are beguiled.

4.

Idall for Adon[12] nev'r shed so many tears,
Nor Thet' for Pelid, nor Phoebus for Hyacinthus,[13]
Nor for Attis, the mother of prophetesses,[14]
As for the death of Bulbeck, the gods have cares.

[9] be caused with moisture and heat Early modern physiology makes these two conditions prerequisites for conception.

[10] Promët According to Ovid, Prometheus created man by mixing earth with rainwater and then fashioning it in the image of the gods.

[11] it i.e., her son.

[12] Idall for Adon Venus (sometimes called Idalaea) loved the beautiful mortal youth, Adonis. While out hunting, he was gored to death by a boar. Venus, unable to save him, grieved terribly, and finally transformed him into the anemone. See p. 607, note 3.

[13] Thet' for Pelid The sea-goddess Thetis and her husband the mortal king, Peleus, together produced the Greek hero Achilles (often called after his surname, Pelides); Homer records her unassuagable grief over Achilles' death in the Iliad. Thetis failed in her attempt to cheat the Fates' decree of an early death for Achilles: she dipped her son into the river Styx in order to make him invulnerable; his heel, however, which was not touched by the water, proved his weak point, and he was slain after being wounded there; Phoebus for Hyacinthus Phoebus, or Apollo the sun-god, loved the beautiful boy, Hyacinthus, whom he accidentally killed with a discus, which had been diverted by the jealous Zephyrus, god of the winds, who also loved the boy; from Hyacinthus' blood sprang the flowers which still bear his name.

[14] Nor for Attis, the mother of prophetesses i.e., nor Cybele, the mother of prophetesses, for Attis. Cybele (Rhea), called the Great Mother or Mother of the Gods, loved the lovely young man Attis, and showered him with favours, including the honour of being guardian of her temple, on the condition (however) that he remain celibate throughout his life. Attis betrayed his vow with the nymph Sagaritis, and the enraged Cybele killed the nymph and drove Attis to castrate himself. Cybele later grieved for her actions and took Attis back. Cybele was an ancient fertility symbol, often depicted as heavily-pregnant (Classical Dict., p. 209).

At the brute of it, the Aphroditan queen[1]
Caused more silver to distill fro[2] her eyes
Than when the drops of her cheeks raised daisies;[3]
And to die with him, mortal she[4] would have been.
The Charits[5] for it break their peruqs of gold:
The Muses, and the nymphs[6] of caves: I behold
All the gods under Olympus are constraint,[7]
On Laches, Clothon, and Atropos to plain:[8]
And yet beauty, for it doth make no complaint,
For it liv'd with him, and died with him again.

Others of the Four Last Lines, of Other That She Made Also.[9]

My son is gone, and with it death end my sorrow,
But Death makes me answer: "Madam, cease these moans.
My force is but on bodies of blood and bones,
And that of yours is no more now but a shadow."

An other.

Amphiôn's wife was turned to rock. Oh[10]
How well I had been, had I had such adventure,[11]
For then I might again have been the sepulchre,
Of him that I bare in me, so long ago.

—1584

---

[1] brute report; Aphroditan queen Venus.

[2] fro i.e., from.

[3] drops of her cheeks raised daisies The pronoun "her" does not refer back to Idall (Venus) and her grief over the death of Adonis, but instead to classical mythology's exemplary wife, Alceste (or Alcestis); she offered to die in the place of her husband, Admetus, whom the Fates had condemned to an early death. In some accounts, Hercules descended into Hades and seized Alceste from Death, brought her back and restored her to her husband (Apollodorus, Library of Greek Mythology [Oxford, 1997], p. 48). According to F. Percival, Alceste's transformation into a daisy is not part of any classical version of the myth and is wholly an invention of Chaucer's (The Legend of Good Women, "Prologue," ll.510-19), although he is clearly adapting elements of Ovidian transformation narratives (such as that of Clytie in Ovid's Metamorphoses, book 4). The story of Alceste was (at least in the Middle Ages) relatively unknown (Chaucer's Legendary Good Women [Cambridge, 1998], esp. pp.49-50).

[4] she i.e., Idall (Venus).

[5] Charits the Charites or three Graces, daughters and constant attendants of Venus; associated with kindness as well as the virtues of private and domestic life; usually represented as three beautiful young virgins. They are sometimes pictured with their hair tucked up under golden caps. A "peruq" is a "peruke," a natural head of hair or a wig; here, perhaps a "cap" or "hat" (Classical Dict., p. 159).

[6] Muses those divine patrons of the arts and sciences, often figured as the inspiration of poets, artists, and scientists. While generally considered virgins, the Muses are sometimes described as the mothers of various famous mortals, including the famed singer Orpheus; nymphs an especially vague category of supernatural beings in Greek mythology; usually beautiful maidens, often attached to a particular natural place or element.

[7] Olympus the dwelling place of the gods; constraint i.e., constrained.

[8] Laches, Clothon, and Atropos the three Fates or Destinies, responsible for dictating the scope, length, and shape of each person's life; Lachesis presided over and assigned each person's lot in life; Clotho spun the thread of life; and Atropos cut it; plain i.e., complain, lament.

[9] The following fragments are numbered in the poem's only print edition (in John Southern's Pandora), but whether he or the printer inserted these lines numbers is unknown.

[10] Amphiôn's wife Niobe, daughter of King Tantalus of Lydia, boasted that her seven sons and seven daughters made her worthier of worship than Latona (Leto), goddess of childbirth and the mother of Apollo and Diana. In response, Apollo killed Niobe's sons, and Diana destroyed all the daughters, except Chloris. Transformed into a stone, Niobe was fated to weep eternally.

[11] adventure fortune, luck, chance.

Jane Anger
fl. 1588

Jane Anger is known for one work, Jane Anger, Her Protection for Women, a pamphlet in defence of women published in 1589. Anger was responding to the attacks against women in the non-extant His Surfeit in Love, a tract from which she occasionally quotes. Both works are part of the period's ongoing discussion on the nature of woman—about which (male) writers often argued philosophically on both sides of the question. Anger's pamphlet is more than a scholarly examination, however, and is enlivened by her anger and her humour. She berates men's approaches to writing about women, and provides alternative visions of women's roles in courtship and the domestic realm. Like other women writers in the period, Anger is careful in her self-presentation, and the two introductory letters reveal her awareness of her audience and her ability to suit her tone to the circumstance. Her Protection for Women also includes a number of poems, which further show Anger's flexibility and control, and provide yet another vision of the roles of men and women.

EDITION: Jane Anger, her Protection for women. London: Printed by Richard Jones and Thomas Orwin, 1589. STC 644.

from Jane Anger, Her Protection for Women

To Defend Them against the Scandalous Reports of a Late Surfeiting Lover, and All Other like Venerians[1] that Complain so to be Overcloyed with Women's Kindness.

Written by Ja. A. Gent.[2]

To the Gentlewomen of England, Health.

Gentlewomen, though it is to be feared that your settled wits will advisedly condemn that which my choleric vein hath rashly set down, and so perchance anger shall reap anger for not agreeing with diseased persons, yet (if with indifferency of censure you consider of the head of the quarrel) I hope you will rather show yourselves defendants of the defender's title than complainants of the plaintiff's wrong. I doubt[3] judgement before trial, which were injurious to the law, and I confess that my rashness deserveth no less, which was a fit of my extremity. I will not urge reasons, because your wits are sharp and will soon conceive my meaning; nor will I be tedious lest I prove too, too troublesome; nor overdark in my writing, for fear of the name of a riddler. But (in a word) for my presumption I crave pardon, because it was anger that did write it. Committing your protection and myself to the protection of yourselves, and the judgement of the cause to the censures of your just minds,

Yours ever at commandment,
Ja. A.

To All Women in General, and Gentle Reader Whatsoever.

Fie on the falsehood of men, whose minds go oft a-madding, and whose tongues cannot so soon be wagging but straight they fall a-railing![4] Was there ever any so abused, so slandered, so railed upon,

[1] Venerians those who are associated with sexual desire; can also refer to sexual diseases; a comic play on "venerable."

[2] Gent. Gentlewoman. "Anger" may be a pseudonym which fits with the tone of the work, but Anger was a documented family name in the period.

[3] doubt fear.

[4] a-madding mad; a-railing railing, yelling, or vilifying.

or so wickedly handled undeservedly as are we women? Will the gods permit it, the goddesses stay their punishing judgements, and we ourselves not pursue their undoings for such devilish practices? O Paul's steeple and Charing Cross![1] A halter hold all such persons! Let the streams of the channels in London streets run so swiftly as they may be able alone to carry them from that sanctuary. Let the stones be as ice, the soles of their shoes as glass, the ways steep like Aetna, and every blast a whirlwind puffed out of Boreas[2] his long throat, that these may hasten their passage to the Devil's haven. Shall surfeiters rail on our kindness, you stand still and say nought, and shall not Anger stretch the veins of her brains, the strings of her fingers, and the lists of her modesty to answer their surfeitings? Yes, truly. And herein I conjure all you to aid and assist me in defence of my willingness, which shall make me rest at your commands. Fare you well.

Your friend,
Ja. A.

A Protection for Women

The desire that every man hath to show his true vein in writing is unspeakable, and their minds are so carried away with the manner as no care at all is had of the matter. They run so into rhetoric as oftentimes they overrun the bounds of their own wits and go they know not whither. If they have stretched their invention so hard on a last as it is at a stand,[3] there remains but one help, which is to write of us women. If they may once encroach so far into our presence as they may but see the lining of our outermost garment, they straight think that Apollo[4] honours them in yielding so good a supply to refresh their sore overburdened heads, through studying for matters to indite of. And therefore, that the god may see how thankfully they receive his liberality (their wits whetted and their brains almost broken with botching his bounty), they fall straight to dispraising and slandering our silly[5] sex. But judge what the cause should be of this their so great malice towards simple women: doubtless the weakness of our wits and our honest bashfulness, by reason whereof they suppose that there is not one amongst us who can or dare reprove their slanders and false reproaches. Their slanderous tongues are so short, and the time wherein they have lavished out their words freely hath been so long, that they know we cannot catch hold of them to pull them out and they think we will not write to reprove their lying lips, which conceits have already made them cocks and would (should they not be cravened) make themselves among themselves be thought to be of the game.[6] They have been so daintily fed with our good natures, that, like jades[7] (their stomachs are grown so queasy), they surfeit of our kindness. If we will not suffer them to smell on our smocks, they will snatch at our petticoats, but if our honest natures cannot away with that uncivil kind of jesting, then we are coy. Yet if we bear with their rudeness and be somewhat modestly familiar with them, they will straight make matter of nothing, blazing abroad that they have surfeited with love, and then their wits must be shown in telling the manner how.

Among the innumerable number of books to that purpose, of late (unlooked-for) "The New Surfeit of an Old Lover" (sent abroad to warn those which are of his own kind from catching the

---

1 Paul's steeple and Charing Cross St Paul's Cathedral, London; Charing Cross was a popular meeting place and the site of a pillory (which may connect with the "halter" or noose in the next sentence).

2 Aetna volcanic mountain in eastern Sicily; Boreas the north wind.

3 stretched ... stand A last was a wooden foot-mould used by cobblers or shoemakers to stretch the material for shoes and boots. This may also refer to the proverb "Let the cobbler stick to his last," meaning people should stick to what they know. The implication is that men have moved beyond what they know, and have stretched their imaginations to breaking point.

4 Apollo the sun-god and the patron of music and poetry.

5 silly helpless, deserving of compassion; it also includes the idea of "simple" in the succeeding sentence.

6 cravened vanquished, cowardly; of the game i.e., still in the game (of love). A "cock of the game" was a fighting game cock. The sense here is that amongst themselves men pretend to be ready and able for the game (either of love, or of the fight against women), even though they may be vanquished or cowardly.

7 jades worn-out, often ill-tempered, inferior breeds of horses.

like disease) came by chance to my hands, which, because as well women as men are desirous of novelties, I willingly read over. Neither did the ending thereof less please me than the beginning, for I was so carried away with the conceit of the gentleman as that I was quite out of the book before I thought I had been in the midst thereof: so pithy were his sentences, so pure his words, and so pleasing his style. The chief matters therein contained were of two sorts: the one in the dispraise of man's folly, and the other, invective against our sex. [...]

[...] yet, truly their sex are so like to bulls that it is no marvel though the gods do metamorphose some of them to give warning to the rest, if they could think so of it, for some of them will follow the smock as Tom Bull[1] will run after a town cow. But lest they should running slip and break their pates,[2] the gods, provident of their welfare, set a pair of tooters[3] on their foreheads to keep it from the ground. For doubtless so stood the case with Menelaus;[4] he, running abroad as a smellsmock,[5] got the habit of a cuckold, of whom thus shall go my verdict:

The gods most just do justly punish sin
With those same plagues which men do most forlorn.
If filthy lust in men to spring begin,
That monstrous sin he plagueth with the horn.
Their wisdom great whereby they men forewarn
To shun vild lust, lest they will wear the horn.

Deceitful men with guile must be repaid,
And blows for blows who renders not again?
The man that is of cuckold's lot afraid,
From lechery he ought for to refrain.
Else shall he have the plague he doth forlorn
And ought (perforce constrained) to wear the horn.

The Greek, Actaeon's badge did wear, they say,[6]
And worthy too, he loved the smock so well,
That every man may be a bull I pray
Which loves to follow lust (his game) so well.
For by that means poor women shall have peace
And want these jars.[7] Thus doth my censure cease.

The greatest fault that doth remain in us women is that we are too credulous, for could we flatter as they can dissemble, and use our wits well as they can their tongues ill, then never would any of them complain of surfeiting. But if we women be so perilous cattle as they term us, I marvel that the gods made not Fidelity[8] as well a man as they created her a woman, and all the moral virtues of their masculine sex as of the feminine kind, except their deities knew that there was some sovereignty in us women which could not be in them men. But lest some snatching fellow should catch me before I fall to the ground (and say they will adorn my head with a feather,[9] affirming that I roam beyond reason, seeing it is most manifest that the man is the head of the woman and that therefore we ought to be guided by them), I prevent them with this answer: the gods, knowing that the minds of mankind would be aspiring and having thoroughly viewed the wonderful virtues wherewith women are enriched, lest they should provoke us to pride and so confound us with Lucifer, they bestowed

---

1 Tom Bull The addition of "Tom" to various animals was often used to indicate the male (which "bull" already does); it is also a comic deflation of the deity chasing the mortal in many myths of metamorphosis.

2 pates heads.

3 tooters something that projects outward; here, horns, the signs of a cuckold (a man whose wife commits adultery).

4 Menelaus husband of Helen, whom Paris carried off to Troy.

5 smellsmock a licentious man.

6 Actaeon's badge Actaeon was a hunter; after he watched Diana bathing, the goddess turned Actaeon into a stag, and he was torn apart by his own hounds. Actaeon's "badge" is his horns, the horns associated with the cuckold.

7 want these jars lack these discords, these arguments.

8 Fidelity virtues, such as Fidelity, were often personified as women.

9 adorn my head with a feather Although this could be a mark of honour, it was also the sign of a fool. This may refer to the proverb, "A fool and his feather."

the supremacy over us to man, that of that cockscomb[1] he might only boast, and therefore, for God's sake let them keep it. But we return to "The Surfeit.""

Having made a long discourse of the gods' censure concerning love, he leaves them (and I them with him) and comes to the principal object and general foundation of love, which he affirmeth to be grounded on women. And now beginning to search his scroll, wherein are taunts against us, he beginneth and saith that we allure their hearts to us, wherein he saith more truly than he is aware of, for we woo them with our virtues, and they wed us with vanities. And men, being of wit sufficient to consider of the virtues which are in us women, are ravished with the delight of those dainties which allure and draw the senses of them to serve us, whereby they become ravenous hawks, who do not only seize upon us, but devour us. Our good toward them is the destruction of ourselves: we, being well formed, are by them foully deformed; of our true meaning they make mocks, rewarding our loving follies with disdainful flouts; we are the grief of man, in that we take all the grief from man; we languish when they laugh; we lie sighing when they sit singing; and sit sobbing when they lie slugging[2] and sleeping. Mulier est hominis confusio[3] because her kind heart cannot so sharply reprove their frantic fits as those mad frenzies deserve. Aut amat aut odit; non est in tertio:[4] she loveth good things and hateth that which is evil; she loveth justice and hateth iniquity; she loveth truth and true dealing and hateth lies and falsehood; she loveth man for his virtues and hateth him for his vices. To be short, there is no medium between good and bad, and therefore she can be in nullo tertio.[5] Plato his answer to a vicar of fools[6] which asked the question, being that he knew not whether to place women among those creatures which were reasonable or unreasonable, did as much beautify his divine knowledge, as all the books he did write: for knowing that women are the greatest help that men have, without whose aid and assistance it is as possible for them to live as if they wanted[7] meat, drink, clothing, or any other necessary; and knowing also that even then in his age, much more in those ages which should after follow, men were grown to be so unreasonable, as he could not decide whether men or brute beasts were more reasonable. Their eyes are so curious, as be not all women equal with Venus for beauty,[8] they cannot abide the sight of them; their stomachs so queasy, as do they taste but twice of one dish they straight surfeit, and needs must a new diet be provided for them. We are contrary to men because they are contrary to that which is good. Because they are purblind,[9] they cannot see into our natures, and we too well (though we had but half an eye) into their conditions, because they are so bad. Our behaviours alter daily, because men's virtues decay hourly. If Hesiod[10] had with equity as well looked into the life of man as he did precisely search out the qualities of us women, he would have said that if a woman trust unto a man, it shall fare as well with her as if she had a weight of a thousand pounds tied about her neck and then cast into the bottomless seas, for by men are we confounded, though they by us are sometimes crossed. Our tongues are light because earnest in reproving men's filthy vices, and our good counsel is termed nipping injury in that it accords not with their foolish fancies; our boldness rash, for giving noddies[11] nipping answers; our dispositions naughty, for not agreeing with their vile minds; and our fury dangerous, because it will not bear

[1] cockscomb a cap worn by a professional fool, similar in shape to a cock's comb.

[2] slugging lazy.

[3] Mulier est hominis confusio Latin, "Woman is the consternation of man."

[4] Aut amat aut odit; non est in tertio Latin, "She either loves or hates; there is no third [or middle] course."

[5] in nullo tertio Latin, "in no third [or middle] course."

[6] Plato his answer to a vicar of fools Plato stated that women should be educated.

[7] wanted lacked.

[8] Venus for beauty Venus is the goddess of beauty and love.

[9] purblind half-blind or dim-sighted.

[10] Hesiod early Greek epic poet (8th century BCE) who wrote a Catalogue of Women.

[11] noddies fools; a "noddypoll" is a blockhead.

with their knavish behaviours. If our frowns be so terrible and our anger so deadly, men are too foolish in offering occasions of hatred which, shunned, a terrible death is prevented. There is a continual deadly hatred between the wild boar and tame hounds; I would there were the like betwixt women and men, unless they amend their manners, for so strength should predominate where now flattery and dissimulation hath the upper hand. The lion rageth when he is hungry, but man raileth when he is glutted. The tiger is robbed of her young ones when she is ranging abroad, but men rob women of their honour undeservedly under their noses. The viper stormeth when his tail is trodden on, and may not we fret when all our body is a footstool to their vild[1] lust? Their unreasonable minds, which know not what reason is, make them nothing better than brute beasts. [...]

Tibullus,[2] setting down a rule for women to follow, might have proportioned this platform for men to rest in, and might have said, "Every honest man ought to shun that which detracteth both health and safety from his own person, and strive to bridle his slanderous tongue." Then must he be modest, and show his modesty by his virtuous and civil behaviours, and not display his beastliness through his wicked and filthy words, for lying lips and deceitful tongues are abominable before God. It is an easy matter to entreat a cat to catch a mouse, and more easy to persuade a desperate man to kill himself. What nature hath made, art cannot mar (and as this surfeiting lover saith) that which is bred in the bone, will not be brought out of the flesh. If we clothe ourselves in sackcloth and truss up our hair in dishclouts,[3] Venerians will nevertheless pursue their pastime. If we hide our breasts, it must be with leather, for no cloth can keep their long nails out of our bosoms. [...]

Now while this greedy gazer is about his entreaty of love, which nothing belongeth to our matter, let us secretly, ourselves with ourselves, consider how and in what they that are our worst enemies are both inferior unto us and most beholden unto our kindness.

The creation of man and woman at the first, he being formed in principio[4] of dross and filthy clay, did so remain until God saw that in him His workmanship was good, and therefore by the transformation of the dust which was loathsome unto flesh, it became purified. Then lacking a help for him, God, making woman of man's flesh that she might be purer than he, doth evidently show how far we women are more excellent than men. Our bodies are fruitful, whereby the world increaseth, and our care wonderful, by which man is preserved. From woman sprang man's salvation.[5] A woman was the first that believed, and a woman likewise the first that repented of sin. In women is only true fidelity; except[6] in her there is constancy, and without her no housewifery. In the time of their sickness we cannot be wanted, and when they are in health we for them are most necessary. They are comforted by our means, they [are] nourished by the meats we dress, their bodies freed from diseases by our cleanliness, which otherwise would surfeit unreasonably through their own noisomeness.[7] Without our care they lie in their beds as dogs in litter and go like lousy mackerel swimming in the heat of summer. They love to go handsomely in their apparel and rejoice in the pride thereof, yet who is the cause of it but our carefulness, to see that everything about them be curious?[8] Our virginity makes us virtuous, our conditions courteous, and our chastity maketh our trueness of love manifest. They confess we are necessary, but they would have us likewise evil. That they cannot want[9] us, I grant, yet evil I deny, except only in the respect of man, who (hating all good things) is only desirous of that which is ill, through whose desire in estimation of conceit we

1 vild vile or wild.

2 Tibullus Roman elegiac poet (c. 55-c. 19 BCE)

3 dishclouts dishcloths.

4 in principio Latin, "in the beginning."

5 man's salvation Jesus sprang from Mary.

6 except only.

7 noisomeness unwholesomeness, noxiousness.

8 curious made with care or art.

9 want do without.

are made ill. But lest some should snarl on me, barking out this reason, "that none is good but God, and therefore women are ill," I must yield that in that respect we are ill, and affirm that men are no better, seeing we are so necessary unto them. It is most certain that if we be ill, they are worse, for malum malo additum efficit malum peius,[1] and they that use ill worse than it should be are worse than the ill. And therefore if they will correct Magnificat,[2] they must first learn the signification thereof. That we are liberal they will not deny, since that many of them have (ex confessio)[3] received more kindness in one day at our hands than they can repay in a whole year, and some have so glutted themselves with our liberality as they cry, "No more." But if they shall avow that women are fools, we may safely give them the lie. For myself have heard some of them confess that we have more wisdom than need is, and therefore no fools, and they less than they should have, and therefore fools. It hath been affirmed by some of their sex that to shun a shower of rain and to know the way to our husband's bed is wisdom sufficient for us women, but in this year of '88, men are grown so fantastical that unless we can make them fools, we are accounted unwise. And now (seeing I speak to none but to you which are of mine own sex), give me leave like a scholar to prove our wisdom more excellent than theirs, though I never knew what sophistry[4] meant. There is no wisdom but it comes by grace; this is a principle, and contra principium non est disputandum.[5] But grace was first given to a woman, because to our Lady,[6] which premises conclude that women are wise. Now primum est optimum,[7] and therefore women are wiser than men. That we are more witty, which comes by nature, it cannot better be proven than that by our answers men are often driven to nonplus.[8] And if their talk be of worldly affairs, with our resolutions they must either rest satisfied or prove themselves fools in the end. [...]

The smooth speeches of men are nothing unlike the vanishing clouds of the air, which glide by degrees from place to place, till they have filled themselves with rain, when breaking, they spit forth terrible showers; so men gloze[9] till they have their answers, which are the end of their travel,[10] and then they bid modesty adieu, and entertaining rage, fall a-railing on us which never hurt them. The rankness of grass causeth suspicion of the serpent's lurking, but his lying in the plain path at the time when woodcocks shoot, maketh the patient passionate through his sting, because no such ill was suspected. When men protest secrecy most solemnly, believe them least, for then surely there is a trick of knavery to be discarded, for in a friar's habit an old fornicator is always clothed.

It is a wonder to see how men can flatter themselves with their own conceits, for let us look, they will straight affirm that we love, and if then lust pricketh them, they will swear that love stingeth us, which imagination only is sufficient to make them assay[11] the scaling of half a dozen of us in one night, when they will not stick to swear that if they should be denied of their requests, death must needs follow. Is it any marvel, though, they surfeit when they are so greedy; but is it not pity that any of them should perish, which will be so soon killed with unkindness? Yes, truly. Well, the onset given, if we retire for a vantage, they will straight affirm that they have got the victory. Nay, some of them are so carried away with conceit that, shameless, they will blaze abroad among their companions that they have obtained the love of a woman unto whom they never spoke above once, if that. Are not these froward[12] fellows? You must

---

1 malum malo additum efficit malum peius Latin, "evil added to evil makes the evil worse."

2 correct Magnificat To attempt to "correct Magnificat" is a byword for presumptuous faultfinding.

3 ex confessio admittedly.

4 sophistry the use of specious or pleasing but deceptive reasonings.

5 contra principium non est disputandum Latin, "there is no argument against a principle."

6 our Lady the Virgin Mary, the mother of Jesus.

7 primum est optimum Latin, "first is best."

8 nonplus a state of perplexity or embarrassment.

9 gloze discourse, expound.

10 travel travail or labour.

11 assay attempt.

12 froward contrary, perverse.

bear with them, because they dwell far from lying neighbours. They will say Mentiri non est nostrum, and yet you shall see true tales come from them as wild geese fly under London bridge.[1] Their fawning is but flattery; their faith, falsehood; their fair words, allurements to destruction; and their large promises, tokens of death or of evils worse than death. Their singing is a bait to catch us, and their playings, plagues to torment us, and therefore take heed of them, and take this as an axiom in logic and a maxim in the law: Nulla fides hominibus.[2] There are three accidents to men, which of all are most inseparable: lust, deceit and malice. Their glozing tongues [are] the preface to the execution of their vild[3] minds, and their pens, the bloody executioners of their barbarous manners. A little gall maketh a great deal of sweet sour, and a slanderous tongue poisoneth all the good parts in man. [...]

At the end of men's fair promises there is a labyrinth, and therefore ever hereafter stop your ears when they protest friendship, lest they come to an end before you are aware, whereby you fall without redemption. The path which leadeth thereunto is man's wit, and the miles' ends are marked with these trees: Folly, Vice, Mischief, Lust, Deceit, and Pride. These, to deceive you, shall be clothed in the raiments of Fancy, Virtue, Modesty, Love, True meaning, and Handsomeness. Folly will bid you welcome on your way and tell you his fancy concerning the profit which may come to you by this journey, and direct you to Vice, who is more crafty. He with a company of protestations will praise the virtues of women, showing how many ways men are beholden unto us, but our backs once turned, he falls a-railing. Then Mischief, he pries into every corner of us, seeing if he can espy a cranny that, getting in his finger into it, he may make it wide enough for his tongue to wag in. Now being come to Lust, he will fall a-railing on lascivious looks and will ban Lechery, and with the collier will say, "The Devil take him,"[4] though he never means it. Deceit will give you fair words and pick your pockets; nay, he will pluck out your hearts, if you be not wary. But when you hear one cry out against lawns, drawn-works,[5] periwigs, against the attire of courtesans, and generally of the pride of all women, then know him for a wolf clothed in sheep's raiment, and be sure[6] you are fast by the lake of destruction. Therefore take heed of it, which you shall do if you shun men's flattery, the forerunner of our undoing. If a jade be galled, will he not winch,[7] and can you find fault with a horse that springeth when he is spurred? The one will stand quietly when his back is healed, and the other go well when his smart ceaseth. You must bear with the old lover "His Surfeit," because he was diseased when he did write it, and peradventure hereafter, when he shall be well amended, he will repent himself of his slanderous speeches against our sex, and curse the dead man which was the cause of it, and make a public recantation. For the faltering in his speech at the latter end of his book affirmeth that already he half repenteth of his bargain. And why? Because his melody is past.[8] But believe him not, though he should outswear you, for although a jade may be still in a stable when his gall back is healed, yet he will show himself in his kind when he is travelling, and man's flattery bites secretly, from which I pray God keep you, and me too. Amen.

A Sovereign Salve to Cure the Late Surfeiting Lover

If once the heat did sore thee beat of foolish love so blind,
Sometime to sweat, sometime to fret
as one bestraught[9] of mind;

---

[1] Mentiri non est nostrum Latin, "it is not ours to lie"; wild geese fly under London bridge i.e., never, as wild geese fly over, not under, the bridge.

[2] Nulla fides hominibus Latin, "place no trust in men."

[3] vild See p. 612, note 1.

[4] Colliers were involved in the coal trade and were associated with blackness and fire, and thus the Devil. They were also reputedly evil for cheating.

[5] lawns fine linens; drawn-works a type of ornamental needlework.

[6] be sure i.e., you can be sure.

[7] winch "wince," but also "kick."

[8] Because his melody is past i.e., because his song is over, his time is up.

[9] bestraught distracted, distraught.

If wits were take in such a brake
that reason was exiled,
And woe did wake, but could not slake,
thus love had thee beguiled;

If any wight[1] unto thy sight
all other did excel,
Whose beauty bright, constrained right
thy heart with her to dwell;

If thus thy foe oppressed thee so that back thou could not start,
But still with woe did surfeit though,
yet thankless was thy smart;

If naught but pain in love remain,
at length this counsel win:
That thou refrain[2] this dangerous pain,
and come no more therein.

And since the blast is overpassed,
it better were certain,
From flesh to fast, whilst life does last,
than surfeit so again.

[1] wight person.
[2] refrain refrain from.

Vivendo disce.[3]

Eiusdem ad Lectorem de Authore[4]

Though sharp the seed by Anger sowed,
we all (almost) confess,
And hard his hap we aye account,
who Anger doth possess,
Yet hapless shall thou (reader) reap
such fruit from anger's soil,
As may thee please, and anger ease
from long and weary toil;
Whose pains were took for thy behoof[5]
to till that cloddy ground,
Where scarce no place free from disgrace of female sex was found.
If aught offend which she doth send,
impute it to her mood,
For anger's rage must that assuage,
as well is understood.
If to delight aught come in sight,
then deem it for the best,
So you your will may well fulfill,
and she have her request.

—1589

[3] Vivendo disce Latin, "learn from living."
[4] Eiusdem ad Lectorem de Authore Latin, "To the Reader of the Same, from the Author."
[5] behoof benefit.

Anne Dowriche

before July 1560-after 1613

Relatively little is known about Anne Dowriche. The daughter of Sir Richard and Elizabeth Edgcumbe, she was born into a prominent family in Devon and Cornwall, whose arms appear on the verso of the title page to her book. Her life appears to have been spent in the west of England, where she married Hugh Dowriche, from another well-to-do family, in 1580. They lived in Honiton, Devon, where he was rector, from 1587 to 1598 and had four or five children. Both husband and wife wrote poetry that displays deep biblical knowledge and appear to have been active in reformist circles.[1] Anne Dowriche's The French History was published first in London in 1589, but an edition was also published for Exeter bookseller William Russell.

The French History consists of a dedicatory epistle and poem addressed to Dowriche's brother, followed by an epistle and poem to the reader and by versified accounts of three episodes in the persecution of French Protestants (the Huguenots). This violence culminated in the St. Bartholomew's Day Massacre (1574), in which 30,000-50,000 people died. Dowriche's poem is adapted from a prose source, Thomas Tymme's 1574 The Three Parts of Commentaries, Containing the Whole and Perfect Discourse of the Civil Wars in France, which was in turn a translation and compilation of Jean de Serres's Commentariorum de statu religionis & republicae in regno Galliae libri and François Hotman's De furoribus gallicis.[2] Material from these sources appears directly in Dowriche's text as a series of marginal glosses that comment on both character and incident. In versifying her sources, however, Dowriche creates a much higher level of drama by, at key moments, inventing speeches for the main characters that translate broad issues into human terms.

In her preface, Dowriche addresses the function of poetry in ways that are strikingly similar to Sir Philip Sidney's Defence of Poesy, for she articulates her primary purpose as the education and motivation of her readers to virtuous (Christian) action. She also indicates keen awareness of her status as a woman writer. The 2400-line main text is written in poulter's measure (i.e., couplets of iambic hexameter and iambic heptameter popular in the mid-sixteenth century), and framed as a dialogue between "the Englishman the Author" and a French exile who recounts recent events. This split in the narration carries over into the ideological concerns of the text. Not only does Dowriche set up an opposition between Roman Catholic evil and Protestant godliness through her polarization of the Guise family and Admiral Coligny, but she also explores a dual understanding of history as both providential and political.[3] That is, she shows the St. Bartholomew's Day Massacre as an incident in a much wider heroic narrative of the persecution of God's chosen people as they seek to reach divine truth, while also exploring human motivation and action in the events she recounts.[4] These two threads are far from separate, however, as Dowriche has Satan address the French Council and explain the scheme for the eradication of the Huguenots. Her interest in the process of human political machination is most fully explored through the figure of Catherine de Medici, whom she portrays as a scheming Machiavel.[5] Dowriche's consciousness of political theory in her working out of this figure shows as she even cites Gentillet's popular Contre Machiavel (1576) during one of Catherine de Medici's speeches. Her use of this figure not only reflects topical interest in Machiavelli's political theory during the late 1580s but also appears to have influenced Christopher Marlowe's use of the stage Machiavel in The Jew of Malta.

EDITION: The French Historie. London: Thomas Orwin for Thomas Man, 1589. STC 7159.

---

1 For biographical details, see E. Beilin, "Anne Dowriche," DLB 172, pp. 79-80.

2 Ibid., p. 80.

3 E. Beilin, "Writing Public Poetry: Humanism and the Woman Writer," Modern Language Quarterly 51 (1990): p. 258.

4 Ibid., pp. 261-62.

5 See R. Martin, "Anne Dowriche's The French History, Christopher Marlowe and Machiavellian Agency," Studies in English Literature 39 (1999): pp. 69-87.

from The French History

To the Right Worshipful Her Loving Brother, Master Pearse Edgecombe, of Mount Edgecombe in Devon, Esquire, Mercy and Peace from Jesus Christ.

Right worshipful, and my loving brother, I have heard it often and truly reported that laws may be broken, but nature cannot be forgotten. I find the force of this in myself. If I find not the like in you, I blame not your nature, but the contrary crossings of those politique[1] affections that hinder the working of it. When I had ended this present pamphlet, I saw that the simplicity of it required a patron and the often remembrance of your former courtesies enforced me to make bold with you. Consider not therefore the worthiness of the work, but rather the will of the worker, for though the one may justly be condemned, yet the other deserves to be accepted. This book which proceeds under your protection, if you consider the matter, I assure you it is most excellent and well worth the reading, but if you weigh the manner, I confess it is base and scarce worth the seeing. This is therefore my desire: that the simple attire of this outward form may not discourage you from seeking the comfortable taste of the inward substance. You shall find here many things for comfort worthy the considering, and for policy[2] the observing. This hath been my ordinary exercise for recreation at times of leisure for a long space together. If I were sure that you would but take half so much pleasure in reading it, as I have in collecting and disposing it, I should not need any farther to commend it. If you find anything that fits not your liking, remember I pray, that it is a woman's doing. The thing itself will sufficiently prove this to be true. Thus committing the patronage of this my recreation unto your protection, and you with my good sister-in-law your wife, and all your children to the Lord's tuition, I cease to trouble you. Honiton, the 25. day of July, 1589.

Your loving sister,
Anne Dowriche.

[1] politique judicious, expedient.

[2] policy craftiness, dissimulation.

To the Reader

Amongst many excellent precepts which Saint Paul gave unto the Church, this is to be considered: Let all things be done unto edifying.[3] If this had been of all men well considered, many things which now fly abroad might well have been spared. That my only purpose in collecting and framing this work was to edify, comfort, and stir up the godly minds unto care, watchfulness, zeal,[4] and ferventness[5] in the cause of God's truth, you shall easily perceive by the choosing and ordering of these singular examples which hereafter ensue. In which these special circumstances are to be considered. First, the great fury and rage of Satan likely to be displaced from his kingdom of error and blindness; the frantic madness of the ignorant, possessed people, delighting in darkness, and striving to uphold the kingdom of their master; and the prompt facility and readiness of Satan's ministers to put in execution any kind of wickedness, all which is to be seen both in the first example of The Winning of Saint James his Street,[6] and in all the rest of the book. Secondly, the power, majesty, and dignity of the Devil, possessing the chiefest states of the earth, and seeming to the outward appearance to wield the truth unto his obedience, in suppressing the strongest that dared openly to withstand him in the story of Annas Burgaeus.[7] Thirdly, the policy

[3] Let … edifying "What then, brethren? When you come together, each one has a hymn, a lesson, a revelation, a tongue, or an interpretation. Let all things be done for edification" (1 Corinthians 14:26).

[4] zeal intense ardour in the pursuit of some end.

[5] ferventness eagerness, vigour.

[6] St. James his Street a 1557 attack on a reformist prayer meeting in the Rue St. Jacques, in the Latin Quarter of Paris, where 135 Protestants were arrested, while others had their tongues cut out or were burned.

[7] Annas Burgaeus Anne Du Bourg (1521-59), jurist, councillor to Henry II, martyr to the Huguenot cause.

and craft of Satan and his members in devising by subtlety to circumvent the godly: under the shadow of trust to exercise tyranny; under the colour of courtesy to practice cruelty; and, under the veil of a sacred oath to cover most shameful villainy. This is to be seen in the third example of the miserable massacre at the bloody marriage.[1]

We had need therefore to be watchful, strong, and wise: watchful in prayer, that we be not taken sleeping; strong in faith, that we be not overthrown by Satan's might; wise as serpents, that we be not deceived by the Devil's allurements. We are to learn also what trust we ought to repose in the promises and oaths of professed papists, what show soever they make of love and friendship. Here, as in a glass, you shall plainly see the picture of all the moral virtues most lively described in the strange patience, the godly perseverance, the comfortable orations, sweet speeches, and the constant and famous endings of these sacred martyrs. Wheresoever thou shalt find the Devil brought in poetically to make any oration to the King and States[2] of France, as in many places he is, then understand that under those speeches are expressed all the subtleties, villainies, cruelties, and policies that were devised, and by devilish means put into practice against the godly, more lively to set them down in their colours, as if it came from the Devil's own mouth, as no doubt it came from his spirit. Again, in all orations of the martyrs, and of the King,[3] the Queen,[4] the Guise,[5] and all other that have speeches in this book, mark that of purpose the nature both of the person that speaks and also of the matter that is spoken are lively set down, so that here are not bare examples of virtue and vice, but also the nature and qualities of those virtues or villainies are manifestly depainted to them that will seek for it. The noble martyrs of England are known sufficiently almost to all. These excellent French histories were seen but of few, being in worthiness nothing inferior unto the other.

The causes why I have described it in verse are 3. First, for mine own exercise, being a learner in that faculty. Secondly, to restore again some credit if I can unto poetry, having been defaced of late so many ways by wanton vanities. Thirdly, for the more novelty of the thing, and apt facility in disposing the matter framed to the better liking of some men's fantasies, because the same story in effect is already translated into English prose. Many of these orations that are here fully and amply expressed were in the French commentaries but only in substance lightly touched, and the sum set down without amplifying the circumstance, and yet here is no more set down than there is signified. I have also, for the more terror unto the wicked, diligently collected the great plagues and just judgements of God showed against the persecutors in every several history, and have set them down so in order, and amplified them by the like judgements against sinners out of the word and other histories, that every proud persecutor may plainly see what punishment remaineth due unto their wicked tyranny. To speak truly without vainglory, I think assuredly, that there is not in this form anything extant which is more forcible to procure comfort to the afflicted, strength to the weak, courage to the faint-hearted, and patience unto them that are persecuted than this little work, if it be diligently read and well considered. So wishing that all the excellent and rare wits that now flourish in England, and show themselves many times in vain devices, would all learn to consecrate their singular gifts to the glory of God, the edifying of his Church, and the salvation of the souls of God's chosen. Then would the Lord still bless their labours, and give their names a perpetual memory.

---

[1] massacre at the bloody marriage the St. Bartholomew's Day Massacre, which followed the marriage of Marguerite of Valois to Henri of Navarre.

[2] States Estates General, the Parliament of France.

[3] the King Charles IX of France (1550-74), Henri of Navarre (1553-1610).

[4] the Queen Catherine de Medici (1519-89). Her marriage to Henri II of France had been a political and economic move to cement French relations with both the papacy and the Medici wealth.

[5] Guise the pro-Roman Catholic faction at the court of Charles IX. This family functioned as agents for Philip II, king of Spain, with whom the French crown fought several wars in the years preceding these events.

So I commit thee to God's protection, and commend this my pleasant exercise to thy good liking, which, if I perceive to be accepted, thou shalt encourage me to proceed, to make thee acquainted with more excellent actions. Honiton in Devon. this xxv. of July. 1589.

A. Dowriche.

To the Reader that Is Friendly to Poetry.

What so thou be that readst my book,
Let wit so weigh my will;
That due regard may here supply
The want of learned skill.

A.D.

The Bloody Marriage, or Butcherly Murder of the Admiral of France,[1] and Diverse Other Noble and Excellent Men, at the Marriage of Margaret,[2] the King's Own Sister, unto Prince Henry, Son to the Queen of Navarre,[3] Committed the 24. of August[4] in the City of Paris, Anno 1572.

Now have you heard before, of faggot,[5] fire, and sword
Enhanced by Satan, for to quell God's truth and blessed word.
But now I must begin such treason to unfold,
As former times for cruelty, and ages new and old
Have never seen the like in Christendom, till now
When sacred faith by flattery, and oath of princely vow
By treason, did contrive to shed the guiltless blood
Of them[6] which now by peace did seek to do their country good.
For when the Lord did send his truth into the land,
He raised up some noble men to take this cause in hand.
Among the which, as chief and sovereign of the field,
There was Prince Henry of Navarre,[7] with such as would not yield
Unto the Guisian race, the Prince of Condé[8] next,
The Admiral, and D'Andelot,[9] with others that were vexed
By bloody Guise's band, who daily did invent
How to oppress the word of truth, which Christ had thither sent.
But when as Satan saw by words and dealings plain,
That many princes were in arms this truth for to maintain,
It galled him to the heart, that where he did devise
To choke the word that even there the more it did arise.
He summons all his mates these matters to debate,
How they might choke this springing seed before it were too late
Where all within around they come without delay,
To whom this bloody captain then these words began to say:

---

1 Admiral of France Gaspard de Coligny (1517-72), Huguenot leader and counsellor to King Charles IX, was deprived of his offices in 1569 because of his reformist politics. He belonged to the Montmorency family, a faction loyal to the Crown but opposed to the Guises and split between loyalty to Roman Catholicism and Protestantism.

2 Margaret Marguerite de Valois (1553-1615), sister to Charles IX, betrothed to Henri of Navarre.

3 Queen of Navarre Jeanne D'Albret (1528-72), mother of Henri of Navarre and renowned leader of the Huguenot party.

4 the 24. of August St. Bartholomew's Day.

5 faggot a bundle of sticks, bound together for use as fuel, used to burn heretics alive.

6 them those on the side of the Huguenots.

7 Prince Henry of Navarre (1553-1610). Son of Antoine, the Bourbon king of Navarre, and Jeanne D'Albret, Henri became leader of Huguenots after the death of Admiral de Coligny.

8 Prince of Condé either Louis de Condé (1530-69), prince of the Bourbon line, staunch reformist and uncle of Henri of Navarre, or his son Henri (1551-88) who was also a Huguenot general.

9 D'Andelot François de Coligny (1521-69), brother of Admiral de Coligny and Odet, Cardinal Châtillon (1517-71).

"There is a subtle vein that feeds this cankered sore,
For now the deeper it is lanced it riseth still the more.
We see that fire and sword cannot at all prevail,
We see that all our bloody broils[1] their courage cannot quail.[2]
We see how noble men their forces daily bend
To counter cross our planted plots, this cause for to defend.
Two civil wars are past, the third is now in hand;
We see how stoutly they are bent our forces to withstand.
Therefore we must devise to play some other part,
Or else in vain we take in hand these princes to subvert.
Now lend your listening ears, and mark what I shall say.
A secret thing I have bethought which here I will bewray:[3]
You must make show, as though you loved to live at ease,
As weary of these broils, you must entreat to have a peace.
The King as chiefest man this play must first begin,
By loving letters, words, and cheer at first to bring them in.
And look what they mislike, the King must raze[4] it out,
And yield to all things they request, to put them out of doubt.
The King must show such face to them above the rest,
As though he did unfeignedly of all men love them best.
The worst of all their band the King must entertain
With such good will, that no mistrust in any may remain.
And he must make them know, as though of late he felt
Some prick in conscience for the cause against the which he dealt.
And that he will forgive all quarrels that are past,
In hope that this their new goodwill with love might ever last
And he must make complaint, as though he did of late
Mislike the dealings of the Guise, and such as they do hate.
And then the Guises must awhile from court retire,
For thus you shall entrap them all, and have your full desire.
The King must yield to all that they request or crave,
And he must grant for to confirm the thing that they would have.
The Mother Queen[5] in this must also play her part,
That no suspect of treason may remain within their heart.
And here you must give out as though you would employ
Their service in some foreign wars,[6] which doth your state annoy.
As if you would not trust the weight of such affairs
To any man, but them alone, whose faith and watchful cares
You have long tried, and so you may your plot prepare
By these and such like feigned things, to trap them in your snare.
If this prevail not, then I stand in fearful doubt,

[1] broils confused disturbance, quarrel.
[2] quail fail, give way, become faint or feeble.
[3] bewray expose.
[4] raze sweep away, efface, or destroy.
[5] The Mother Queen Catherine de Medici.
[6] some foreign wars France had been at war with Spain intermittently since the late 1550s. The most recent fighting had been in the Netherlands, where France was bound by treaty to support the Protestant William of Orange. Open war with Spain, which became a possibility in the early 1570s, was opposed by Henri, duke of Anjou, and Charles de Guise, cardinal of Lorraine, leaders of the Roman Catholic faction at Charles IX's court.

What practice next to put in ure[1] to have them rooted out.
Now therefore say your mind, if thus it be not best
To cut them off, that so again we all may live in rest."

The Council did agree, this was the only way,
And every man did give his word, this sentence to obey.
And that they would devise such things to put in ure,
As best might fit this cursed plot, and make the same most sure.
Which Satan hearing rose, and thanked them with his heart,
That they to him so willing were, and so they did depart.
Then presently the King in post a message sent Unto the Admiral, to whom he showed his good intent,
Which was, that he was loath more civil wars to have,
And that he greatly did desire his subjects for to save.
"I will," said he, "forget, yea pardon and release
All former griefs, so that you will now yield to have a peace.
Which might be now to me a cause of passing joy,
For that I mean in foreign wars your service to employ;
And first we do require that we may join our band
Against the man that causeth all these troubles in our land.
Our armies being joined, we may the stronger go
Against the Duke of Alva,[2] whom we know to be our foe.
Great matters move our mind against the King of Spain,
For he hath taken Florida,[3] and late our sister slain."

With lies of like device the godly to betray,
Requesting him most earnestly that he would come away
And that he should obtain what safety he would crave,
Yea, for his surety there, that he his faith and oath should have.
The message being done, the Admiral as wise,
Within himself did half suspect the plot of this device.
And though that many things did some suspicion bring,
Yet all things else he doubted more than falsehood in the King.
He thought the promise sure, and firmly did believe,
No treason could be meant, whereas the King his word did give.
The Admiral as one that was devoid of fear,
And willing for to hear of peace, unto the King gave ear.
So now the civil broils which many did intend,
By this device were pacified and brought unto an end.
It cannot be expressed what shows of friendly mind,
Both in the King and courtiers all the Admiral doth find.
His friends likewise, which had the Gospel long professed,
As Count Rochefoucauld[4] and eke[5] Theligny[6] with the rest,
Like grace and favour found, which made them so rejoice,
That to consent unto the King they all did give their voice.

---

[1] in ure in use or practice.

[2] Duke of Alva Fernando Alvarez de Toledo (1508-82), leader of Spanish forces in the Netherlands.

[3] Florida the Spanish had destroyed the Huguenot settlement at Fort Caroline in 1565.

[4] Count Rochefoucauld Antoine de la Rochefoucauld, nobleman killed by the Duke of Anjou's troops.

[5] eke also.

[6] Theligny Charles de Téligny was Coligny's son-in-law and gentleman of the bedchamber to Charles IX.

And if in former wars the Admiral had lost
Either castles, houses, towns or farms, whatever it should cost,
The King commanded straight for to restore them all,
And all things else which he of right of any man could call.
And those whom he perceived the Admiral to love,
He blinded them with great rewards, suspicion to remove.
Besides, he did command out of his purse to give
To him an hundred thousand pounds his losses to relieve.
And when as it did chance his brother for to die,
The Cardinal Chatillon,[1] the King then presently
The fruit and profits all of livings all one year
Unto the Admiral he gave his charges to forwear.[2]
Yet not content with this, one thing above the rest
The King most friendly did, the which the godly liked best.
He wrote to Philibert the Duke of Savoie[3] then,
That he should cease for to molest or grieve those godly men,
The which in former wars the Gospel did defend
And that to such he should leave off his rigour to extend.

[...]

But nothing did prevail to put them out of doubt
So much as one thing, which as now the King did go about.
Which was that he did wish his sister for to match
Unto Prince Henry of Navarre, by this in hope to catch
Them all within his snare. For this he did conclude,
Not for good will, but mere deceit the godly to delude.

[...]

The Admiral again was much confirmed besides
By other signs, not doubting now their falsehoods and their slides.
The godly did rejoice to see the King so bent,
Not thinking of the treachery and treason that they meant.
So, matters being past and parties all agreed,
In Paris town to have them joined by both it was decreed.
The Queen of Navarre now (a rare and virtuous dame)
With others to the Prince's court in full assurance came.
Where having stayed awhile, she took her leave to ride
To Paris, for this solemn feast the better to provide.
The King to like effect, by message did request
The Admiral that he would go to Paris there to rest.
And see that nothing want for that appointed day,
And that himself would after come, and make no long delay.
And that he might not fear the malice and the rage
That Paris men did bear to him, he said he would assuage
The same himself, and so he did presently did write
To Marcel,[4] provost of the town (perceiving well their spite),
That he should entertain and use in friendly wise
The Admiral and all his train, that nothing might arise

[1] Cardinal Chatillon Odet de Coligny, Cardinal of Châtillon.

[2] forwear wear out, exhaust.

[3] the Duke of Savoie Emanuel-Philibert (1528-80), whose duchy was allied with Spain and not under the control of the French Crown, was noted for his persecution of Huguenots in his domain.

[4] Marcel Claude Marcel, a goldsmith, and former Provost of Merchants (head of the city militia), who later marshalled the mob to attack the Huguenots.

Which might offend his mind or burst to any flame,
For if there did, he swore he would most fiercely plague the same.
The King and Queen also unto the like effect
Unto the Duke of Anjou[1] did their letters now direct.
So that the Admiral, not doubting any foe,
Resolved himself, and did provide to Paris for to go.
Where being come, he found the King and all the rest,
With friendly welcomes, so as more he could not well request.
But whilst that every man was busy to provide
Within the court, most suddenly the Queen of Navarre died,
Which afterward was known (as some have plainly said)
That by a pair of gloves[2] perfumed this treason was conveyed.
Which lewd and sinful deed was now no sooner done
But that the kingdom of Navarre descended to her son.
Here many did rejoice in hope of perfect rest,
Yet this unequal bloody match the Guises did detest.
That dismal day is come, the marriage must begin,
Where were assembled solemnly the chief of every kin.
And for because the Mass their minds might grieve no more,
The marriage was solemnized before the great church door[3]
Of Paris, with such words as both were well content.

[...]

Now from the wedding night, five days are come and past,
When as the King and Senate were contented at the last
In counsel for to sit such matters to decide,
As best might fit their feigned wars in Flanders[4] to provide.
Which ended, near about the middle of the day,
As every man unto his house did take his ready way,
The Admiral himself, with other nobles more
Along the streets (not doubting hurt) in pleasant talk do go,
A harquebus[5] was shot from other side the street,
Which charged was with bullets two the Admiral to greet.
Which cursed blow did wound and strike this noble man,
That through both his valiant arms the leaden pellets ran.
Which done, although the wound did touch him somewhat near,
Yet nothing daunted with the stroke, he said with wonted cheer,
"From yonder house it came, go look who is within,
What vile unworthy treachery is this they do begin?"
And therewithal he sent in haste unto the King,
Such as might show unto his Grace this bad and shameful thing.
The message being done (the King as then did play
At tennis with the Duke of Guise) he fiercely threw away
His racquet in a rage, as though it grieved his heart

[1] Duke of Anjou Henri (1551-89), brother to Charles IX, later King Henri III of France. He was one of the proposed suitors for Elizabeth I.

[2] by a pair of gloves While Jeanne D'Albret likely died of a lung infection, it was rumoured that she had been poisoned by an enemy by means of a pair of gloves.

[3] church door a civil, rather than religious, ceremony.

[4] feigned wars in Flanders In the summer of 1572, Admiral de Coligny proposed to Charles IX that France re-enter the conflict in the Low Countries to assist William of Orange against Philip II. Agreement to this by the King and Council appears to have been a means to draw Huguenot military leaders to Paris in order to eliminate them.

[5] harquebus early version of a large musket.

That thus the Admiral was hurt and straight he did depart
Unto his castle, where a while he did remain
Close with his brother of Navarre till he might hear again
More certain news, but now the matter was too plain,
That this assault was surely made by one of Guise's train.
Now whilst these grievous wounds the surgeons had in cure,
He[1] sent Theligny to the King (because he was not sure Wheth'r he should live or die) for to desire his Grace,
That he would now vouchsafe to come unto that simple place
Where he did lie, for that he had a secret thing
To tell him, which did much concern the safety of the King.
Which was no sooner said, the King was well content,
And with the man the message came without delay he went.
They went likewise that sought the Admiral to kill,
The Mother Queen with all her mates, no doubt for great good will.
Which all no sooner did within the door appear,
But that the King saluted him with sweet and friendly cheer:

"Alas my dearest friend, how camest thou to this place,
Where wounded now I see thee lie methinks in heavy case.
What errant villain wrought this lewd and sinful act,
Would God I knew the wicked wretch that did commit the fact,
For though (my Admiral) the hurt be done to thee,
Yet the dishonour of the fact, and shame redounds to me.
Both which I will revenge by death, of God I swear,
As like in France was never seen, to make such wretches fear."
Such speeches had the King, and questions many more
Concerning judges, health and grief, and how he felt his sore.[2]
To which the Admiral with mild and quiet mind
Such answer gave, as moved them much, such patience for to find
In him that had received such cause of deadly ire,
Who did request, but only that the King would straight inquire
Upon the fact: "which was, I surely know," said he,
"Procured by the Duke of Guise, for great good will to me.
Which deed the Lord revenge as he shall think it best,
For if I die, I hope by faith with Christ to be in rest."
The rest he did desire a while to stand away,
For that he had some secret thing unto the King to say.
Which done, he thus began: "O King this life to save,
Is not the thing (I thank the Lord) that I do greatly crave.
For this I know is true, we all must pay a death
To God, our maker, which hath lent this use of lively breath.
But to your Majesty the great good will I bear
Is it which now above the rest doth most increase my care:
To see you now beset with such as wish no good
Unto your health, your crown and life, and such as seek the blood
Of you and of your friends, to spill your noble race
That so they may in future time your princely stock deface.

[1] He the Admiral.

[2] how he felt his sore how the Admiral's wounds felt.

And so at length ingraft[1] a strange Italian weed,[2]
Which may in France most surely choke the Prince's royal seed.
This is the only mark to which they do aspire;
This is the only wood, O King, that doth maintain the fire
Of these your civil wars, (although they do pretend Religion, and some other thing); this is the chiefest end
Of all their drift. Therefore, O King, beware by time,
Mark this eclipse, whilst yet ye see the moon is in her prime.
I say the less, because I know your Grace is wise,
You shall in time most plainly see this plot of their device
Your wisdom doth perceive (I hope) whom I do mean,
For of the same with grief before I heard you oft complain.
For though that I do lie here wounded as you see,
The chiefest treason they intend is not alone to me.

[...]

God grant you see in time your friends from fleering[3] foe,
That still in safety you may reign devoid of grief and woe.
Now I can say no more, but God preserve your Grace,
And shield you from your feigned friends which bear a double face.
And this amidst your mirth I pray remember still,
That they that seek to have my life, do bear you no good will."
Which said, the King did give such speech as he thought best,
And then in loud and solemn words in hearing of the rest
He did with friendly cheer request the Admiral
Unto his court for to remove, whatever should befall.
And others spake likewise unto the same intent.
His simple meaning could not see the treason that was meant.
But yet upon advice, his friends did think it best,
Not knowing what may there betide, the King he should request,
That he would them assign some of his Grace's guard
Before his gates both night and day to keep their watch and ward.
The motion being made, the King was well content,
And said to this their good device[4] he gladly gave consent.
And that he would provide to have it surely known,
That of his life he made accompt[5] no less than of his own.
And that he would preserve with care more tenderly
The Admiral, than he would keep the apple of his eye.
For that he did admire the valour of his mind,
Who little thought in mortal man such courage for to find.
The Duke of Anjou then commanded out of hand
One Cossein,[6] captain of the guard, to ward with Prince's band
The gates and streets wherein the Admiral did lie,
Which was no sooner said, but was performed presently.
This Cossein that was set with watch to ward the gate,
Was one that did the Admiral in heart most deadly hate.
And farther, for to put the matter out of doubt,

[1] ingraft to implant.
[2] strange Italian weed Catherine de Medici.
[3] fleering mocking, jeering, sneering.
[4] device plan, scheme, trick.
[5] accompt account.
[6] Cossein Admiral de Coligny's traitorous guard, who killed Henri of Navarre's guard and attacked the house in which the men were staying.

They did consent that he should have his trusty friends about
The place where he did lie, which came of no good will,
But hoping rather all by this the easier for to kill.
And this among the rest a bloody practice was,
Which cloaked guile by Satan's art too soon was brought to pass.

But here the prologue ends, and here begins the play,
For bloody minds resolved quite to use no more delay.
The Mother Queen[1] appears now first upon the stage,
Where like a devilish sorceress with words demure and sage
The King she calls aside, with other trusty mates
Into a close and secret place, with whom she now debates
The great desire she had to quit them all from care
In planting long a bloody plot, which now she must declare.

"O happy light (quoth she) O thrice most happy day;
Which thus hath thrust into our hands our long desired prey,
We have them all in hold, we have the chiefest fast
And those for whom we waited long we have them all at last.
Why should we longer stay? What can we further crave?
What, are not all things come to pass which we do long to have?
Doth not our mightiest foe lie wounded in his bed,
Not able now to help himself, which others long hath led?
The Captains captive are, the King of Navarre sure;
The Prince of Condé, with the rest that mischief did procure,
Are close within our walls, we have them in a trap;
Good fortune (lo) hath brought them all, and laid them in our lap.
By force or flight to save their lives it is too late,
If we (to cut off future fear and cause of all debate)
Do take the proffered time, which time is only now,
And wisdom matched with policy our dealings doth allow.
We need not fear the spot of any cruel fame,
So long as we may feel some ease or profit by the same.
For wisdom doth allow the Prince to play the fox,
And lion-like to rage, but hates the plainness of an ox.
What though ye do forswear? What though ye break your faith?
What though ye promise life, and yet repay it with their death?
Is this so great a fault? Nay, nay, no fault at all,
For this we learn we ought to do, if such occasions fall.
Our masters do persuade a king to cog[2] and lie,
And never keep his faith, whereas his danger grows thereby.
Cut off therefore the head of this infectious sore,
So may you well assure yourselves this bile will rise no more.
The captains being slain, the soldiers will be faint,
So shall we quickly on the rest perform our whole intent.
Pluck up therefore your spirits, and play your manly parts,
Let neither fear nor faith prevail to daunt your warlike hearts.
What shame is this that I (a woman by my kind)
Need thus to speak, or pass you men in valour of the mind?

[1] Mother Queen Catherine de Medici.

[2] cog employ fraud or deceit, cheat.

For here I do protest, if I had been a man,
I had myself before this time this murder long began.
Why do you doubting stand, and wherefore do you stay?
If that you love your peace, or life, procure no more delay.
We have them in our hands, within our castle gates,
Within the walls of Paris town the masters and their mates.
This is the only time this matter to dispatch,
But being fled, these birds are not so easy for to catch.
The town of Paris will most gladly give consent,
And threescore thousand fighting men provide for this intent.
So shall we quickly see the end of all our strife,
And in a moment shall dispatch these rebels of their life.
But if we stand in fear, and let them scape[1] our hand,
They will procure in time to come great trouble in our land,
For if the Admiral his strength receive again,
Can any doubt but that he will be mindful of his pain?
It is a simple thing for princes to believe
That new goodwill an ancient hate from galled hearts can drive.
Therefore if we permit these rebels to retire,
We soon shall see by wars again our country set on fire.
This is a woman's mind, and thus I think it best.
Now let us likewise hear I pray the sentence[2] of the rest."

This counsel of them all was liked passing well
And in respect of present state, all others did excel.
Some, doubting, mused long which were the better way
The King of Navarre and the Prince of Condé for to slay;
Or else to save their lives in hope they would recant
Because the proof of perfect years they both as yet did want.
But here, they did prevail (as God, no doubt would have)
Who thought it best in this assault these princely youths to save.
Because they were in hope, that when those imps[3] should see
Their mates tormented thus, they would most willingly agree
To bow where they would bind, to go where they would call,
And to forswear their former faith would make no doubt at all.
But all the rest remain condemned for to die
Which cruel verdict must be put in practice presently
The night that should ensue then next without delay,
Beginning ere the same were spent long time before the day.
The Duke of Guise was thought the fittest of the train
To take in hand this bloody plot to have the godly slain.
Concluding thus, they go each one unto his place,
The godly doubting nothing less than this so heavy case.

Here is the first part played and here I do lament,
My slender skill wants fitted phrase the sequel to depaint.
The Duke in office put begins for to prepare,
So that in troops the armed men ran bustling here and there
With noise and threatening words, as though some tumult were

[1] scape escape.
[2] sentence opinion.
[3] imps boys, young men.

Preparing now in every street, which made the wisest fear
What would ensue. At length the Admiral did hear
This tumult, and not knowing how the truth for to inquire,
He sent unto the King to know the full intent,
Why in the night in riotwise these armed people went Thus raging in the streets and wheth'r it were his will?
If so, he would not fear, but rest in hope of safety still.

The King returned word, and willed him not to fear,
For this was done by his advice, yet not in everywhere,
But in some certain ways these armed men were set,
The foolish rage of lewd attempts by this in hope to let.

O lewd and filthy lie! unseemly for a king.
What Turk or devil could devise a more unworthy thing?
For when the Duke of Guise had all in order set,
And nothing rested which might seem their purpose for to let,
He Marcel calls in haste, and wills him have a care
That all the masters of the streets ere midnight did repair[1]
Unto the Council hall, where they should hear at large
Great matters from the King himself of strange and special charge.
The message being done, they all without delay
Assembled were, to know the thing the Guises had to say.
Where Provost Carron[2] rose with stomach stout and bold,
And guarded with a Guisian troop, this bloody message told:

"My friends (quoth he) give ear, and mark what I shall say,
The King's intent is presently this night, without delay,
Those rebels to destroy, which now these latter years
Bore arms against his Grace, which though they be his peers,
Yet will he quite pull up, and root the lawless race
Of them, that long have sought by force his dealings to disgrace.
And what a happy time (I pray) my mates, is this,
When fast within our city walls the captain closed is
That fiercely brued[3] the broil of this our doubtful strife,
And many times hath put us all in danger of our life?

[...]

And when we have dispatched the rebels we have here,
We'll likewise ransack all the land of like that shall appear.
This is the King's intent, this is his Grace's mind,
To do this feat, let him in us a willing courage find.
And for a token when this murder shall begin,
The warlike trumpet shall not sound, nor banner shall be seen,
But tocsin[4] shall be heard this bloody news to bring,
For then begin, when as you hear this palace bell to ring.
The badge which you shall bear by which you shall be known,
Shall be a linen cloth of white, made fast about the brawn[5]
Of left side arm, and eke a cross upon your cap,
Of white likewise; and these keep fast whatever chance may hap.

---

1 repair go.

2 Carron Le Charron, Provost of Merchants.

3 brued imbrued, stained, dyed with blood or slaughter.

4 tocsin alarm bell.

5 brawn muscle.

And this is all (my friends) that I have now to say,
Come follow me, and let's begin and use no more delay."

This while the Duke of Guise did show his whole intent
Unto the captains of the guard, and bade them give consent
With courage to perform so great and famous act,
Which service as the case did stand, they might not long protract.
Now shortly after this, the Duke with many more (Accompanied with the Chevalier and armed men great store)[1]
Came posting to the gate which Cossein took to keep,
Woe worth the time when they did trust the wolf to guard the sheep!
The Admiral knew well the tumult of this rout,
Yet this, nor any thing could make his valiant heart to doubt.
For though he had but few, scarce ten, within the place,
Yet nothing could at all prevail to make him doubt his case.

For oft he would repeat the King's assured love,
Approved by so many signs as you have heard above.
"What though the commons rise? what though the tumult rage?
When they shall see the Prince's guard, their malice will assuage.
I know the King will not by treason false his faith,
Though for the same there might ensue the hazard of his death.
The oath that he hath sworn so oft to keep the peace,
No Christian conscience can assent at all for to release.
His mother gave her faith, his brothers swore likewise,
The public records of the land do witness this device.
What band may surer be? What more may you desire?
What can we farther wish? And yet if more you do require
The Queen of England is a witness of the same,
The Prince of Orange,[2] and the states that from the Germans came."

[...]

Thus, whilst among the rest the case he did debate,
His trusty keeper Cossein came and knocked at his gate.
Who was no sooner come within the outward door,
But that there came in after him of armed men great store.
Then after went the lords, the nobles, and the rest,
For to dispatch this noble man, whom they did most detest.
And those whom Cossein found within to lie or stand,
He slew them with a partisan[3] which he had in his hand.
Which woeful news when as the Admiral perceived,

"Woe worth the time (quoth he) that I by trust have been deceived.
Well, now the time is come, I may no longer doubt.
Come lend your help, my friends (I pray) from bed to lift me out.
To Christ my only hope my soul I do betake,
And in this place from off my couch this life I will forsake."
Then standing on his feet his nightgown on his back:

[1] great store large number.

[2] Prince of Orange William of Orange (1533-84), leader of Protestant forces in the Low Countries.

[3] partisan a long-handled spear with one or more lateral cutting projections.

"Shift for yourselves my friends (quoth he) that you go not to wrack.[1]
And have no care for me, for I am well content
This life to yield unto the Lord, which he to me hath lent.
It grieves me not to die, God's will is alway best.
From future fears I know with Christ my soul shall be in rest.
This plot is not prepared alone to murder me,
But for the razing of that truth, which they are loath to see.
The godly for to spoil which have received the Word,
These tyrants seek with cruel hate by falsehood and by sword.
Which Word unto my power I always did defend,
The malice of which godly course hath brought me to my end.
Which doth rejoice my heart and soul exceedingly,
That for his truth the Lord hath thought me worthy for to die.
For though our sins do cause these troubles in our land,
Yet shall these tyrants not escape the Lord's revenging hand.
And though our God do seem from us to hide his face,
And arms our foes with cruel death his people to disgrace,
Yet if we be content, his mercy will retire.

[...]

And whereas I despair no more to see the day,
Instead of that, thy loving face show me (my God) I pray.
Lo then, a blessed chance, and happy change for me,
That from this vale of wretched life with Christ in joy shall be.
Now let these traitors come. The fear of death is past
And fainting flesh that did rebel hath yielded at the last.
Now doth my soul rejoice, my heart most gladly say
Thou Son of God, my Saviour come, my Christ now come thy way!
For here again to thee my soul I do commend,
And to thy poor afflicted Church, O Lord, thy mercy send.
So shall they be at rest, so shall they praise thy name,
Let not these tyrants longer Lord thy servants put to shame.
Lest they do proudly brag and say within their heart
Where is the God whom they do serve, that now should take their part.[2]
Come quickly Lord therefore, and make no more delay
To end these fierce and bloody broils. Amen, Amen, I say."

By this came up the stair ere ended were his words,
One Benvise[3] and two other mates with targets[4] and with swords.
The chamber broken up, this Benvise swearing came,
With sword drawn to the Admiral, and asking for his name:
"Art thou the Admiral?" The man, not much appalled,
With quiet mind gave answer thus: "Indeed so am I called."[5]
Then seeing Benvise bend his naked sword to slay,
"My friend (quoth he) that bloody blade I pray thee for to stay,
And have respect unto my age, and weak estate
To which by treason wrought by trust I have been drawn of late."

[1] wrack disaster, ruin.

[2] Psalm 79:10.

[3] <*> Benvise a German [Dowriche's note].

[4] targets light round shields.

[5] Indeed so am I called allusion to Christ's response to the high priest's demand that he state whether he was the Son of God just prior to the crucifixion (Matthew 26:63-64; Mark 22:70).

But beastly Benvise would to this no answer give,
But swearing, to this noble man his pointed sword let drive,
And thrust him to the heart, but yet not fully dead,
With force he laid a mighty blow and strake[1] him on the head.
With that came Attin[2] in with pistol in his hand,
And shot him in the wounded breast, yet did he stoutly stand
Till Benvise came again with third repeated wound
And slashed him on the thigh, which done, he fell unto the ground
Where he gave up the ghost. The bloody Guise that stayed
This while within the lower court, with lifted voice now said
"Ho Benvise, hast thou done?" Who straightway did reply,
"Yea sir this happy deed is done, and that most perfectly."
Then said the Duke of Guise, "Come throw him down to me,
That whether it be the same, or not, we here may quickly see.
For now our Chevalier will think it but a lie,
Except at window thrown out he see him with his eye."
Then Benvise with his mates to put them out of doubt,
Took up this bloody corpse and so from window cast him out.
Where from his wounded head sprang out so fresh a flood,
That vizard-like his face was all imbrued with gory blood.
Whereby they could not well at first discern his face
Till that the Duke of Guise himself first kneeling in the place
Had with his napkin wiped the clotted blood away,
And searching viewed every part. He rose without delay,
And crying to his crew, devoid of fear and shame:
"It's he (my friends) I know him well, trust me it is the same."
The Duke descending then from out the stately gates,
With bloody heart and cursed mouth he cried unto his mates:

"O happy luck that we so good beginnings have,
Lo Fortune frames her willing hand to give that we do crave.
And sith[3] it pleased the Fates at first such hap[4] to send,
It gives me cause of future hope to see some happy end.
Come on my valiant hearts, so place your warlike bands,
That marching forward to the rest, not one may scape[5] our hands.
This is the King's decree, this hath he given out.
We do no more than he commands, to put you out of doubt.
Let pity take no place till rebels all be rid,
Thus saith the King, fear not therefore to do what he doth bid."

[...]

Which said, he bade in haste the tocsin for to ring,
Which sounding bell appointed was the fatal news to bring
When as this raging rout this murder should begin,
Which they performed, as though they had no men, but monsters been.
And therewithal devise alarum for to raise,
Pretending with some solemn lie the people for to please.

---

1 strake struck.

2 <*> Attin a Picard [Dowriche's note].

3 sith since.

4 hap event, happenstance.

5 scape escape.

So now the trumpets sound this lie and shameful thing,
That certain traitors were in arms about to kill the King.
Here, one among the rest from Rome that lately came,
(Desirous by some valiant act perhaps to get a name)
Cut off the bleeding head (imbrued with reeking blood)
Of that most worthy Admiral in hope to do some good
And sent it straight to Rome as Lorraine had required,
A present welcome to the Pope, which he had long desired.
His hands cut off by some, by some his secret parts,
Declares what hate to shining light lies hid in blinded hearts.
His hacked and mangled corpse by space of certain days
Was dragged by rascals all along the streets and filthy ways.
At length this rustic rage, as fury thought it meet,
At common gallows of the town did hang him by the feet.
Thus came this noble man to this unworthy death,
Thus do the Papists learn to break the vow of plighted faith.

The Admiral being slain, they likewise murdered most cruelly not only all such friends, physicians, preachers, and all others that were found hidden in the Admiral's lodging, but also as many as were suspected to be of that religion within the town or anywhere else were lamentably put to the sword, as here following we may plainly see.

These furies frying[1] thus, yet thus were not content:
But in the house, from place to place, like greedy hounds they went.
To search the chambers all and corners of receipt,[2]
That from the wolf the sheep might save his throat by no deceit.
And such as sleeping were found naked in their bed,
Or gone to hide or save themselves they first cut off their head,
And after fiercely pierced with wounds both great and deep,
Which being done, like cruel curs they throw them on a heap.
Among which woeful troop two noble youths there were
And pages of most worthy birth which likewise died there.
With these, among the rest a man of noble fame,
The Count Rochefoucauld, was forced at length to taste the same.
Whom for his pleasant wit the King did seem to love,
Yet in this fury nothing might the King to mercy move.
But now in haste must be to death untimely sent,
To yield again unto the Lord the life that he had lent.
So him at first De Nance[3] commanded was to kill,
But he most stoutly did refuse this guiltless blood to spill.

"Shall I," said he, "consent to do this fearful thing,
To shed this blood, because I am commanded by the King?
No, God forbid, I know I have a soul to save,
So bloody spot, to save my life my name shall never have.
I know there is a day, a day that saints desire,
When of our deeds the King above a reckoning will require.

[1] frying burning with strong passion or emotion.

[2] corners of receipt places of refuge.

[3] De Nance De Nancé, captain of the royal guard who saved several Huguenot nobles by refusing to allow soldiers to enter the room in which they had taken refuge.

Obey the King; that's true, in things that honest be.
When I obey in wicked hests,[1] woe worth the time to me.
For Joab did not well King David[2] to obey,
When wickedly the King him bade Uriah for to slay.
Those Elders did offend which showed themselves too prone,
Those wicked letters to obey poor Naboth[3] for to stone.
And cursed Doeg[4] which obeyed a wicked will,
Shall cursed stand for that he did the Lord's anointed kill.
A murder to be done the King doth now request.
My God commands the contrary. Now which to choose were best?
The King doth threaten death, and God doth threaten Hell,
If for the King I should forsake my God, should I do well?

[...]

In matters that be good if that you list[5] to use
My service, you shall see that I no peril will refuse.
Therefore I pray your Grace this answer for to take,
Which unto Saul his soldiers[6] once were not afraid to make:
De Nance to kill his friend no wight[7] shall ever see,
Though for refusal he were sure beheaded for to be.
Take heed (O noble King) what sprite[8] you follow now.
Let no man force you do the thing that God doth disallow.
While good King David was by whoredom brought asleep,
He did the thing, which being waked did force his heart to weep.
While Saul in malice was against good David[9] bent,
He ran to that which afterward with tears he did lament.
And whilst that Jezebel[10] great mischief did intend
Against poor Naboth, she at last came to a fearful end.
Look well therefore (O King) before you leap too far,
Lest in the end this testy scab do breed a lasting scar.
Well I can say no more, but God preserve your Grace,
And grant your soul when breath is gone with him a resting place."

---

[1] hests bidding, command.

[2] Joab ... King David Joab was David's nephew and second in command. When David fell in love with Bathsheba, the wife of Uriah, David asked Joab to place Uriah in the front lines of a battle with the Ammonites in order to kill him. Joab placed him with strong fighters instead, but Uriah was ultimately killed (2 Samuel 11:14-17).

[3] Naboth Jezebel, wife of King Ahab, persecuted the prophets of Yahweh and when Ahab wanted Naboth's vineyard, brought a false charge against Naboth so that he was stoned to death. She then presented the vineyard to Ahab in triumph (1 Kings 21:1-23).

[4] Doeg When David fled the insane wrath of King Saul, he was harboured by a high priest of Yahweh. Doeg reported this news to Saul, who then ordered the execution of all of the priests. When the guard refused the task, Saul transferred it to Doeg, who performed it eagerly and slaughtered anywhere from 85 to 305 priests (1 Samuel 21-22).

[5] list wish, desire.

[6] Saul his soldiers They refused to kill the priests who harboured the fugitive David (1 Samuel 22:17).

[7] wight person.

[8] sprite spirit.

[9] Saul ... David Saul, first king of Israel, was a man of courage and strength who depended on his own judgement, rather than on the power and wisdom of Yahweh. Late in his life, after ignoring and disobeying God, Saul became insanely jealous of rivals for his position. Because David had been anointed by the prophet Samuel as Saul's successor, he sought to kill him but was himself finally killed, along with his sons, in a battle with the Philistines (1 Samuel 10-31).

[10] Jezebel after her crime against Naboth, Samuel prophesied that she would be eaten by dogs. When Jehu came to the throne, she was tossed to her death from the palace tower, run over by Jehu's chariot and eaten by dogs before she could be buried (2 Kings 9:30-37).

But this could not prevail this noble man to save,
For bloody Doeg did attend his office for to have.
For which, an Avernois, a man of cused[1] fame
Made offer there, before the King that he would do the same.
The King was well content this office for to give
To him, so that this noble man of life he would bereave.
We see how Satan doth by glory mixed with gain,
Work to procure this worthy wight the sooner to be slain.
There fell in this assault (for malice to the truth)
Theligny famous for his wit, a rare and passing youth,
Who for his manly heart and courage did excel,
For which, the King in outward show did seem to love him well.
Now when the time was come that martyred he should be
With courage bold, he smiling said, "O welcome death to me.
It grieves me for to live since faith from princely seat
Abandoned is, and in her place reigns falsehood and deceit.
It grieves me for to see this sad and irksome day,
Wherein so great and famous King, a traitor's part should play.
It grieves me for to hear poor souls deceived cry
Too late, for that they did too much on prince's oath rely.
Woe worth my harmless heart too soon that did believe,
And to the King's dissembling words too soon did credit give.
Woe worth the wicked time when first I did begin
To work the means, for to persuade my father to come in.
Woe worth my lying tongue which first assayed[2] to bring
My fearful father in the mind, that he should trust the King.

How oft did I commend the King's assured love?
How did I think that nothing might us from the same remove?
How oft did I recount the King's repeated oath?
How many friendly signs were seen of force to bind us both?
How often did I urge there was no cause of fear,
Because for this we saw the King most willing for to swear?
But sith it is too late this error to lament,
My trusting hath deserved death and therefore am content.
Sith I am not the first whom trust hath thus betrayed,
To suffer death for no offence I am the less dismayed.
And since my greatest hope hath wrought me most despite,[3]
What shall I say? I say no more, but Lord receive my sprite."

Thus came this noble imp untimely to his grave,
For that he to a papist's oath too great affiance[4] gave
And thus fell many more of nobles here and there,
Whose names and valiant acts were now too long for to declare.
Thus did those lawless bands[5] go raging up and down
From house to house, they sought to spoil the wealthiest of the town.
So they that beggars were when first this stir began,
At last with rich and flowing wealth the chiefest credit won.
This while the Duke of Guise these words repeated still,

[1] cused accused.
[2] assayed tried, attempted.
[3] despite indignation, anger.
[4] affiance faith, trust.
[5] lawless bands As the massacre gathered momentum, violence against Huguenots became an excuse for acts of revenge and stealing of property so that it became, to some degree, a class war as well as a religious one.

With crying voice, "Kill, kill the knaves, this is the Prince's will."
And lest the soldiers should wax faint with bloody toil,
"Now rid them all my friends (quoth he) and you shall have the spoil."
Thus did they all a day from morning unto night
With bloody swords run up and down, no doubt a heavy sight.
They spared none they knew, no sex could pity find,
The rueful cry of tender babes could not assuage their mind.
In great triumphing joy of this their warlike feat,
The bodies slain from windows high they throw into the street.
So that there was no way, no lane or passage by;
Where murdered men you might not see in heaps together lie.

Now whilst within the town these things a-doing were,
The King of Navarre and the Prince of Condé did appear
Before the King. For so before it was agreed
To save these youths to farther hope the Council had decreed.
For they their lodging had within the castle wall,
Which for defence is always thought the surest place of all.
These princes being gone, and only had away,
The rest were left unto the sword to die without delay.
Their servants and their friends, their tutors with the rest
Could not prevail to save their lives by suit ne yet request,
But thrust without the doors, and kneeling in the place,
The guard of Switzers[1] slew them all before the Prince's face.
And still between the strokes they cried all amain[2]
Upon the King's fidelity, but faith was called in vain.
Yet none amongst them all so much lamented was
As Monsieur de Pilles,[3] that he should come unto so hard a pass.
Because among the rest he passed them all so far
For godly zeal in truth, and eke[4] for prowess in the war.
Who lying in his bed somewhat before the day,
And hearing noise of armed men leapt out to see the fray,
And marking well the voice in place and time of truce,
Of cries and killings everywhere, it made him
much to muse.
Which dump[5] De Nance did break, who did this message bring,
That straight to void the place he was commanded by the King
And that he should depart (his weapons left behind)
From out the court and castle gate full sore[6] against his mind.
Which was no sooner said but Pilles was forced out
Among the blood weapons of that rude unruly rout.[7]
To hope for longer life he saw it was but vain.
He saw such cruel rage, and eke the bodies that were slain,
Where lifting up his voice, so that the King
might hear,
These words he spake before them all, devoid of fainting fear:

"O false unworthy King, O whelp of savage kind!
O traitorous heart in kingly breast! O base polluted mind!
Is this a princely part, by treason to procure

[1] guard of Switzers Swiss mercenaries were used as palace guards, as well as soldiers for both sides of the conflict.
[2] amain vehemently, violently.
[3] Monsieur de Pilles a Huguenot captain.
[4] eke also.
[5] dump fit of abstraction or musing, a reverie.
[6] full sore most painfully or severely.
[7] rout company or band of people.

The murder of thy chiefest friends? Is this thy popish lure,
To train us in[1] by trust, to thrust us thus to death?
Is this thy solemn kingly oath? is this a prince's faith?
Is this thy friendly cheer? Is this thy fawning face?
Is this the fruit of Romish faith? O false dissembling race!
And dost thou honour so thy sister's spousal day?
And couldst thou find no other time thy treasons to bewray?[2]
Is this the trust that is in mother, son, and kin?
Let France then curse the man that did first bring this kindred in.

[...]

How darest thou to behold the creatures of the Lord,
When for thy false and bloody fact this place shall be abhorred?
What answer canst thou make to this unhappy town,
Which for thy traitorous act shall lose his glory and renown?
What answer canst thou give to many a weeping child?
To many matrons husbandless what reason canst thou yield?
And deemst thou not that God will plague this sinful land
For this our blood? and fearest thou not God's just revenging hand?
Yes, though at this our grief thou proudly now do jest,
Yet God will not forget the blood of them that be oppressed.
Did Joab die in peace that had by treason slain
Two noble men? Did not his blood requite the same again?
Did Absalom[3] likewise that wrought his brother's death
By treason, under friendly show, and falsing plighted[4] faith,
Thus prosper long? No, no, for God did quickly send
To this rebellious wicked wretch a swift and fearful end.
Be sure therefore of this, and mark what Pilles hath said,
That this our blood by shedding of thy blood shall be repaid."
Which said, from off his back he put a costly cloak,
And to a friend among the press,[5] the same thus saying took:
"Take this, and let the same a token still remain,
That Pilles thy friend by treason was here most unjustly slain."
With that he did commend his soul unto the Lord,
Upon his knees with lifted eyes still waiting for the sword.
Then one of Prince's guard, to end this bitter strife,
Thrust through Pilles with partisan, who yielded there his life.
This was the cruel end of that most famous man.
To read the same without remorse, I think no creature can.

This rout in Paris streets which posted up and down,
Four hundred houses sacked have within that wicked town.
The King therewith directs his letters out in post,
To cities all his message flies in haste to every coast,
That they (as Paris had) with murder should oppress
As many in their towns, as did the Gospel there profess.
Which lewd and bloody charge, a wonder is to see,
How glad and willing to obey most town and cities be.

[1] train us in allure, entice, deceive, take in.

[2] bewray betray.

[3] Absalom King David's third son, who had Amnon, the eldest, killed in an effort to gain the throne (2 Samuel 13:1-38).

[4] plighted pledged.

[5] press crowd.

But one among the rest, a place of ancient fame,
Did lion-like behave herself, as Lyons[1] was her name.
For though in other towns by murder many fell,
Yet Lyons for her cruel heart, all others did excel.
Where then, unhappy then, a lion as the chief,
One Mandelot was governor, a black and bloody thief,
Who having once received these letters from the King,
With greedy mind, he sets abroach[2] this vile unworthy thing.

[Under the pretext of protecting them from the mob, François de Mandelot, governor of Lyons, imprisons the Huguenots.]

Then Mandelot commands the hangman for to call,
Whom he enjoins to enter in with axe to kill them all.
But this so fearful fact the hangman did refuse,
And bad him for so wicked act some fitter man to choose.
"For I will not defile my hands with guiltless blood,
Nor give consent (said he) to do the thing that is not good.
On such as are condemned by justice and by law,
I only am in public place my deadly blade to draw."

The man repelled thus invents another way;
He wills the soldiers of the town these prisoners for to slay,
But they likewise replied that they would not distain
The glory of their martial feats with fame that they had slain
Poor simple naked men bound prostrate at their feet,
"It is a service, sir," say they, "for soldiers far unmeet,
And therefore if you have this murder thus decreed,
Choose out some other men that list perform so hard a deed."

[...]

Again refused thus, the man with fury bent,
For all the butchers of the town, he straight his message sent,
To whom in savage sort his mind he did unfold
And had them go and kill them all whom he had laid in hold.
These beastly butchers then no conscience made at all,
But with their bloody butchering knives like tigers they do fall
Upon these silly[3] souls, in murder fiercely bent,
Not like to men, but rather as some furies had been sent
From Hell to stop the course of God's afflicted word,
So quickly did these hellhounds put these people to the sword.
Here some that prostrate were, and did for mercy cry,
And other some unto the Lord that lift their voices high,
They killed not, but did their hands cut off at first,
And after chopped in savage sort with blood to quench their thirst.
Such shrieks and wailing cries from prisons did rebound,
That every corner of the town might hear their woeful sound.

[...]

Of these captived souls such was the piteous plight,
That very papists did lament to see this cruel sight.

[1] Lyons one of the centres with a strong Huguenot minority to which Charles IX sent extermination orders.

[2] sets abroach pierces and leaves running.

[3] silly deserving of pity, compassion, or sympathy.

And some that loved the Pope, these dealings did detest,
Who for their credit did not think this rigour to be best.
And many women of the town devoid of crime,
With horror of this sudden fear, had child before their time.
For from the common gaol[1] in sight of shining sun,
The smoking blood from street to street with grief was seen to run.
But one amongst the rest, an old and aged man
Called Francis Collute,[2] for his faith a lasting credit won.
To whom with bloody axe when butchers did resort,
Upon his sons with tears he fell, and did them thus exhort,

"You know (quoth he) my sons, what pain and tender care
Your loving father from your youth hath had for to prepare
Your hearts to know the Lord, his truth to entertain,
Which far surmounteth fading wealth, and hope of worldly gain.
Now is our harvest in, now must our fruit appear,
Now will the Lord require accompt how we have lived here.
The final axe is laid to root of falling tree
And how we have the truth embraced, the world forthwith must see.
Be strong therefore my sons, refuse not proffered death,
Which from the Lord is sent to be a trial of our faith.
But how should we be strong, when flesh doth daily fall?
O Lord increase our faith, that we may come when thou dost call.
And from the Lord I know this butchering axe is sent,
Who Satan's sword hath loosed now no doubt for some intent.
This is no new device which Satan puts in ure,[3]
For they that will embrace the truth of this shall still be sure.
For unto Truth belongs both fire, sword, and rack,
And naked Truth hath always tied a whip unto her back.
The ages that are past do yet declare the same,
Whose constant death for Christ, depaints the glory of their name.

[...]

Come, let us gladly give our throat unto the knife
And for our Christ let us rejoice to leave this wretched life.
And say you all with me, 'O Lord from these our bands,
Receive (we pray) our sinful souls into thy blessed hands.
And lend us Lord thy grace and mercy to the end,
Thy blessed help to come to thee, O Lord of mercy send.'"

And this repeating oft, the butchers with their blade,
Their bodies then with deadly wounds a bloody present made.
Then joining on the ground they clasped all in one,
Where grovelling lay in folded arms the father with the son
Which sudden heavy chance such woeful sight did give,
That just remorse of causeless death a flinty heart would grieve.
Thus hath this blessed man received a happy place.
The Lord grant us that be behind like portion of his grace.
Amen.

—1589

[1] gaol jail.
[2] Francis Collute a merchant in Lyons.
[3] in ure in use or practice.

Richard Hakluyt
?1552-1616

As the dedication to Principal Navigations (1589) indicates, Richard Hakluyt was interested in far distant lands from an early age. Born the second of five children, he was only five years old when he lost his father, and was subsequently placed under the guardianship of his cousin, also named Richard Hakluyt. The elder Richard, although trained and active as a lawyer, was fascinated by the new geography and voyages of discovery, cultivating a large acquaintance of merchants, sea captains, cartographers, and explorers, all of whom were engaged in the new economic and national possibilities of exploration. A scholar, compiler of travellers' accounts and an editor, the elder Richard set an example for the younger. Having taken his BA in 1574 and his MA in 1577 from Christ Church College, Oxford, Hakluyt began focusing entirely on his geographic studies, although he was ordained to the priesthood in 1580. His geographic knowledge was extensive and seems to have been drawn upon by the government, since in 1580 he wrote a memo for Frances Walsingham, Elizabeth I's secretary of state, concerning the Strait of Magellan. Hakluyt supported Sir Humphrey Gilbert's voyage to the New World, but was unable to persuade Walsingham to help finance a further expedition after its dramatic failure.[1]

Hakluyt's sojourn in Paris (1583-88) fired his imagination concerning the New World and his determination that the English should overcome their Continental reputation for sloth in exploration. In a letter to Walsingham he encouraged a revolution in English attitudes towards exploration, urging the establishment of formal education in mathematics and navigation at Oxford, since these topics were crucial to "the service of wars ... and for our new discoveries and longer voyages by sea."[2] His memorandum to the queen concerning the economic possibilities of colonies in Virginia, A Discourse of Western Planting (published, 1877) won him ecclesiastical preferment. In 1590 he also became rector of Wetheringsett, Suffolk, and in response to his dedication of Principal Navigations to Cecil and Howard, he gained further advancement in the church.[3] Married twice, he had one child, Edmond.[4]

Hakluyt's most famous works, Divers Voyages Touching the Discovery of America (1582) and The Principal Navigations, Voyages, Traffiques and Discoveries of the English Nation (1589; revised and expanded into three volumes, 1599-1600), are compilations of narratives of discovery, often eyewitness accounts, sometimes accounts which Hakluyt commissioned and sometimes accounts which others spontaneously provided him. Taking inspiration from Giovanni Battista Ramusio's Delle navigationi et viaggi (1550-56), Principal Navigations is organized chronologically by region. As Fuller has pointed out, all the texts in Principal Navigations work together to educate Englishmen about the New World, and to ground their right to dominate this world by linking contemporary English voyages of discovery to earlier ones; these earlier voyages, stretching back as far as the legendary Brute, the traditional founder of Britain, authorize and legitimize English imperial ambitions. For all its over-arching intentions, however, Principal Navigations contains a wildly diverse group of narratives: some are sensational accounts of captivity and escape; others are travel diaries, recording monuments visited and sights seen; others are accounts of exploration; while still others bear the marks of early ethnographic and anthropological interests.

EDITION: The principal navigations, voyages, traffiques and discoveries of the English nation made by sea or over-land, to the remote and farthest distant quarters of the earth, at any time within the compasse of these 1600. yeres: devided into three severall volumes, according to the positions of the regions, whereunto they were directed. London: George Bishop, Ralph Newbery, and Robert Barker, Anno 1599 [-1600]. STC 12626a.

[1] M.C. Fuller, "Richard Hakluyt," DLB 136, pp. 178-79.
[2] Quoted in Fuller, "Richard Hakluyt," p. 181.
[3] Ibid., p. 183.
[4] Ibid., p. 182.

from The Second Volume of the Principal Navigations, Voyages, Traffiques and Discoveries of the English Nation, made by Sea or over-land, to the South and South-east parts of the World, at any time within the compass of these 1600 years: Divided into two several parts:

Whereof the first containeth the personal travels, etc., of the English through and within the strait of Gibraltar, to Alger, Tunis and Tripolis in Barbary,[1] to Alexandria and Cairo in Egypt, to the isles of Sicilia, Zante,[2] Candia, Rhodus,[3] Cyprus, and Chio,[4] to the city of Constantinople, to divers parts of Asia Minor, to Syria and Armenia, to Jerusalem and other places in Judea; as also to Arabia, down the river of Euphrates, to Babylon and Balsara,[5] and so through the Persian Gulf to Ormuz, Chaul, Goa,[6] and to many islands adjoining upon the south parts of Asia; and likewise from Goa to Cambaia,[7] and to all the dominions of Zelabdim Echebar, the great Mogor,[8] to the mighty river of Ganges, to Bengala, Aracan, Bacola, and Chonderi,[9] to Pegu,[10] to Iamahai in the kingdom of Siam,[11] and almost to the very frontiers of China.

The second comprehendeth the voyages, traffics, etc., of the English nation, made without the strait of Gibraltar, to the islands of the Açores,[12] of Porto Santo, Madera,[13] and the Canaries, to the kingdoms of Barbary, to the isles of Capo Verde,[14] to the rivers of Senega,[15] Gambra, Madrabumba, and Sierra Leona,[16] to the coast of Guinea and Benin, to the isles of San Thomé and Santa Helena,[17] to the parts about the Cape of Buona Esperanza,[18] to Quitangone[19] near Mozambique, to the isles of Comoro and Zanzibar,[20] to the city of Goa, beyond Cape Comori,[21] to the isles of Nicubar, Gomes Polo, and Pulo Pinaom,[22] to the main land of Malacca,[23] and to the kingdom of Iunsalaon.[24]

---

[1] Barbary North Africa, along the Mediterranean (Topographical Dict., pp. 45-46).

[2] Zante Greek island, off the NW coast of the Peloponnesus (Topographical Dict., p. 577).

[3] Candia Candy, the isle of Crete; Rhodus Rhodes, an island off the SW corner of Asia Minor (Topographical Dict., p. 96; p. 431).

[4] Chio the isle of Chios, just off the W coast of Turkey.

[5] Babylon ancient city on the Euphrates River, in present-day Iraq; Balsara chief port at the head of the Persian Gulf, on the Euphrates, previously an important trading centre (present-day Basra, Iraq) (Topographical Dict., p. 43).

[6] Ormuz Hormuz, ancient city on the N shore of the Straits of Ormuz (at entrance to the Persian Gulf), in present-day Iran (Topographical Dict., pp. 379-80); Chaul Portuguese settlement (established 1521), about 350 kilometres N of Goa, at the mouth of the Kundalika River; Goa now a territory on the W coast of India.

[7] Cambaia Cambay, a territory on the NW coast of India, on the bay of Cambay, N of Goa.

[8] Zelabdim Echebar, the great Mogor Akbar ("Yeladin el Kubar"); although called simply the king of Cambay by the English, Akbar was the Great Mogul of a huge territory in northern India, with Cambay being only one of his many possessions. See M.F. Strachan, "India," The Hakluyt Handbook, 2 vols., ed., D.B. Quinn (London, 1974), vol.1., pp. 208-09.

[9] Bengala Bengal; Aracan Arakan, a territory on the coast of Burma; Bacola unidentified; Chonderi unidentified.

[10] Pegu a city in Burma (Myanmar), near Rangoon.

[11] kingdom of Siam present-day Thailand.

[12] Açores the Azores.

[13] Madera Madeira, an island in the Atlantic, off the coast of Morocco.

[14] the isles of Capo Verde the Cape de Verd Islands, in the North Atlantic, 320 miles W of Cape Verde in Africa (Topographical Dict., p. 98).

[15] Senega the Senegal River which flows through what is now Senegambia and Guinea, N. Africa.

[16] Madrabumba, and Sierra Leona rivers in Guinea.

[17] San Thomé St. Thomas, an island off the W coast of Africa, formerly a colony of Portugal; Santa Helena St. Helen, another island off the W coast of Africa.

[18] Cape of Buona Esperanza the Cape of Good Hope, South Africa.

[19] Quitangone perhaps the port of Quelimane in Mozambique.

[20] isles of Comoro in the Indian Ocean, between what is now Mozambique and the island of Madagascar; Zanzibar an island off the coast of what is now Tanzania.

[21] Comori i.e., Cape Comorin, at the southern-most tip of India.

[22] Nicubar i.e., the Nicobar Islands, Indian Ocean: near the northern tip of Indonesia (Sumatra); Gomes Polo not identified; Pulo Pinaom Peninsular Malaysia.

[23] Malacca perhaps a group of islands W of New Guinea called the Moluccas (Maluku); or perhaps Malaysia itself.

[24] Iunsalaon unidentified.

By Richard Hakluyt Preacher, and sometime student of Christ-Church in Oxford. Imprinted at London by George Bishop, Ralph Newbery, and Robert Barker.[1] anno 1599.

[...]

The Voyage Made to Tripoli in Barbary,[2] in the Year 1583, with a Ship Called the Jesus, Wherein the Adventures and Distresses of Some Englishmen Are Truly Reported, and Other Necessary Circumstances Observed. Written by Thomas Sanders.[3]

[...]

And when our merchants came ashore, the King[4] commanded presently[5] that they with the rest of our company that were with them should be chained four and four to a hundred weight of iron, and when we came in with the ship, there came presently above a hundred Turks aboard of us, and they searched us, and stripped our very clothes from our backs, and broke open our chests, and made a spoil of[6] all that we had. And the Christian caitiffs[7] likewise that came aboard of us made spoil of our goods, and used us as ill as the Turks did. And our master's mate having a Geneva Bible[8] in his hand, there came the King's chief gunner and took it out from him, who showed me of it, and I having the language went presently to the King's treasurer, and told him of it, saying that sith[9] it was the will of God that we should fall into their hands, yet that they should grant us to use our consciences to our own discretion, as they suffered[10] the Spaniards and other nations to use theirs, and he granted us. Then I told him that the master gunner had taken away a

---

1 George Bishop London stationer; Ralph Newbery also Rafe (fl. 1590), London printer and publisher, responsible for many important volumes, including Holinshed's Chronicles (1584) and Stow's Annals (1592; 1601); Robert Barker (d. 1645), king's printer, and freeman of the Stationers' Company (1589); he published the first edition of the King James Bible in 1611.

2 Barbary North Africa along the Mediterranean, from Egypt to the Atlantic, and from the sea to the Sahara Desert, encompassing Tripoli, Tunis, Algiers, and Morocco (now Morocco, Algeria, Tunisia, and Libya). Barbary was an important centre of trade for the English, prompting the formation of the Company of the Barbary Merchants in 1588 (Topographical Dict., p. 45). Saunders' account places Tripoli "in the East part of Africa" (p. 184). Tripoli is now Tarabulus, Libya.

3 This account was first published in 1587 under the title A true description and brief discourse of a most lamentable voyage, made lately to Tripoli in Barbary in a ship named the Jesus by Thomas Saunders. Apart from altering the spelling of "Saunders," Hakluyt's changes are mostly in aid of tightening and clarifying the narrative. He omits the pamphlet's preface and its dedication to Julius Caesar (a retelling of the tale of Androcles and the Lion), and he changes the spelling of some place names for clarification. See C.F. Beckingham, "The Near East: North and North-East Africa," The Hakluyt Handbook, vol. 1, p. 183. The selection here is from Principal Navigations, vol. 2, part 1, pp. 184-91.

Saunders was part of a merchant expedition backed by the Turkish Company. When the Jesus was preparing to leave Tripoli, Romane Sonnings, a French mercantile agent, brought onboard a fellow agent, Patrone Norado, who was being held in Tripoli for an unpaid debt to a local Turk. Unaware of Patrone's legal status as a pledge to repay this debt, the Jesus set sail. Attacked and threatened with sinking by Turkish gunners, the Jesus returned to harbour, where the entire ship's company was arrested and enslaved. After converting to Islam in a vain attempt to save his life, Romane Sonnings was executed. See Principal Navigations, vol. 2, pp. 184-87.

The documents appended to the narrative proper include: "The Queen's Letters to the Turk 1584 for the Restitution of the Ship Called the Jesus, and the English Captives Detained in Tripoli in Barbary, and for Certain Other Prisoners in Argier" (in Latin, pp. 191-92; in English, p. 192); "The Turk's Letter to the King of Tripoli in Barbary, Commanding the Restitution of an English Ship, Called the Jesus, with the Men, and Goods, Sent from Constantinople, by Mahomet Beg, a Justice of the Great Turk's, and an English Gentleman, called Master Edward Barton. Anno 1584" (in English, pp. 192-93); "A Letter of Master William Hareborne, the English Ambassador, Ligier in Constantinople, to the Bassa Romadan, the Beglerbeg of Tripoli in Barbary, for the Restoring of an English Ship Called the Jesus, with the Goods, and Men, Detained as Slaves. Anno 1585" (in Italian, pp. 193-94; in English, p. 194).

4 the King Bassa Romadan Beglerbeg, the pasha of West Tripoli (according to the Great Turk's letter to him commanding the release of the surviving Englishmen of the Jesus). "Bassa" is an obsolete form of "bashaw" or "pasha," here denoting a governor under the general authority of the "Great or Grand Turk," the Sultan (absolute ruler) of the Ottoman Empire.

5 presently immediately, at once.

6 made a spoil of to pillage or plunder.

7 caitiffs base, wicked wretches; villains.

8 Geneva Bible the English translation of the Bible first published in Geneva in 1560.

9 sith since, seeing that.

10 suffered allowed, permitted.

Bible from one of our men. The treasurer went presently and commanded him to deliver up the Bible again, which he did.

And within a little after, he took it from the man again, and I showed the treasurer of it, and presently he commanded him to deliver it again, saying, "Thou villain, wilt thou turn to Christianity again?"—for he was a renegado, which is one that first was a Christian and afterwards becometh a Turk—and so he delivered me the Bible the second time.

And then I having it in my hand, the gunner came to me and spoke these words, saying, "Thou dog, I will have the book in despite of thee," and took it from me, saying, "If thou tell the King's treasurer of it any more, by Mahomet, I will be revenged of thee."

Notwithstanding, I went the third time unto the King's treasurer and told him of it, and he came with me, saying thus unto the gunner: "By the head of the Great Turk, if thou take it from him again, thou shalt have a hundred bastinados."[1]

And forthwith he delivered me the book, saying he had not the value of a pin of the spoil of the ship, which was the better for him, as hereafter you shall hear: for there was none, neither Christian nor Turk, that took the value of a pennyworth of our goods from us, but perished both body and goods within seventeenth months following, as hereafter shall plainly appear.

[...]

This King had a son which was a ruler in an island called Gerbi, whereunto arrived an English ship called the Green Dragon, of the which was master one Master Blonket,[2] who having a very unhappy boy in that ship, and understanding that whosoever would turn Turk should be well entertained of the King's son, this boy did run ashore and voluntarily turned Turk. Shortly after the King's son came to Tripoli to visit his father and seeing our company, he greatly fancied Richard Burgess, our purser, and James Smith. They were both young men; therefore, he was very desirous to have them to turn Turks, but they would not yield to his desire, saying: "We are your father's slaves, and as slaves we will serve him."

Then his father, the King, sent for them, and asked them if they would turn Turks.

And they said: "If it please your Highness, Christians we were born, and so we will remain," and beseeched the King that they might not be enforced thereunto.

The King had there before in his house a son of a yeoman of our Queen's guard, whom the King's son had enforced to turn Turk: his name was John Nelson. Him the King caused to be brought to these young men, and then said unto them: "Will not you bear this your countryman company, and be Turk as he is?"[3]

And they said that they would not yield thereunto during life.

But it fell out that, within a month after, the King's son went home to Gerbi again, being six score miles[4] from Tripoli, and carried our two foresaid young men with him, which were Richard Burgess and James Smith. And after their departure from us, they sent us a letter signifying that there was no violence showed unto them as yet, but within three days after they were violently used for that the King's son demanded of them again 'if that they would turn Turk?'

Then answered Richard Burgess, "A Christian I am, and so I will remain."

The King's son very angrily said unto him, "By Mahomet, thou shalt presently be made Turk."

Then called he for his men, and commanded them to make him Turk, and they did so, and circumcised him, and would have had him speak the words that thereunto belonged, but he answered them stoutly that he would not. And although they had put on him the habit of a Turk, yet said he, "A

[1] bastinados blows administered with a stick to the soles of a person's feet; an Eastern method of corporal punishment.

[2] <*> The Green Dragon [Principal Navigations' note].

[3] <*> The King's son had a captive that was son to one of the Queen's Majesty's guard that was forced to turn Turk [Principal Navigations' note].

[4] six score miles 120 miles.

Christian I was born, and so I will remain, though you force me to do otherwise."

And then he called for the other, and commanded him to be made Turk perforce[1] also, but he was very strong, for it was so much as eight of the King's son's men could do to hold him. So in the end they circumcised him, and made him Turk.

Now to pass over a little, and to show the manner of our deliverance out of that miserable captivity. In May aforesaid, shortly after our apprehension,[2] I wrote a letter into England unto my father, dwelling in Eavistoke in Devonshire, signifying unto him the whole estate of our calamities, and I wrote also to Constantinople to the English ambassador; both which letters were faithfully delivered. But when my father had received my letter, and understood the truth of our mishap, and the occasion thereof, and what had happened to the offenders, he certified[3] the right honourable, the Earl of Bedford thereof, who in short space acquainted her Highness with the whole cause thereof, and her Majesty, like a most merciful princess tendering her subjects, presently took order for our deliverance. Whereupon the right worshipful Sir Edward Osborne,[4] knight, directed his letters with all speed to the English ambassador in Constantinople to procure our delivery. And he obtained the Great Turk's[5] commission, and sent it forthwith to Tripoli by one Master Edward Barton,[6] together with a justice of the Great Turk's, and one soldier, and another Turk, and a Greek which was his interpreter, which could speak (besides Greek) Turkish, Italian, Spanish, and English. And when they came to Tripoli, they were well entertained.

[...]

[A]nd so did the justices deliver unto the King the Great Turk's commission to the effect that aforesaid,[7] which commission the King with all obedience received. And after the perusing of the same,[8] he forthwith commanded all the English captives to be brought before him, and then willed the keeper to strike off all our irons, which done, the King said:

"You Englishmen, for that you did offend the laws of this place,[9] by the same laws therefore some of your company were condemned to die as you know, and you to be perpetual captives during your lives. Notwithstanding, seeing it hath pleased my sovereign lord, the Great Turk, to pardon your said offences, and to give you your freedom and liberty, behold: here I make delivery of you to this English gentleman."

So he delivered us all that were there, being thirteen in number, to Master Barton, who required also those two young men which the King's son had taken with him. Then the King answered that it was against their law to deliver them, for that they were turned Turks; and touching the ship and goods, the King said that he had

---

1 perforce forcibly.

2 <*> The first motion for those Englishmen's delivery [Principal Navigations' note].

3 certified informed authoritatively.

4 Sir Edward Osborne (?1530-91), member of the Clothworkers' Company, London, and merchant-trader with Spain and Turkey. Governor of the Turkey Company, founded in 1579, he was instrumental in the company's gaining of a charter and its final incorporation as the "Merchants of the Levant trading to Turkey and Venice." He was a zealous proponent of the Company's interests, and often intervened with the English Crown when the Company's people, trading routes, and ships were threatened (DNB, p. 1178). He was made lord mayor of London and knighted in 1583. Because of his wealth, experience, and prominent position in the Clothworkers' Company and "Turkey Company," the government often called upon him for help in resolving commercial disputes.

5 the Great Turk also known as the Grand Turk, the Sultan (or absolute ruler) of the Ottoman Empire. Here, Amurath III, also known as Murad III (reigned 1574-95).

6 Edward Barton (?1562-97), second English ambassador at Constantinople. He took up his post in 1590, before which he was the secretary to William Harborne, Elizabeth's first ambassador to the area. Although his responsibilities were generally to safeguard the interests of the Turkey Company (DNB, p. 1262), he was also an agent of the Crown, delivering a gift from Elizabeth I to Sultan Murad III in 1594 (Principal Navigations, vol. 2, p. 303). Remembered favourably by the Turks, for whom he fought in their campaigns in Hungary, he died of the plague on the island of Halke, near Constantinople (DNB, p. 1263).

7 The Great Turk's commission included the freeing of all the English captives and the restoration of the seized goods and ship.

8 <*> The Englishmen released [Principal Navigations' note].

9 See p. 641, note 3.

sold her, but would make restitution of the value, and as much of the goods as came unto his hands; and so the King arose and went to dinner, and commanded a Jew to go with Master Barton and the other commissioners to show them their lodging, which was a house provided and appointed them by the said King. And because I had the Italian and Spanish tongues, by which their most traffic in that country is, Master Barton made me his cater[1] to buy his victuals for him and his company, and delivered me money needful for the same. Thus were we set at liberty the 28th day of April, 1585.

Now to return to the King's plagues and punishments, which almighty God at his will and pleasure sendeth upon men in the sight of the world, and likewise of the plagues that befell his children and other aforesaid.[2] First, when we were made bondmen, being the 2nd day of May 1584, the King had three hundred captives, and before the month was expired there died of them of the plague one hundred and fifty. And whereas there were twenty-six men of our company, of whom two were hanged, and one died that same day that we were made bondslaves,[3] that present month there died nine more of our company of the plague, and other two were forced to turn Turks, as before is rehearsed. And on the 4th day of June next following the King lost one hundred and fifty camels, which were taken from him by the wild Moors.[4]

[...]

And about three months after our delivery, Master Barton with all the residue of his company departed from Tripoli to Zante,[5] in a vessel called a settee,[6] of one Marcus Segoorus, who dwelt in Zante, and after our arrival at Zante we remained fifteen days there aboard our vessel before we could have platego (that is, leave to come ashore) because the plague was in that place from whence we came. And about three days after we came ashore, thither came another settee of Marseilles bound for Constantinople. Then did Master Barton and his company, with two more of our company, ship themselves as passengers in the same settee, and went to Constantinople.[7] But the other nine of us that remained in Zante, about three months after, shipped ourselves in a ship of the said Marcus Segoorus, which came to Zante and was bound for England. In which three months, the soldiers of Tripoli killed the said king.[8] And then the King's son, according to the custom there, went to Constantinople to surrender up all his father's treasure, goods, captives, and concubines unto the Great Turk, and took with him our said purser Richard Burgess and James Smith, and also the other two Englishmen which he, the said king's son, had enforced to become Turks, as is aforesaid. And they, the said Englishmen, finding now some opportunity, concluded with the Christian captives which were going with them unto Constantinople, being in number about one hundred and fifty, to kill the King's son and all the Turks which were aboard of the galley; and privily[9] the said Englishmen conveyed unto the said Christian captives weapons for that purpose. And when they came into the main sea toward Constantinople (upon the faithful promise of the said Christian captives), these four Englishmen leapt suddenly into the crossia (that is, into the midst of the galley, where the cannon lieth) and with their swords drawn did fight against all the foresaid Turks; and for want of help of the said Christian captives, who falsely broke their promises, the said Master Blonket's boy was killed, and the said James Smith, and our purser Richard Burgess, and the other

[1] cater buyer of provisions.

[2] <*> The plagues and punishments that happened to the King and his people [Principal Navigations' note].

[3] bondslaves a more emphatic term for slave or bondman.

[4] <*> The king lost 150 camels, taken by the wild Moors [Principal Navigations' note].

[5] Zante i.e., Zacynthos, one of the Ionian Islands off the NW coast of the Peloponnesus; occupied by Venice from the fifteenth century until 1797 (Topographical Dict., p. 577).

[6] settee a fairly large merchant vessel, much used in the Mediterranean.

[7] <*> Two Englishmen shipped to Constantinople with Master Barton [Principal Navigations' note].

[8] <*> The soldiers of Tripoli kill the King [Principal Navigations' note].

[9] privily secretly.

Englishmen were taken and bound into chains to be hanged at their arrival in Constantinople. And as the Lord's will was, about two days after, passing through the gulf of Venice, at an island called Cephalonia,[1] they met with two of the Duke of Venice his galleys, which took that galley and killed the King's son, and his mother, and all the Turks that were there, in number one hundred and fifty, and they saved the Christian captives,[2] and would have killed the two Englishmen because they were circumcised and become Turks had not the other Christian captives excused them, saying that they were enforced to be Turks by the King's son, and showed the Venetians also how they did enterprise at sea to fight against all the Turks, and that their two fellows were slain in that fight. Then the Venetians saved them, and they, with all the residue of the said captives, had their liberty, which were in number one hundred and fifty or thereabouts; and the said galley and all the Turk's treasure was confiscated to the use of the state of Venice.

[...]

[A]nd so we came home; and within two months after our arrival at London, our said purser Richard Burgess and his fellow came home also, for the which we are bound to praise almighty God during our lives, and, as duty bindeth us, to pray for the preservation of our most gracious Queen, for the great care her Majesty had over us, her poor subjects, in seeking and procuring of our deliverance aforesaid; and also for her honourable Privy Council, and I especial for the prosperity and good estate of the house of the late deceased, the right honourable, the Earl of Bedford, whose honour I must confess most diligently, at the suit of my father now departed, travailed[3] herein; for the which I rest continually bounden to him, whose soul I doubt not but is already in the heavens in joy with the Almighty; unto which place he vouchsafe to bring us all, that for our sins suffered most vile and shameful death upon the cross, there to live perpetually, world without end, Amen.

—1599

from The Third and Last Volume of the Voyages, Navigations, Traffiques, and Discoveries of the English Nation, and in some few places, where they have not been, of strangers, performed within and before the time of these hundred years, to all parts of the Newfound world of America, or the West Indies, from 73 degrees of Northerly to 57 of Southerly latitude:

As namely to Engronland, Meta Incognita, Estotiland, Tierra de Labrador,[4] Newfoundland, up The grand bay, the gulf of St. Lawrence, and the River of Canada to Hochelaga and Saguenay,[5] along the coast of Arambec,[6] to the shores and mains of Virginia and Florida, and on the West or backside of them both, to the rich and pleasant countries of Nueva Biscaya, Cibola, Tiguex, Cicuic, Quivira,[7] to the 15 provinces of [1] Cephalonia the largest of the Ionian islands.

[2] <*> The galleys of Venice took the King of Tripoli his galley, and killed the King's son, and all the Turks in it, and released all the Christians being in number 150 [Principal Navigations' note].

[3] travailed laboured.

[4] Engronland also known as Groynland and Groeland (present-day, Greenland); Meta Incognita Latin, "the unknown shore"; here, the E Canadian Arctic, including present-day Resolution Island and Baffin Island; Estotiland mythical part of North America, first "mapped" by the Zeno brothers (Nicolo and Antonio) in the late-fifteenth century; Tierra de Labrador the land of Labrador.

[5] the River of Canada to Hochelaga and Saguenay the St. Lawrence River to Hochelaga (present-day Montreal) and Saguenay (at the time, a country further north of Hochelaga, believed to be an El Dorado).

[6] Arambec Norumbega (Norumbegua), sometimes defined as the North American coast between Maine and Nova Scotia, sometimes between Newfoundland and Florida. See C. Nicholl, The Creature in the Map: Sir Walter Ralegh's Quest for El Dorado (London, 1996), p. 25.

[7] Nueva Biscaya i.e., Nueva Vizcaya, first province of N Mexico that was colonized by the Spanish, encompassing most of present-day Chihuahua and Durango; Cibola territory in N New Spain (Colonial Mexico), what is now the SW United States, famous for its legendary seven cities of gold; Tiguex territory along the Rio Grande near Bernalillo, New Mexico; Cicuic Cicúique, Pecos pueblo, now Rowe, New Mexico; Quivira fabled Indian province, E of the New Mexico pueblos, like Cibola, a legendary repository of gold and silver. See The Handbook of Texas Online <http://www.tsha.utexas.edu/handbook/online>.

the kingdom of New Mexico, to the bottom of the gulf of California, and up the River of Buena Guia[1]

And likewise to all the isles both small and great lying before the cape of Florida, the bay of Mexico, and Tierra firma,[2] to the coasts and Inlands of New Spain, Tierra firma, and Guiana, up the mighty Rivers of Orenoque, Dessekibe, and Maramon,[3] to every part of the coast of Brazil, to the River of Plate,[4] through the Straits of Magellan forward and backward, and to the South of the said Straits as far as 57 degrees:

And from thence on the backside of America, along the coasts, harbours, and capes of Chile, Peru, Nicaragua, Nueva Espanna, Nueva Galicia, Culiacan,[5] California, Nova Albion,[6] and more Northerly as far as 43 degrees:

Together with two renowned, and prosperous voyages of Sir Francis Drake, and Master Thomas Candish round about the circumference of the whole earth, and divers other voyages intended and set forth for that course.

Collected by RICHARD HAKLUYT Preacher, and sometimes student of Christ-Church in Oxford.

Imprinted at London by George Bishop, Ralph Newbery and Robert Barker. ANNO DOMINI 1600.

The Second Voyage of Master Martin Frobisher,[7] Made to the West and Northwest Regions in the Year 1577. With a Description of the Country and People. Written by Master Dionyse Settle.[8]

[...]

[W]ith a merry wind, the 7th of June we arrived at the islands called Orcades, or vulgarly Orkney,[9] being in number thirty, subject and adjacent to Scotland, where we made provision of fresh water. In the doing whereof, our general licensed the gentlemen and soldiers for their recreation to go on shore. At our landing, the people fled from their poor cottages with shrieks and alarms to warn their neighbours of enemies,[10] but by gentle persuasions we reclaimed them to their houses. It seemeth they are often frighted with pirates or some other enemies that move them to such sudden fear. Their houses are very simply builded with pebble-stone, without any chimneys, the fire

[1] Buena Guia Spanish, "River of Good Guidance": the Colorado River.

[2] Tierra firma Spanish, "solid ground" (unidentified).

[3] Orenoque the Orinoco River, Guiana; Dessekibe unidentified; Maramon perhaps, the Marañon River, Peru.

[4] the River of Plate i.e., Rio de la Plata (in present-day Argentina and Uruguay).

[5] Nueva Espanna New Spain. This colonial possession included all of present-day Mexico and Central America, down to the S border of Costa Rica and portions of the United States (California, Arizona, New Mexico, and Texas); Nueva Galicia Mexican province with four principal villages: Guadalajara, Compostela, Purificación, and Culiacán; Culiacan a Spanish outpost in NW Mexico (Handbook of Texas Online).

[6] Nova Albion the W coast of North America (present-day N California?), claimed by Francis Drake in 1579 for the English Crown, occasionally defined as the coastal area N of New Spain and New Mexico.

[7] See vol. 3, pp. 32-39. Sir Martin Frobisher (?1535-94), explorer and navigator, first went to sea in 1554 and spent the next ten years voyaging to the N shores of Africa or the Levant. Most famous for his three voyages in search of the North-West Passage, Frobisher's first voyage (1576) into what is now Frobisher Bay netted him pyrite which was declared to be gold, and which led to the enthusiastic outfitting of his second voyage, the Queen herself providing one of her own ships for the expedition.

[8] Dionyse Settle He wrote an earlier account of this voyage, A true report of Captain Frobisher his last voyage into the West and Northwest regions this present year 1577 (London, 1577). Within three years, it was translated into French, German, and Italian. See D.B. Quinn, New American World: A Documentary History of North America to 1612, vol. IV (New York, 1979), p. 182; the first widely disseminated account of the exploration of America, it was translated into a number of European languages (ibid., p. 207). Settle's account makes clear that he was both a gentleman and one of those who made the voyage with Frobisher.

[9] <*> The Islands Orcades, or Orkney [Principal Navigations' note].

[10] <*> The Orcadians upon small occasion flee their home [Principal Navigations' note].

being made in the midst thereof. The goodman, wife, children, and other of their family eat and sleep on the one side of the house and the cattle on the other, very beastly and rudely in respect of civility. They are destitute of wood;[1] their fire is turfs and cow-shards.[2] They have corn, bigg,[3] and oats with which they pay their king's rent to the maintenance of his house. They take great quantity of fish, which they dry in the wind and sun. They dress[4] their meat very filthily and eat it without salt. Their apparel is after the rudest sort of Scotland. Their money is all base. Their Church and religion is reformed according to the Scots. The fishermen of England can better declare the dispositions of those people than I.[5] [C]oasting along the west shore not far from whence the ship rode, they perceived a fair harbour, and, willing to sound the same, at the entrance thereof they espied two tents of seal-skins, unto which the captain, our said master, and the other company resorted. At the sight of our men the people fled into the mountains.[6] Nevertheless, they went to their tents, where leaving certain trifles of ours—as glasses, bells, knives, and such like things—they departed, not taking anything of theirs except one dog. They did in like manner leave behind them a letter, pen, ink, and paper, whereby our men whom the captain lost the year before, and in that people's custody, might (if any of them were alive) be advertised of our pretence[7] and being there.

[...]

[...]

At our coming back again to the place where their tents were before, they had removed their tents further into the said bay or sound, where they might, if they were driven from the land, flee with their boats into the sea. We parting ourselves into two companies and compassing a mountain came suddenly upon them by land, who espying us without any tarrying fled to their boats, leaving the most part of their oars behind them for haste, and rowed down the bay where our two pinnaces[8] met them and drove them to shore. But if they had had all their oars, so swift are they in rowing, it had been lost time to have chased them.

When they were landed they fiercely assaulted our men with their bows and arrows,[9] who wounded three of them with our arrows. And perceiving themselves thus hurt, they desperately leapt off the rocks into the sea and drowned themselves. Which if they had not done but had submitted themselves, or if by any means we could have taken them alive (being their enemies as they judged), we would both have saved them and also have sought remedy to cure their wounds received at our hands. But they, altogether void of humanity and ignorant what mercy meaneth, in extremities look for no other than death. And perceiving they should fall into our hands, thus miserably by drowning rather desired death than otherwise to be saved by us. The rest perceiving their fellows in this distress fled into the high mountains. Two women not being so apt to escape as the men were, the one for her age and the other being encumbered with a young child, we took. The old wretch, whom divers of our sailors supposed to be either a devil or a witch, had her buskins[10] plucked off to see if she were cloven-footed, and for her ugly hue and deformity we let her go. The young woman and the child we brought away. We named the place where they were slain "Bloody Point" and the bay or harbour

---

1 <*> No wood in Orkney [Principal Navigations' note].

2 turfs peat; cow-shards cow dung.

3 bigg a type of barley grown in northern climates.

4 dress prepare.

5 <*> Fishermen of England have daily traffic to Orkney [Principal Navigations' note].

6 <*> The people fled at the sight of our men [Principal Navigations' note].

7 pretence intention, purpose, design.

8 pinnace a small light vessel, generally two-masted, and schooner-rigged; often in attendance on a larger vessel.

9 <*> A fierce assault of a few [Principal Navigations' note].

10 buskins a covering for the foot and leg, reaching to the calf, or to the knee; a half-boot.

"York's Sound," after the name of one of the captains of the two barks.

Having this knowledge both of their fierceness and cruelty, and perceiving that fair means as yet is not able to allure them to familiarity,[1] we disposed ourselves, contrary to our inclination, something to be cruel, returned to their tents and made a spoil of the same, where we found an old shirt, a doublet, a girdle,[2] and also shoes of our men whom we lost the year before.[3] On nothing else unto them belonging could we set our eyes.

Their riches are not gold, silver, or precious drapery,[4] but their said tents and boats made of the skins of red deer and seal skins, also dogs like unto wolves but for the most part black, with other trifles, more to be wondered at for their strangeness than for any other commodity needful for our use.

[...]

The men and women wear their hose[5] close to their legs from the waist to the knee, without any open before, as well the one kind as the other. Upon their legs they wear hose of leather with the fur side inward, two or three pair on at once and especially the women. In those hose they put their knives, needles, and other things needful to bear about. They put a bone within their hose which reacheth from the foot to the knee, whereupon they draw their said hose, and so in place of garters they are holden from falling down about their feet.

They dress their skins very soft and supple with the hair on. In cold weather or winter, they wear the fur side inward, and in summer outward. Other apparel they have none but the said skins.

Those beasts, fishes, and fowls which they kill are their meat, drink, apparel, houses, bedding, hose, shoes, thread, and sails for their boats, with many other necessaries whereof they stand in need, and almost all their riches.

[...]

Those houses, or rather dens which stand there, have no sign of footway or anything else trodden, which is one of the chiefest tokens of habitation. And those tents which they bring with them, when they have sufficiently hunted and fished, they remove to other places. And when they have sufficiently stored them of such victuals as the country yieldeth or bringeth forth, they return to their winter stations or habitations. This conjecture do I make for the infertility which I conjecture to be in that country.

They have some iron, whereof they make arrowheads, knives, and other little instruments to work their boats, bows, arrows, and darts withal, which are very unapt to do anything withal but with great labour.[6]

It seemeth that they have conversation[7] with some other people, of whom for exchange they should receive the same. They are greatly delighted with anything that is bright or giveth a sound.

What knowledge they have of God or what idol they adore we have no perfect intelligence. I think them rather anthropophagi or devourers of man's flesh than otherwise,[8] for that there is no flesh or fish which they find dead (smell it never so filthily) but they will eat it as they find it,

[1] <*> Fair means not able to allure them to familiarity [Principal Navigations' note].

[2] doublet a close-fitting body-garment, with or without sleeves, worn by men from the fourteenth to the eighteenth century; girdle a belt worn round the waist to secure or confine the garments; also for carrying light articles, esp. a weapon or purse (wallet).

[3] whom we lost the year before During Frobisher's first expedition in 1576, five of his men accompanied ashore an Inuit man who had agreed to serve as their guide in their journey westward. They were never seen again, and Frobisher believed they had been detained by force. See A. Savours, "A Narrative of Frobisher's Arctic Voyages" in Meta Incognita—A Discourse of Discovery: Martin Frobisher's Arctic Expeditions, 1576-1578, vol. 1, ed. T.H.B. Symons (Hull, 1999), pp. 19-54.

[4] <*> Boats of skins [Principal Navigations' note].

[5] hose an article of clothing for the leg; sometimes reaching down only to the ankle as a legging, sometimes also covering the foot like a long stocking.

[6] <*> Their use of iron [Principal Navigations' note].

[7] conversation dealings, relations.

[8] <*> Anthropophagi [Principal Navigations' note].

without any other dressing:[1] a loathsome thing either to the beholders or hearers.

There is no manner of creeping beast hurtful, except some spiders (which, as many affirm, are signs of great store of gold),[2] and also certain stinging gnats, which bite so fiercely that the place where they bite shortly after swelleth and itcheth very sore.

They make signs of certain people that wear bright plates of gold in their foreheads and other places of their bodies.[3]

The countries on both sides the straits lie very high with rough, stony mountains and great quantity of snow thereon.[4] There is very little plain ground and no grass, except a little which is much like unto moss that groweth on soft ground, such as we get turfs in. There is no wood at all. To be brief, there is nothing fit or profitable for the use of man which that country with root yieldeth or bringeth forth. Howbeit, there is great quantity of deer, whose skins are like unto asses, their heads or horns do far exceed as well in length as also in breadth any in these our parts or countries. Their feet likewise are as great as our oxen's, which we measured to be seven or eight inches in breadth. There are also hares, wolves, fishing bears, and sea fowl of sundry sorts.

As the country is barren and infertile, so are they rude and of no capacity to culture[5] the same to any perfection, but are contented by their hunting, fishing, and fowling, with raw flesh and warm blood to satisfy their greedy paunches,[6] which is their only glory.

[...]

1 dressing preparation.

2 <*> Signs of gold ore [Principal Navigations' note].

3 <*> Signs of gold from other people [Principal Navigations' note].

4 <*> Description of the countries [Principal Navigations' note].

5 culture cultivate.

6 paunches bellies, stomachs.

The Voyage of Master Hore and Divers Other Gentlemen to Newfoundland and Cape Breton, in the Year 1536 and in the Twenty-eighth Year of King Henry VIII.[7]

One Master Hore of London,[8] a man of goodly stature and of great courage and given to the study of cosmography, in the 28th year of King Henry VIII and in the year of our Lord 1536, encouraged divers gentlemen and others, being assisted by the King's favour and good countenance, to accompany him in a voyage of discovery upon the northwest parts of America. Wherein his persuasions took such effect that within short space many gentlemen of the Inns of Court and of the Chancery[9] and divers others of good worship, desirous to see the strange things of the world, very willingly entered into the action with him. [...] [These gentlemen included] Thomas Butts,[10] the 7 This is the second narrative in the section dealing with voyages to the north-eastern parts of North America (such as Newfoundland, Labrador, etc.).

8 Master Richard Hore (or Hoore) (fl. 1535-38), London citizen, leather-seller, and skilled naval captain. In February 1536, he hired the ships the William and the Trinity for a trip to Newfoundland. The explicit purpose of the journey remains somewhat obscure, although line-fishing of cod was clearly part of it (D.B. Quinn, England and the Discovery of America, 1481-1620 [New York, 1974], pp. 182-83). However, Hore's voyage combined fishing and sightseeing, a combination which characterized many later English voyages to the New World. His ships were the first English vessels to enter the Strait of Belle Isle, and the second to see the southern shore of Labrador (after their discovery by Cartier, these shores had been largely forgotten). Quinn concludes that Hore's journey up the St. Lawrence likely was the result of curiosity rather than a well-planned exploratory expedition (England, p. 189). See J. McDermott, "Richard Hore," DNB online, 2005.

9 Inns of Court the four sets of buildings in London (the Inner Temple, the Middle Temple, Lincoln's Inn, and Gray's Inn) belonging to the four legal societies, responsible for educating legal professionals and admitting them to the bar; [Inns] of the Chancery certain houses or sets of buildings in London, originally places of residence and study for students and apprentices of law; also the societies by which they were occupied. Those who would belong to either institution would generally be of the rank of gentleman or higher.

10 Thomas Butts (d. 1593). His estate was at Great Ryburgh (Ryburgh Magna), Norfolk. See D.B. and A.M. Quinn, "A Hakluyt Chronology," Hakluyt Handbook, vol. 2, p. 302.

son of Sir William Butts, knight, of Norfolk, which was lately living and from whose mouth I wrote most of this relation.

[After a journey of some eight weeks, the expedition arrived at "Cape Breton, shaping their course thence northeastwards until they came to the island of Penguin" (off the S coast of Newfoundland)]

Master Oliver Dawbeny, which (as it is before mentioned) was in this voyage, and in the Minion, told Master Richard Hakluyt of the Middle Temple[1] these things following: to wit, that after their arrival in Newfoundland, and having been there certain days at anchor and not having yet seen any of the natural people of the country, the same Dawbeny walking one day on the hatches spied a boat with savages of those parts rowing down the bay toward them to gaze upon the ship and our people; and taking view of the coming aloof,[2] he called to such as were under the hatches and willed them to come up if they would see the natural people of the country, that they had so long and so much desired to see.[3] Whereupon, they came up and took view of the savages rowing toward them and their ship, and upon the view they manned out a ship-boat to meet them and to take them. But they spying our ship-boat making towards them returned with main force and fled into an island that lay up in the bay or river there, and our men pursued them into the island, and the savages fled and escaped. But our men found a fire and the side of a bear on a wooden spit left at the same by the savages that were fled.

There in the same place they found a boot of leather garnished on the outward side of the calf with certain brave trails,[4] as it were of raw silk, and also found a certain great, warm mitten; and these carried with them, they returned to their ship, not finding the savages nor seeing anything else besides the soil and the things growing in the same, which chiefly were store of fir and pine trees.

And further, the said Master Dawbeny told him that lying there they grew into great want of victuals, and that there they found small relief, more than that they had from the nest of an osprey that brought hourly to her young great plenty of divers sorts of fishes.[5] But such was the famine that increased amongst them from day to day that they were forced to seek to relieve themselves of raw herbs and roots that they sought on the main. But the famine increasing and the relief of herbs being to little purpose to satisfy their insatiable hunger, in the fields and deserts here and there the fellow killed his mate while he stooped to take up a root for his relief, and cutting out pieces of his body whom he had murdered, broiled the same on the coals and greedily devoured them.

By this mean[6] the company decreased, and the officers knew not what was become of them. And it fortuned that one of the company,[7] driven with hunger to seek abroad for relief, found out in the fields the savour of broiled flesh and fell out with one for that he would suffer him and his fellows to starve, enjoying plenty as he thought.

And this matter growing to cruel speeches, he that had the broiled meat burst out into these words, "If thou wouldst needs know, the broiled meat that I had was a piece of such a man's buttock."

The report of this brought to the ship, the captain found what became of those that were missing, and was persuaded that some of them were neither devoured with wild beasts nor yet destroyed with savages. And hereupon he stood up and made a notable oration,[8] containing how much these dealings offended the Almighty and vouched the Scriptures from first to last, what God had in cases of distress done for them that called upon

---

1 <*> Master Dawbeny's report to Master Richard Hakluyt of the Temple [Principal Navigations' note]. On the elder Richard Hakluyt, see above, p. 639.

2 the coming aloof i.e., of those coming at a distance.

3 <*> They beheld the savages of Newfoundland [Principal Navigations' note].

4 trails slender pieces of cloth, hanging or trailing as a decoration.

5 <*> Extreme famine [Principal Navigations' note].

6 mean means, method.

7 <*> Our men eat one another for famine [Principal Navigations' note].

8 <*> The captain's oration [Principal Navigations' note].

him and told them that the power of the Almighty was then no less than in all former time it had been. And added that if it had not pleased God to have holpen[1] them in that distress that it had been better to have perished in body and to have lived everlastingly than to have relieved for a poor time their mortal bodies and to be condemned everlastingly both body and soul to the unquenchable fire of Hell. And thus having ended to that effect, he began to exhort to repentance and besought all the company to pray that it might please God to look upon their miserable present state and for his own mercy to relieve the same. The famine increasing and the inconvenience of the men that were missing being found, they agreed amongst themselves rather than all should perish to cast lots who should be killed. And such was the mercy of God that the same night there arrived a French ship in that port well-furnished with victual, and such was the policy of the English that they became masters of the same,[2] and changing ships and victualing them they set sail to come into England.

[...]

They arrived at Saint Ives in Cornwall about the end of October. From thence they departed unto a certain castle belonging to Sir John Luttrell, where Master Thomas Butts and Master Rastall[3] and other gentlemen of the voyage were very friendly entertained. After that they came to the Earl of Bath at Bath and thence to Bristol, so to London. Master Butts was so changed in the voyage with hunger and misery that Sir William, his father, and my lady, his mother, knew him not to be their son until they found a secret mark which was a wart upon one of his knees, as he told me, Richard Hakluyt of Oxford, himself, to whom I rode two hundred miles only[4] to learn the whole truth of this voyage from his own mouth, as being the only man now alive that was in this discovery.

Certain months after, those Frenchmen came into England and made complaint to King Henry VIII. The King, causing the matter to be examined and finding the great distress of his subjects and the causes of the dealing so with the French, was so moved with pity that he punished not his subjects, but of his own purse made full and royal recompense unto the French.[5]

In this distress of famine, the English did somewhat relieve their vital spirits by drinking at the springs the fresh water out of certain wooden cups, out of which they had drunk their aqua composita[6] before.

---

[1] holpen obsolete form of "helped."

[2] <*> The English surprise a French ship, wherein they returned home [Principal Navigations' note]; such was the policy of the English that they became masters of the same i.e., they used cunning to steal the French ship.

[3] Master Rastell here, apparently, John Rastell, the younger, (c. 1497), the son of the much more famous John Rastell (c. 1475-1536). The senior Rastell was a lawyer, printer, and writer, whose abortive colonizing voyage to the New World in 1517 was sponsored by Henry VIII. When this expedition made landfall in Ireland instead of the Americas, he held his sailors responsible, calling them "Caitiffs [who] would take no pain to sail further" (J. Youings, Sixteenth-Century England, The Penguin Social History of Britain [London, 1984], p. 233). Although he never travelled further west than Ireland, he enthusiastically recommended New World exploration in A new interlude and a merry of the nature of the four elements (1519), a treatise which reveals the extent of very early English knowledge about North America. See Quinn, "North America," Hakluyt Handbook, vol. 1, p. 245.

[4] only solely.

[5] <*> The French royally compensated by King Henry VIII [Principal Navigations' note]. There is no independent corroboration of this part of Hakluyt's narrative. The entire expedition, however, seriously undermined the English appetite for North American exploration. It was the last such expedition in Henry VIII's reign. See Quinn, England, p. 189.

[6] aqua composita Latin, "compounded water"; according to Hugh Plat's Delights for Ladies (1602), a mixture of wine, ginger, and a variety of spices, used as a tonic and to ward off various ailments, from heartburn and indigestion to melancholy and memory loss.

A Report of the Voyage and Success Thereof, Attempted in the Year of Our Lord 1583 by Sir Humphrey Gilbert, Knight,[1] with Other Gentlemen Assisting Him in That Action, Intended to Discover and to Plant Christian Inhabitants in Place Convenient, upon Those Large and Ample Countries Extended Northward from the Cape of Florida, Lying under Very Temperate Climes, Esteemed Fertile and Rich in Minerals, yet Not in the Actual Possession of Any Christian Prince.

Written by Master Edward Hayes, Gentleman[2] and Principal Actor in the Same Voyage, Who Alone Continued unto the End, and by God's Special Assistance Returned Home with His Retinue Safe and Entire.

Many voyages have been pretended,[3] yet hitherto never any thoroughly accomplished, by our nation of exact discovery into the bowels of those main,[4] ample and vast countries extended infinitely into the north from 30 degrees, or rather from 25 degrees of septentrional[5] latitude; neither hath a right way been taken of planting a Christian habitation and regiment upon the same, as well may appear both by the little we yet do actually possess therein, and by our ignorance of the riches and secrets within those lands which unto this day we know chiefly by the travel and report of other nations, and most of the French: who albeit they cannot challenge[6] such right and interest unto the said countries as we; neither these many years have had opportunity nor means so great to discover and to plant[7] (being vexed with the calamities of intestine[8] wars) as we have had by the inestimable benefit of our long and happy peace; yet have they both ways performed more, and had long since attained a sure possession and settled government of many provinces in those northerly parts of America, if their many attempts into those foreign and remote lands had not been impeached by their garboils[9] at home.

The first discovery of these coasts[10] (never heard of before) was well begun by John Cabot the father, and Sebastian his son, an Englishman born, who were the first finders-out of all that great tract of land stretching from the cape of Florida unto those islands which we now call the New-found-land, all which they brought and annexed unto the crown of England.[11] Since

---

[1] Sir Humphrey Gilbert (1537-83), explorer, navigator, and soldier, as well as step-brother of Sir Walter Ralegh. Gilbert devoted much of his life to war: he fought in Normandy, Ireland, and the Netherlands. He had from his earliest years, however, been interested in exploration, petitioning the Queen in 1566 for "privileges" concerning the discovery of the North-West Passage to Cathay. While the license for this exploration went to Martin Frobisher, Gilbert finally received in 1578 a charter from the Queen, including the right to be named governor of the new territories and to colonize them. Between 1579 and 1583, Gilbert raised enough money to sail for the New World on 11 June 1583. There were five ships in the company: The Delight (the fleet's admiral), the Ralegh (a barque, the largest of the vessels, provided by Walter Ralegh), the Golden Hind (commanded by Edward Hayes, see below), the Swallow, and the Squirrel. On 30 July he reached the N shores of Newfoundland, near the Straits of Belle Isle, and on 3 August entered St. John's Harbour (DNB, p. 1208).

[2] Edward Hayes (c. 1550-c.1613), seaman and promoter of colonization. His father was a merchant and erstwhile landowner. Hayes attended King's College, Cambridge, and was a long-time servant of William Cecil, Lord Burghley. Investor and participant in Gilbert's 1583 voyage to Newfoundland, he was an eyewitness to the events recorded here. His ship, the Golden Hind, was the only one to return from Gilbert's ill-fated voyage. Later, Hayes took up privateering during the Spanish war, but much of the rest of his life was given to promoting projects ranging from New World colonization to the development of a copper coinage for England. Almost all his projects came to nothing (DNB, Missing Persons, p. 297). For Edward Hayes's colonizing plans for Newfoundland, see Quinn's edition of some of his manuscripts in "Edward Hayes's Plans for English Control of Newfoundland, 1586" in New American World, vol. 3, pp. 124-38.

[3] pretended attempted.

[4] main said of a considerable, uninterrupted stretch of land.

[5] septentrional northern.

[6] challenge assert (their) title to, lay claim to.

[7] plant colonize.

[8] intestine internal, civil.

[9] garboils disturbances, tumults.

[10] <*> The coasts from Florida northward first discovered by the English nation [Principal Navigations' note].

[11] The first discovery … England John Cabot (Giovanni Caboto) (c. 1450-?99), an Italian explorer, whose journeys were sponsored by Henry VII and the Bristol merchant community in the late fifteenth century, undertook three voyages, which took him to Nova Scotia and later down the coast of North America as far as Chesapeake when, if with like diligence the search of inland countries had been followed as the discovery upon the coast and out-parts thereof was performed by those two men, no doubt her Majesty's territories and revenue had been mightily enlarged and advanced by this day. And which is more, the seed of Christian religion had been sowed amongst those pagans, which by this time might have brought forth a most plentiful harvest and copious congregation of Christians; which must be the chief intent of such as shall make any attempt that way, or else whatsoever is builded upon other foundation shall never obtain happy success nor continuance.

And although we cannot precisely judge (which only belongeth to God) what have been the humours[1] of men stirred up to great attempts of discovering and planting in those remote countries, yet the events[2] do show that either God's cause hath not been chiefly preferred by them, or else God hath not permitted so abundant grace as the light of his word and knowledge of him to be yet revealed unto those infidels before the appointed time.

But most assuredly, the only cause of religion[3] hitherto hath kept back and will also bring forward at the time assigned by God an effectual and complete discovery and possession by Christians both of those ample countries and the riches within them hitherto concealed; whereof, notwithstanding, God in his wisdom hath permitted to be revealed from time to time a certain obscure and misty knowledge, by little and little to allure the minds of men that way (which else will be dull enough in the zeal of his cause) and thereby to prepare us unto a readiness for the execution of his will against[4] the due time ordained, of calling those pagans unto Christianity.

In the meanwhile, it behooveth every man of great calling,[5] in whom is any instinct of inclination unto this attempt, to examine his own motions; which if the same proceed of ambition or avarice, he may assure himself it cometh not of God, and therefore cannot have confidence of God's protection and assistance against the violence (else irresistible) both of sea, and infinite perils upon the land; whom God yet may use an instrument[6] to further his cause and glory some way, but not to build upon so bad a foundation.

Otherwise, if his motives be derived from a virtuous and heroical mind, preferring chiefly the honour of God; compassion of poor infidels captived by the Devil, tyrannizing in most wonderful[7] and dreadful manner over their bodies and souls; advancement of his honest and well-disposed countrymen, willing to accompany him in such honourable actions; relief of sundry people within this realm distressed: all these be honourable purposes, imitating the nature of the munificent God, wherewith he is well pleased, who will assist such an actor beyond expectation of man. And the same, who feeleth this inclination in himself, by all likelihood may hope, or rather confidently repose in the pre-ordinance of God,[8] that in this last age of the world[9] (or likely never) the time is complete of receiving also these gentiles into his mercy, and that God will raise him an instrument to effect the same: it seeming probable by event[10] of precedent

---

Bay. His son Sebastian (c. 1470-?1557) by some accounts was born in Bristol, although Venice is also suggested. His voyages involved the search for the North-West passage through the Americas to the East, and took him (it appears) to what is now Hudson's Strait and Hudson's Bay, and perhaps as far south as Delaware Bay. With Henry VIII's relative lack of interest in exploration, Sebastian Cabot turned to other European patrons, serving the Spanish king, Charles I. He returned to England only after Henry's death to become the first governor of the Merchant Adventurers of England (1551) and himself the sponsor of expeditions to Russia in search of a NE passage to the East. See Dict. History 1485-1789, pp. 47-48.

1 humours mental qualities or tendencies.

2 events outcomes (of these actions of discovery and colonization).

3 the only cause of religion i.e., it is only the cause of religion.

4 against in preparation for.

5 <*> A fit consideration [Principal Navigations' note].

6 use an instrument i.e, use as an instrument.

7 wonderful such as to excite wonder or astonishment.

8 <*> Probable conjectures of these lands North of Florida, are reserved for the English nation to possess [Principal Navigations' note].

9 last age of the world the widely accepted notion that the world was fast-approaching the apocalypse (the end of the world) foretold in the Christian Scriptures, especially in the Book of Revelation and the Book of Daniel.

10 event [the] outcome.

attempts made by the Spaniards and French sundry times that the countries lying north of Florida God hath reserved the same to be reduced unto Christian civility by the English nation. For not long after that Christopher Columbus had discovered the islands and continent of the West Indies for Spain,[1] John and Sebastian Cabot made discovery also of the rest from Florida northwards to the behoof[2] of England.[3]

And whensoever afterwards the Spaniards[4] (very prosperous in all their southern discoveries) did attempt anything into Florida and those regions inclining towards the north, they proved most unhappy, and were at length discouraged utterly by the hard and lamentable success[5] of many, both religious and valiant in arms, endeavouring to bring those northerly regions also under the Spanish jurisdiction; as if God had prescribed limits unto the Spanish nation which they might not exceed, as by their own gests[6] recorded may be aptly gathered.

The French, as they can pretend less title unto these northern parts than the Spaniard,[7] by how much the Spaniard made the first discovery of the same continent so far northward as unto Florida, and the French did but review that before discovered by the English nation, usurping upon our right and imposing names upon countries, rivers, bays, capes, or headlands, as if they had been the first finders of those coasts (which injury we offered not unto the Spaniards, but left off to discover when we approached the Spanish limits); even so God hath not hitherto permitted them to establish a possession permanent upon another's right,[8] notwithstanding their manifold attempts in which the issue hath been no less tragical than that of the Spaniards, as by their own reports is extant.

Then seeing the English nation only hath right unto these countries of America from the cape of Florida northward by the privilege of first discovery,[9] unto which Cabot was authorised by regal authority and set forth by the expense of our late famous King Henry VII,[10] which right also seemeth strongly defended on our behalf by the powerful hand of almighty God withstanding the enterprises of other nations: it may greatly encourage us upon so just ground, as is our right, and upon so sacred an intent, as to plant religion (our right and intent being mete[11] foundations for the same) to prosecute effectually the full possession of those so ample and pleasant countries appertaining unto the crown of England; the same (as is to be conjectured by infallible arguments of the world's end approaching) being now arrived unto the time by God prescribed of their vocation,[12] if ever their calling unto the knowledge of God may be expected. Which also is very probable by the revolution and course of God's word and religion, which from the beginning hath moved from the East towards and, at last, unto the West, where it is like to end unless the same begin again where it did in the East, which were to expect a like world again.[13] But we are assured of the contrary by the prophecy of Christ, whereby we gather that after his word preached throughout the world shall be the end. And as the Gospel when it descended westward began in the south and afterward spread into the north of Europe,

[1] Between 1492 and 1502, Columbus (Cristóbal Colón) (c. 1451-1506) discovered Cuba, Haiti, Guadalupe, Puerto Rico, and other islands, as well as Jamaica, Trinidad, and the mainland of S. America, exploring the coast of Honduras, Nicaragua, and Panama. See Dict. History 1485-1789, pp. 101-02.

[2] behoof profit, advantage.

[3] See pp. 652-53, note 11. There does not seem to be any evidence that either of the Cabots sailed as far south down the coast of North America as Florida.

[4] <*> The Spaniards prosperous in the Southern discoveries, yet unhappy in these Northern [Principal Navigations' note].

[5] success fortune.

[6] gests notable deeds, exploits.

[7] <*> The French are but usurpers upon our right [Principal Navigations' note].

[8] <*> The French also unfortunate in those North parts of America [Principal Navigations' note].

[9] <*> A good encouragement for the English nation, to proceed in the conquests of the North of America [Principal Navigations' note].

[10] See above, pp. 652-53, note 11.

[11] mete proper, fit, appropriate.

[12] <*> The due time approacheth by all likelihood of calling these heathens unto Christianity [Principal Navigations' note].

[13] <*> The word of God moveth circularly [Principal Navigations' note].

even so as the same hath begun in the south countries of America, no less hope may be gathered that it will also spread into the north.

These considerations may help to suppress all dreads rising of hard events[1] in attempts made this way by other nations, as also of the heavy success and issue[2] in the late enterprise made by a worthy gentleman, our countryman Sir Humphrey Gilbert, knight, who was the first of our nation that carried people to erect a habitation and government in those northerly countries of America. About which, albeit he had consumed much substance and lost his life at last, his people also perishing for the most part, yet the mystery thereof we must leave unto God, and judge charitably both of the cause (which was just in all pretence[3]) and of the person, who was very zealous in prosecuting the same, deserving honourable remembrance for his good mind and expense of life in so virtuous an enterprise. Whereby, nevertheless, lest any man should be dismayed by example of other folk's calamity, and misdeem[4] that God doth resist all attempts intended that way, I thought good, so far as myself was an eyewitness, to deliver the circumstance and manner of our proceedings in that action: in which the gentleman was so unfortunately encumbered with wants, and worse matched with many ill-disposed people, that his rare judgement and regiment[5] premeditated for those affairs was subjected to tolerate abuses, and in sundry extremities to hold on a course more to uphold credit than likely in his own conceit happily to succeed.

The issue[6] of such actions, being always miserable not guided by God who abhoreth confusion and disorder, hath left this for admonition (being the first attempt by our nation to plant) unto such as shall take the same cause in hand hereafter not to be discouraged from it, but to make men well-advised how they handle his so high and excellent matters, as the carriage[7] is of his word into those very mighty and vast countries.[8] An action doubtless not to be intermedled with base purposes, as many have made the same but a colour to shadow actions otherwise scarce justifiable; which doth excite God's heavy judgements in the end,[9] to the terrifying of weak minds from the cause without pondering his just proceedings; and doth also incense foreign princes against our attempts how just soever, who cannot but deem the sequel very dangerous unto their state (if in those parts we should grow to strength), seeing the very beginnings are entered with spoil.[10]

And with this admonition denounced upon zeal towards God's cause, also towards those in whom appeareth disposition honourable unto this action of planting Christian people and religion in those remote and barbarous nations of America (unto whom I wish all happiness), I will now proceed to make relation briefly yet particularly[11] of our voyage undertaken with Sir Humphrey Gilbert, begun, continued, and ended adversely.

When first Sir Humphrey Gilbert undertook the western discovery of America, and had procured from her Majesty a very large commission to inhabit and possess at his choice all remote and heathen lands not in the actual possession of any Christian prince[12]—the same commission exemplified with many privileges such as in his discretion he might demand—very many gentlemen of good estimation drew unto him to associate him in so commendable an enterprise, so that the preparation was expected to grow unto a puissant[13] fleet able to encounter a king's power by

1 hard events unfortunate outcomes.

2 heavy success and issue distressing or grievous fortune and outcome.

3 pretence intention, purpose.

4 misdeem suppose mistakenly.

5 regiment here, ability to govern or rule.

6 issue outcome, result.

7 carriage carrying, conveyance.

8 <*> The planting of God's word must be handled with reverence [Principal Navigations' note].

9 <*> All actions coloured by pretence of planting upon remote lands [Principal Navigations' note].

10 the very beginnings are entered with spoil i.e., the initial stages of colonization are marked by the desire for material profit.

11 particularly in detail.

12 <*> The first and great preparation of Sir Humphrey Gilbert [Principal Navigations' note].

13 puissant mighty, powerful.

sea. Nevertheless, amongst a multitude of voluntary men, their dispositions were diverse, which bred a jar[1] and made a division in the end, to the confusion of that attempt even before the same was begun. And when the shipping was in a manner prepared and men ready upon the coast to go aboard, at that time some broke consort and followed courses degenerating from the voyage before pretended; others failed of their promises contracted; and the greater number were dispersed, leaving the general with few of his assured friends, with whom he adventured to sea. Where, having tasted of no less misfortune, he was shortly driven to retire home with the loss of a tall ship, and (more to his grief) of a valiant gentleman, Miles Morgan.[2]

Having buried only in a preparation a great mass of substance,[3] whereby his estate was impaired, his mind yet not dismayed, he continued his former designment and purpose to revive this enterprise, good occasion serving.[4] Upon which determination standing long, without means to satisfy his desire, at last he granted certain assignments out of his commission to sundry persons of mean[5] ability, desiring the privilege of his grant to plant and fortify in the north parts of America about the river of Canada,[6] to whom if God gave good success in the north parts (where then no matter of moment was expected) the same (he thought) would greatly advance the hope of the south, and be a furtherance unto his determination that way. And the worst that might happen in that course might be excused without prejudice unto him by the former supposition: that those north regions were of no regard; but chiefly a possession taken in any parcel of those heathen countries, by virtue of his grant, did invest him of territories extending every way two hundred leagues. Which induced Sir Humphrey Gilbert to make those assignments, desiring greatly their expedition, because his commission did expire after six years if in that space he had not gotten actual possession.[7]

[...] Monday following,[8] the general had his tent set up, who being accompanied with his own followers summoned the merchants and masters, both English and strangers, to be present at his taking possession of those countries.[9] Before whom openly was read and interpreted unto the strangers his commission. By virtue whereof he took possession in the same harbour of St. John and two hundred leagues every way; invested the Queen's Majesty with the title and dignity thereof; had delivered unto him (after the custom of England) a rod and a turf of the same soil, entering possession also for him, his heirs and assignees forever; and signified unto all men that from that time forward they should take the same land as a territory appertaining to the Queen of England; and himself authorised under her Majesty to possess and enjoy it, and to ordain laws for the government thereof agreeable (so near as conveniently might be) unto the laws of England, under which all people coming thither hereafter, either to inhabit or by way of traffic, should be subjected and governed. And especially, at the same time for a beginning, he pro-

[1] jar dispute, quarrel.

[2] Gilbert's first expedition in 1578 was a complete failure. He returned to Plymouth after less than two months at sea, his plans undermined by quarrelling and disagreements among the participants. Leaving again on 18 November 1578, the fleet returned in May 1579, after a fateful encounter with the Spanish at Cape Verde (DNB, p. 1207). Miles Morgan remains unidentified.

[3] <*> A constant resolution of Sir Humphrey Gilbert [Principal Navigations' note].

[4] For Gilbert, the outcome of his first failed expedition was poverty and debt, since he had sunk a great deal of his own money into it (DNB, p. 1207).

[5] mean poor, inferior.

[6] I.e., the St. Lawrence River (Quinn, New American World, vol. 3, p. 341).

[7] The only way Gilbert could raise sufficient funds for another Newfoundland expedition was to sell off some of the rights he had received to possess, colonize, and exploit this New World territory from the Crown (granted under his royal charter of 1584). He maintained control, however, by requiring purchasers to submit their planned enterprises to his ultimate authority (DNB, p. 1207).

[8] <*> August 5 [Principal Navigations' note]. Arriving in St. John's Harbour on Saturday 3 August, Gilbert surveyed the area the next day, and quickly named the harbour as the site of the colony's chief settlement (DNB, p. 1208).

[9] <*> Possession taken [Principal Navigations' note].

posed and delivered three laws to be in force immediately.[1] That is to say: the first for religion, which in public exercise should be according to the Church of England; the second for maintenance of her Majesty's right and possession of those territories, against which if anything were attempted prejudicial, the party or parties offending should be adjudged and executed as in case of high treason, according to the laws of England; the third, if any person should utter words sounding to the dishonour of her Majesty, he should lose his ears, and have his ship and goods confiscate.

These contents published, obedience was promised by general voice and consent of the multitude, as well of Englishmen as strangers, praying for continuance of this possession and government begun. After this, the assembly was dismissed. And afterward were erected not far from that place the arms of England engraven in lead and infixed upon a pillar of wood.[2] Yet further and actually to establish this possession taken in the right of her Majesty and to the behoof[3] of Sir Humphrey Gilbert, knight, his heirs and assignees forever, the general granted in fee farm[4] divers parcels of land lying by the water side, both in this harbour of St. John and elsewhere, which was to the owners a great commodity, being thereby assured (by their proper inheritance) of grounds convenient to dress and to dry their fish, whereof many times before they did fail, being prevented by them that came first into the harbour. For which grounds they did covenant to pay a certain rent and service unto Sir Humphrey Gilbert, his heirs or assignees forever, and yearly to maintain possession of the same by themselves or their assignees.

[...]

While the better sort of us were seriously occupied in repairing our wants and contriving of matters for the commodity of our voyage, others of another sort and disposition were plotting of mischief.[5] Some casting to steal away our shipping by night, watching opportunity by the generals and captains lying on the shore, whose conspiracies discovered, they were prevented. Others drew together in company and carried away out of the harbours adjoining a ship laden with fish, setting the poor men on shore. A great many more of our people stole into the woods to hide themselves, attending time and means to return home by such shipping as daily departed from the coast. Some were sick of fluxes[6] and many dead; and, in brief, by one means or other our company was diminished, and many by the general licensed to return home. Insomuch as after we had reviewed our people resolved to see an end of our voyage, we grew scant of men to furnish all our shipping.[7]

[...]

So upon Saturday in the afternoon the 31st of August,[8] we changed our course and returned back for England, at which very instant, even in winding about, there passed along between us and towards the land which we now forsook a very lion to our seeming,[9] in shape, hair and colour, not swimming after the manner of a beast by moving of his feet, but rather sliding upon the water with his whole body (excepting the legs) in sight, neither yet diving under and again rising above the water, as the manner is of whales, dolphins,

---

1 <*> Three laws [Principal Navigations' note].

2 <*> Actual possession maintained in New-found-land [Principal Navigations' note].

3 behoof advantage, benefit, profit.

4 fee farm The owner of such a farm would hold it in fee-simple from Gilbert (i.e., the owner and his heirs would possess this land forever, without limitation to any particular class of heirs); in return, Gilbert would receive some kind of perpetual fixed rent, but he would not be entitled to any other services from the owner or his heirs.

5 <*> Misdemeanor in our company [Principal Navigations' note].

6 flux dysentery.

7 The first English colony had obvious problems from the outset: it was peopled by individuals unsuited to the project, including prisoners from English jails (DNB, p. 1208).

8 <*> August 31 [Principal Navigations' note]. Gilbert departed Newfoundland with the Delight, the Squirrel, and the Golden Hind—leaving behind the Swallow to ferry the sick and injured directly back to England—to explore the coast towards the south (DNB, p. 1208).

9 <*> A monster of the sea [Principal Navigations' note].

tunise,[1] porpoises and all other fish, but confidently showing himself above the water without hiding. Notwithstanding, we presented ourselves in open view and gesture to amaze him, as all creatures will be commonly at a sudden gaze and sight of men. Thus he passed along, turning his head to and fro, yawning and gaping wide with ugly demonstration of long teeth, and glaring eyes, and to bid us a farewell (coming right against the Hind) he sent forth a horrible voice, roaring or bellowing as doth a lion, which spectacle we all beheld so far as we were able to discern the same, as men prone to wonder at every strange thing, as this doubtless was, to see a lion in the ocean sea or fish in shape of a lion. What opinion others had thereof, and chiefly the general himself, I forbear to deliver. But he took it for bonum omen,[2] rejoicing that he was to war against such an enemy, if it were the Devil.

[...]

The weather fair, the general came aboard the Hind again,[3] to make merry together with the captain, master, and company, which was the last meeting, and continued there from morning until night.[4] During which time there passed sundry discourses touching affairs past and to come, lamenting greatly the loss of his great ship,[5] more of the men, but most of all of his books and notes, and what else I know not, for which he was out of measure grieved, the same doubtless being some matter of more importance than his books, which I could not draw from him.[6] Yet, by circumstance I gathered the same to be the ore which Daniel the Saxon had brought unto him in the New-found-land.[7] Whatsoever it was, the remembrance touched him so deep as, not able to contain himself, he beat his boy in great rage, even at the same time, so long after the miscarrying of the great ship, because upon a fair day, when we were becalmed upon the coast of Newfoundland, near unto Cape Race,[8] he sent his boy aboard the admiral[9] to fetch certain things, amongst which, this being chief, was yet forgotten and left behind. After which time he could never conveniently send again aboard the great ship, much less he doubted[10] her ruin so near at hand.

Herein my opinion was better confirmed diversely and by sundry conjectures, which maketh me have the greater hope of this rich mine. For whereas the general had never before good conceit[11] of these north parts of the world, now his mind was wholly fixed upon the New-found-land; and as before he refused not to grant assignments[12] liberally to them that required the same into these north parts, now he became contrarily affected, refusing to make any so large grants, especially of St. John's, which certain English merchants made suit for, offering to employ their money and travail[13] upon the same. Yet neither by their own suit nor of others of his own company,

[1] tunise Found in the Mediterranean and Atlantic, the tunny (tunise) it is one of the largest of food fishes, often reaching a length of ten feet.

[2] Latin, "good omen."

[3] <*> Our last conference with our general [Principal Navigations' note].

[4] On 2 September.

[5] On 29 August, the Delight (the admiral or chief ship of the fleet) ran aground and was destroyed on the "flats and shoals between Cape Breton Island and the edge of the bank of Newfoundland" (DNB, p. 1208); Quinn says, more specifically, that the ship struck aground on Sable Island (England, p. 238). Some few survivors made it to Newfoundland and from there were rescued by French sailors (Principal Navigations, vol. 3, pp. 156-57).

[6] <*> Circumstances to be well observed in our general, importing the ore to be of a silver mine [Principal Navigations' note]. See p. 658, note 7.

[7] the ore which Daniel the Saxon had brought unto him in the New-found-land Daniel remains unidentified. However, earlier in the narrative Gilbert's men have brought back mineral samples from Newfoundland which they believe contain silver. Gilbert's confident assertion that he expected Elizabeth I would lend him £10,000 for his next expedition suggests he believed that Newfoundland would prove an El Dorado. See below, p. 659, ll.765-85.

[8] Cape Race at the southern tip of Newfoundland, about 75 nautical miles from St. John's (Quinn, England, p. 177).

[9] See p. 652, note 1.

[10] doubted suspected.

[11] conceit opinion.

[12] assignments legal transference of a right or property; the document that effects or authorizes the transference.

[13] travail labour.

whom he seemed willing to pleasure, it could be obtained.

Also, laying down his determination in the spring following for disposing of his voyage then to be reattempted, he assigned the captain and master of the Golden Hind unto the south discovery, and reserved unto himself the north, affirming that this voyage had won his heart from the south, and that he was now become a northern man altogether. Last, being demanded what means he had at his arrival in England to compass the charges of so great preparation as he intended to make the next spring—having determined upon two fleets, one for the south, another for the north:

"Leave that to me," he replied. "I will ask a penny of no man. I will bring good tidings unto her Majesty, who will be so gracious to lend me £10,000," willing us therefore to be of good cheer. For he did thank God (he said) with all his heart for that he had seen, the same being enough for us all, and that we needed not to seek any further. And these last words he would often repeat, with demonstration of great fervency of mind, being himself very confident and settled in belief of inestimable good by this voyage; which the greater number of his followers nevertheless mistrusted altogether, not being made partakers of those secrets which the general kept unto himself. Yet all of them that are living may be witnesses of his words and protestations, which sparingly I have delivered.

Leaving the issue of this good hope unto God, who knoweth the truth only and can at his good pleasure bring the same to light, I will hasten to the end of this tragedy, which must be knit up in the person of our general.[1] And as it was God's ordinance upon him, even so the vehement persuasion and entreaty of his friends could nothing avail to divert him from a wilful resolution of going through in his frigate, which was overcharged upon their decks with fights,[2] netting, and small artillery, too cumbersome for so small a boat that was to pass through the ocean sea at that season of the year, when by course we might expect much storm of foul weather, whereof indeed we had enough.

But when he was entreated by the captain, master, and other his well-willers of the Hind not to venture in the frigate, this was his answer:[3]

"I will not forsake my little company going homeward with whom I have passed so many storms and perils."

And in very truth, he was urged to be so overhard by hard reports given of him, that he was afraid of the sea, albeit this was rather rashness than advised resolution to prefer the wind of a vain report to the weight of his own life.

[...]

Monday the 9th of September, in the afternoon, the frigate was near cast away, oppressed by waves, yet at that time recovered. And giving forth signs of joy, the general, sitting abaft[4] with a book in his hand, cried out unto us in the Hind (so oft as we did approach within hearing): "We are as near to Heaven by sea as by land!"[5] Reiterating the same speech, well-beseeming a soldier resolute in Jesus Christ, as I can testify he was.

The same Monday night, about twelve of the clock or not long after, the frigate being ahead of us in the Golden Hind suddenly her lights were out, whereof as it were in a moment we lost the sight; and withal our watch cried, "the general was cast away,"[6] which was too true. For in that moment the frigate was devoured and swallowed up of the sea. Yet still we looked out all that night and ever after, until we arrived upon the coast of England; omitting no small sail at sea, unto which we gave not the token between us agreed upon, to have perfect knowledge of each other, if we should at any time be separated.

---

1 <*> Wilfulness in the general [Principal Navigations' note].

2 fights a kind of screen used during a naval engagement to conceal and protect the crew of the vessel. Usually in plural.

3 <*> A token of a good mind [Principal Navigations' note].

4 abaft in the after part or stern half of the ship.

5 <*> A resolute and Christianlike saying in a distress [Principal Navigations' note].

6 <*> Sir Humphrey Gilbert drowned [Principal Navigations' note].

In great torment of weather and peril of drowning, it pleased God to send safe home the Golden Hind,[1] which arrived at Falmouth, the 22nd day of September, being Sunday, not without as great danger escaped in a flaw[2]—coming from the southeast with such thick mist that we could not discern land—to put in right with the Haven.

[...]

All the men tired with the tediousness of so unprofitable a voyage (to their seeming),[3] in which their long expense of time, much toil and labour, hard diet and continual hazard of life was unrecompensed; their captain nevertheless by his great charges impaired greatly thereby, yet comforted in the goodness of God, and his undoubted providence following him in all that voyage, as it doth always those at other times, whosoever have confidence in him alone. Yet have we more near feeling and perseverance of his powerful hand and protection when God doth bring us together with others into one same peril, in which he leaveth them and delivereth us, making us thereby the beholders but not partakers of their ruin.

Even so, amongst very many difficulties, discontentments, mutinies, conspiracies, sicknesses, mortality, spoilings, and wracks by sea—which were afflictions more than in so small a fleet or so short a time may be supposed, albeit true in every particularity, as partly by the former relation may be collected, and some I suppressed with silence for their sakes living—it pleased God to support this company: of which only one man died of a malady inveterate and long infested, the rest kept together in reasonable contentment and concord, beginning, continuing, and ending the voyage; which none else did accomplish, either not pleased with the action or impatient of wants,[4] or prevented by death.

Thus have I delivered the contents of the enterprise and last action of Sir Humphrey Gilbert, knight, faithfully, for so much as I thought mete[5] to be published; wherein may always appear (though he be extinguished) some sparks of his virtues,[6] he remaining firm and resolute in a purpose by all pretence[7] honest and godly, as was this: to discover, possess, and to reduce unto the service of God and Christian piety those remote and heathen countries of America, not actually possessed by Christians, and most rightly appertaining unto the crown of England. Unto the which, as his zeal deserveth high commendation, even so he may justly be taxed of temerity and presumption (rather) in two respects.

First,[8] when yet there was only probability, not a certain and determinate place of habitation selected, neither any demonstration of commodity there in esse,[9] to induce his followers, nevertheless he both was too prodigal of his own patrimony and too careless of other men's expenses to employ both his and their substance upon a ground imagined good. The which falling, very like his associates were promised, and made it their best reckoning to be salved some other way, which pleased not God to prosper in his first and great preparation.

Secondly, when by his former preparation he was enfeebled of ability and credit to perform his designments (as it were, impatient to abide in expectation better opportunity and means which God might raise), he thrust himself again into the action for which he was not fit, presuming the cause pretended on God's behalf would carry him to the desired end. Into which, having thus made reentry he could not yield again to withdraw, though he saw no encouragement to proceed, lest his credit soiled in his first attempt in a second should utterly be disgraced. Between extremities

---

1 <*> Arrival in England of the Golden Hind [Principal Navigations' note].

2 flaw a sudden burst or squall of wind.

3 <*> An ill recompense [Principal Navigations' note].

4 wants those things lacking.

5 mete appropriate, fit proper.

6 <*> Constancy in Sir Humphrey Gilbert [Principal Navigations' note].

7 pretence intention.

8 <*> His temerity and presumption [Principal Navigations' note].

9 in esse (medieval Latin phrase) in actual existence; as opposed to in posse, in potentiality.

he made a right aventure, putting all to God and good fortune, and (which was worst) refused not to entertain every person and means whatsoever to furnish out this expedition, the success whereof hath been declared.

But such is the infinite bounty of God, who from every evil deriveth good.[1] For besides that fruit may grow in time of our travelling into those northwest lands, the crosses, turmoils, and afflictions, both in the preparation and execution of this voyage, did correct the intemperate humours which before we noted to be in this gentleman, and made unsavoury and less delightful his other manifold virtues.

Then as he was refined, and made nearer drawing unto the image of God, so it pleased the divine will to resume him unto himself, whither both his and every other high and noble mind have always aspired.

[...]

The First Voyage Made to the Coasts of America,[2] with Two Barks, wherein Were Captains Master Philip Amadas and Master Arthur Barlowe,[3] Who Discovered Part of the Country Now Called Virginia, Anno 1584. Written by One of the Said Captains[4] and Sent to Sir Walter Ralegh, Knight, at Whose Charge and Direction the Said Voyage Was Set Forth.[5]

[...]

The 2nd of July we found shoal water,[6] where we smelt so sweet and so strong a smell[7] as if we had been in the midst of some delicate garden abounding with all kind of odoriferous flowers, by which we were assured that the land could not be far distant. And keeping good watch, and bearing

[1] <*> Afflictions needful in the children of God [Principal Navigations' note].

[2] This is the first narrative in the section dealing with voyages to Virginia.

[3] Little is known of Philip Amadas (sometimes, "Amadis") and Arthur Barlowe. Both were in Ralegh's service prior to their undertaking this voyage (Quinn, New American World, vol. 3, p. 282) and both were from Devonshire (C. Nicholl, The Creature in the Map, p. 25). Employing the ship's log, this account gives a very partial and highly-biased picture of Virginia as an earthly paradise; it was thus very useful for Ralegh in his New World lobbying efforts (Quinn, New American World, vol. 3, p. 276). Quinn conjectures that Amadas captained the Bark Ralegh, the ship that had fortunately been forced to abandon Gilbert's tragic 1583 voyage to Newfoundland, while Barlowe captained the Dorothy; both ships were Ralegh's (New American World, vol. 3, p. 276).

[4] by One of the Said Captains Barlowe (G.B. Parks, "Tudor Travel Literature: A Brief History," Hakluyt Handbook, vol. 1, pp. 111-12).

[5] Sir Walter Ralegh … Forth Ralegh received his letters patent from Elizabeth for the "free liberty and license ... to discover, search, find out and view such remote, heathen and barbarous lands, countries and territories not actually possessed by any Christian prince nor inhabited by Christian people; the same to have, hold, occupy and enjoy to him, his heirs and assigns forever" (qtd. in C. Nicholl, The Creature in the Map, p. 25). Soon after receiving his patent, Ralegh sent two ships to that part of the American coast between the settlements of northern Newfoundland and southern Florida. Previously known as Norumbega, Ralegh renamed this area "Virginia," in honour of his queen (ibid., p. 25).

[6] Amadas and Barlowe departed England on 27 April, setting sail first for Puerto Rico, before ultimately entering the Florida Channel—now, the Straits of Florida (Quinn, England, p. 255).

[7] <*> A sweet smell from the land [Principal Navigations' note].

but slack sail, the 4th of the same month we arrived upon the coast, which we supposed to be a continent and firm land,[1] and we sailed along the same a hundred and twenty English miles before we could find any entrance or river issuing into the sea.[2] The first that appeared unto us we entered, though not without some difficulty, and cast anchor about three harquebus[3] shot within the haven's mouth, on the left hand of the same. And after thanks given to God for our safe arrival thither, we manned our boats, and went to view the land next adjoining, and[4] to take possession of the same in the right of the Queen's most excellent majesty, as rightful queen and princess of the same, and after delivered the same over to your use, according to her Majesty's grant and letters patent, under her Highness's great seal.

Which being performed according to the ceremonies used in such enterprises, we viewed the land about us, being, whereas we first landed, very sandy and low towards the water's side,[5] but so full of grapes as the very beating and surge of the sea overflowed them, of which we found such plenty—as well there as in all places else, both on the sand and on the green soil on the hills, as in the plains, as well on every little shrub, as also climbing towards the tops of high cedars—that I think in all the world the like abundance is not to be found. And myself having seen those parts of Europe that most abound find such difference as were incredible to be written.

We passed from the seaside towards the tops of those hills next adjoining, being but of mean height,[6] and from thence we beheld the sea on both sides to the north and to the south, finding no end any of both ways. This land lay stretching itself to the west, which after we found to be but an island of twenty miles long and not above six miles broad. Under the bank or hill whereon we stood, we beheld the valleys replenished with goodly cedar trees; and having discharged our harquebus shot, such a flock of cranes (the most part white) arose under us, with such a cry redoubled by many echoes as if an army of men had shouted all together.

[...]

The next day there came unto us divers boats, and in one of them the King's brother,[7] accompanied with forty or fifty men, very handsome and goodly people, and in their behaviour as mannerly and civil as any of Europe. His name was Granganimeo, and the king is called Wingina, the country Wingandacoa, and now, by her Majesty, Virginia. The manner of his coming was in this sort: he left his boats altogether as the first man did a little from the ships by the shore, and came along to the place over against the ships, followed with forty men. When he came to the place, his servants spread a long mat upon the ground, on which he sat down, and at the other end of the mat four others of his company did the like; the rest of his men stood round about him, somewhat afar off. When we came to the shore to him with our weapons, he never moved from his place, nor any of the other four, nor never mistrusted any harm to be offered from us, but sitting still he beckoned us to come and sit by him, which we performed. And being set[8] he made all signs of joy and welcome, striking on his head and his breast and afterwards on ours to show we were all one, smiling and making show the best he could of all love and familiarity. After he had made a long speech unto us, we presented him with divers

[1] firm land the mainland as opposed to an island.

[2] <*> The first river [Principal Navigations' note]. On the difficulties in determining exactly which of the North Carolina islands Amadas and Barlowe initially made landfall on, see Quinn, England, pp. 254-57.

[3] harquebus an early type of portable gun, varying in size from a small cannon to a musket, which on account of its weight was, when used in the field, supported upon a tripod.

[4] <*> July 13 possession taken [Principal Navigations' note].

[5] <*> Abundance of grapes [Principal Navigations' note].

[6] <*> The Isle of Wokokon [Principal Navigations' note].

[7] <*> The arrival of the king's brother [Principal Navigations' note]. The English never met the King himself; as Barlowe notes elsewhere, at this time King Wingina was recuperating from a gunshot wound he had received from the king of a neighbouring country.

[8] I.e., and once we had sat down.

things, which he received very joyfully and thankfully. None of the company durst speak one word all the time. Only the four which were at the other end spoke one in the other's ear very softly.

[...]

After we had presented this his brother with such things as we thought he liked, we likewise gave somewhat to the others that sat with him on the mat. But presently he arose and took all from them and put it into his own basket, making signs and tokens that all things ought to be delivered unto him, and the rest were but his servants and followers. A day or two after this, we fell to trading with them, exchanging some things that we had for chamois, buff,[1] and deer skins.[2] When we showed him all our packet of merchandise, of all things that he saw a bright tin dish most pleased him, which he presently took up and clapped it before his breast, and after made a hole in the brim thereof and hung it about his neck,[3] making signs that it would defend him against his enemies' arrows; for those people maintain a deadly and terrible war with the people and king adjoining. We exchanged our tin dish for twenty skins, worth twenty crowns or twenty nobles, and a copper kettle for fifty skins, worth fifty crowns. They offered us good exchange for our hatchets and axes and for knives, and would have given anything for swords, but we would not depart with any.

After two or three days the King's brother came aboard the ships and drank wine, and ate of our meat and of our bread, and liked exceedingly thereof. And after a few days overpassed, he brought his wife with him to the ships, his daughter and two or three children. His wife was very well-favoured, of mean stature[4] and very bashful. She had on her back a long cloak of leather, with the fur side next to her body, and before her a piece of the same. About her forehead she had a band of white coral,[5] and so had her husband many times. In her ears she had bracelets of pearls hanging down to her middle (whereof we delivered your Worship a little bracelet), and those were of the bigness of good peas. The rest of her women of the better sort had pendants of copper hanging in either ear, and some of the children of the King's brother and other noblemen have five or six in either ear. He himself had upon his head a broad plate of gold or copper, for being unpolished we knew not what metal it should be, neither would he by any means suffer us to take it off his head, but feeling it, it would bow very easily.[6] His apparel was as his wife's, only the women wear their hair long on both sides and the men but on one. They are of colour yellowish and their hair black for the most part, and yet we saw children that had very fine auburn and chestnut-coloured hair.

After that these women had been there, there came down from all parts great store of people, bringing with them leather, coral, divers kinds of dyes very excellent, and exchanged with us. But when Granganimeo, the King's brother, was present, none durst trade but himself, except such as wear red pieces of copper on their heads like himself, for that is the difference between the noblemen and the governors of countries, and the meaner sort. And we both noted there, and you have understood since by these men which we brought home, that no people in the world carry more respect to their king, nobility, and governors than these do. The King's brother's wife, when she came to us (as she did many times), was followed with forty or fifty women always. And when she came into the ship, she left them all on land, saving her two daughters, her nurse, and one or two more. The King's brother always kept this order: as many boats as he would come withal to the ships, so many fires would he make on the shore afar off, to the end we might understand with what strength and company he approached.

[1] chamois antelope skins; buff buffalo.

[2] <*> Traffic with the Savages [Principal Navigations' note].

[3] <*> Tin much esteemed [Principal Navigations' note].

[4] of mean stature short.

[5] <*> White coral Pearls [Principal Navigations' note].

[6] Its malleability made it more likely to be gold than copper.

[...]

And the evening following, we came to an island which they call Roanoke,[1] distant from the harbour by which we entered seven leagues. And at the north end thereof was a village of nine houses, built of cedar and fortified round about with sharp trees to keep out their enemies, and the entrance into it made like a turnpike[2] very artificially.[3] When we came towards it, standing near unto the water's side, the wife of Granganimeo, the King's brother, came running out to meet us very cheerfully and friendly; her husband was not then in the village. Some of her people she commanded to draw our boat on shore for the beating of the billow. Others she appointed to carry us on their backs to the dry ground, and others to bring our oars into the house for fear of stealing. When we were come into the outer room,[4] having five rooms in her house, she caused us to sit down by a great fire, and after took off our clothes and washed them, and dried them again. Some of the women plucked off our stockings and washed them, some washed our feet in warm water, and she herself took great pains to see all things ordered in the best manner she could, making great haste to dress some meat for us to eat.

After we had thus dried ourselves, she brought us into the inner room,[5] where she set on the board standing along the house some wheat like frumenty;[6] sodden[7] venison and roasted; fish sodden, boiled, and roasted; melons raw and sodden; roots of divers kinds, and divers fruits. Their drink is commonly water, but while the grape lasteth they drink wine, and for want of casks to keep it, all the year after they drink water, but it is sodden with ginger in it and black cinnamon, and sometimes sassafras and divers other wholesome and medicinable herbs and trees. We were entertained with all love and kindness, and with as much bounty (after their manner) as they could possibly devise. We found the people most gentle, loving, and faithful, void of all guile and treason, and such as live after the manner of the golden age.[8] The people only care how to defend themselves from the cold in their short winter, and to feed themselves with such meat as the soil affordeth. Their meat is very well sodden and they make broth very sweet and savoury. Their vessels are earthen pots, very large, white, and sweet; their dishes are wooden platters of sweet timber. Within the place where they feed was their lodging, and within that their idol, which they worship,[9] of whom they speak incredible things.

While we were at meat, there came in at the gates two or three men with their bows and arrows from hunting, whom when we espied we began to look one towards another, and offered to reach our weapons. But as soon as she espied our mistrust, she was very much moved, and caused some of her men to run out, and take away their bows and arrows and break them, and withal beat the poor fellows out of the gate again. When we departed in the evening and would not tarry all night, she was very sorry, and gave us into our boat our supper half dressed, pots and all, and brought us to our boat side, in which we lay all night, removing the same a pretty distance from the shore. She, perceiving our jealousy,[10] was much grieved, and sent

---

[1] <*> Roanoke Island [Principal Navigations' note]. Roanoke Island, off the coast of North Carolina, was the site of the first serious English attempt to colonize the eastern coast of North America. Three expeditions (1585, 1586, and 1587) landed colonists on Roanoke; however, none of the colonies survived. For contemporary accounts of these ill-fated and tragic attempts at colonization, see Quinn, New American World: A Documentary History of North America to 1612—English Plans for North America. The Roanoake Voyages, New England Ventures, vol. 3 (New York, 1979). See also Quinn, Set Fair for Roanoke: Voyages and Colonies, 1584-1606 (Chapel Hill, 1985).

[2] turnpike a spiked barrier fixed in or across a road or passage, as a defence against sudden attack.

[3] artificially skilfully.

[4] <*> The great kindness of the King's brother's wife [Principal Navigations' note].

[5] <*> A solemn banquet [Principal Navigations' note].

[6] frumenty a wheat or spelt which could be used to make a coarse meal, like oatmeal.

[7] sodden boiled.

[8] golden age In classical literature, the golden age was the age of original human and natural perfection.

[9] <*> Their Idol [Principal Navigations' note].

[10] jealousy suspicion, mistrust.

divers men and thirty women to sit all night on the bank side by us, and sent us into our boats fine mats to cover us from the rain, using very many words to entreat us to rest in their houses. But because we were few men, and if we had miscarried the voyage had been in very great danger, we durst not adventure anything, though there was no cause of doubt,[1] for a more kind and loving people there cannot be found in the world, as far as we have hitherto had trial.

[...]

—1600

[1] doubt suspicion.

Lady Elizabeth Cooke Hoby Russell
1528-1609

As the third of the five daughters of Sir Anthony Cooke—reformist tutor to Edward VI, and Lady Anne Fitzwilliam Cooke—Elizabeth Russell was born into a family at the nexus of intellectual and political power throughout Elizabeth I's reign. The accomplishments of the Cooke sisters earned the household at Gidea Hall a reputation as a "female university."[1] As well as developing fluency in Latin, Greek, French, and Italian, the Cooke daughters became acquainted with a network of politically active young humanists who became highly influential in the latter half of the century. Mildred, the eldest, married William Cecil, Elizabeth I's chief secretary; Anne married Nicholas Bacon, Lord Keeper of the Great Seal; and Katherine married Sir Henry Killigrew, one of Elizabeth I's diplomats. The youngest Cooke sister, Margaret, died young. Elizabeth married Sir Thomas Hoby and, after his death, John, Lord Russell. Both of these men were active in literary and political circles. Hoby was a diplomat and scholar whose highly influential translation of Castiglione's The Courtier, a set of dialogues discussing the ethical, intellectual, military, and athletic qualifications of the ideal courtier, was published in 1561. Through the 1550s and 1560s, the sisters moved in a circle of international reformists, which included figures like Barnardino Ochino, John Ponet, and Theodore Beza. By 1572, the sisters' focus grew local as they acted in defence of Anne Locke's second husband. Edward Dering, a young and radical preacher, had insulted the Queen in a sermon when he argued that her tolerance of poorly educated clergy and corrupt leadership in the English Church was sinful. A volume, channelled to the Queen through Robert Dudley, earl of Leicester and one of Elizabeth's favourites, was compiled with the goal of restoring royal toleration of Dering. In it, a learned work by Bartolo Sylva was prefaced by dedicatory poems in Greek and Latin composed by the Cooke sisters.[2]

Russell's own work reflects a mingling of political concerns with the personal and familial. Her translation of John Ponet's A Way of Reconciliation of a Good and Learned Man, Touching the Truth, Nature and Substance of the Body and Blood of Christ in the Sacrament entered a hot debate within the English Church over Eucharistic doctrine. After the Elizabethan Settlement of 1559, which re-established the English Church independent of Rome, there was a perception, both internally and abroad, that the Church was splintering into a collection of schismatic sects. An early effort to produce unity came with Bishop John Jewel's Apologia Ecclesiae Anglicanae (1562), translated as An Apology of the Church of England (1564) by Russell's sister, Anne Cooke Bacon. One of the matters under dispute was the degree to which Christ was present in the bread and wine of the Eucharist, with the more Catholic factions arguing that Christ was carnally present and the more reformist for the idea that Christ's presence was purely symbolic. Russell's husband, Thomas Hoby, translated a work by Martin Bucer, whose views on transubstantiation appear to have strongly influenced the writers of the Apologia.[3] Ponet's conciliatory text argues that historical scholarship shows the participants in the debate to have shared beliefs about the Sacrament as, to some degree, symbolic, and transubstantiation as a spiritual rather than material process. Russell's preface represents her, too, as a peacemaker seeking to ameliorate division over the issue of Communion. Ponet's work was originally published by Anthony Cooke in 1557, while he was in exile on the Continent during Mary's reign,[4] and the comment in her dedicatory epistle that Ponet "in his life approved my translation with his own allowance" indicates Russell likely did the work around that time. Her translation was not printed until 1605, when the issue of the orientation and unity of the English Church arose again with the arrival of the new king, James I.

The other body of work for which Russell is known is funerary verse in Latin, Greek, and English, a genre that reflects the reality of mortality as both intensely private and very public. Outliving two husbands and four of her seven

---

[1] L. Schleiner, Tudor and Stuart Women Writers (Indiana, 1994), p. 34.

[2] For an account of this incident, see ibid., pp. 39-40.

[3] M.E. Lamb, "The Cooke Sisters: Attitudes toward Learned Women of the Renaissance," Silent But For the Word: Tudor Women as Patrons, Translators, and Writers of Religious Works, ed. M. Hannay (Kent, 1985), p. 112.

[4] E. Beilin, ed., Protestant Translators: Anne Lock Prowse and Elizabeth Russell, The Early Modern Englishwoman, ed. B. Travitsky and A. Lake Prescott (Aldershot, 2001), p. xi.

children,[1] Russell experienced a set of losses not unusual for women in this period, but for her they became the basis for literary production. On one hand, her mortuary verse is highly personal, mourning as it does the loss of family members; yet both language and location frequently render it more authoritative and public. In the selections below, Latin, Greek, and English are used to celebrate the lives of Russell's sister, brother-in-law, and husband. While the poem for Philip and Thomas Hoby that adorns their tomb in the Bisham church indicates Russell's personal grief, its details emphasize the successful political lives of both men. Even more public is the monument on which her cycle of Greek and Latin verses for her second husband, John Russell, appears. This combination of personal grief and panegyric is located in Westminster Abbey, the meeting place for the nation's politics and its religion.

EDITIONS: A way of reconciliation of a good and learned man. London: R. Barker, 1605. STC 21456; "Verse on the Hoby Tombs at Bisham" and "Elizabethae in Obitum Katharinae Sororis Epicaedia" in Louise Schleiner, Tudor and Stuart Women Writers. Bloomington: Indiana UP, 1994, pp. 205-06 and 210; and "A Lamentation for the Death of Mrs K. Killigrew" in George Ballard, Memoirs of Several Ladies of Great Britain. Oxford: W. Jackson, 1752, p. 206.

Selected Mortuary Verse

Verse on the Hoby Tombs at Bisham

Two worthy knights, and Hobys both by name
Inclosed within this marble stone doth rest;
Philip,[2] the first, in Caesar's court[3] hath fame,
Such as tofore[4] few legates like possessed.
A deep discovering head, a noble breast,
A courtier passing, and a courteous knight,
Zealous to God, whose gospel he professed
When greatest storms gan dim the sacred light.
A happy man, whom death hath now redeemed
From care to joy, that cannot be esteemed.
Thomas[5] in France possessed the legate's place,
And with such wisdom grew to guide the same
As had encreased great honour to his race,
If sudden Fate had not envied his fame.
Firm in God's truth, gentle and faithful friend,
Well learned and languaged, Nature beside
Gave comely shape, which made rueful his end,
Since in his flower in Paris town he died,
Leaving with child behind his woeful wife,
In foreign land oppressed with heaps of grief,
From part of which, when she discharged was
By fall of tears, that faithful wives do shed,
The corpse, with honour, brought she to this place,
Performing here all due unto the dead.
That done, this noble tomb she caused to make,
And both these brethren closed within the same,
A memory left here for virtue's sake,
In spite of death to honour them with fame.
Thus live they dead, and we learn well thereby,
That ye, and we, and all the world must die.

—composed, c. 1566

---

1 Schleiner, Tudor and Stuart Women Writers, p. 46.

2 Philip Philip Hoby (1505-58), Russell's brother-in-law and a diplomat.

3 Caesar's court the court of Charles V, Holy Roman Emperor, to which Philip Hoby was posted in 1548 and 1553.

4 tofore previously, before.

5 Thomas Thomas Hoby (1530-66), Russell's first husband, diplomat, and translator.

Elizabethae in Obitum Katharinae Sororis Epicaedia.

Εὐσεβίης, διδαχῆς, χομψείας, σεμνὸν ἄγαλμα,
Μειλιχιοῦ τε τρόπου, νήλεϊ πίπτε μορῷ.
Ἧς Καθαρίνα γλυχέια διχοτμηθεῖσα άδελφῆς,
Ἁρμονιὴν αύλῇ νῦν ποθέουσα πόλου.

Chara in valeto soror, in coelo morte triumphas,
Mors tua vita tibi, mors tamen illa tuis.
Mens tua labe carens, pietas, doctrina, modesta
Vita, lepos suavis digna fuere Deo.
Ut junxit sanguis, nos jungat in aethere Christus:
Interea taceo mortua morte tua.

A Lamentation for the Death of Mrs K. Killigrew[1]

By rig'rous fate, tho' learned, pious, fair,
She fell; no eloquence persuaded there.
Untimely snatch'd, sweet Katherine farewell,
'Tis thine in heav'nly harmony to dwell!

Farewell, dear sister, you shall Heav'n enjoy,
Crown'd by that death which does thy friends destroy.
Free was thy mind from ev'ry vicious stain,
Wit, learning, grace, did in thy bosom reign.
Thy blameless life well merited that Heav'n,
Which to thy hopes, (alas!) was early giv'n.
As blood on earth our friendly bosoms join'd,
Our souls, above, shall be in Christ combin'd.
Meantime in silence I thy death deplore,
Death by that fatal stroke, I can no more!

—composed, c. 1583

[1] Mrs. K. Killigrew Russell's sister, Katherine (?1530-83). The verses that follow translate the Greek and Latin texts above.

from A Way of Reconciliation of a Good and Learned Man, Touching the Truth, Nature and Substance of the Body and Blood of Christ in the Sacrament.

Translated out of Latin into English by the Right Honourable Lady Elizabeth Russell, Dowager.[2]

To the Right Honourable the Lord John Russell, Baron and Son and Heir to Francis, Earl of Bedford.

The Author to the Reader.

To seek the atonement[3] of men is to be commended and it hath a sure promise of God: blessed be the peace-makers.[4] But I fear me, lest in greedily following the same, it happen to me which chanceth to them that part frays,[5] while they seek others' safety, they bear the blows themselves. And I, while I study to make enemies friends, perhaps shall have small thanks of them. Which if it happen, the example of him shall comfort me, which said, "If I should please men, I should not be the servant of Christ."[6] Farewell, and endeavour thyself to please Christ.

To the Right Honourable My Most Entirely Beloved and Only Daughter, the Lady Anne Herbert,[7] Wife to the Lord Henry Herbert, Son and Heir Apparent to Edward the Most Noble Earl of Worcester.

Most virtuous and worthily beloved daughter, even as from your first birth and cradle I ever was most careful, above any worldly thing, to have you suck the perfect milk of sincere religion, so willing

[2] Dowager widow.

[3] atonement reconciliation, harmony.

[4] blessed be the peace-makers one of the petitions from the Sermon on the Mount (Matthew 5:3-11).

[5] frays skirmishes, conflicts

[6] If I should please men … servant of Christ See St. Paul in Galatians 1:10.

[7] Lady Anne Herbert Elizabeth Russell's only surviving daughter.

to end as I began, I have left to you, as my last legacy, this book. A most precious jewel to the comfort of your soul, being the work of a most good, learned, and worthy man, made above fifty years since in Germany, after by travail[1] a French creature, now naturalized by me into English like to his learned author, to whom from my part most honour and service is due. Surely at the first I meant not to have set it abroad in print, but myself only to have some certainty to lean unto, in a matter so full of controversy,[2] and to yield a reason of my opinion. But since by my lending the copy of mine own hand to a friend, I am bereft thereof by some, and fearing lest after my death it should be printed according to the humours of other and wrong of the dead, who in his life approved my translation with his own allowance, therefore dreading, I say, wrong to him above any other respect, I have by anticipation prevented the worst. I meant this to you, good daughter, for a New Year's gift, but altered by grief for your brother's broken arm. Farewell, my good sweet Nanne.[3] God bless thee with the continuance of the comfort of his Holy Spirit, that it may ever work in you, and persevere with you to the end, and in the end.

—1605

[1] travail labour.

[2] matter so full of controversy the question of transubstantiation (see above, p. 666).

[3] Nanne diminutive of Anne.

Fulke Greville, first Baron Brooke of Beauchamps Court
1554-1628

Most famous now as the intimate friend and biographer of Sir Philip Sidney, Fulke Greville came from a wealthy and well-connected Warwickshire family. Educated at Shrewsbury School and Jesus College (Cambridge), Greville impressed the young Sir Philip Sidney, who wrote in his childhood primer, "Fulke Greville is a good boy." As early as 1576, Sidney's father, Sir Henry Sidney, used his influence to gain the young man several offices, including clerk of the Council and clerk of the Signet (1577), as well as secretary to the Council of the Marches (1583). However, like Philip Sidney, Greville had his eye on the greater honours associated with a court career. Like Sidney, Greville became a favourite with Elizabeth I, but unlike Sidney he managed to retain her favour, although his desire to travel (against her wishes) led to some conflict. In the summer of 1585, both Greville and Sidney were preparing to join Drake on his expedition to the Spanish West Indies, but Elizabeth forbade their participation; later in 1597, the earl of Essex offered Greville the opportunity to travel to the Azores, but the Queen again refused permission. Greville's desire to participate in the military service so prized by Elizabethan gentlemen was also frustrated by Elizabeth's desire to keep her favourite close. Greville's desire to join Leicester's army in its 1586 expedition to the Low Countries met with the Queen's implacable opposition, although she allowed Sidney to go, leading to his tragic death at Zutphen on the 17th of October. After the Queen's refusal to allow him to travel to the Azores, Greville threw himself into civil service, holding a number of important offices and exercising his influence with Elizabeth in support of Francis Bacon's successful bid to become solicitor-general. Between 1603 and 1614, Greville's career stalled somewhat, and during this period he penned "A Treatise of Monarchy" and "A Dedication to Sir Philip Sidney," more commonly known as Life of Sidney, composed between 1610 and 1612.[1] Later under James I, however, Greville did achieve truly high office (chancellor and under-treasurer of the Exchequer [1614]; commissioner of the Treasury), and was made Baron Brooke in January 1620-21. His successful and lengthy career came to an unexpectedly violent end: he died of wounds inflicted by a long-time servant, disgruntled that he had been over-looked in Greville's will.

Although Greville was a friend to Edmund Spenser and a generous patron to a wide variety of writers (from the historian William Camden to the poets Daniel and Davies to the dramatist William d'Avenant), his earliest verse, particularly many of the early "Caelica" poems, seems to have arisen largely from emulating the examples of Sidney and Edward Dyer. Sidney's death was a serious blow to Greville, and his love and admiration for his friend are evident in Greville's continued attempts to protect Sidney's memory and literary reputation. He edited the first edition of Sidney's Arcadia before it was finally printed in 1590. However, Greville's actions as the self-appointed protector of Sidney's personal and literary legacy seem to have been contested by Sidney's sister, Mary, countess of Pembroke: she had her own version of the Arcadia published three years later.[2] The works Greville produced before 1603 show an increasing commitment to the political, religious, and philosophical issues which some of the later "Caelica" poems had begun to explore. During this time, Greville wrote his Senecan closet dramas (Mustapha, Alaham, and Antony and Cleopatra), which explore the spiritual, personal, and political dilemma of an individual in an absolute monarchy; a "Letter to an Honourable Lady" advocates a Stoic approach to these and other problems. Of these works, only Mustapha was published in Greville's lifetime (in 1609), and Greville himself understood all too well the politically-charged and thus personally-dangerous nature of his dramas in particular. Fearing that his Antony and Cleopatra might be seen as a commentary on Essex's attempted coup d'etat, he destroyed all his copies.[3] After 1621, when he lost his treasury office, Greville produced his other major works, "A Treatise of Humane Learning," "A Treatise of Wars," and "A Treatise of Religion." Even when his works were finally printed in 1633,[4] the more controversial were omitted, including "A Treatise on

---

1 J. Gouws, "Fulke Greville," DNB online, 2005

2 Ibid.

3 Ibid.

4 Certain Learned and Elegant Works of the Right Honourable Fulke, Lord Brooke, Written in his Youth and Familiar Exercise with Sir Philip Sidney (London).

Monarchy" (which was highly critical of the institution), "A Treatise on Religion," and indeed the "Dedication." The latter, certainly the best-known and arguably the most influential of Greville's works, was published finally in 1652, a time when the English public would be more sympathetic towards its critical attitude to the Stuarts and its promotion of a uncompromisingly hostile anti-Catholic foreign policy.

EDITION: "Caelica, containing CIX Sonnets" contained in Certaine learned and elegant workes of the Right Honourable Fulke Lord Brooke written in his youth, and familiar exercise with Sir Philip Sidney. London: Printed by E[lizabeth] P[urslowe] for Henry Seyle, 1633.

from Caelica, Containing CIX Sonnets[1]

XXII (22)

I with whose colours Myra dressed her head,
I, that wore posies of her own hand-making,
I, that mine own name in the chimneys read
By Myra finely wrought ere I was waking:
Must I look on, in hope time coming may
With change bring back my turn again to play?

I, that on Sunday at the church-stile[2] found,
A garland sweet, with true-love knots in flowers,
Which I to wear about mine arm was bound,
That each of us might know that all was ours:
Must I now lead an idle life in wishes?
And follow Cupid for his loaves and fishes?[3]

I, that did wear the ring her mother left,
I, for whose love she gloried to be blamed,
I, with whose eyes her eyes committed theft,
I, who did make her blush when I was named:
Must I lose ring, flowers, blush, theft and go naked,
Watching with sighs, till dead love be awaked?

I, that when drowsy Argus[4] fell asleep,
Like jealousy o'erwatched with desire,
Was even warned modesty to keep,
While her breath speaking kindled Nature's fire:
Must I look on a-cold, while others warm them?
Do Vulcan's brothers in such fine nets arm them?[5]

Was it for this that I might Myra see,
Washing the water with her beauties, white?
Yet would she never write her love to me;
Thinks wit of change while thoughts are in delight?
Mad girls must safely love, as they may leave,
No man can print a kiss, lines may deceive.

[1] The "Caelica poems" were composed over many years, although most were probably "begun between 1577 and 1580," with critics disagreeing on when they were completed (J. Rees, Fulke Greville, Lord Brooke, 1554-1628: A Critical Biography [London, 1971], pp. 78-79).

[2] church-stile the stile (an entrance through a fence or hedge which allows people through, but serves as a barrier to sheep or cattle) giving entrance to the churchyard.

[3] And follow Cupid for his loaves and fishes a reference to the miracle whereby Christ made five loaves of bread and two fish feed 5,000. Even when each person had eaten all he or she wanted, there was enough bread left over to fill twelve baskets (John 6:8-14, Matthew 14:13-21, Mark 6:32-44, Luke 9:10-17).

[4] Argus a mythical creature with a hundred eyes; since only two were ever closed at once, he was appointed by Juno to guard Io, a beautiful maiden whom Jupiter had transformed into a heifer in an attempt to hide her from his wife.

[5] a reference to Vulcan, the god of the forge, who trapped his brother, Mars, the god of war, and Vulcan's wife, Venus, under a net while they were making love. See ll. 24-28.

LVI (56)[1]

All my senses, like beacons' flame,
Gave alarum to desire
To take arms in Cynthia's name,
And set all my thoughts on fire:
Fury's wit persuaded me,
Happy love was hazard's heir,
Cupid did best shoot and see
In the night where smooth is fair;
Up I start believing well
To see if Cynthia were awake;
Wonders I saw, who can tell?
And thus unto myself I spake:
"Sweet god Cupid where am I,
That by pale Diana's[2] light,
Such rich beauties do espy,
As harm our senses with delight?
Am I borne up to the skies?
See where Jove and Venus[3] shine,
Showing in her heavenly eyes
That desire is divine;
Look where lies the Milken Way,
Way unto that dainty throne,
Where while all the gods would play,
Vulcan thinks to dwell alone,
Shadowing it with curious art,
Nets of sullen golden hair,
Mars am I, and may not part,
Till that I be taken there."
Therewithal I heard a sound,
Made of all the parts of love,
Which did sense delight and wound;
Planets with such music move.[4]
Those joys drew desires near.
The heavens blushed, the white showed red,
Such red as in skies appear
When Sol parts from Thetis'[5] bed.
Then unto myself I said,
"Surely I Apollo am,
Yonder is the glorious maid
Which men do Aurora[6] name,
Who for pride she hath in me
Blushing forth desire and fear,
While she would have no man see,
Makes the world know I am there.
I resolve to play my son,[7]
And misguide my chariot fire:
All the sky is overcome,
And inflame with my desire."
I gave reins to this conceit,
Hope went on the wheel of lust:
Fancy's scales are false of weight,[8]
Thoughts take thought that go of trust.[9]
I stepped forth to touch the sky,
I a god by Cupid dreams,
Cynthia who did naked lie,
Runs away like silver streams;
Leaving hollow banks behind,
Who can neither forward move,
Nor if rivers be unkind,
Turn away or leave to love.
There stand I, like the Arctic Pole,
Where Sol passeth o'er the line,[10]
Mourning my benighted soul,
Which so loseth light divine.
There stand I like men that preach
From the execution place,
At their death content to teach

[1] LV (55) in Certain Learned and Elegant Works (1633). Lines 25-48 are included in the Greville MSS. in the British Library, but are missing from the 1633 and subsequent editions. I have followed N. Powell in restoring these lines here. See Fulke Greville, Selected Poems, ed. N. Powell (Manchester, 1990), p. 122.

[2] Diana the moon, after the classical goddess of the moon, the hunt, and virginity. One of Diana's alternate names was "Cynthia"; both were popular epithets for Elizabeth I.

[3] Jove and Venus as planets beheld from Earth, Venus is still called "the evening star," while Jove refers to Jupiter.

[4] a reference to the divine music produced by the motion of the planetary spheres.

[5] Thetis the sea, after one of the Nereids, daughters of an ancient sea-god.

[6] Apollo god of the sun and music; Aurora goddess of the dawn.

[7] my son i.e., Apollo's son, Phaethon. He persuaded his father to let him drive the chariot of the sun across the sky, but the young boy was unable to control the fiery horses. Zeus was forced to strike him down with a thunderbolt to stop the careening chariot from immolating heaven and earth.

[8] false of weight incorrectly balanced in order to cheat the customer.

[9] i.e., thoughts are anxious that rely entirely on trust.

[10] the line the equator.

All the world with their disgrace:[1]
He that lets his Cynthia lie,
Naked on a bed of play,
To say prayers ere she die,[2]
Teacheth time to run away:
Let no love-desiring heart,
In the stars go seek his fate,
Love is only Nature's art,
Wonder hinders love and hate.
None can well behold with eyes,
But what underneath him lies.

LXXXVIII (88)

Man, dream no more of curious[3] mysteries,
As what was here before the world was made,
The first man's life, the state of paradise,
Where Heaven is, or Hell's eternal shade,
For God's works are like him, all infinite;
And curious[4] search, but crafty sin's delight.

The flood that did, and dreadful fire that shall,
Drown, and burn up the malice of the earth,[5]
The divers tongues, and Babylon's downfall,[6]
Are nothing to the man's renewed birth;
First, let the law[7] plough up thy wicked heart,
That Christ may come, and all these types[8] depart.

When thou hast swept the house that all is clear,[9]
When thou the dust hast shaken from thy feet,[10]
When God's all-might doth in thy flesh appear,
Then seas with streams above the sky do meet;[11]
For goodness only doth God comprehend,
Knows what was first, and what shall be the end.

XC (90)

The Turkish government allows no law,
Men's lives and states depend on his behest;
We think subjection there a servile awe,
Where nature finds both honour, wealth and rest.
Our Christian freedom is, we have a law,
Which even the heathen think no power should wrest;[12]
Yet proves it crooked as power lists to draw,[13]
The rage or grace that lurks in princes' breasts.
Opinion bodies may to shadows give,[14]
But no burnt zone[15] it is, where people live.

C (100)

In night when colours all to black are cast,
Distinction lost, or gone down with the light;
The eye a watch to inward senses placed,
Not seeing, yet still having power of sight,

Gives vain alarums to the inward sense,
Where fear stirred up with witty tyranny,
Confounds all powers, and thorough self-offence,
Doth forge and raise impossibility:

---

[1] It was common practice for those condemned to death to make a speech from the scaffold, one which usually (but not always) spoke of the individual's guilt and repentance and urged the spectators to avoid the like fate.

[2] die with a pun on "have sexual orgasm."

[3] curious abstruse, recondite.

[4] curious too minute, unduly inquisitive.

[5] a reference to the flood in Genesis 7 and to the final fiery destruction of the world in Revelation 8.

[6] divers diverse; Babylon's downfall When the Babylonians determined to build a tower that would reach to heaven, God disrupted their plans by introducing different languages among them creating chaos and dissension (Genesis 11:1-9). Babylon's downfall is also related in Revelation 18:1-24.

[7] law i.e., the law of God, contained in the Scriptures.

[8] type a person, object, or event in the Old Testament thought to prefigure a person, object, or event in the New Testament. In Christ, it was believed, all of these Old Testament types (like Moses and Joseph) were fulfilled and supersceded.

[9] See Luke 15:8.

[10] See Luke 10:11 and Acts 13:51.

[11] "Then seas … do meet" perhaps a reference to Psalm 104:6.

[12] wrest pervert.

[13] lists to draw pleases or wishes to draw out.

[14] I.e., opinion may tend to make what is illusory seem real or solid.

[15] burnt zone the torrid zone, the region of the earth between the tropics.

Such as in thick depriving darkness,
Proper reflections of the error be,
And images of self-confusedness,
Which hurt imaginations only see;
And from this nothing seen, tells news of devils,
Which but expressions be of inward evils.

CVIII (108)

What is the cause, why states, that war and win,
Have honour, and breed men of better fame,
Than states in peace, since war and conquest sin
In blood, wrong liberty, all trades of shame?
Force-framing instruments, which it must use,
Proud in excess, and glory to abuse.

The reason is: peace is a quiet nurse
Of idleness, and idleness the field
Where wit and power change all seeds to the worse,
By narrow self-will upon which they build,
And thence bring forth captived inconstant ends,
Neither to princes, nor to people friends.

Besides, the sins of peace on subjects feed,
And thence would power, which for it all things can,
With wrong to one despairs in many breed,
For while laws' oaths, power's creditors to man,
Make humble subjects dream of native right,
Man's faith abused adds courage to despite.

Where conquest works by strength, and stirs up fame,
A glorious echo, pleasing doom of pain,
Which in the sleep of death yet keeps a name,
And makes detracting loss speak ill in vain.

For to great actions time so friendly is,
As o'er the means (albeit the means be ill)
It casts forgetfulness; veils things amiss,
With power and honour to encourage will.

Besides things hard a reputation bear,
To die resolved though guilty wonder breeds,
Yet what strength those be which can blot out fear,
And to self-ruin joyfully proceeds,
Ask them that from the ashes of this fire,
With new lives still to such new flames aspire.[1]

CIX (109)[2]

Sion[3] lies waste, and thy Jerusalem,
O Lord, is fall'n to utter desolation,
Against thy prophets, and thy holy men,
The sin hath wrought a fatal combination,
Profaned thy name, thy worship over-thrown,
And made thee living Lord, a God unknown.

Thy powerful laws, thy wonders of creation,
Thy word incarnate,[4] glorious Heaven, dark Hell,
Lie shadowed under man's degeneration,
Thy Christ still crucified for doing well,
Impiety, O Lord, sits on thy throne,
Which makes thee living light, a God unknown.

---

[1] Yet … aspire Greville's image here depends on the myth of the Phoenix, that fabled bird that every 500 years builds its own pyre, immolates itself, and then arises renewed and reborn from its own ashes; a common symbol of Christ and the resurrection.

[2] This poem echoes Isaiah 64:10.

[3] Sion In the Old Testament, Sion or Zion refers to the Temple Mount in Jerusalem and thus the Temple itself. In the New Testament, "the heavenly Jerusalem" or "Zion" refers metaphorically to the Christian Church.

[4] Thy word incarnate Although Christ is often referred to as "the word incarnate," here the reference is more generally to God's creation of the universe through his word, and thus creation's status as the word (of God) made material.

Man's superstition hath thy truths entombed,
His atheism again her pomps defaceth,
That sensual unsatiable vast womb
Of thy seen Church, thy unseen Church disgraceth;[1]
There lives no truth with them that seem thine own,
Which makes thee living Lord, a God unknown.

Yet unto thee, Lord (mirror of transgression),
We, who for earthly idols have forsaken
Thy heavenly image (sinless pure impression),
And so in nets of vanity lie taken,
All desolate implore that to thine own,
Lord, thou no longer live a God unknown.

Yet Lord let Israel's plagues not be eternal,
Nor sin forever cloud thy sacred mountains,
Nor with false flames spiritual but infernal,
Dry up thy mercies' ever-springing fountains,
Rather, sweet Jesus, fill up time and come,[2]
To yield the sin her everlasting doom.

—composed, c. 1577/80-1600?; published, 1633

[1] Of thy seen Church, thy unseen Church disgraceth The Visible Church, the church as consisting of its professed members upon earth, is contrasted with the Church Invisible or Mystical, the church as consisting of those elected or chosen by God (including those elect who have died and those still living). Greville's Calvinist sympathies led him to perceive the Church of England in its ceremonies, symbols, and sacraments as a corrupt Visible Church.

[2] Rather, sweet Jesus, fill up time and come cf. John's prayer at the end of Revelation (22:20).

Sir Philip Sidney
1554-1586

Katherine Duncan-Jones has argued that "Sidney is the earliest English writer of whom something approximating to a 'literary biography' can be written," given the extent of his literary production and the memorializing of his life in contemporary eulogies, biographies, memoirs, and elegies.[1] His life, however, is as much caught up in personal and cultural myth as is that of Sir Walter Ralegh. A member of an illustrious family, Sidney excelled in many of the occupations and interests thought fitting for a gentleman: learning, piety, military action, and public service. He became—through the eulogies and biographies published after his death—the exemplar of the Protestant soldier and Christian gentleman. When he was lying wounded at the battle of Zutphen in Flanders (a battle which often appears in eulogies for Sidney as evidence of his commitment to international Protestantism), he is said to have given a cup of water offered him to a dying soldier, saying "Thy need is greater than mine." Sidney died of gangrene soon after.

Born the son of Sir Henry Sidney, lord deputy of Ireland from 1565, and his wife Mary, sister of Queen Elizabeth I's favourite, Robert Dudley, the earl of Leicester, Sidney proved from childhood to have exceptional promise as a student, excelling in his studies at Shrewsbury School and at Christ Church, Oxford, although he left the latter without taking his degree. During his European tour, he made friends with prominent Protestant intellectuals, and learned a great deal about the Continent's political and religious situation. His experiences abroad included being in or near Paris at the time of the infamous slaughter of Protestants at the St. Bartholomew's Day Massacre (24 August 1572). This particular experience shaped the views for which he later died: that the Protestant powers of Europe needed to unite politically against the powerful Catholic countries of Italy, Spain, and France, and that England had a responsibility to aid its Protestant brethren who were attacked, as in the Low Countries, by these Catholic powers. Returning to England, Sidney went to court, where he became a member of the so-called "Areopagus," a circle of poets, philosophers, and scholars that included the humanist writer Gabriel Harvey. This circle aimed at increasing the social status and the technical and thematic scope of English poetry. While spending time with his father in Ireland, Sidney met and fell in love with Penelope Devereux, daughter of the commander of the army in Ireland, Walter Devereux, earl of Essex. Sadly, while her father approved of the match, he died in 1576, before the matter could be finalized, and Penelope was instead married to Lord Rich in 1581. In the meantime, Sidney was becoming increasingly and publicly associated with the cause of Protestantism on the Continent; however, Elizabeth I was herself always less enamoured with this notion than many of her courtiers and counsellors. Sidney subsequently wrote a most undiplomatic letter criticizing Elizabeth for her contemplated marriage with the Duke of Alençon and a subsequent alliance with Catholic France.

Having angered Elizabeth and quarrelled with the earl of Oxford, one of the supporters of this French alliance, Sidney withdrew from court from 1580 to 1581, living mostly at Wilton, the estate of his sister Lady Mary Sidney Herbert, countess of Pembroke. Here he wrote his two major works: the sonnet sequence Astrophil and Stella is based upon his courtship and eventual loss of Penelope Devereux; the prose romance, The Countess of Pembroke's Arcadia, written for his sister and published four years after his death, was one of the most popular and influential works of prose fiction in English literature, subjected to endless reprints and imitations. However, while Sidney's literary career soared—at least in the coterie market in which his manuscripts were circulated and reproduced—his political career stalled. Although the Queen forgave him in 1582, he found advancement hard to achieve. His marriage to Frances Walsingham in 1583 also displeased the Queen, but she did eventually authorize his journey to Flushing in the Netherlands to serve under Leicester. And it was in the Netherlands, at Zutphen, that he died. His state funeral in 1587 occasioned an outpouring of grief and more than 200 eulogies were written in his memory, although it is well to keep in mind that many of these eulogies had the dual aim of grieving for this exemplary Christian soldier and furthering the cause of international Protestantism, for which Sidney himself had given his life.

[1] Sir Philip Sidney: Courtier Poet (New Haven, 1990), p. ix.

EDITIONS: Astrophil and Stella in Sir Philip Sidney: Selected Poems. Ed. Katherine Duncan-Jones. Oxford: Clarendon P, 1973 (excerpts from the texts and notes to Sir Philip Sidney: Selected Poems. Ed. Katherine Duncan-Jones [Oxford, 1982] are reproduced by permission of the Clarendon Press, Oxford); The Countesse of Pembrokes Arcadia. London: Printed [by John Windet] for William Ponsonby, 1593. STC 22540; The defence of poesie. London: Printed [by Thomas Creede] for William Ponsonby, 1595. STC 22535; The Sidney Family Correspondence. Letters and Memorials of State. Ed. A. Collins. 2 vols., London, 1746. Vol.1, pp. 271-72, 293-96.

from Astrophil and Stella

1

Loving in truth, and fain[1] in verse my love to show,
That she (dear she)[2] might take some pleasure of my pain;
Pleasure might cause her read, reading might make her know;
Knowledge might pity win, and pity grace obtain;
I sought fit words to paint the blackest face of woe,
Studying inventions fine, her wits to entertain;
Oft turning others' leaves,[3] to see if thence would flow
Some fresh and fruitful showers upon my sunburnt brain.
But words came halting forth, wanting invention's stay;[4]
Invention, nature's child, fled step-dame study's blows;
And others' feet still seemed but strangers in my way.
Thus great with child[5] to speak, and helpless in my throes,
Biting my truant pen, beating myself for spite,
"Fool," said my muse to me; "look in thy heart, and write."[6]

5

It is most true, that eyes are formed to serve
The inward light;[7] and that the heavenly part
Ought to be king, from whose rules who do swerve,
Rebels to nature, strive for their own smart.
It is most true, what we call Cupid's dart,
An image is, which for ourselves we carve;
And, fools, adore in temple of our heart,
Till that good god make Church and churchmen starve.
True, that true beauty virtue is indeed,
Whereof this beauty can be but a shade,[8]
Which elements with mortal mixture breed;[9]

---

1 fain desirous.

2 That she (dear she) in Ringler's edition (following quartos and manuscript copies), "the dear she." Duncan-Jones's reading is from the 1598 folio.

3 leaves i.e., leaves of books.

4 stay prop, support.

5 great with child heavily pregnant.

6 As many critics have pointed out (among them C.S. Lewis, M. Doran, and K. Duncan-Jones), such protestations of sincerity are conventional in Renaissance writing.

7 inward light reason, understanding.

8 shade shadow.

9 Which elements with mortal mixture breed "a reference to the Platonic theory that mortal beauty, clothed in the physical elements, is only a shadow of absolute virtue; the elements combine in a perishable way (e.g., Republic, ch. x.)" (Duncan-Jones, Sir Philip Sidney: Selected Poems, p. 215, note 5.11).

True, that on earth we are but pilgrims made,
And should in soul up to our country move;
True; and yet true, that I must Stella love.

9

Queen Virtue's court, which some call Stella's face,
Prepared by nature's chiefest furniture,[1]
Hath his front built of alablaster[2] pure;
Gold is the covering of that stately place.
The door, by which sometimes comes forth her grace,
Red porphyr[3] is, which lock of pearl makes sure;
Whose porches rich (which name of "cheeks" endure)
Marble, mixed red and white, do interlace.
The windows now through which this heavenly guest
Looks o'er the world, and can find nothing such
Which dare claim from those lights the name of "best,"
Of touch they are that without touch doth touch,
Which Cupid's self from beauty's mine did draw:
Of touch they are, and poor I am their straw.[4]

21

Your words, my friend, right healthful caustics,[5] blame
My young mind marred, whom love doth windlass so
That mine own writings like bad servants show,
My wits, quick in vain thoughts, in virtue lame;
That Plato I read for nought, but if[6] he tame
Such coltish gyres;[7] that to my birth I owe
Nobler desires, lest else that friendly foe,
Great expectation, wear a train of shame.
For since mad March great promise made of me,[8]
If now the May of my years much decline,
What can be hoped my harvest time will be?[9]
Sure you say well; your wisdom's golden mine
Dig deep with learning's spade; now tell me this,
Hath this world aught so fair as Stella is?

23

The curious wits, seeing dull pensiveness
Bewray[10] itself in my long settled eyes,

[1] furniture i.e., her best materials.

[2] front forehead; alablaster a smooth, fine white stone, often used for constructing public buildings.

[3] porphyr i.e., porphyry, a decorative red or purple stone.

[4] Lines 12-14: "This elaborate punning metaphor ... plays on three or four senses of 'touch': Stella's eyes are of touch-stone (black marble) [lignite or jet is a glossy black stone which can attract other lighter objects, like straw, through the use of static electricity] which without physical contact has an emotive effect. The last line either sustains the 'touch-stone' metaphor, or introduces yet another reference, to 'touch-paper' or 'touch-wood,' which sets the straw alight. The new image in the last line would be typical of the many sonnets in which Sidney introduces a surprise or twist in the last line" (Duncan-Jones, Sir Philip Sidney: Selected Poems, p. 216, note 9.12-14).

[5] caustics in medicine, a substance that burns and destroys diseased tissue.

[6] but if unless.

[7] coltish gyres youthful capers, like the wild circles that a young horse makes; probably Sidney is referring here to Plato's image of reason as a charioteer reigning in and controlling the horses of passion (Phaedrus 254); see the similar image at the opening of Sidney's Defence of Poesy.

[8] mad March great promise made of me "a reference to the extraordinary success of Sidney's three years of foreign travel, in which he impressed scholars and politicians with his wit, charm, learning, and promise as a possible leader of Protestant Europe against Spain. His youth at the time—nineteen to twenty-two—might have led his friends to expect something more of the sowing of wild oats suggested by 'mad March'" (Duncan-Jones, Sir Philip Sidney: Selected Poems, p. 217, note 21.9).

[9] In lines 5-11, the speaker repeats back to his friend the objections that this friend has made to the speaker's love for Stella.

[10] Bewray reveal.

Whence these same fumes[1] of melancholy rise
With idle pains, and missing aim, do guess.
Some, that know how my spring I did address,[2]
Deem that my Muse some fruit of knowledge plies;
Others, because the prince[3] my service tries,
Think that I think state errors to redress.
But harder judges judge ambition's rage,
Scourge of itself, still climbing slippery place,
Holds my young brain captived in golden cage.
O fools, or over-wise: alas, the race
Of all my thoughts hath neither stop nor start
But only Stella's eyes and Stella's heart.

27

Because I oft, in dark abstracted guise,
Seem most alone in greatest company,
With dearth of words, or answers quite awry,
To them that would make speech of speech arise,
They deem, and of that doom[4] the rumour flies,[5]
That poison foul of bubbling pride doth lie
So in my swelling breast, that only I
Fawn on myself, and others do despise.[6]
Yet pride, I think, doth not my soul possess,
Which looks too oft in his unflatt'ring glass;
But one worse fault, ambition, I confess,
That makes me oft my best friends overpass,
Unseen, unheard, while thought to highest place
Bends all his powers, even unto Stella's grace.

47

What, have I thus betrayed my liberty?
Can those black beams such burning marks[7] engrave
In my free side? or am I born a slave,
Whose neck becomes[8] such yoke of tyranny?
Or want[9] I sense to feel my misery?
Or sprite,[10] disdain of such disdain to have,
Who for long faith, though daily help I crave,
May get no alms, but scorn of beggary?
Virtue, awake: beauty but beauty is;
I may, I must, I can, I will, I do,
Leave following that, which it is gain to miss.
Let her go. Soft, but here she comes. Go to,[11]
Unkind, I love you not—: O me, that eye
Doth make my heart give to my tongue the lie.

53

In martial sports I had my cunning tried,[12]
And yet to break more staves did me address,[13]
While with the people's shouts, I must confess,
Youth, luck and praise even filled my veins with pride;
When Cupid, having me, his slave, descried[14]
In Mars's livery, prancing in the press:[15]

---

1 these same fumes in Ringler, "those same fumes."
2 how my spring I did address i.e., how I spent my youthful years.
3 the prince the queen.
4 that doom in Ringler, "their doom."
5 I.e., they judge, and of that judgement.
6 do despise in Ringler, "to despise."
7 burning marks literally, the marks of ownership branded onto a slave's body.
8 becomes is suited to.
9 want lack.
10 sprite spirit.
11 Go to exclusively used in this case to express disapprobation, disapproval.
12 cunning tried skill proven.
13 staves long poles used in jousting or tilting contests; lances; did me address i.e., I readied myself to accomplish.
14 descried discerned, noticed.
15 livery the colours and often the cut of clothing which identified a person as belonging to the household of a particular nobleman or aristocratic family; here, Sidney represents Astrophil as a liveried servant in the household of Mars, Roman god of war; press crowd, throng.

"What now, sir fool," said he; "I would no less,
Look here, I say." I looked, and Stella spied,
Who hard by[1] made a window send forth light.
My heart then quaked, then dazzled were mine eyes,
One hand forgot to rule, th'other to fight;
Nor trumpet's[2] sound I heard, nor friendly cries;
My foe came on, and beat the air[3] for me,
Till that her blush taught me my shame to see.

63

O grammar rules, O now your virtues show:
So children still read you with awful[4] eyes,
As my young dove may in your precepts wise,
Her grant to me, by her own virtue, know.
For late, with heart most high, with eyes most low,
I craved the thing, which ever she denies:
She, lightning love, displaying Venus' skies,
Lest once should not be heard, twice said, "No, no."
Sing then, my Muse, now Io Paean[5] sing;
Heavens, envy not at my high triumphing,
But grammar's force with sweet success confirm.
For grammar says (Oh this, dear Stella, weigh),
For grammar says (to grammar who says nay?)
That in one speech two negatives affirm.

71

Who will in fairest book of nature know
How virtue may best lodged in beauty be,
Let him but learn of love to read in thee,
Stella, those fair lines which true goodness show.
There shall he find all vices' overthrow,
Not by rude force, but sweetest sovereignty
Of reason, from whose light those night-birds fly,
That inward sun in thine eyes shineth so.
And not content to be perfection's heir
Thy self, dost strive all minds that way to move,
Who mark[6] in thee what is in thee most fair;
So while thy beauty draws the heart to love,
As fast thy virtue bends that love to good.
But ah, desire still cries: "Give me some food."

81

O kiss, which dost those ruddy gems impart,
Or[7] gems, or fruits of new-found paradise,
Breathing all bliss, and sweetening to the heart,
Teaching dumb lips a nobler exercise;[8]
O kiss, which souls, even souls together ties
By links of love, and only nature's art;
How fain[9] would I paint thee to all men's eyes,
Or of thy gifts at least shade out[10] some part.
But she forbids; with blushing words, she says
She builds her fame on higher seated praise;
But my heart burns, I cannot silent be.

---

1 hard by close by.
2 trumpet's the conventional signal to begin a combat.
3 to beat the air to fight to no purpose or against no opposition.
4 awful full of awe or respect.
5 Io Paean a Greek shout of victory.
6 mark perceive, make note of.
7 Or either.
8 I.e., kissing is a nobler activity for lips than speaking.
9 fain happily.
10 shade out roughly sketch.

Then since (dear life) you fain would have me peace,[1]
And I, mad with delight, want wit[2] to cease,
Stop you my mouth with still still kissing me.

82

Nymph of the garden where all beauties be;
Beauties, which do in excellency pass
His[3] who till death looked in a watery glass,
Or hers[4] whom naked the Trojan boy did see:
Sweet garden nymph, which keeps the cherry tree,
Whose fruit doth far th'Hesperian taste[5] surpass;
Most sweet-fair, most fair-sweet, do not, alas,
From coming near those cherries banish me.
For though, full of desire, empty of wit,
Admitted late by your best-graced grace,
I caught at one of them a hungry bit;
Pardon that fault, once more grant me the place,
And I do swear, even by the same delight,
I will but kiss, I never more will bite.

83

Good brother Philip,[6] I have borne you long;
I was content you should in favour creep,
While craftily you seemed your cut to keep,[7]
As though that fair soft hand did you great wrong.
I bare (with envy) yet I bare your song,
When in her neck you did love-ditties peep;
Nay, more fool I, oft suffered you to sleep
In lilies' nest, where love's self lies along.
What, doth high place ambitious thoughts augment?
Is sauciness reward of courtesy?
Cannot such grace your silly self content,
But you must needs with those lips billing[8] be,
And through those lips drink nectar from that tongue?
Leave that, sir Phip, lest off your neck be wrung.

85

I see the house; my heart, thy self contain;
Beware full sails drown not thy tottering barge,
Lest joy, by nature apt sprites to enlarge,
Thee to thy wrack beyond thy limits strain;
Nor do like lords, whose weak confused brain,
Not pointing to fit folks each undercharge,[9]
While every office themselves will discharge,
With doing all, leave nothing done but pain.
But give apt servants their due place; let eyes
See beauty's total sum summed in her face;
Let ears hear speech, which wit to wonder ties;
Let breath suck up those sweets; let arms embrace
The globe of weal; lips love's indentures[10] make;
Thou but of all the kingly tribute take.

---

1 peace be quiet.

2 want wit lack the necessary intelligence or discretion.

3 His Narcissus.

4 hers Venus, seen by Paris.

5 th'Hesperian taste The Hesperides, the daughters of Atlas, were the keepers of the golden apples that Juno gave to Jupiter as a wedding present.

6 Good brother Philip The beloved's pet as a surrogate for and rival of the pining lover is a common trope in Renaissance love poetry; the pet is often envied for its physical closeness to the beloved. The trope derives ultimately from Catullus, Poems, 2 and 3. Cf. A. Finch's "The White Mouse's Petition." See Anne Finch and Her Poetry, ed. B. McGovern (Athens, GA, 1992), pp. 209-10.

7 cut to keep "to keep one's cut, to keep cut": to keep one's distance; to be coy or reserved.

8 billing kissing.

9 I.e., not appointing to the appropriate persons each delegated duty.

10 weal wealth, riches; indenture a deed or contract.

Fourth Song

Only joy, now here you are,
Fit to hear and ease my care;
Let my whispering voice obtain
Sweet reward for sharpest pain:
Take me to thee and thee to me.
"No, no, no, no, my dear, let be."

Night hath closed all in her cloak,
Twinkling stars love-thoughts provoke;
Danger hence good care doth keep;
Jealousy itself doth sleep:
Take me to thee and thee to me.
"No, no, no, no, my dear, let be."

Better place can no man find[1]
Cupid's yoke to loose or bind;
These sweet flowers on fine bed too[2]
Us in their best language woo:
Take me to thee and thee to me.
"No, no, no, no, my dear, let be."

This small light the moon bestows
Serves thy beams but to disclose,
So to raise my hap more high;
Fear not else, none can us spy:
Take me to thee and thee to me.
"No, no, no, no, my dear, let be."

That you heard was but a mouse;
Dumb sleep holdeth all the house;
Yet asleep, methinks, they say,
"Young folks, take time while you may":
Take me to thee and thee to me.
"No, no, no, no, my dear, let be."

Niggard[3] time threats, if we miss
This large offer of our bliss
Long stay ere he grant the same;
Sweet then, while each thing doth frame:
Take me to thee and thee to me.
"No, no, no, no, my dear, let be."

Your fair mother is abed,
Candles out, and curtains spread;
She thinks you do letters write;
Write, but first let me endite:
Take me to thee and thee to me.
"No, no, no, no, my dear, let be."

Sweet, alas, why strive you thus?
Concord better fitteth us.
Leave to Mars the force of hands,
Your power in your beauty stands:
Take me to thee and thee to me.
"No, no, no, no, my dear, let be."

Woe to me, and do you swear
Me to hate, but I forbear?[4]
Cursed be my destinies all,
That brought me so high, to fall;
Soon with my death I will please thee.
"No, no, no, no, my dear, let be."

Eighth Song[5]

In a grove most rich of shade,[6]
Where birds wanton music made,
May then young his pied weeds showing,
New perfumed with flowers fresh growing,

Astrophil with Stella sweet
Did for mutual comfort meet;

---

[1] Better place can no man find in Ringler, "Better place can no wit find."

[2] Since the scene takes place in Stella's bedchamber, these flowers are probably those embroidered on the bed's coverlet (Duncan-Jones, Sir Philip Sidney: Selected Poems, p. 162, note 4.15).

[3] Niggard miserly.

[4] but I forbear unless I cease, refrain from pressing you.

[5] "This song, the only one to employ a third person narrative, is by far the most explicit account of the relationship of the lovers in the whole sequence. It is distanced, however, by being set in the traditional form of the reverdie, or encounter of lovers in spring. Stella's reply, lines 69-100, was omitted in the 1591 editions" (Duncan-Jones, Sir Philip Sidney: Selected Poems, p. 222).

[6] most rich of shade perhaps a reference to Lady Rich, but Duncan-Jones warns against too literal a biographical reading here: "The suggestion may be that the shade is made rich by Lady Rich's presence, and not necessarily that the meeting occurs in the garden of one of Lord Rich's houses" (ibid., p. 222, note 8.1).

Both within themselves oppressed,
But each in the other blessed.

Him great harms had taught much care:
Her fair neck a foul yoke bare:
But her sight his cares did banish,
In his sight her yoke did vanish.

Wept they had, alas the while;
But now tears themselves did smile,
While their eyes, by love directed,
Interchangeably reflected.

Sigh they did; but now betwixt
Sighs of woes were glad sighs mixed,
With arms crossed, yet testifying[1]
Restless rest, and living dying.

Their ears hungry of each word,
Which the dear tongue would afford,
But their tongues restrained from walking,
Till their hearts had ended talking.

But when their tongues could not speak
Love itself did silence break;
Love did set his lips asunder,
Thus to speak in love and wonder:

"Stella, sovereign of my joy,
Fair triumpher of annoy,
Stella, star of heavenly fire,
Stella, lodestar[2] of desire;

Stella, in whose shining eyes
Are the lights of Cupid's skies;
Whose beams, where they once are darted,
Love therewith is straight imparted;

Stella, whose voice when it speaks
Senses all asunder breaks;

Stella, whose voice when it singeth
Angels to acquaintance bringeth;

Stella, in whose body is
Writ each character of bliss;
Whose face all, all beauty passeth,
Save thy mind, which yet surpasseth:

Grant, Oh grant—but speech, alas,
Fails me, fearing on to pass;
Grant—Oh me, what am I saying?
But no fault there is in praying:

Grant, O dear, on knees I pray"—
(Knees on ground he then did stay)
"That not I, but since I love you,
Time and place for me may move you.

Never season was more fit,
Never room more apt for it;
Smiling air allows my reason;
These birds sing, 'Now use the season';

This small wind, which so sweet is,
See how it the leaves doth kiss,
Each tree in his best attiring
Sense of love to love inspiring.

Love makes earth the water drink,
Love to earth makes water sink;
And if dumb[3] things be so witty,
Shall a heavenly grace want pity?"

There his hands in their speech fain
Would have made tongue's language plain:
But her hands, his hands repelling,
Gave repulse, all grace excelling.

Then she spake; her speech was such
As not ears, but heart did touch;
While such wise[4] she love denied,
As yet love she signified.

---

[1] The figure of the young man with crossed arms is a popular emblem of love melancholy.

[2] lodestar a star that guides one's way, especially the pole star; fig., a guiding star, or that on which one's attentions or hopes are fixed.

[3] dumb mute, inanimate.

[4] such wise in such ways.

"Astrophil," said she, "my love
Cease in these effects to prove:
Now be still; yet still believe me,
Thy grief more than death would grieve me.

If that any thought in me
Can taste comfort but of thee,
Let me, fed with hopeless anguish,[1]
Joyless, hopeless, endless languish.

If those eyes you praised be
Half so dear as you to me,
Let me home return, stark blinded
Of those eyes, and blinder minded.

If to secret of my heart
I do any wish impart
Where thou art not foremost placed,
Be both wish and I defaced.

If more may be said, I say:
All my bliss in thee I lay;
If thou love, my love content thee,
For all love, all faith is meant thee.

Trust me, while I thee deny,
In myself the smart I try:[2]
Tyrant honour thus doth use thee;[3]
Stella's self might not refuse thee.

Therefore, dear, this no more move,
Lest, though I leave not thy love,
Which too deep in me is framed,
I should blush when thou art named."

Therewithal away she went,
Leaving him so passion-rent
With what she had done and spoken,
That therewith my song is broken.[4]

Ninth Song

Go, my flock, go get you hence,
Seek a better place of feeding,
Where you may have some defence
From the storms in my breast breeding,
And showers from my eyes proceeding.[5]

Leave a wretch, in whom all woe
Can abide to keep no measure;
Merry flock, such one forego,
Unto whom mirth is displeasure,
Only rich in mischief's treasure.

Yet, alas, before you go,
Hear your woeful master's story,
Which to stones I else would show:
Sorrow only then hath glory,
When 'tis excellently sorry.

Stella, fiercest shepherdess,
Fiercest, but yet fairest ever;
Stella, whom, O heavens, still bless,
Though against me she persever,
Though I bliss inherit never;

Stella hath refused me,
Stella, who more love hath proved
In this caitiff[6] heart to be
Than can in good ewes be moved
Toward lambkins best beloved.

Stella hath refused me;
Astrophil, that so well served,
In this pleasant spring must see,
While in pride flowers be preserved,
Himself only winter-starved.

---

[1] Let me, fed with hopeless anguish in Ringler, "Let me, fed with hellish anguish."

[2] try experience.

[3] Tyrant honour thus doth use thee in Ringler, "doth thus."

[4] That therewith my song is broken "The shift from third to first person in the last line suggests vividly that Astrophil has attempted in this poem to give an objective account of a crisis in his relationship with Stella, which breaks down at the end so that he forgets to mask his identity" (Duncan-Jones, Sir Philip Sidney: Selected Poems, p. 222, note 8.104).

[5] my eyes proceeding in Ringler, "mine eyes proceeding."

[6] caitiff miserable.

Why, alas, doth she then swear
That she loveth me so dearly,
Seeing me so long to bear
Coals of love, that burn so clearly,
And yet leave me helpless merely?

Is that love? Forsooth, I trow,[1]
If I saw my good dog grieved,
And a help for him did know,
My love should not be believed
But he were by me relieved.

No, she hates me, wellaway,[2]
Faining[3] love somewhat, to please me;
For she knows, if she display
All her hate, death soon would seize me,
And of hideous torments ease me.

Then adieu, dear flock, adieu:
But alas, if in your straying
Heavenly Stella meet with you,
Tell her, in your piteous blaying,
Her poor slave's unjust decaying.

87

When I was forced from Stella, ever dear,
Stella, food of my thoughts, heart of my heart,
Stella, whose eyes make all my tempests clear,
By iron laws of duty to depart;[4]
Alas, I found that she with me did smart,
I saw that tears did in her eyes appear;
I saw that sighs her sweetest lips did part,
And her sad words my sadded sense did hear.
For me, I wept, to see pearls scattered so;
I sighed her sighs, and wailed for her woe;
Yet swam in joy, such love in her was seen.
Thus while th'effect most bitter was to me,
And nothing than the cause more sweet could be,
I had been vexed, if vexed I had not been.

93

O fate, O fault, O curse, child of my bliss;
What sobs can give words grace my grief to show?
What ink is black enough to paint my woe?
Through me, wretch me, even Stella vexed is.
Yet truth—if caitiff's breath might call thee—this Witness with me, that my foul stumbling so
From carelessness did in no manner grow;
But wit, confused with too much care, did miss.[5]
And do I then myself this vain 'scuse give?
I have (live I, and know this?) harmed thee;
Though worlds quite[6] me, shall I myself forgive?
Only with pains my pains thus eased be,
That all my hurts in my heart's wrack I read;[7]
I cry thy sighs; my dear, thy tears I bleed.

98

Ah bed, the field[8] where joy's peace some do see,
The field where all my thoughts to war be trained,[9]
How is thy grace by my strange fortune stained!

---

1 trow think, believe.

2 wellaway an exclamation of sorrow and lamentation.

3 Faining i.e., feigning, pretending.

4 "This, the first of the 'absence' sonnets, makes it clear that the lovers' physical separation is brought about by Astrophil's responsibilities elsewhere—'iron laws of duty'—and not by Stella's wish. It is thus consistent with the early sonnets in the sequence which show Astrophil amid the pressures and demands of court life" (Duncan-Jones, Sir Philip Sidney: Selected Poems, p. 222, note 87.4).

5 miss go wrong, made a mistake.

6 quite acquit, absolve.

7 That all my hurts … I read in Ringler, "That all thy hurts in my heart's wrack I read."

8 field battlefield.

9 trained drawn.

How thy lee shores[1] by my sighs stormed be!
With sweet soft shades thou oft invitest me
To steal some rest; but, wretch, I am constrained (Spurred with love's spur, though galled and shortly reined
With care's hard hand) to turn and toss in thee,
While the black horrors of the silent night
Paint woe's black face so lively to my sight
That tedious leisure marks each wrinkled line.
But when Aurora leads out Phoebus' dance,[2]
Mine eyes then only wink,[3] for spite, perchance,
That worms should have their sun, and I want mine.

107

Stella, since thou so right a princess art
Of all the powers which life bestows on me,
That ere by them aught undertaken be
They first resort unto that sovereign part;
Sweet, for a while give respite to my heart,
Which pants as though it still should leap to thee;
And on my thoughts give thy lieutenancy
To this great cause,[4] which needs both use and art;
And as a queen, who from her presence sends
Whom she employs, dismiss from thee my wit,
Till it have wrought what thy own will attends.
On servants' shame oft master's blame doth sit;
O, let not fools in me thy works reprove,
And scorning say, "See, what it is to love!"

108[5]

When sorrow, using mine own fire's might,
Melts down his lead into my boiling breast,
Through that dark furnace to my heart oppressed
There shines a joy from thee, my only light;
But soon as thought of thee breeds my delight,
And my young soul flutters to thee, his nest;
Most rude despair, my daily unbidden guest,
Clips straight my wings, straight wraps me in his night,
And makes me then bow down my head, and say:
"Ah, what doth Phoebus' gold[6] that wretch avail Whom iron doors do keep from use of day?"
So strangely, alas, thy works in me prevail,
That in my woes for thee thou art my joy,
And in my joys for thee my only annoy.

—1591, 1598

[1] lee shores a shore sheltered from the wind.

[2] Aurora, goddess of the dawn, heralds the arrival of Phoebus, god of the sun.

[3] wink close.

[4] this great cause "... either some public duty—though there is no major one that suits the date of Astrophil and Stella—or the composition of the Arcadia" (Duncan-Jones, Sir Philip Sidney: Selected Poems, p. 224, note 107.8).

[5] This is the sequence's last poem.

[6] Phoebus' gold i.e., sunlight.

from The Countess of Pembroke's Arcadia

Written by Sir Philip Sidney, Knight.
Now Since the First Edition Augmented and Ended.[1]

London. Printed for William Ponsonby,[2]
Anno Domini. 1593.

To My Dear Lady and Sister, the Countess of Pembroke[3]

Here now have you (most dear, and most worthy to be most dear, lady) this idle work of mine, which, I fear, like the spider's web, will be thought fitter to be swept away than worn to any other purpose. For my part, in very truth (as the cruel fathers among the Greeks were wont to do to the babes they would not foster) I could well find in my heart to cast out in some desert of forgetfulness this child which I am loath to father. But you desired me to do it, and your desire to my heart is an absolute commandment. Now it is done only for you, only to you: if you keep it to yourself or to such friends who will weigh errors in the balance of goodwill, I hope, for the father's sake, it will be pardoned, perchance made much of, though in itself it have deformities. For indeed, for severer eyes it is not, being but a trifle, and that triflingly handled. Your dear self can best witness the manner, being done in loose sheets of paper, most of it in your presence, the rest by sheets sent unto you as fast as they were done. In sum, a young head, not so well staid as I would it were (and shall be when God will) having many, many fancies begotten in it, if it had not been in some way delivered, would have grown a monster, and more sorry might I be that they came in than that they got out. But his chief safety shall be the not walking abroad; and his chief protection, the bearing the livery of your name, which (if much much goodwill do not deceive me) is worthy to be a sanctuary for a greater offender. This say I, because I know the virtue so; and this say I, because it may be ever so, or, to say better, because it will be ever so. Read it, then, at your idle times, and the follies your good judgement will find in it blame not, but laugh at. And so, looking for no better stuff than, as in a haberdasher's shop, glasses or feathers, you will continue to love the writer who doth exceedingly love you, and most, most heartily prays you may long live to be a principal ornament to the family of the Sidneys.

Your loving brother,
PHILIP SIDNEY.

---

[1] Sidney's first version of what was to finally become The Countess of Pembroke's Arcadia was probably completed around 1580. Called by modern critics "The Old Arcadia," this first version circulated in manuscript during Sidney's lifetime but was not published until the early twentieth century. Between 1582 and 1584, Sidney began revising and expanding this version of his romance, and had completed the first two books and part of the third before his untimely death in 1586. Sidney's revision (called by modern critics "The New Arcadia") was published in 1590, but being unfinished breaks off abruptly (in the middle of a sentence and a battle). Clearly dissatisfied with the 1590 version, prepared under the guidance of Philip's close friend, Fulke Greville (see pp. 670-671), Sidney's sister, Mary Sidney Herbert, countess of Pembroke, brought out a version in 1593 which took Sidney's revision and added material from "The Old Arcadia" to create a complete narrative. There was still a gap between the two parts, however, and in the 1621 edition this gap was filled in by Sir William Alexander.

Most famously, perhaps, "The New Arcadia" deletes two episodes which reflect rather badly on the romance's major male characters, Pyrocles and Musidorus: Pyrocles and Philoclea's physical consummation of their love (replaced by a scene of physical chastity and self-restraint) and Musidorus' attempted rape of his beloved, Pamela. For an account of Philip Sidney's revisions, see K. Duncan-Jones, Sir Philip Sidney: Courtier Poet (New Haven, 1991), pp. 260-66. For an account of the differences between the "Old" and "New Arcadia," see R.W. Zandvoort, Sidney's Arcadia: A Comparison between the Two Versions (New York, rept. 1968).

[2] William Ponsonby (?1546-1604), bookseller and printer; he published a number of significant literary works: 10 volumes of Spenser's works alone, including The Faerie Queene (1590; 1596) as well as Amoretti and Colin Clout's Come Home Again (1595); and Robert Greene's romances Mamillia (Part 1, 1582) and Gwydonius (1584). He seems to have had particularly close relations with the Sidney family; apart from publishing the 1590 and 1593 Arcadia, he also brought out Sidney's Defence of Poesy (1595) and Mary's translations of de Mornay's Life and Death and of Garnier's Antonius (1592). See S. Lee, rev. A. McConnell, "William Ponsonby (1546?-1604)," DNB online, 2005.

[3] Mary Sidney Herbert, countess of Pembroke (1561-1621), poet, translator, dramatist, and literary patron. See pp. 743-58. This dedication appeared in "The New Arcadia," (1590; 1593) and in subsequent editions, but it does not appear in ms. copies of "The Old Arcadia."

To the Reader[1]

The disfigured face, gentle reader, wherewith this work not long since appeared to the common view, moved that noble lady to whose honour consecrated, to whose protection it was committed, to take in hand the wiping away those spots wherewith the beauties thereof were unworthily blemished. But as often in repairing a ruinous house the mending of some old part occasioneth the making of some new, so here her honourable labour, begun in correcting the faults, ended in supplying the defects, by the view of what was ill done guided to the consideration of what was not done. Which part with what advice entered into, with what success it hath been passed through—most by her doing, all by her directing—if they may be entreated not to define which are unfurnished of means to discern, the rest (it is hoped) will favourably censure. But this they shall for their better satisfaction understand, that though they find not here what might be expected, they may find nevertheless as much as was intended, the conclusion, not the perfection of Arcadia, and that no further than the author's own writings or known determinations could direct. Whereof who sees not the reason must consider there may be reason which he sees not. Albeit I dare affirm he either sees or, from wiser judgements than his own, may hear that Sir Philip Sidney's writings can no more be perfected without Sir Philip Sidney than Apelles' pictures without Apelles.[2] There are that think contrary, and no wonder. Never was Arcadia free from the cumber[3] of such cattle. "To us," say they, "the pastures are not pleasant; and as for the flowers—such as we light on we take no delight in, but the greater part grow not within our reach." Poor souls! What talk they of flowers? They are roses not flowers must do them good,[4] which, if they find not here, they shall do well to go feed elsewhere: any place will better like them; for without Arcadia nothing grows in more plenty than lettuce suitable to their lips.[5] If it be true that likeness is a great cause of liking and that contraries infer contrary consequences, then is it true that the worthless reader can never worthily esteem of so worthy a writing; and as true that the noble, the wise, the virtuous, the courteous, as many as have had any acquaintance with true learning and knowledge, will with all love and dearness entertain it, as well for affinity with themselves as being child to such a father. Whom albeit it do not exactly and in every lineament represent, yet considering the father's untimely death prevented the timely birth of the child, it may happily seem a thank-worthy labour that the defects being so few, so small, and in no principal part, yet the greatest unlikeness is rather in defect than in deformity. But howsoever it is, it is now by more than one interest The Countess of Pembroke's Arcadia—done, as it was, for her; as it is, by her. Neither shall these pains be the last (if no unexpected accident cut off her determination) which the everlasting love of her excellent brother will make her consecrate to his memory.

H.S.[6]

---

[1] first appeared after the dedication to Mary Sidney Herbert in "The New Arcadia" (1593).

[2] Apelles (fl. c. late 4th century BCE), Greek painter, famed in antiquity and later ages, who painted portraits of Philip II and Alexander the Great.

[3] cumber encumbrance; trouble, annoyance.

[4] They are roses … good In Apuleius's second-century romance, Metamorphoses (popularly known as The Golden Ass), the central character Lucius, transformed into an ass, is only restored to his human shape by eating a garland of roses. See The Golden Ass of Apuleius, trans. W. Adlington (1566; London, rept. 1946), pp. 227-28.

[5] for without … lips Proverb, "Like (Such) lips, like (such) lettuce" (Tilley, L326; Erasmus, Adages, 386D). Meaning "like has met its like," it is an alleged saying of Marcus Crassus, when he saw an ass eating thistles; without i.e., outside of.

[6] H.S. Hugh Sanford, secretary to Mary's husband, the earl of Pembroke, and tutor to their son, William, was Mary's editor for the 1593 Arcadia.

Book 1[1]

[...]

[...] he[2] himself went to repose himself in a little wood he saw thereby; where lying under the protection of a shady tree, with intention to make forgetting sleep comfort a sorrowful memory, he saw a sight which persuaded and obtained of his eyes that they would abide yet a while open. It was the appearing of a lady who, because she walked with her side toward him, he could not perfectly see her face, but so much he might see of her that was a surety for the rest that all was excellent.

Well might he perceive the hanging of her hair in fairest quantity in locks, some curled and some as it were forgotten, with such a careless care and an art so hiding art that she seemed she would lay them for a pattern whether nature simply or nature helped by cunning[3] be the more excellent: the rest whereof was drawn into a coronet of gold richly set with pearl, and so joined all over with gold wires and covered with feathers of divers colours that it was not unlike to a helmet, such a glittering show it bore, and so bravely it was held up from the head. Upon her body she wore a doublet of sky-colour satin, covered with plates of gold and, as it were, nailed with precious stones that in it she might seem armed. The nether part of her garment was so full of stuff and cut after such a fashion, that though the length of it reached to the ankles, yet in her going one might sometimes discern the small of her leg, which with the foot was dressed in a short pair of crimson velvet buskins,[4] in some places open (as the ancient manner was) to show the fairness of the skin. Over all this she wore a certain mantle made in such manner, that coming under her right arm and covering most of that side, it had no fastening of the left side but only upon the top of the shoulder, where the two ends met and were closed together with a very rich jewel: the device[5] whereof, as he after saw, was this: a Hercules made in little form, but set with a distaff in his hand, as he once was by Omphale's commandment, with a word in Greek but thus to be interpreted, "Never more valiant." On the same side, on her thigh she wore a sword which, as it witnessed her to be an Amazon[6] or one following that profession, so it seemed but a needless weapon, since her other forces were without withstanding.[7]

But this lady walked out-right[8] till he might see her enter into a fine close arbour. It was of trees, whose branches so lovingly interlaced one the other that it could resist the strongest violence of eyesight; but she went into it by a door she opened, which moved him, as warily as he could, to follow her; and by and by he might hear her sing this song with a voice no less beautiful to his ears than her goodliness was full of harmony to his eyes:

Transform'd in show, but more transform'd in mind,
I cease to strive, with double conquest foil'd:

---

[1] After receiving several terrible prophecies involving himself, his wife Gynecia, and their two beautiful daughters, Pamela and Philoclea, King Basilius of Arcadia takes his family to his isolated country estate. The princes Musidorus and Pyrocles, however, fall in love with the princesses: Pyrocles with Philoclea, and Musidorus with Pamela. In order to get close to their beloveds, Pyrocles disguises himself as the Amazon Zelmane, and Musidorus as the shepherd Dorus. Romantic complications ensue: Basilius falls in love with Zelmane thinking her the woman she appears to be; Gynecia falls in love with Zelmane strongly suspecting her to be a man; Philoclea also falls in love with Zelmane, believing her a woman, and thus suffering much uneasiness at her passion for someone of the same sex. Both Zelmane and Dorus finally reveal their true identities to their beloveds, and are loved by them in return.

[2] he Musidorus. Greek, muse + dore (gift); thus, gift of the muse.

[3] cunning art, artifice.

[4] buskins a covering for the foot and leg reaching to the calf, or to the knee; a half-boot.

[5] device an emblematic figure or design, especially one borne or adopted by a particular person, family, etc., usually accompanied by a motto.

[6] Amazon Herodotus is the classical source for the existence of this race of female warriors. See Histories, trans. R. Waterfield (Oxford, 1998), 4.110-17. See also Justin's Epitome of the Philippic History of Pompeius Trogus (2nd-4th c. CE), 2.4.

[7] her other forces were without withstanding i.e., her other forces (her beauty and personal charms) could not be resisted.

[8] out-right directly onward, straight ahead.

For (woe is me) my powers all I find
With outward force and inward treason spoil'd.

For from without came to mine eyes the blow,
Whereto mine inward thoughts did faintly yield:
Both these conspir'd poor reason's overthrow;
False in myself, thus have I lost the field.

Thus are my eyes still captive to one sight;
Thus all my thoughts are slaves to one thought still:
Thus reason to his servants yields his right;
Thus is my power transformed to your will.

What marvel then I take a woman's hue,
Since what I see, think, know, is all but you?

This ditty gave him some suspicion, but the voice gave him almost assurance who the singer was; and therefore boldly thrusting open the door and entering into the arbour, he perceived indeed that it was Pyrocles[1] thus disguised: wherewith not receiving so much joy to have found him as grief so to have found him, amazedly looking upon him (as Apollo is painted when he saw Daphne suddenly turned into a laurel[2]) he was not able to bring forth a word; so that Pyrocles (who had as much shame as Musidorus had sorrow) rising to him, would have formed a substantial excuse, but his insinuation being of blushing and his division of sighs, his whole oration stood upon a short narration what was the causer of this metamorphosis.[3] But by that time Musidorus had gathered his spirits together, and yet casting a ghastful[4] countenance upon him as if he would conjure some strange spirit, he thus spoke unto him:

"And is it possible that this is Pyrocles, the only young prince in the world formed by nature and framed by education to the true exercise of virtue? Or is it indeed some Amazon that hath counterfeited the face of my friend in this sort to vex me? For likelier sure I would have thought it that any outward face might have been disguised than that the face of so excellent a mind could have been thus blemished. O sweet Pyrocles, separate yourself a little (if it be possible) from yourself, and let your own mind look upon your own proceedings; so shall my words be needless and you best instructed. See with yourself how fit it will be for you in this your tender youth, born so great a prince, and of so rare not only expectation but proof, desired of your old father, and wanted[5] of your native country, now so near your home to divert your thoughts from the way of goodness to lose, nay, to abuse your time. Lastly to overthrow all the excellent things you have done, which have filled the world with your fame; as if you should drown your ship in the long desired haven, or, like an ill player should mar the last act of his tragedy. Remember (for I know you know it) that if we will be men, the reasonable part of our soul is to have absolute commandment, against which, if any sensual weakness arise, we are to yield all our sound forces to the overthrowing of so unnatural a rebellion; wherein how can we want courage, since we are to deal against so weak an adversary that in itself is nothing but weakness? Nay, we are to resolve that if reason direct it, we must do it; and if we must do it, we will do it; for, to say 'I cannot,' is childish, and 'I will not,' womanish.

"And see how extremely every way you endanger your mind: for to take this womanish habit, without you frame your behaviour accordingly, is wholly vain; your behaviour can never come kindly[6] from you but as the mind is proportioned unto it: so that you must resolve, if you will play your part to any purpose, whatsoever peevish

[1] Pyrocles Greek, pyr (fire) + ochle (to move, trouble, or disturb by tumult). See J. Webster and R. Isomaki, "Pyrochles, Cymochles," Spenser Encycl., p. 574.

[2] The nymph Daphne, pursued by the god Apollo, begged for rescue from her father, the river god Peneus; in response, Peneus turned her into a laurel tree.

[3] In rhetoric, an "insinuation" is a kind of introduction to a speech designed artfully to win over the hearers, while the "division" is the subsequent classification and thus organization of one's material.

[4] ghastful horrified.

[5] wanted lacked.

[6] kindly i.e., as nature dictates.

imperfections are in that sex, to soften your heart to receive them—the very first down-step to all wickedness. For do not deceive yourself, my dear cousin, there is no man suddenly either excellently good or extremely evil, but grows either as he holds himself up in virtue or lets himself slide to viciousness.

"And let us see what power is the author of all these troubles: forsooth love, love, a passion, and the basest and fruitlessest of all passions. Fear breedeth wit; anger is the cradle of courage; joy openeth and enableth the heart; sorrow, as it closeth, so it draweth it inward to look to the correcting of itself; and so all of them generally have power towards some good by the direction of reason. But this bastard love (for indeed the name of love is most unworthily applied to so hateful a humour[1]) as it is engendered betwixt lust and idleness; as the matter it works upon is nothing but a certain base weakness which some gentle fools call a gentle heart; as his adjoined companions be unquietness, longings, fond comforts, faint discomforts, hopes, jealousies, ungrounded rages, causeless yieldings; so is the highest end it aspires unto a little pleasure with much pain before and great repentance after. But that end, how endless it runs to infinite evils, were fit enough for the matter we speak of; but not for your ears, in whom, indeed, there is so much true disposition to virtue.

"Yet thus much of his worthy effects in yourself is to be seen, that (besides your breaking laws of hospitality with Kalander[2] and of friendship with me) it utterly subverts the course of nature in making reason give place to sense, and man to woman. And truly I think hereupon it first got the name of love: for indeed the true love hath that excellent nature in it, that it doth transform the very essence of the lover into the thing loved, uniting and, as it were, incorporating it with a secret and inward working. And herein do these kinds of love imitate the excellent; for as the love of heaven makes one heavenly, the love of virtue, virtuous, so doth the love of the world make one become worldly: and this effeminate love of a woman doth so womanize a man that, if he yield to it, it will not only make him an Amazon, but a launder, a distaff-spinner[3] or whatsoever other vile occupation their idle heads can imagine and their weak hands perform.

"Therefore (to trouble you no longer with my tedious but loving words) if either you remember what you are, what you have been, or what you must be; if you consider what it is that moved you, or by what kind of creature you are moved, you shall find the cause so small, the effect so dangerous, yourself so unworthy to run into the one or to be driven by the other, that I doubt not I shall quickly have occasion rather to praise you for having conquered it than to give you further counsel how to do it."

But in Pyrocles this speech wrought no more but that he who before he was espied was afraid, after being perceived was ashamed, now being hardly rubbed upon left both fear and shame and was moved to anger. But the exceeding good will he bore to Musidorus striving with it, he thus (partly to satisfy him, but principally to loose the reins to his own motions[4]) made him answer:

"Cousin, whatsoever good disposition nature hath bestowed upon me, or howsoever that disposition hath been by bringing up confirmed, this must I confess, that I am not yet come to that degree of wisdom to think light of the sex of whom I have my life, since if I be anything (which your friendship rather finds than I acknowledge) I was, to come to it, born of a woman and nursed of a woman. And certainly (for this point of your speech doth nearest touch me) it is strange to see the unmanlike cruelty of mankind, who, not content with their tyrannous ambition to have brought the other's virtuous patience under them,

[1] humour emotional and/or psychological state.

[2] Kalandar Greek, "worthy man."

[3] launder a person of either sex who washes linen; distaff-spinner someone who uses a distaff (a long cleft staff) to spin the thread that then would be used to weave cloth; these occupations were traditionally and proverbially "woman's work."

[4] loose the reins to his own motions i.e., allow him to remove any restraints on the expression of his emotions, desires.

like childish masters think their masterhood nothing without doing injury to them who (if we will argue by reason) are framed of nature with the same parts of the mind for the exercise of virtue as we are. And for example, even this estate of Amazons (which I now for my greatest honour do seek to counterfeit) doth well witness that if generally the sweetness of their disposition did not make them see the vainness of these things which we accompt[1] glorious, they neither want valour of mind, nor yet doth their fairness take away their force. And truly we men and praisers of men should remember that if we have such excellencies, it is reason to think them excellent creatures of whom we are, since a kite never brought forth a good flying hawk.[2] But to tell you true, as I think it superfluous to use any words of such a subject which is so praised in itself as it needs no praises, so withal, I fear lest my conceit[3] (not able to reach unto them) bring forth words which for their unworthiness may be a disgrace to them I so inwardly honour. Let this suffice: that they are capable of virtue; and virtue, you yoursel[f] say, is to be loved, and I too, truly. But this I willingly confess, that it likes me much better when I find virtue in a fair lodging than when I am bound to seek it in an ill-favoured creature, like a pearl in a dung-hill. As for my fault of being an uncivil guest to Kalander, if you could feel what an inward guest myself am host unto, ye would think it very excusable, in that I rather perform the duties of a host than the ceremonies of a guest. And for my breaking the laws of friendship with you (which I would rather die than effectually do) truly I could find in my heart to ask you pardon for it but that your now handling of me gives me reason to my former dealing."

And here Pyrocles stayed as to breathe himself, having been transported with a little vehemency, because it seemed him Musidorus had over-bitterly glanced against the reputation of womankind; but then quieting his countenance (as well as out of an unquiet mind it might be), he thus proceeded on:

"And poor love," said he, "dear cousin, is little beholding unto you, since you are not contented to spoil[4] it of the honour of the highest power of the mind, which notable men have attributed unto it; but ye deject it below all other passions, in truth somewhat strangely, since, if love receive any disgrace, it is by the company of these passions you prefer before it. For those kinds of bitter objections (as that lust, idleness, and a weak heart should be, as it were, the matter and form of love) rather touch me, dear Musidorus, than love; but I am good witness of mine own imperfections, and therefore will not defend myself. But herein I must say you deal contrary to yourself: for if I be so weak, then can you not with reason stir me up as you did by remembrance of my own virtue; or if indeed I be virtuous, then must ye confess that love hath his working in a virtuous heart; and so no doubt hath it, whatsoever I be: for, if we love virtue, in whom shall we love it but in a virtuous creature?—without[5] your meaning be, I should love this word 'Virtue' where I see it written in a book! Those troublesome effects you say it breeds be not the faults of love but of him that loves, as an unable vessel to bear such a liquor; like evil eyes not able to look on the sun, or like a weak brain soonest overthrown with the best wine. Even that heavenly love you speak of is accompanied in some hearts with hopes, griefs, longings and despairs. And in that heavenly love, since there are two parts—the one the love itself, the other the excellency of the thing loved—I, not able at the first leap to frame both in me, do now, like a diligent workman, make ready the chief instrument and first part of that great work, which is love itself; which when I have a while practised in this sort, then you shall see me turn it to greater matters. And thus gently you may, if it please you, think of me. Neither doubt ye because I wear a woman's apparel I will be the more womanish,

[1] accompt account.

[2] kite ... flying hawk Proverb, "A carrion kite (bittern) will never be a good hawk" (Tilley K114).

[3] conceit understanding, ability to conceive.

[4] spoil rob.

[5] without except.

since I assure you, for all my apparel, there is nothing I desire more than fully to prove myself a man in this enterprise. Much might be said in my defence, much more for love, and most of all for that divine creature which hath joined me and love together. But these disputations are fitter for quiet schools than my troubled brains, which are bent rather in deeds to perform than in words to defend the noble desire that possesseth me."

[...]

But Musidorus was so grieved to see his well-beloved friend obstinate (as he thought) to his own destruction, that it forced him with more than accustomed vehemency to speak these words:

"Well, well," said he, "you list[1] to abuse yourself. It was a very white and red virtue which you could pick out of a painterly gloss of a visage.[2] Confess the truth, and ye shall find the utmost was but beauty, a thing, which though it be in as great excellency in yourself as may be in any, yet I am sure you make no further reckoning of it than of an outward fading benefit nature bestowed upon you. And yet such is your want of a true grounded virtue, which must be like itself in all points, that what you wisely account a trifle in yourself, you fondly become a slave unto in another. For my part I now protest I have left nothing unsaid which my wit could make me know, or my most entire friendship to you requires of me. I do now beseech you even for the love betwixt us (if this other love have left any in you towards me) and for the remembrance of your old, careful[3] father (if you can remember him that forget yourself) lastly, for Pyrocles' own sake (who is now upon the point of falling or rising) to purge yourself of this vile infection. Otherwise give me leave to leave off this name of friendship as an idle title of a thing which cannot be where virtue is abolished."

The length of these speeches before had not so much cloyed Pyrocles, though he were very impatient of long deliberations, as this last farewell of him he loved as his own life did wound his soul. For, thinking himself afflicted, he was the apter to conceive unkindness deeply; insomuch that shaking his head, and delivering some show of tears, he thus uttered his griefs:

"Alas," said he, "Prince Musidorus, how cruelly you deal with me. If you seek the victory, take it, and, if ye list, the triumph. Have you all the reason of the world, and with me remain all the imperfections, yet such as I can no more lay from me than the crow can be persuaded by the swan to cast off all his black feathers. But truly you deal with me like a physician that, seeing his patient in a pestilent fever, should chide him instead of ministering help, and bid him be sick no more; or rather like such a friend that, visiting his friend condemned to perpetual prison and laden with grievous fetters, should will him to shake off his fetters or he would leave him. I am sick, and sick to the death. I am prisoner, neither is there any redress but by her to whom I am [a] slave. Now, if you list, leave him that loves you in the highest degree, but remember ever to carry this with you—that you abandon your friend in his greatest extremity."

And herewith the deep wound of his love, being rubbed afresh with this new unkindness, began, as it were, to bleed again in such sort that he was unable to bear it any longer, but gushing out abundance of tears, and crossing his arms over his woeful heart,[4] he sunk down to the ground. Which sudden trance[5] went so to the heart of Musidorus that, falling down by him and kissing the weeping eyes of his friend, he

---

[1] list desire, wish.

[2] It was a very white and red virtue … visage Musidorus accuses Pyrocles of falling in love with the artistic, superficial lustre of the beauty of Philoclea's face; Pyrocles has thus reduced true virtue to an appreciation of and desire for the "red" and "white" which comprise the traditional colours of the Petrarchan mistress' complexion. See below, pp. 694-95, ll.559-604, for Pyrocles' description of how he first fell in love with Philoclea through her portrait.

[3] careful i.e., full of care, anxious.

[4] at this point, the Penguin edition contains the clauses: "as if his tears had been out-flowing blood, his arms an over-pressing burden."

[5] trance a state of extreme apprehension or dread.

besought him not to make account of his speech which, if it had been over-vehement, yet was it to be borne withal, because it came out of a love much more vehement; that he had not thought fancy could have received so deep a wound, but now finding in him the force of it, he would no further contrary it but employ all his service to medicine it in such sort as the nature of it required. But even this kindness made Pyrocles the more melt in the former unkindness, which his manlike tears well showed, with a silent look upon Musidorus, as who should say: "And is it possible that Musidorus should threaten to leave me?"; and this struck Musidorus' mind and senses so dumb, too, that for grief being not able to say anything, they rested with their eyes placed one upon another, in such sort as might well paint out the true passion of unkindness to be never aright but betwixt them that most dearly love.

And thus remained they a time, till at length Musidorus, embracing him, said, "And will you thus shake off your friend?"

"It is you that shake me off," said Pyrocles, "being for my unperfectness unworthy of your friendship."

"But this," said Musidorus, "shows you more unperfect, to be cruel to him that submits himself unto you. But since you are imperfect (said he, smiling), it is reason you be governed by us wise and perfect men. And that authority will I begin to take upon me with three absolute commandments: the first, that you increase not your evil with further griefs; the second, that you love her with all the powers of your mind; and the last commandment shall be, ye command me to do what service I can towards the attaining of your desires."

Pyrocles' heart was not so oppressed with the two mighty passions of love and unkindness but that it yielded to some mirth at [t]his commandment of Musidorus that he should love; so that something clearing his face from his former shows of grief: "Well," said he, "dear cousin, I see by the well-choosing of your commandments that you are far fitter to be a prince than a counsellor, and therefore I am resolved to employ all my endeavour to obey you, with this condition, that the commandments ye command me to lay upon you shall only be, that you continue to love me, and look upon my imperfections with more affection than judgement."

"Love you?" said he. "Alas, how can my heart be separated from the true embracing of it without it burst by being too full of it? But (said he) let us leave off these flowers of new-begun friendship; and now I pray you again tell me, but tell it me fully, omitting no circumstance, the story of your affections, both beginning and proceeding, assuring yourself that there is nothing so great which I will fear to do for you, nor nothing so small which I will disdain to do for you. Let me, therefore, receive a clear understanding, which many times we miss while those things we account small, as a speech or a look, are omitted, like as a whole sentence may fail of his congruity by wanting one particle. Therefore between friends all must be laid open, nothing being superfluous nor tedious."

"You shall be obeyed," said Pyrocles, "and here are we in as fit a place for it as may be; for this arbour nobody offers to come into but myself, I using it as my melancholy retiring place, and therefore that respect is borne unto it. Yet if by chance any should come, say that you are a servant sent from the Queen of the Amazons to seek me, and then let me alone for the rest." So sat they down, and Pyrocles thus said:

"Cousin," said he, "then began the fatal overthrow of all my liberty when, walking among the pictures in Kalander's house, you yourself delivered unto me what you had understood of Philoclea;[1] who much resembling (though I must say much surpassing) the lady Zelmane whom so well I loved,[2] there were mine eyes infected, and at

[1] Philoclea Greek, philo (lover, friend) + kleia (renown); thus, lover of renown.

[2] In Book 2, Pyrocles and Musidorus find themselves imprisoned by Andromana, queen of Iberia, when they refuse to satisfy her sexual desires. Their dear friend Palladius, son of Andromana and the king of Iberia, and the lady Zelmane, daughter of Plexirtus, are also at the court. Palladius is in love with Zelmane, but sadly she is in love with your mouth did I drink my poison. Yet alas, so sweet was it unto me, that I could not be contented till Kalander had made it more and more strong with his declaration. Which the more I questioned, the more pity I conceived of her unworthy fortune;[1] and when with pity once my heart was made tender, according to the aptness of the humour, it received quickly a cruel impression of that wonderful passion which to be defined is impossible, because no words reach to the strange nature of it. They only know it which inwardly feel it: it is called love. Yet did I not, poor wretch, at first know my disease, thinking it only such a wonted kind of desire to see rare sights, and my pity to be no other but the fruits of a gentle nature. But even this arguing with myself came of further thoughts, and the more I argued the more my thoughts increased. Desirous I was to see the place where she remained, as though the architecture of the lodges would have been much for my learning; but more desirous to see herself, to be judge, forsooth, of the painter's cunning—for thus at the first did I flatter myself, as though my wound had been no deeper. But when within short time I came to the degree of uncertain wishes and that those wishes grew to unquiet longings; when I could fix my thoughts upon nothing but that within little varying they should end with Philoclea; when each thing I saw seemed to figure out some part of my passions; when even Parthenia's[2] fair face became a lecture to me of Philoclea's imagined beauty; when I heard no word spoken but that methought it carried the sound of Philoclea's name; then, indeed, then I did yield to the burden, finding myself prisoner before I had leisure to arm myself, and that I might well, like the spaniel, gnaw upon the chain that ties him, but I should sooner mar my teeth than procure liberty.

"Yet I take to witness the eternal spring of virtue that I had never read, heard, nor seen anything, I had never any taste of philosophy nor inward feeling in myself which for a while I did not call to my succour. But, alas, what resistance was there, when ere long my very reason was, you will say, corrupted—I must confess, conquered—and that methought even reason did assure me that all eyes did degenerate from their creation which did not honour such beauty? Nothing in truth could hold any plea with it but the reverent friendship I bear unto you. For as it went against my heart to break any way from you, so did I fear, more than any assault, to break it to you; finding (as it is indeed) that to a heart fully resolute, counsel is tedious but reprehension is loathsome, and that there is nothing more terrible to a guilty heart than the eye of a respected friend. This made me determine with myself (thinking it a less fault in friendship to do a thing without your knowledge than against your will) to take this secret course, which conceit[3] was most builded up in me the last day of my parting and speaking with you, when upon your speech with me and my but naming love, when else perchance I would have gone further, I saw your voice and countenance so change as it assured me my revealing it should but purchase your grief with my cumber;[4] and therefore, dear Musidorus, even ran away from thy well-known chiding. For having written a letter, which I know not whether you found or no, and taken my chief jewels with me, while you were in the midst of your sport I got a time, as I think, unmarked by any, to steal away I cared not whither so I might 'scape you.

"And so came I to Ithonia in the province of Messenia, where, lying secret, I put this in practice which before I had devised. For remembering by Philanax[5] his letter and Kalander's speech how

---

Pyrocles. Palladius helps free the two princes but in the subsequent conflict with his mother and her men, who pursue them, he is killed. Zelmane, disguised as a boy takes up service as Pyrocles' page. She dies of an illness, but not before first revealing her identity and asking the princes to aid her father.

1 her unworthy fortune referring to Philoclea's isolation in the country, along with her father and mother, King Basilius and his queen, Gynecia, and her sister Pamela; in the country, Pamela is separated from her family and placed under the guardianship of the boorish rustic Dametas, while Philoclea remains with Basilius and Gynecia.

2 Parthenia Greek (parthenos), "virgin."

3 conceit idea, plan.

4 cumber distress.

5 Philanax Greek, "lover of the sovereign."

obstinately Basilius was determined not to marry his daughters, and therefore fearing lest any public dealing should rather increase her captivity than further my love, love (the refiner of invention) had put in my head thus to disguise myself, that under that mask I might, if it were possible, get access; and what access could bring forth commit to fortune and industry, determining to bear the countenance of an Amazon. Therefore in the closest[1] manner I could, naming myself Zelmane, for that dear lady's sake to whose memory I am so much bound, I caused this apparel to be made, and bringing it near the lodges which are hard at hand, by night thus dressed myself, resting till occasion might make me to be found by them whom I sought; which the next morning happened as well as my own plot could have laid it.

[...]

"[...] within awhile he[2] came unto me, bearing indeed shows in his countenance of an honest and well-minded gentleman, and with as much courtesy as Dametas[3] with rudeness saluting me:

"'Fair lady,' said he, 'it is nothing strange that such a solitary place as this should receive solitary persons, but much do I marvel how such a beauty as yours is should be suffered to be thus alone.'

"I (that now knew it was my part to play) looking with a grave majesty upon him, as if I found in myself cause to be reverenced, 'They are never alone,' said I, 'that are accompanied with noble thoughts.'

"'But those thoughts,' replied Basilius, 'cannot in this your loneliness neither warrant[4] you from suspicion in others nor defend you from melancholy in yourself.'

"I then showing a mislike that he pressed me so far, 'I seek no better warrant,' said I, 'than my own conscience, nor no greater pleasure than my own contentation.'[5]

"'Yet virtue seeks to satisfy others,' said Basilius.

"'Those that be good,' said I, 'and they will be satisfied as long as they see no evil.'

"'Yet will the best in this country,' said Basilius, 'suspect[6] so excellent beauty being so weakly guarded.'

"'Then are the best but stark naught,'[7] answered I, 'for open suspecting others comes of secret condemning themselves. But in my country (whose manners I am in all places to maintain and reverence) the general goodness which is nourished in our hearts makes everyone think the strength of virtue in another whereof they find the assured foundation in themselves.'

"'Excellent lady,' said he, 'you praise so greatly, and yet so wisely, your country that I must needs desire to know what the nest is out of which such birds do fly.'

"'You must first deserve it,' said I, 'before you may obtain it.'

"'And by what means,' said Basilius, 'shall I deserve to know your estate?'

"'By letting me first know yours,' answered I.

"'To obey you,' said he, 'I will do it; although it were so much more reason yours should be known first, as you do deserve in all points to be preferred. Know you, fair lady, that my name is Basilius, unworthily lord of this country. The rest, either fame hath already brought to your ears or (if it please you to make this place happy by your presence) at more leisure you shall understand of me.'

"I that from the beginning assured myself it was he, but would not seem I did so, to keep my gravity the better, making a piece of reverence

---

1 closest most secret or concealed.

2 Pyrocles is still speaking here; he i.e., King Basilius; see p. 689, note 1. Basilius is Greek for "king."

3 Dametas Named after a rural character in Virgil's Eclogues, the foolish and cowardly shepherd Dametas is the guardian of the princess Pamela. He has just attempted to drive Zelmane/Pyrocles away from Basilius' estate with blows and insults; when Zelmane/Pyrocles draws her/his sword; Dametas flees.

4 warrant protect.

5 contentation contentment.

6 I.e., perhaps, they will suspect her of being unchaste, given that she is wandering about with no escort.

7 stark naught utterly worthless, completely bad.

unto him,[1] 'Mighty Prince,' said I, 'let my not knowing you serve for the excuse of my boldness, and the little reverence I do you, impute it to the manner of my country, which is the invincible land of the Amazons, myself niece to Senicia, queen thereof, lineally descended of the famous Penthesilea slain by the bloody hand of Pyrrhus.[2] I, having in this my youth determined to make the world see the Amazons' excellencies as well in private as in public virtue, have passed some dangerous adventures in divers countries till the unmerciful sea deprived me of my company; so that shipwreck casting me not far hence, uncertain wandering brought me to this place.'

"But Basilius (who now began to taste of that, which since he hath swallowed up, as I will tell you) fell to more cunning entreating my abode than any greedy host would use to well-paying passengers.[3] I thought nothing could shoot righter at the mark of my desires; yet had I learned already so much: that it was against my womanhood to be forward in my own wishes. And therefore he (to prove whether intercessions in fitter mouths might better prevail) commanded Dametas to bring forthwith his wife and daughters thither: three ladies, although of diverse yet all of excellent beauty.

"His wife in grave matron-like attire, with countenance and gesture suitable and of such fairness (being in the strength of her age) as if her daughters had not been by might with just price have purchased admiration; but they being there, it was enough that the most dainty eye would think her a worthy mother of such children. The fair Pamela,[4] whose noble heart I find doth greatly disdain that the trust of her virtue is reposed in such a lout's lands as Dametas, had yet, to show an obedience, taken on shepherdish apparel, which was but of russet-cloth cut after their fashion, with a straight body, open-breasted,[5] the nether part full of pleats, with long and wide sleeves. But believe me she did apparel her apparel, and with the preciousness of her body made it most sumptuous. Her hair at the full length wound about with gold lace, only by the comparison to show how far her hair doth excel in colour; betwixt her breasts, which sweetly rose up like two fair mountainets in the pleasant vale of Tempe,[6] there hung a very rich diamond set but in a black horn; the word I have since read is this: "Yet still myself." And thus particularly have I described them, because you may know that mine eyes are not so partial but that I marked them too.

"But when the ornament of the earth, the model of heaven, the triumph of nature, the life of beauty, the queen of love, young Philoclea appeared in her nymph-like apparel, so near nakedness as one might well discern part of her perfections, and yet so apparelled as did show she kept best store of her beauty to herself: her hair (alas, too poor a word! why should I not rather call them her beams?[7]) drawn up into a net, able to have caught Jupiter when he was in the form of an eagle;[8] her body (O sweet body!) covered with a light taffeta garment, so cut as the wrought smock[9] came through it in many places, enough to have made your restrained imagination have thought what was under it; with the cast of her black eyes—black indeed, whether nature so made them that we might be the more able to behold and bear their wonderful shining, or that she, goddess-like, would work this miracle with herself

---

1 making a piece of reverence unto him i.e., bowing or offering to him some other token of respect.

2 Although most classical writers say that it was Achilles who killed Penthesilea, the deed is attributed to Achilles' son, Pyrrhus, in Dares Phyrgius' De Excidio Troiae Historia. See The Iliad of Dares Phrygius, trans. G. Roberts (Cape Town, 1970), p. 79. Senicia seems to be Sidney's own invention.

3 passengers travellers.

4 Pamela Greek, pan ("all") + meli ("honey"); thus, "all honey" or "all sweetness."

5 open-breasted i.e, not covering the breast or bosom.

6 vale of Tempe an actual valley in Thessaly, used by ancient Roman writers as a general name for a beautiful valley.

7 beams In Petrarchan discourse, the lady's golden hair is often likened to sunbeams.

8 able to have caught Jupiter … eagle Most famously, Jove transforms himself into an eagle in order to seize the beautiful shepherd, Ganymede, whom he desired. He carried Ganymede off to Olympus to be his cupbearer (Metamorphoses, 10.149-75).

9 wrought smock embroidered undergarment, shift, or chemise.

in giving blackness the price above all beauty—then, I say, indeed methought the lilies grew pale for envy; the roses methought blushed to see sweeter roses in her cheeks, and the apples methought fell down from the trees to do homage to the apples of her breast. Then the clouds gave place that the heavens might more freely smile upon her—at the least the clouds of my thoughts quite vanished, and my sight, then more clear and forcible than ever, was so fixed there that, I imagine, I stood like a well-wrought image with some life in show but none in practice. And so had I been like enough to have stayed long time but that Gynecia[1] stepping between my sight and the only Philoclea, the change of object made me recover my senses so that I could with reasonable good manner receive the salutation of her and of the Princess Pamela, doing them yet no further reverence than one princess useth to another. But when I came to the never-enough-praised Philoclea, I could not but fall down on my knees, and taking by force her hand and kissing it, I must confess, with more than womanly ardency,[2] 'Divine lady,' said I, 'let not the world nor these great princesses marvel to see me, contrary to my manner, do this especial honour unto you, since all, both men and women, do owe this to the perfection of your beauty.'

"But she, blushing like a fair morning in May at this my singularity, and causing me to rise, 'Noble lady,' said she, 'it is no marvel to see your judgement much mistaken in my beauty, since you begin with so great an error as to do more honour unto me than to them to whom I myself owe all service.'

"'Rather,' answered I with a bowed down countenance, 'that shows the power of your beauty which forced me to do such an error, if it were an error.'

"'You are so well-acquainted,' said she sweetly, most sweetly smiling, 'with your own beauty that it makes you easily fall into the discourse of beauty.'

"'Beauty in me?' said I, truly sighing, 'Alas, if there be any it is in my eyes, which your blessed presence hath imparted unto them.'

"But then, as I think, Basilius willing her so to do, 'Well,' said she, 'I must needs confess I have heard that it is a great happiness to be praised of them that are most praiseworthy; and well I find that you are an invincible Amazon since you will overcome, though in a wrong matter. But if my beauty be anything, then let it obtain thus much of you, that you will remain some while in this company to ease your own travail[3] and our solitariness.'

"'First let me die,' said I, 'before any word spoken by such a mouth should come in vain.'

"And thus with some other words of entertaining was my staying concluded, and I led among them to the lodge, truly a place for pleasantness, not unfit to flatter solitariness; for it being set upon such an insensible rising of the ground as you are come to a pretty height before almost you perceive that you ascend, it gives the eye lordship over a good large circuit,[4] which according to the nature of the country, being diversified between hills and dales, woods and plains, one place more clear, another more darksome, it seems a pleasant picture of nature, with lovely lightsomeness and artificial shadows. The lodge is of a yellow stone, built in the form of a star, having round about a garden framed into like points; and beyond the garden, ridings[5] cut out, each answering the angles of the lodge. At the end of one of them is the other smaller lodge, but of like fashion, where the gracious Pamela liveth, so that the lodge seemeth not unlike a fair comet, whose tail stretcheth itself to a star of less greatness."

[...]

"Now thus I[6] had, as methought, well played my first act, assuring myself that under that disguisement I should find opportunity to reveal myself to

---

1 Gynecia Greek, "womanly."

2 ardency intense zeal, fervency, or ardour.

3 travail hardship.

4 circuit area.

5 ridings riding trails.

6 Pyrocles continues his narration to Musidorus.

the owner of my heart. But who would think it possible (though I feel it true) that in almost eight weeks' space I have lived here (having no more company but her parents, and I being familiar as being a woman, and watchful as being a lover) yet could never find opportunity to have one minute's leisure of private conference, the cause whereof is as strange as the effects are to me miserable. And, alas, this it is:

"At the first sight that Basilius had of me (I think Cupid having headed his arrows with my misfortune) he was stricken (taking me to be such as I profess) with great affection towards me, which since is grown to such a doting love that till I was fain to get this place sometimes to retire unto freely, I was even choked with his tediousness. You never saw fourscore[1] years dance up and down more lively in a young lover, now as fine in his apparel as if he would make me in love with a cloak, and verse for verse with the sharpest-witted lover in Arcadia. Do you not think that this is a salad of wormwood[2] while mine eyes feed upon the ambrosia[3] of Philoclea's beauty?

"But this is not all; no, this is not the worst: for he, good man, were easy enough to be dealt with, but (as I think) love and mischief, having made a wager which should have most power in me, have set Gynecia also on such a fire towards me as will never, I fear, be quenched but with my destruction. For she, being a woman of excellent wit and of strong-working thoughts, whether she suspected me by my over-vehement shows of affection to Philoclea (which love forced me unwisely to utter, while hope of my mask foolishly encouraged me) or that she hath taken some other mark of me that I am not a woman, or what devil it is hath revealed it unto her, I know not; but so it is, that all her countenances, words, and gestures are even miserable portraitures of a desperate affection. Whereby a man may learn that these avoidings of company do but make the passions more violent when they meet with fit subjects. Truly it were a notable dumb show[4] of Cupid's kingdom to see my eyes, languishing with over-vehement longing, direct themselves to Philoclea; and Basilius, as busy about me as a bee and indeed as cumbersome,[5] making such vehement suits to me, who neither could if I would nor would if I could, help him; while the terrible wit of Gynecia, carried with the beer[6] of violent love, runs through us all. And so jealous is she of my love to her daughter that I could never yet begin to open my mouth to the inevitable[7] Philoclea but that her unwished presence gave my tale a conclusion before it had a beginning.

"And surely, if I be not deceived, I see such shows of liking and, if I be acquainted with passions, of almost a passionate liking in the heavenly Philoclea towards me, that I may hope her ears would not abhor my discourse. And for good Basilius, he thought it best to have lodged us together, but that the eternal hatefulness of my destiny made Gynecia's jealousy stop that and all other my blessings. Yet must I confess that one way her love doth me pleasure, for since it was my foolish fortune or unfortunate folly to be known by her, that keeps her from bewraying[8] me to Basilius. And thus, my Musidorus, you have my tragedy played unto you by myself, which I pray the gods may not indeed prove a tragedy." And therewith he ended, making a full point[9] of a hearty sigh.

[...]

1 fourscore eighty.

2 wormwood a plant proverbial for its bitter taste.

3 ambrosia the divinely sweet food of the classical gods.

4 dumb show in early drama, part of a play represented by action without speech.

5 cumbersome troublesome, wearisome, oppressive.

6 beer obsolete form of "birr": force, impetus.

7 inevitable that which cannot be avoided or escaped; irresistible.

8 bewraying revealing; betraying.

9 full point the punctuation mark, "the period" or "full stop."

Book 3[1]

[...]

As for Amphialus,[2] he was received with triumph into the castle, although one might see by his eyes (humbly lifted up to the window where Philoclea stood) that he was rather suppliant than victorious; which occasion Cecropia[3] taking, who as then stood by Philoclea, and had lately left Pamela in another room whence also she might see the combat, "Sweet lady," said she, "now you may see whether you have cause to love my son, who then lies under your feet when he stands upon the neck of his bravest enemies."

"Alas," said Philoclea, "a simple[4] service to me, methinks it is, to have those who come to succour me destroyed. If it be my duty to call it love, be it so; but the effects it brings forth, I confess I account hateful."

Cecropia grew so angry with this unkind answer that she could not abstain from telling her that she was like them that could not sleep when they were softly laid; but that if her son would follow her counsel, he should take another course with her; and so flung away from her.

Yet, knowing the desperate melancholy of Amphialus in like cases, framed to him a very thankful message, powdering[5] it with some hope-giving phrases, which were of such joy to Amphialus that he (though against public respect and importunity of dissuaders) presently caused it to be made known to the camp that whatsoever knight would try the like fortune as Phalantus did, he should in like sort be answered. So as divers[6] of the valiantest, partly of themselves, partly at the instigation of Basilius, attempted the combat with him; and according to every one's humour,[7] so were the causes of the challenge grounded: one laying treason to his charge; another preferring himself in the worthiness to serve Philoclea; a third exalting some lady's beauty beyond either of the sisters; a fourth laying disgraces to love itself, naming it the bewitcher of the wit, the rebel to reason, the betrayer of resolution, the defiler of thoughts, the underminer of magnanimity, the flatterer of vice, the slave to weakness, the infection of youth, the madness of age, the curse of life and reproach of death; a fifth, disdaining to cast[8] at less than at all, would make the cause of his quarrel the causers of love, and proclaim his blasphemies against womankind—that namely that sex[9] was the oversight of nature, the disgrace of reasonableness, the obstinate cowards, the slave-born tyrants, the shops of vanities, the gilded weathercocks; in whom conscience is but peevishness, chastity waywardness, and gratefulness a miracle. But all these challenges (how well soever indited[10]) were so well answered, that some by death taught others, though past learning themselves; and some by yielding gave themselves the lie for having blasphemed; to the great grief of Basilius so to see his rebel prevail and, in his own sight, to crown himself with deserved honour.

Whereupon thirsting for revenge, and else not hoping to prevail, the best of his camp being already overthrown, he sent a messenger to Argalus, in whose approved courage and force he had (and had cause) to have great confidence, with a letter requiring him to take this quarrel in hand,

---

1 The story so far: at the beginning of Book 3 Philoclea, Pamela, and Zelmane are kidnapped by armed men and taken to the castle of Amphialus and his mother Cecropia. Cecropia is Basilius' sister-in-law, and thus Amphialus is his nephew. Back in Book 2 we learn of Amphialus' love for Philoclea, when Zelmane (the disguised Pyrocles) catches him spying on the two sisters while they are bathing; she/he wounds Amphialus in a fight. The kidnapping is Cecropia's idea, and she orders it while her son is recovering from this injury. Basilius pursues his daughters with an army, but when he fails in his attempt to take the castle, his knights begin to challenge Amphialus, and much of Book 3 recounts these combats.

2 Amphialus Greek, "between two seas."

3 Cecropia Greek, Athenian, after the founder of Athens, Cecrops (Classical Dict., p. 150).

4 simple valueless.

5 powdering sprinkling over (it).

6 divers various, sundry, several.

7 humour dominant psychological and/or emotional tendency; habitual cast of mind.

8 cast aim.

9 that sex the female sex; woman.

10 indited written, composed.

from which he had hitherto spared him in respect of his late marriage. But now his honour and (as he esteemed it) felicity standing upon it, he could no longer forbear to challenge of him his faithful service.

The messenger made speed, and found Argalus at a castle of his own, sitting in a parlour with the fair Parthenia, he reading in a book the stories of Hercules, she by him, as to hear him read; but while his eyes looked on the book, she looked on his eyes, and sometimes staying him with some pretty question, not so much to be resolved of the doubt as to give him occasion to look upon her. A happy couple: he joying in her, she joying in herself, but in herself, because she enjoyed him; both increasing their riches by giving to each other, each making one life double, because they made a double life one; where desire never wanted satisfaction, nor satisfaction ever bred satiety; he ruling, because she would obey, or rather because she would obey, she therein ruling.

But when the messenger came in with letters in his hand and haste in his countenance, though she knew not what to fear, yet she feared because she knew not; but she rose and went aside while he delivered his letters and message; yet afar off she looked, now at the messenger, and then at her husband: the same fear, which made her loath to have cause of fear, yet making her seek cause to nourish her fear. And well she found there was some serious matter, for her husband's countenance figured some resolution between loathness and necessity; and once his eye cast upon her, and finding hers upon him, he blushed, and she blushed because he blushed, and yet straight grew pale because she knew not why he had blushed. But when he had read, and heard, and dispatched away the messenger (like a man in whom honour could not be rocked asleep by affection) with promise quickly to follow, he came to Parthenia, and as sorry as might be for parting, and yet more sorry for her sorrow, he gave her the letter to read.

She with fearful slowness took it, and with fearful quickness read it; and having read it, "Ah, my Argalus," said she, "and have you made such haste to answer? And are you so soon resolved to leave me?"

But he discoursing unto her how much it imported[1] his honour (which, since it was dear to him, he knew it would be dear unto her) her reason, overclouded with sorrow, suffered her not presently to reply, but left the charge thereof to tears and sighs, which he, not able to bear, left her alone and went to give order for his present departure.

But by that time he was armed and ready to go, she had recovered a little strength of spirit again, and coming out, and seeing him armed and wanting[2] nothing for his departure but her farewell, she ran to him, took him by the arm, and kneeling down without regard who either heard her speech or saw her demeanour,

"My Argalus, my Argalus," said she, "do not thus forsake me. Remember, alas, remember that I have interest in you, which I will never yield shall be thus adventured. Your valour is already sufficiently known. Sufficiently have you already done for your country. Enow,[3] enow there are beside you to lose less worthy lives. Woe is me, what shall become of me if you thus abandon me? Then was it time for you to follow these adventures when you adventured nobody but yourself, and were nobody's but your own. But now pardon me, that now, or never, I claim mine own. Mine you are, and without me you can undertake no danger, and will you endanger Parthenia? Parthenia shall be in the battle[4] of your fight. Parthenia shall smart in your pain, and your blood must be bled by Parthenia."

"Dear Parthenia," said he, "this is the first time that ever you resisted my will. I thank you for it, but persevere not in it; and let not the tears of those most beloved eyes be a presage unto me of that which you would not should happen. I shall live, doubt not, for so great a blessing as you are was not given unto me so soon to be deprived of it. Look for me, therefore, shortly, and victorious;

---

1 imported concerned, related to.
2 wanting lacking.
3 Enow enough.
4 in the battle perhaps, in the midst or at the forefront.

and prepare a joyful welcome, and I will wish for no other triumph."

She answered not, but stood as it were thunder-stricken with amazement; for true love made obedience stand up against all other passions. But when he took her in his arms and sought to print his heart in her sweet lips, she fell in a sound,[1] so as he was fain[2] to leave her to her gentlewomen; and carried away by the tyranny of honour, though with many a back-cast look and hearty groan, went to the camp.

[...]

But he[3] had scarcely viewed the ground of the island and considered the advantages (if any were) thereof, before the castle boat had delivered Amphialus, in all points provided to give a hard entertainment. And then sending each to other their squires in honourable manner to know whether they should attend any further ceremony, the trumpets sounding, the horses with smooth running, the staves[4] with unshaked motion, obediently performed their choleric[5] commandments. But when they drew near, Argalus' horse being hot, pressed in with his head, which Amphialus perceiving, knowing if he gave him his side it should be to his disadvantage, pressed in also with him, so as both the horses and men met shoulder to shoulder, so as the horses (hurt as much with the striking as being stricken) tumbled down to the earth, dangerously to their masters but that they, by strength nimble and by use skillful, in the falling shunned the harm of the fall, and without more respite drew out their swords with a gallant bravery, each striving to show himself the less endamaged, and to make known that they were glad they had now nothing else to trust to but their own virtue.

True it is that Amphialus was the sooner up, but Argalus had his sword out the sooner; and then fell they to the cruellest combat that any present eye had seen. Their swords first, like cannons, battering down the walls of their armour, making breaches almost in every place for troops of wounds to enter. Among the rest, Argalus gave a great wound to Amphialus' disarmed face, though part of the force of it Amphialus warded upon his shield, and withal, first casting his eye up to Philoclea's window, as if he had fetched his courage thence, feigning to intend the same sort of blow, turned his sword and, with a mighty reverse, gave a cruel wound to the right arm of Argalus, the unfaithful armour yielding to the sword's strong-guided sharpness. But though the blood accused the hurt of Argalus, yet would he in no action of his confess it; but keeping himself in a lower ward,[6] stood watching with timely thrusts to repair his loss, which quickly he did. For Amphialus, following his fawning fortune, laid on so thick upon Argalus that his shield had almost fallen piece-meal to the earth, when Argalus, coming in with his right foot, and something stooping to come under his armour, thrust him into the belly dangerously; and mortally it would have been, but that with the blow before, Amphialus had over-stricken himself so as he fell sideward down, and with falling saved himself from ruin, the sword by that means slipping aside and not piercing more deeply.

Argalus seeing him fall, threatening with voice and sword, bade him yield. But he striving without answer to rise, Argalus struck him with all his might upon his head. But his hurt arm, not able to master so sound a force, let the sword fall so as Amphialus, though astonished with the blow, could arise; which Argalus considering, ran in to grasp with him, and so closed together, falling so to the ground, now one getting above, and then the other. At length both, weary of so unlovely embracements, with a dissenting consent got up and went to their swords, but happened each of [1] sound faint; swoon.

[2] fain forced, obliged.
[3] he i.e., Argalus.
[4] staves lances.
[5] choleric hot-tempered, wrathful.
[6] ward in fencing, a defensive posture or movement; a mode of parrying.

his enemy's; where Argalus finding his foe's sword garnished in his blood, his heart rose with the same sword to revenge it, and on that blade to ally their bloods together. But his mind was evil waited-on by his lamed force, so as he received still more and more wounds, which made all his armour seem to blush that it had defended his master no better. But Amphialus perceiving it, and weighing the small hatefulness of their quarrel with the worthiness of the knight, desired him to take pity of himself. But Argalus, the more repining[1] the more he found himself in disadvantage, filling his veins with spite instead of blood, and making courage arise against faintness (like a candle, which a little before it goes out gives then the greatest blaze) so did he unite all his force, that casting away the little remnant of his shield, and taking his sword in both hands, he struck such a notable blow that he cleft his shield, armour, and arm almost to the bone.

But then Amphialus forgot all ceremonies, and with cruel blows made more of his best blood succeed the rest: till his hand being stayed by his ear, his ear filled with a pitiful cry, the cry guided his sight to an excellent fair lady who came running as fast as she could, and yet because she could not as fast as she would, she sent her lamentable voice before her: and being come, and being known to them both to be the beautiful Parthenia (who had that night dreamed she saw her husband in such estate as she then found him, which made her make such haste thither) they both marvelled. But Parthenia ran between them, fear of love making her forget the fear of nature, and then fell down at their feet, determining so to part them till she could get breath to sigh out her doleful speeches: and when her breath (which running had spent, and dismayedness made slow to return) had by sobs gotten into her sorrow-closed breast, for a while she could say nothing, but, "O wretched eyes of mine, O wailful sight, O day of darkness!"

At length turning her eyes, wherein sorrow swam, to Amphialus, "My lord," said she, "it is said you love. In the power of that love, I beseech you to leave off this combat. As ever your heart may find comfort in his affection, even for her sake I crave it: or if you be mortally determined, be so pitiful unto me as first to kill me, that I may not see the death of Argalus."

Amphialus was about to have answered, when Argalus, vexed with his fortune, but most vexed that she should see him in that fortune, "Ah Parthenia," said he, "never till now unwelcome unto me, do you come to get my life by request? And cannot Argalus live but by request? Is that a life?"

With that he went aside for fear of hurting her, and would have begun the combat afresh. But Amphialus not only conjured[2] by that which held the monarchy of his mind, but even in his noble heart melting with compassion at so passionate a sight, desired him to withhold his hands, for that he should strike one who sought his favour, and would not make resistance—a notable example of the wonderful effects of virtue, where the conqueror sought for friendship of the conquered, and the conquered would not pardon the conqueror, both indeed being of that mind to love each other for accepting, but not for giving mercy, and neither affected to over-live a dishonour: so that Argalus, not so much striving with Amphialus (for if he had had him in the like sort, in like sort he would have dealt with him) as labouring against his own power (which he chiefly despised) set himself forward, stretching his strength to the uttermost. But the fire of that strife, blown with his inward rage, boiled out his blood in such abundance that he was driven to rest him upon the pommel of his sword; and then each thing beginning to turn round in the dance of death before his eyes, his sight both dazzled and dimmed, till, thinking to sit down, he fell in a swoon. Parthenia and Amphialus both hastily went unto him. Amphialus took off his helmet, and Parthenia laid his head in her lap, tearing off her linen sleeves and partlet[3] to serve about his wounds; to bind which she took off her hair-lace[1] and would have cut off her fair hair herself, but that the squires and judges came in with fitter things for the purpose, while she bewailed herself with so lamentable sweetness as was enough to have taught sorrow to the gladdest thoughts, and have engraved it in the minds of hardest metal.

[1] repining discontented, dissatisfied.

[2] conjured entreated.

[3] partlet a linen neckerchief.

"O Parthenia, no more Parthenia," said she, "what art thou? What seest thou? How is thy bliss in a moment fallen! How wert[2] thou even now before all ladies the example of perfect happiness, and now the gazing-stock of endless misery! O God, what hath been my desert to be thus punished? Or if such have been my desert, why was I not in myself punished? O wandering life, to what wilderness wouldst thou lead me? But sorrow, I hope thou art sharp enough to save my labour from other remedies. Argalus, Argalus, I will follow thee, I will follow thee."

But with that Argalus came out of his swoon, and lifting up his languishing eyes (which a painful rest and iron sleep did seek to lock up) seeing her in whom, even dying, he lived, and himself seated in so beloved a place, it seemed a little cheerful blood came up to his cheeks, like a burning coal, almost dead, if some breath a little revive it; and forcing up, the best he could, his feeble voice:

"My dear, my better half," said he, "I find I must now leave thee. And by that sweet hand and fair eyes of thine I swear that death brings nothing with it to grieve me but that I must leave thee, and cannot remain to answer part of thy infinite deserts with being some comfort unto thee. But since so it pleaseth him, whose wisdom and goodness guideth all, put thy confidence in him, and one day we shall blessedly meet again, never to depart. Meanwhile live happily, dear Parthenia, and I persuade myself it will increase the blessedness of my soul so to see thee. Love well the remembrance of thy loving, and truly loving Argalus, and let not," (with that word he sighed) "this disgrace of mine make thee one day think thou hadst an unworthy husband."

They could scarcely understand the last words, for death began to seize himself of his heart; neither could Parthenia make answer, so full was her breast of anguish. But while the others sought to staunch his remediless wounds, she with her kisses made him happy, for his last breath was delivered into her mouth.

But when indeed she found his ghost was gone, then sorrow lost the wit of utterance and grew rageful and mad, so that she tore her beautiful face and rent her hair, as though they could serve for nothing since Argalus was gone, till Amphialus (so moved with pity of that sight as that he honoured his adversary's death with tears) caused her, with the help of her women that came with her, partly by force to be conveyed into the boat, with the dead body of Argalus, from which she would not depart. And being come of the other side, there she was received by Basilius himself with all the funeral pomp of military discipline, trailing all their ensigns[3] upon the ground, making their warlike instruments sound doleful notes; and Basilius (with comfort in his mouth and woe in his face) sought to persuade some ease into Parthenia's mind. But all was as easeful to her as the handling of sore wounds; all the honour done being to her but the triumph of her ruin, she finding no comfort but in desperate yielding to sorrow, and rather determined to hate herself if ever she should find ease thereof. And well might she hear as she passed through the camp the great praises spoken of her husband, which all were records of her loss. But the more excellent he was (being indeed counted second to none in all Greece) the more did the breath of those praises bear up the wings of Amphialus his fame; to whom yet (such was his case) that trophy upon trophy still did but build up the monument of his thraldom, he ever finding himself in such favour of Philoclea that she was most absent when he was present with her, and ever sorriest when he had best success, which would have made him renounce all comfort but that his mother, with a diversity of devices, kept up his heart.

[1] hair-lace string or tie for binding the hair.

[2] wert "art" in the 1593 edition, although the past tense is clearly needed here.

[3] ensigns military banners or flags.

[...]

This Knight of the Tomb (for so the soldiers termed him) sent to Basilius to demand leave to send in a damsel into the town to call out Amphialus, according as before time some others had done. Which being granted (as glad any would undertake the charge, which nobody else in that camp was known willing to do) the damsel went in, and having with tears sobbed out a brave challenge to Amphialus from the Knight of the Tomb, Amphialus, honourably entertaining the gentlewoman, and desiring to know the knight's name (which the doleful gentlewoman would not discover) accepted the challenge, only desiring the gentlewoman to say thus much to the strange knight from him, that if his mind were like to his title, there were more cause of affinity than enmity between them. And therefore presently, according as he was wont, as soon as he perceived the Knight of the Tomb with his damsels and judge was come into the island, he also went over in accustomed manner; and yet, for the courtesy of his nature, desired to speak with him.

But the Knight of the Tomb, with silence and drawing his horse back, showed no will to hear nor speak; but with lance on thigh made him know it was fit for him to go to the other end of the career;[1] whence waiting the start of the unknown knight, he likewise made his spurs claim haste of his horse. But when his staff was in his rest,[2] coming down to meet with the knight, now very near him, he perceived the knight had missed his rest; wherefore the courteous Amphialus would not let his lance descend, but with a gallant grace ran over the head of his therein-friended enemy. And having stopped his horse, and with the turning of him blessed his sight with the window where he thought Philoclea might stand, he perceived the knight had lighted from his horse and thrown away his staff (angry with his misfortune as of having missed his rest) and drawn his sword, to make that supply his fellow's fault. He also lighted and drew his sword, esteeming victory by advantage rather robbed than purchased; and so the other coming eagerly toward him, he with his shield out and sword aloft, with more bravery than anger drew unto him, and straight made their swords speak for them a pretty while with equal fierceness.

But Amphialus, to whom the earth brought forth few matches, having both much more skill to choose the places and more force to work upon the chosen, had already made many windows in his armour for death to come in at, when in the nobleness of his nature abhorring to make the punishment overgo the offence, he stepped a little back, and withal, "Sir knight," said he, "you may easily see that it pleaseth God to favour my cause. Employ your valour against them that wish you hurt; for my part I have not deserved hate of you."

"Thou liest, false traitor," said the other, with an angry, but weak voice.

But Amphialus, in whom abused kindness became spiteful rage, "Ah barbarous wretch," said he, "only courageous in discourtesy, thou shalt soon see whether thy tongue hath betrayed thy heart, or no"; and with that, redoubling his blows, gave him a great wound upon his neck, and closing with him, overthrew him, and in the fall thrust him mortally into the body; and with that went to pull off his helmet, with intention to make him give himself the lie for having so said, or to cut off his head.

But the headpiece was no sooner off but that there fell about the shoulders of the overcome knight the treasure of fair golden hair which, with the face (soon known by the badge of excellency) witnessed that it was Parthenia, the unfortunately virtuous wife of Argalus; her beauty then, even in the despite of the past sorrow or coming death, assuring all beholders that it was nothing short of perfection. For her exceeding fair eyes having with continual weeping gotten a little redness about them; her roundy,[1] sweetly-swelling lips a little trembling, as though they kissed their neighbour death; in her cheeks the whiteness striving by little and little to get upon the rosiness of them; her neck, a neck indeed of alabaster, displaying the wound, which with most dainty blood laboured to drown his own beauties, so as here was a river of purest red, there an island of perfectest white, each giving luster to the other, with the sweet countenance, God knows, full of an unaffected languishing. Though these things to a grossly conceiving sense might seem disgraces, yet indeed were they but apparelling beauty in a new fashion which, all-looked-upon through the spectacles of pity, did even increase the lines of her natural fairness, so as Amphialus was astonished with grief, compassion, and shame, detesting his fortune that made him unfortunate in victory.

[1] career the charge of a horse (in tournament or battle), and thus, here, the path laid out for such an encounter.

[2] rest a contrivance meant to receive the butt-end of the lance [staff] when couched for the charge in a tournament or battle, and which prevented the lance from being driven back upon impact.

Therefore putting off his headpiece and gauntlet, kneeling down unto her, and with tears testifying his sorrow, he offered his (by himself accursed) hands to help her, protesting his life and power to be ready to do her honour. But Parthenia, who had inward messengers of the desired death's approach, looking upon him, and straight turning away her feeble sight as from a delightless object, drawing out her words which her breath, loath to part from so sweet a body, did faintly deliver:

"Sir," said she, "I pray you, if prayers have place in enemies, to let my maids take my body untouched by you. The only honour I now desire by your means is that I have no honour of you. Argalus made no such bargain with you, that the hands which killed him should help me. I have of them (and I do not only pardon you, but thank you for it) the service which I desired. There rests nothing now but that I go live with him since whose death I have done nothing but die."

Then pausing, and a little fainting, and again coming to herself:

"O sweet life, welcome!" said she. "Now feel I the bands untied of the cruel death which so long hath held me. And O life, O death, answer for me, that my thoughts have not so much as in a dream tasted any comfort since they were deprived of Argalus. I come, my Argalus, I come! And O God, hide my faults in thy mercy, and grant, as I feel thou dost grant, that in thy eternal love we may love each other eternally. And this, O Lord"—but there Atropos[2] cut off her sentence, for with that, casting up both eyes and hands to the skies, the noble soul departed (one might well assure himself) to Heaven, which left the body in so heavenly a demeanour.

But Amphialus (with a heart oppressed with grief, because of her request) withdrew himself, but the judges, as full of pity, had been all this while disarming her, and her gentlewomen with lamentable cries labouring to staunch the remediless wounds. And a while she was dead before they perceived it, death being able to divide the soul, but not the beauty from that body. But when the infallible tokens of death assured them of their loss, one of the women would have killed herself but that the squire of Amphialus perceiving it by force held her. Others that had as strong passion though weaker resolution fell to cast dust upon their heads, to tear their garments; all falling upon the earth and crying upon their sweet mistress, as if their cries could persuade the soul to leave the celestial happiness to come again into the elements of sorrow: one time calling to remembrance her virtue, chasteness, sweetness, goodness to them; another time accursing themselves that they had obeyed her, they having been deceived by her words, who assured them that it was revealed unto her that she should have her heart's desire in the battle against Amphialus, which they wrongly understood; then kissing her cold hands and feet, weary of the world, since she was gone who was their world. The very heavens seemed with a cloudy countenance to lour[3] at the loss, and fame

[1] roundy rounded.

[2] Atropos was one of the three Fates or Destinies, responsible for dictating the scope, length, and shape of each person's life; Lachesis presides over and assigns each person's lot in life; Clotho spins the thread of life; and Atropos cuts the thread.

[3] lour mourn.

itself (though by nature glad to tell such rare accidents) yet could not choose but deliver it in lamentable accents, and in such sort went it quickly all over the camp. And, as if the air had been infected with sorrow, no heart was so hard but was subject to that contagion, the rareness of the accident matching together (the rarely matched together) pity with admiration.

Basilius himself came forth, and brought the fair Gynecia with him, who was come into the camp under colour of visiting her husband and hearing of her daughters, but indeed Zelmane was the saint to which her pilgrimage was intended, cursing, envying, blessing, and in her heart kissing the walls which imprisoned her. But both they, with Philanax and the rest of the principal nobility, went out to make honour triumph over death, conveying that excellent body (whereto Basilius himself would needs lend his shoulder) to a church a mile from the camp, where the valiant Argalus lay entombed; recommending to that sepulchre the blessed relics of faithful and virtuous love, giving order for the making of marble images to represent them, and each way enriching the tomb, upon which Basilius himself caused this epitaph to be written:

His being was in her alone:
And he not being, she was none.

They joy'd one joy, one grief they griev'd,
One love they lov'd, one life they liv'd.
The hand was one, one was the sword
That did his death, her death afford.

As all the rest, so now the stone
That tombs the two is justly one.

ARGALUS AND PARTHENIA

Then with eyes full of tears and mouths full of her praises returned they to the camp, with more and more hate against Amphialus, who, poor gentleman, had therefore greater portion of woe than any of them. For that courteous heart, which would have grieved but to have heard the like adventure, was rent with remembering himself to be the author, so that his wisdom could not so far temper his passion but that he took his sword, counted the best in the world (which with much blood he had once conquered of a mighty giant) and broke it into many pieces (which afterwards he had good cause to repent) saying, that neither it was worthy to serve the noble exercise of chivalry, nor any other worthy to feel that sword which had stroken[1] so excellent a lady; and withal, banishing all cheerfulness of his countenance, he returned home, where he got him to his bed, not so much to rest his restless mind as to avoid all company, the sight whereof was tedious unto him.

[...]

But his mother, as she had plentiful cause, making him see that of his other griefs there was little or no fault in himself, and therefore there ought to be little or no grief in him; when she came to the head[2] of the sore, indeed seeing that she could no longer patch up[3] her former promises (he taking a desperate deafness to all delaying hopes) she confessed plainly that she could prevail nothing, but the fault was his own, who had marred the young girl by seeking to have that by prayer which he should have taken by authority; that as it were an absurd cunning to make high ladders to go in a plain way,[4] so was it an untimely and foolish flattery there to beseech where one might command, puffing them up, by being besought, with such a self-pride of superiority that it was not, forsooth, to be held out but by a denial.

"O God," said Amphialus, "how well I thought my fortune would bring forth this end of your labours! Assure yourself, mother, I will sooner pull out these eyes than they shall look upon the heavenly Philoclea but as upon a heaven whence they

[1] stroken struck.

[2] head origin.

[3] patch up repair or mend in a clumsy or imperfect manner, that she would win Philoclea's love for him.

[4] to make high ladders to go in a plain way i.e., to take high ladders (such as are meant for the scaling of a besieged town's walls) and lay them flat on the ground.

have their light, and to which they are subject. If they will pour down any influences of comfort, O happy I; but if by the sacrifice of a faithful heart they will not be called unto me, let me languish, and wither with languishing, and grieve with withering, but never so much as repine[1] with never so much grieving. Mother, O mother, lust may well be a tyrant, but true love, where it is indeed, it is a servant. Accursed more than I am may I be, if ever I did approach her but that I freezed as much in a fearful reverence as I burned in a vehement desire. Did ever man's eye look through love upon the majesty of virtue shining through beauty but that he became (as it well became him) a captive? And is it the style of a captive to write, 'Our will and pleasure'?"

"Tush, tush, son!" said Cecropia. "If you say you love but, withal, you fear, you fear lest you should offend. Offend? And how know you that you should offend? Because she doth deny? Deny! Now by my truth, if your sadness would let me laugh, I could laugh heartily to see that yet you are ignorant that 'No' is no negative in a woman's mouth. My son, believe me, a woman speaking of women. A lover's modesty among us is much more praised than liked; or if we like it, so well we like it that for marring of his modesty he shall never proceed further. Each virtue hath his time. If you command your soldier to march foremost and he for courtesy put others before him, would you praise his modesty? Love is your general: he bids you dare. And will Amphialus be a dastard?[2] Let examples serve. Do you think Theseus should ever have gotten Antiope with sighing and crossing his arms? He ravished her, and ravished her that was an Amazon and therefore had gotten a habit of stoutness above the nature of a woman; but having ravished her, he got a child of her.[3] And I say no more, but that, they say, is not gotten without consent of both sides.[4] Iöle had her own father killed by Hercules and herself ravished, by force ravished, and yet ere long this ravished and unfathered lady could sportfully put on the lion's skin upon her own fair shoulders, and play with the club with her own delicate hands.[5] So easily had she pardoned the ravisher that she could not but delight in those weapons of ravishing. But above all mark Helen, daughter to Jupiter, who could never brook her mannerly-wooing Menelaus, but disdained his humbleness and loathed his softness. But so well she could like the force of enforcing Paris that for him she could abide what might be abidden. But what? Menelaus takes heart: he recovers her by force, by force carries her home, by force enjoys her, and she (who could never like him for serviceableness) ever after loved him for violence.[6] For what can be more agreeable than upon force to lay the fault of desire, and in one instant to join a dear delight with a just excuse? Or rather the true cause is (pardon me, O womankind, for revealing to mine own son the truth of this mystery) we think there wants fire, where we find no sparkles at least of fury [...] My Amphialus, know thyself a man, and show thyself a man; and, believe me upon my word, a woman is a woman."

[...]

---

1 repine murmur, complain.

2 dastard one who meanly or basely shrinks from danger; a despicable coward.

3 In some classical accounts, Theseus took prisoner and raped Antiope (better known as Hippolyta), queen of the Amazons, by whom he had a son named Hippolytus.

4 but that, they say … sides It was a medical commonplace in the period that since mutual enjoyment was necessary for conception to occur rape could not result in a pregnancy. Thus, if a woman became pregnant she could not possibly have been raped. See T. Laqueur, Making Sex (Cambridge, MA, 1990), chapter 5, especially p. 161.

5 Hercules was in love with Iöle, daughter of King Eurytus. When Eurytus spurned Hercules' suit, Hercules made war on him, killing Eurytus and three of his sons, and making off with Iöle. Iöle's subsequent putting on of Hercules' arms and lion skin occurs in Ovid's "Deianira to Hercules" (Heroides, 9).

6 Paris, Helen and Menelaus the famous triangle which triggered the Trojan War.

But she[1] by this means rid of the present danger of the siege[2] (desiring Zoilus and Lycurgus[3] to take the care, till their brother recovered, of revictualling and furnishing the city both with men and what else wanted, against any new occasion should urge them—she herself disdaining to hearken to Basilius, without he would grant his daughter in marriage to her son, which by no means he would be brought unto) bent all the sharpness of her malicious wit how to bring a comfortable grant to her son, whereupon she well found no less than his life depended. Therefore for a while she attempted all means of eloquent praying and flattering persuasion, mingling sometimes gifts, sometimes threatenings, as she had cause to hope that either open force or undermining would best win the castle of their resolution. And ever as much as she did to Philoclea, so much did she to Pamela, though in manner sometimes differing, as she found fit to level at the one's noble height and the other's sweet lowliness. For though she knew her son's heart had wholly given itself to Philoclea, yet seeing the equal gifts in Pamela, she hoped a fair grant would recover the sorrow of a fair refusal; cruelly intending the present empoisoning the one as soon as the other's affection were purchased.

But in vain was all her vain oratory employed. Pamela's determination was built upon so brave a rock that no shot of hers could reach unto it, and Philoclea (though humbly seated) was so environed with sweet rivers of clear virtue as could neither be battered nor undermined. Her witty persuasions had wise answers; her eloquence recompensed with sweetness; her threatenings repelled with disdain in the one, and patience in the other; her gifts either not accepted, or accepted to obey, but not to bind. So as Cecropia, in nature violent; cruel, because ambitious; hateful, for old rooted grudge to their mother,[4] and now spiteful because she could not prevail with girls (as she counted them); lastly, drawn on by her love to her son, and held up by a tyrannical authority, forthwith followed the bias of her own crooked disposition, and doubling and redoubling her threatenings, fell to confirm some of her threatened effects, first withdrawing all comfort both of servants and service from them. But that those excellent ladies had been used unto, even at home, and then found in themselves how much good the hardness of education doth to the resistance of misery. Then dishonourably using them both in diet and lodging, by a contempt to pull down their thoughts to yielding. But as before the consideration of a prison had disgraced all ornaments, so now the same consideration made them attend all diseasefulness.[5] Then still as she found those not prevail would she go forward with giving them terrors, sometimes with noises of horror, sometimes with sudden frightings in the night, when the solitary darkness thereof might easier astonish the disarmed senses. But to all, virtue and love resisted, strengthened one by the other when each found itself over-vehemently assaulted; Cecropia still sweetening her fierceness with fair promises, if they would promise fair, that feeling evil and seeing a way far better, their minds might the sooner be mollified. But they, that could not taste her behaviour when it was pleasing indeed, could worse now when they had lost all taste by her injuries.

She, resolving all extremities rather than fail of conquest, pursued on her rugged way, letting no day pass without new and new perplexing the poor ladies' minds and troubling their bodies; and still swelling the more she was stopped, and growing hot with her own doings, at length abominable rage carried her to absolute tyrannies; so that taking with her certain old women (of wicked

[1] she Cecropia.

[2] by this means … siege Cecropia threatens to behead Philoclea, Pamela, and Zelmane unless Basilius raises the siege of the castle, which he does, retreating to his own nearby castle and commencing negotiations with Cecropia; the narrator notes he is motivated more by his love for Zelmane than his fear for his daughters.

[3] Lycurgus Greek, "wolf."

[4] old rooted grudge to their mother Cecropia's grudge against Gynecia stems from the fact that Gynecia's marriage to Basilius has frustrated her ambition to gain real political power, first through her husband, Basilius' brother, and later through her son.

[5] attend all diseasefulness expect all discomfort.

dispositions, and apt for envy-sake to be cruel to youth and beauty) with a countenance empoisoned with malice, flew to the sweet Philoclea, as if so many kites should come about a white dove; and matching violent gestures with mischievous threatenings, she having a rod in her hand (like a fury that should carry wood to the burning of Diana's temple[1]) fell to scourge that most beautiful body; love in vain holding the shield of beauty against her blind cruelty. The sun drew clouds up to hide his face from so pitiful a sight, and the very stone walls did yield drops of sweat for agony of such a mischief. Each senseless thing had sense of pity; only they that had sense were senseless. Virtue rarely found her worldly weakness more than by the oppression of that day; and weeping Cupid told his weeping mother that he was sorry he was not deaf as well as blind, that he might never know so lamentable a work. Philoclea, with tearful eyes and sobbing breast (as soon as her weariness rather than compassion gave her respite) kneeled down to Cecropia, and making pity in her face honourable, and torment delightful, besought her since she hated her (for what cause she took God to witness she knew not) that she would at once take away her life, and not please herself with the tormenting of a poor gentlewoman.

"If," said she, "the common course of humanity cannot move you, nor the having me in your own walls cannot claim pity, nor womanly mercy, nor near alliance,[2] nor remembrance (how miserable soever now) that I am a prince's daughter, yet let the love you have often told me your son bears me so much procure, that for his sake one death may be thought enough for me. I have not lived so many years but that one death may be able to conclude them. Neither have my faults, I hope, been so many, but that one death may satisfy them. It is no great suit to an enemy when but death is desired. I crave but that, and as for the granting your request, know for certain you lose your labours, being every day further-off-minded from becoming his wife who useth me like a slave."

But that, instead of getting grace, renewed again Cecropia's fury, so that (excellent creature) she was newly again tormented by those hellish monsters, Cecropia using no other words but that she was a proud and ungrateful wench, and that she would teach her to know her own good, since of herself she would not conceive it. So that with silence and patience (like a fair gorgeous armour, hammered upon by an ill-favoured smith) she abode their pitiless dealing with her till, rather reserving her for more than meaning to end, they left her to an uncomfortable leisure, to consider with herself her fortune, both helpless—herself being a prisoner—and hopeless, since Zelmane was a prisoner. Who therein only was short of the bottom of misery, that she knew not how unworthily her angel by these devils was abused; but wanted, God wot,[3] no stings of grief when those words did but strike upon her heart, that Philoclea was a captive and she not able to succour her. For well she knew the confidence Philoclea had in her, and well she knew Philoclea had cause to have confidence; and all trodden under foot by the wheel of senseless fortune. Yet if there be that imperious power in the soul as it can deliver knowledge to another without bodily organs, so vehement were the workings of their spirits as one met with other, though themselves perceived it not, but only thought it to be the doubling of their own loving fancies. And that was the only worldly thing whereon Philoclea rested her mind, that she knew she should die beloved of Zelmane, and should die rather than be false to Zelmane. And so this most dainty nymph, easing the pain of her mind with thinking of another's pain, and almost forgetting the pain of her body through the pain of her mind, she wasted, even longing for the conclusion of her tedious tragedy.

[1] A fury was an avenging or tormenting infernal spirit. Here, Cecropia is the fury tormenting Philoclea who, as a virgin, is compared to the temple of Diana, goddess of virginity and chastity. Her temple in Ephesus was burned to the ground by Eratostratus (Classical Dict., p. 254).

[2] near alliance For Cecropia's kinship to Philoclea and Pamela, see p. 700, note 1.

[3] wanted, God wot i.e., lacked, God knows.

But for a while she was unvisited, Cecropia employing her time in using the like cruelty upon Pamela, her heart growing not only to desire the fruit of punishing them but even to delight in the punishing them. But if ever the beams of perfection shined through the clouds of affliction, if ever virtue took a body to show his (else unconceivable) beauty, it was in Pamela. For when reason taught her there was no resistance—for to just resistance first her heart was inclined—then with so heavenly a quietness and so graceful a calmness did she suffer the divers kinds of torments they used to her, that while they vexed her fair body, it seemed that she rather directed than obeyed the vexation. And when Cecropia ended and asked whether her heart would yield, she a little smiled, but such a smiling as showed no love and yet could not be but lovely.

And then, "Beastly woman," said she, "follow on, do what thou wilt and canst upon me, for I know thy power is not unlimited. Thou mayest well wreck this silly body, but me thou canst never overthrow. For my part I will not do thee the pleasure to desire death of thee: but assure thyself, both my life and death shall triumph with honour, laying shame upon thy detestable tyranny."

And so, in effect, conquering their doing with her suffering, while Cecropia tried as many sorts of pains as might rather vex them than spoil them (for that she would not do while she were in any hope to win either of them for her son) Pamela remained almost as much content with trial in herself what virtue could do, as grieved with the misery wherein she found herself plunged. Only sometimes her thoughts softened in her, when with open wings they flew to Musidorus. For then she would think with herself how grievously Musidorus would take this her misery; and she, that wept not for herself, wept yet Musidorus' tears which he would weep for her. For gentle love did easlier[1] yield to lamentation than the constancy of virtue would else admit. Then would she remember the case wherein she had left her poor shepherd; and she, that wished death for herself, feared death for him; and she, that condemned in herself the feebleness of sorrow, yet thought it great reason to be sorry for his sorrow; and she that long had prayed for the virtuous joining themselves together, now thinking to die herself, heartily prayed that long time their fortunes might be separated.

"Live long, my Musidorus," would she say, "and let my name live in thy mouth, in thy heart my memory. Live long, that thou mayest love long the chaste love of thy dead Pamela."

Then would she wish to herself that no other woman might ever possess his heart, and yet scarcely the wish was made a wish, when herself would find fault with it as being too unjust that so excellent a man should be banished from the comfort of life. Then would she fortify her resolution with bethinking the worst, taking the counsel of virtue and comfort of love.

[...]

[2]Full therefore of the horriblest despair which a most guilty conscience could breed, with wild looks promising some terrible issue, understanding his mother was upon the top of the leads,[3] he caught one of his servant's swords from him, and none of them daring to stay him, he went up, carried by fury instead of strength; where she was at that time, musing how to go through with this matter, and resolving to make much of her nieces in show and secretly to empoison them; thinking since they were not to be won, her son's love would no otherwise be mitigated.

But when she saw him come in with a sword drawn, and a look more terrible than the sword, she straight was stricken with the guiltiness of her own conscience. Yet the well-known humbleness of her son somewhat animated her, till he coming nearer her, and crying to her, "Thou damnable

[1] easlier more easily.

[2] Amphialus has finally been informed by the sisters of the torture which his mother has striven to keep him ignorant of. This information being confirmed by his servants, Amphialus searches out his mother.

[3] leads roof.

creature, only fit to bring forth such a monster of unhappiness as I am," she fearing he would have stricken her (though indeed he meant it not, but only intended to kill himself in her presence) went back so far till, ere she were aware, she overthrew herself from over the leads, to receive her death's kiss at the ground; and yet was she not so happy as presently[1] to die, but that she had time with hellish agony to see her son's mischief[2] (whom she loved so well) before her end; when she confessed (with most desperate but not repenting mind) the purpose she had to empoison the princesses, and would then have had them murdered. But everybody, seeing, and glad to see her end, had left obedience to her tyranny.

And, if it could be, her ruin increased woe in the noble heart of Amphialus who, when he saw her fall, had his own rage stayed a little with the suddenness of her destruction.

"And was I not enough miserable before," said he, "but that before my end I must be the death of my mother? who, how wicked soever, yet I would she had received her punishment by some other! O Amphialus, wretched Amphialus, thou hast lived to be the death of thy most dear companion and friend, Philoxenus, and of his father, thy most careful foster father.[3] Thou hast lived to kill a lady with thine own hands, and so excellent and virtuous a lady as the fair Parthenia was. Thou hast lived to see thy faithful Ismenus slain in succouring thee, and thou not able to defend him. Thou hast lived to show thyself such a coward, as that one unknown knight could overcome thee in thy lady's presence. Thou hast lived to bear arms against thy rightful prince, thine own uncle. Thou hast lived to be accounted, and justly accounted, a traitor, by the most excellent persons that this world holdeth. Thou hast lived to be the death of her that gave thee life. But ah, wretched Amphialus, thou hast lived, for thy sake and by thy authority, to have Philoclea tormented. O heavens, in Amphialus' castle, where Amphialus commanded, tormented! Tormented? Torment of my soul, Philoclea tormented, and thou hast had such comfort in thy life as to live all this while! Perchance this hand, used only to mischievous acts, thinks it were too good a deed to kill me; or else, filthy hand, only worthy to kill women, thou art afraid to strike a man. Fear not, cowardly hand, for thou shalt kill but a cowardly traitor, and do it gladly, for thou shalt kill him whom Philoclea hateth."

With that, furiously he tore open his doublet, and setting the pommel of the sword to the ground and the point to his breast, he fell upon it. But the sword more merciful than he to himself, with the slipping of the pommel, the point swerved and razed him but upon the side; yet with the fall, his other wounds opened so as he bled in such extremity that Charon's boat[4] might very well be carried in that flood, which yet he sought to hasten by this means. As he opened his doublet and fell, there fell out Philoclea's knives which Cecropia at the first had taken from her and delivered to her son, and he had ever worn them next his heart as the only relic he had of his saint. Now seeing them by him (his sword being so as weakness could not well draw it out from his doublet) he took the knives, and pulling one of them out and many times kissing it, and then, first with the passions of kindness and unkindness melting in tears:

"O dear knives, you are come in a good time to revenge the wrong I have done you all this while, in keeping you from her blessed side, and wearing you without your mistress' leave. Alas, be witness with me yet before I die (and well you may, for you

[1] presently immediately, at once.

[2] mischief evil plight or condition; misfortune.

[3] In Book 1, Amphialus is sent by his friend and foster-brother, Philoxenus, to plead Philoxenus' love-case to Helen, queen of Corinth. Unfortunately, Helen falls in love with Amphialus instead, causing Amphialus to flee the court in hopes that she will forget him and turn her affections to Philoxenus. When Philoxenus comes across Helen mourning over a picture of Amphialus, he pursues his friend and challenges him to a fight. When Amphialus refuses to fight, Philoxenus assaults him and in defending himself Amphialus accidentally kills his friend. Philoxenus' father, Timotheus, Amphialus' foster-father, comes upon the tragic scene and dies from grief.

[4] Charon's boat the vessel that ferried the classical dead across the River Styx into the underworld.

have lain next my heart) that by my consent your excellent mistress should have had as much honour as this poor place could have brought forth for so high an excellency; and now I am condemned to die by her mouth. Alas, other, far other hope would my desire often have given me; but other event it hath pleased her to lay upon me. Ah Philoclea,"—with that his tears gushed out as though they would strive to overflow his blood—"I would yet thou knewest how I love thee. Unworthy I am, unhappy I am, false I am; but to thee, alas, I am not false. But what a traitor am I any way to excuse him whom she condemneth! Since there is nothing left me wherein I may do her service but in punishing him who hath so offended her, dear knife, then do your noble mistress' commandment."

With that, he stabbed himself into divers places of his breast and throat, until those wounds, with the old, freshly bleeding, brought him to the senseless gate of death.

By which time, his servants having, with fear of his fury, abstained a while from coming unto him, one of them (preferring dutiful affection before fearful duty) came in and there found him swimming in his own blood, giving a pitiful spectacle, where the conquest was the conqueror's overthrow, and self-ruin the only triumph of a battle fought between him and himself. The time full of danger, the person full of worthiness, the manner full of horror did greatly astonish all the beholders, so as by and by all the town was full of it, and then of all ages came running up to see the beloved body, everybody thinking their safety bled in his wounds and their honour died in his destruction.

[...]

—1593

from The Defence of Poesy.[1]

By Sir Philip Sidney, Knight.
London. Printed for William Ponsonby. 1595.

When the right virtuous E.W.[2] and I were at the Emperor's Court together, we gave ourselves to learn horsemanship of Jon Pietro Pugliano, one that with great commendation had the place of an esquire in his stable. And he, according to the fertileness of the Italian wit, did not only afford us the demonstration of his practice, but sought to enrich our minds with the contemplations therein which he thought most precious. But with none I remember mine ears were at any time more loaden than when (either angered with slow payment, or moved with our learner-like admiration) he exercised his speech in the praise of his faculty. He said soldiers were the noblest estate of mankind, and horsemen the noblest of soldiers. He said they were the masters of war and ornaments of peace, speedy goers and strong abiders, triumphers both in camps and courts. Nay, to so unbelieved a point he proceeded as that no earthly thing bred such wonder to a prince as to be a good horseman. Skill of government was but a pedanteria[3] in comparison; then would he add certain praises by telling what a peerless beast the horse was, the one serviceable courtier without flattery, the beast of most beauty, faithfulness, courage, and such more that if I had not been a piece of a logician before I came to him I think he would have persuaded me to have wished myself a horse. But thus much at least, with his no few words, he drove into me: that self-love is better than any gilding to make that seem gorgeous wherein ourselves be parties. Wherein, if Pugliano's strong affection and weak arguments will not satisfy you, I will give you a nearer example of myself, who, I know not by what mischance in these my not old years and idlest times,[1] having slipped into the title of a poet, am provoked to say something unto you in the defence of that my unelected vocation; which if I handle with more good will than good reasons, bear with me, since the scholar is to be pardoned that followeth the steps of his master.[2] And yet, I must say that as I have more just cause to make a pitiful[3] defence of poor poetry—which from almost the highest estimation of learning is fallen to be the laughingstock of children—so have I need to bring some more available proofs, since the former[4] is by no man barred of his deserved credit, the silly[5] latter hath had even the names of philosophers used to the defacing of it, with great danger of civil war among the Muses. And first, truly, to all them that professing learning inveigh against poetry may justly be objected that they go very near to ungratefulness, to seek to deface that which in the noblest nations and languages that are known hath been the first light-giver to ignorance, and first nurse whose milk little and little enabled them to feed afterwards of tougher knowledges. And will you[6] play the hedgehog, that being received into the den drove out his host? Or rather the vipers, that with their birth kill their parents?[7] Let learned Greece in any of his manifold sciences[8] be able to show me one book before Musaeus, Homer, and Hesiod,[9] all three nothing else but poets. Nay, let any history be brought that can say any writers were there before them, if they were not men of the same skill, as Orpheus, Linus,[10] and some other are named, who having been the first of that country that made pens deliverers of their knowledge to the posterity may[11] justly challenge to be called their fathers in learning. For not only in time they had this priority, (although in itself antiquity be venerable) but went before them, as causes to draw with their charming sweetness the wild untamed wits to an admiration of knowledge: so as Amphion[12] was said to move stones with his poetry to build Thebes, and Orpheus to be listened to by beasts, indeed stony and beastly

[1] The following selections are based upon Ponsonby's 1595 edition, but the footnotes indicate the major differences between this edition and that published by Henry Olney (also in 1595).

[2] E.W. Edward Wotton (1548-1626), scholar, diplomat, and linguist, half-brother of Sir Henry Wotton; in 1574-75, Edward Wotton was secretary to the English embassy in Vienna to the court of Maximilian II (1527-76), Holy Roman Emperor and king of Bohemia and Hungary. During the homeward leg of his Continental tour, Sidney met Wotton and the two became friends; clearly, they both took riding lessons from John Pietro Pugliano, Emperor Maximillian II's equerry (esquire). Pugliano was the officer charged with the care of the royal horses, and he was also a master-horseman and instructor in the Imperial Riding School. See K. Duncan-Jones, Sir Philip Sidney: Courtier Poet (New Haven, 1991), p. 83.

[3] pedenteria mere learning without judgement or discrimination; pedantry.

[1] in these my not old years and idlest times The Defence was probably composed in 1582 when Sidney was 28 years old; in 1582-83, Sidney was certainly busy: he finally secured an appointment (in the Ordnance Office), married Francis Walsingham, wrote his sonnet sequence, Astrophil and Stella, and was knighted (Duncan-Jones, pp. 222-50).

[2] I.e., here, humorously, Pugliano.

[3] pitiful full of or characterized by pity; compassionate.

[4] the former i.e., the art of horsemanship.

[5] silly helpless, innocent.

[6] you they (Olney).

[7] vipers, that with their birth kill their parents a reference to the widespread and ancient tradition that "young vipers force their way through the bowels of their dam, or that the female viper in the act of generation bites off the head of the male, in revenge whereof the young ones eat through the womb and belly of the female" (Thomas Browne, Pseudodoxia Epidemica ["Enquiries Into Vulgar and Common Errors"], 1646, in The Works of Sir Thomas Browne, 4 vols., ed. G. Keynes, 2.207-08).

[8] his manifold sciences her (Olney).

[9] Musaeus legendary pre-Homeric Greek poet, said to be a pupil of the equally legendary Orpheus (see p. 714, note 10); Hesiod (fl. c. 700 BCE), early Greek poet, most famous for Works and Days and Theogony. Homer (fl. c. 700 BCE?), ancient Greek poet, traditionally the author of the epics, the Iliad and the Odyssey.

[10] Orpheus legendary Greek musician, son of Calliope (muse of heroic epic) and Apollo, god of poetry. Given a lute by Apollo himself, Orpheus was so skilled that his music could quiet wild beasts and cause inanimate objects like rocks and trees to move; his music was so powerful that it induced the god of the underworld to release Orpheus's recently-deceased wife, Eurydice, back into the land of the living; Linus legendary Greek poet and musician, according to some ancient writers, the son of Mercury and Urania; author of "philosophical compositions," he was "killed by Apollo, for presuming to compare himself to him" (Classical Dict., p. 362).

[11] Although Ponsonby has "nay" here, "may" clearly is the preferred reading.

[12] Amphion Son of Zeus, king of the gods, and the mortal, Antiope; on a lyre given him by the god Hermes, Amphion played music that was said to have raised the walls of the ancient city of Thebes.

people; so among the Romans were Livius Andronicus and Ennius;[1] so in the Italian language, the first that made it aspire to be a treasure-house of science[2] were the poets Dante, Bocace, and Petrarch;[3] so in our English, were Gower and Chaucer,[4] after whom, encouraged and delighted with their excellent foregoing, others have followed to beautify our mother tongue, as well in the same kind as other arts.[5] This did so notably show itself that the philosophers of Greece durst not a long time appear to the world but under the mask of poets:[6] so Thales, Empedocles, and Parmenides sang their natural philosophy in verses;[7] so did Pythagoras and Phocillides[8] their moral counsels; so did Tirteus[9] in war matters, and Solon[10] in matters of policy, or rather they being poets did exercise their delightful vein in those points of highest knowledge, which before them lay hidden[11] to the world. For that wise Solon was directly a poet, it is manifest, having written in verse the notable fable of the Atlantic Island, which was continued by Plato.[12] And truly even Plato whosoever well considereth shall find that in the body of his work, though the inside and strength were philosophy, the skin, as it were, and beauty depended most of poetry. For all stands upon dialogues, wherein he feigns many honest burgesses of Athens speak of such matters[13] that if they had been set on the rack they would never have confessed them: besides his poetical describing the circumstances of their meetings, as the [1] Lucius Livius Andronicus (fl. c. 240 BCE), Latin playwright, poet, and translator (he authored a Latin translation of Homer's Odyssey); Quintus Ennius (239-169 BCE), Graeco-Roman playwright and poet; in his Annales, a narrative poem recounting the history of the Roman people, "he represented himself as a reincarnation of Homer" (OCD, p. 876; 525).

[2] science knowledge.

[3] Dante Alighieri (1265-1321), poet, most famously the author of the Divina Commedia ("The Divine Comedy"), a poetic epic recounting the poet's journey through hell, purgatory and heaven, with Virgil as his guide, as well as the Vita Nuova, a sequence of lyric poems celebrating Dante's love for Beatrice); Bocace Giovanni Boccaccio (?1313-75), writer and humanist scholar, most famously the author of De Casibus Virorum Illustrium ("On the Fall of Great Men"), a collection of de casibus tragedies in Latin used later by both Lydgate and the editors of Mirror for Magistrates, and the Decameron (a collection of prose tales); Petrarch Francesco Petrarca (1304-74), poet and scholar, whose most famous and influential works were the Canzoniere (also known as the Rime or Rime sparse), a collection of lyric verse celebrating the incomparable and idealized Laura, and the Trifoni ("Triumphs"), six poems representing the triumphs of love, chastity, death, fame, time, and eternity. In English Renaissance texts, references to Dante, Petrarch, and Boccaccio often appear together, this trio of literary excellence frequently being paired with that of Chaucer, Gower, and Lydgate, perhaps in an attempt by English writers "to portray themselves as being in the mainstream of European culture by associating themselves with such established, widely applauded icons." See J.C. Boswell, Dante's Fame in England (Newark, 1999), pp. xiv-xv.

[4] John Gower (?1330-1408), poet, whose major English poem, Confessio Amantis, recounts the confession and experiences of a lover, presented through a moral and didactic lens; Geoffrey Chaucer (c. 1340-1400), the most famous and respected medieval English poet, author of The Legend of Good Women, Troilus and Criseyde, the House of Fame and The Canterbury Tales, among others. Chaucer and Gower are often linked in the Renaissance as the founders of the English poetic and (indeed) literary tradition.

[5] the same kind as other arts as in other arts (Olney).

[6] mask of poets masks of poets (Olney).

[7] Thales of Miletus (fl. c. 585 BCE), early Greek natural philosopher, engineer, astronomer, and one of the Seven Sages, who left no written works, although a "navigational handbook, a Nautical Astronomy in hexameter verse" has been attributed to him; Empedocles (c. 492-432 BCE), Greek philosopher, author of two philosophic/scientific works in verse, On Nature and Purifications; Parmenides of Elea (fl. c. 450 BCE), a "philosophical pioneer" who wrote a philosophic poem in hexameter verse (OCD, p. 1491; 853).

[8] Pythagoras (fl. c. 530 BCE), Greek philosopher, who is credited with significant contributions to mathematics, music, and astronomy; he also introduced the Greeks to the Egyptian idea of the transmigration of souls; for classical and later authors "he becomes the pattern of the 'divine man': at once a sage, a seer, a teacher, and a benefactor of the human race"; Phocillides Phocylides, long-assumed to be a Greek poet from the city of Miletus who flourished in the first half of the sixth century BCE; a long didactic poem was attributed to him (OCD, p. 1284; 1173).

[9] Tirteus Tyrtaeus of Sparta (fl. c. 650 BCE), of whose prodigious output only fragments survive; his Eunomia ("Law and Order") and a later poem encouraged civic virtue and patriotism (OCD, p. 1568).

[10] Solon (fl. c. 594 BCE), Athenian politician and poet, institutor of many legal and social reforms, one of the fathers of Athenian democracy; his poetry addressed the growing gulf between the rich and the poor in Athenian society and the unrest this inequality caused.

[11] lay hidden lay hid (Olney).

[12] Plato recounts the story of Atlantis in Timaeus and Critias. In Critias, Solon is described as intending to use the story of the origin, development, and nature of Atlantis' civilization in a poem.

[13] speak of such matters to speak of such matters (Olney).

well-ordering of a banquet, the delicacy of a walk, with interlacing mere[1] tales, as Gyges' Ring[2] and others, which, who knows not to be flowers of poetry did never walk into Apollo's garden.[3] And even historiographers, although their lips sound of things done, and verity be written in their foreheads, have been glad to borrow both fashion and perchance weight of the poets. So Herodotus entitled his History by the name of the nine Muses,[4] and both he and all the rest that followed him either stole or usurped of poetry their passionate describing of passions, the many particularities of battles which no man could affirm, or, if that be denied me, long orations put in the mouths of great kings and captains which it is certain they never pronounced. So that truly neither philosopher nor historiographer could at the first have entered into the gates of popular judgements, if they had not taken a great passport of poetry, which in all nations at this day where learning flourisheth not is plain to be seen, in all which they have some feeling of poetry. In Turkey, besides their lawgiving divines,[5] they have no other writers but poets. In our neighbour country Ireland, where truly learning goes very bare, yet are their poets held in a devout reverence. Even among the most barbarous and simple Indians,[6] where no writing is, yet have they their poets who make and sing songs, which they call arentos,[7] both of their ancestors' deeds and praises of their gods:[8] a sufficient probability that if ever learning come among them, it must be by having their hard dull wits softened and sharpened with the sweet delights of poetry, for until they find a pleasure in the exercise of the mind,[9] great promises of much knowledge will little persuade them that know not the fruits of knowledge. In Wales, the true remnant of the ancient Britons, as there are good authorities to show, the long time they had poets which they called bards: so thorough[10] all the conquests of Romans, Saxons, Danes, and Normans, some of whom did seek to ruin all memory of learning from among them, yet do their poets even to this day last: so as it is not more notable in the soon beginning, than in long continuing.

But since the authors of most of our sciences were the Romans, and before them the Greeks, let us a little stand upon their authorities, but even so far as to see what names they have given unto this now scorned skill. Among the Romans a poet was called vates, which is as much as a diviner, foreseer, or prophet, as by his conjoined words vaticinium, and vaticinari is manifest, so heavenly a title did that excellent people bestow upon this heart-ravishing knowledge, and so far were they carried into the admiration thereof, that they thought in the chanceable hitting upon any of such verses, great foretokens of their following fortunes were placed. Whereupon grew the word of Sortes

---

1 mere absolute, entire, perfect; downright.

2 In The Republic (2.359-60), Plato recounts the tale of the Lydian shepherd, Gyges, who finds a magic ring that gives him the ability to be invisible. He proceeds to seduce the Lydian queen, conspire with her to kill the king, and usurp the kingdom. Plato draws the conclusion from this tale that men generally behave justly out of necessity not out of conviction, since whenever a man thinks he can "get way with" being unjust, he does so.

3 Apollo was the ancient Greek god of poetry.

4 Herodotus (?484-?425 BCE), Greek historian; each of the nine books of his Histories was named after one of the Muses by a later editor.

5 divines theologians, religious writers.

6 Indians "The Amerindians of Hispaniola" (i.e., Haitians) (R. Kuin, "Querre-Muhau: Sir Philip Sidney and the New World," Renaissance Quarterly, 51.2 (1998): 559; Topographical Dict., p. 251).

7 arentos areytos (Olney).

8 "They give themselves chiefly to two things: as generally to learn the original and success of things; and particularly to rehearse the noble facts [deeds] of their grandfathers, great-grandfathers and ancestors as well in peace as in war. These two things they have of old time composed in certain meters and ballettes [ballads] in their language. These hymns or ballettes, they call Areitos. And as our minstrels are accustomed to sing to the harp or lute, so do they in like manner sing these songs and dance to the same, playing on timbrels made of shells of certain fishes" (R. Eden, Decades of the New World or West India, 1555, f. 125, quoted in Kuin, p. 559; spelling and punctuation modernized by the editor). Eden's Decades (an expanded version of a work by Peter the Martyr) was identified in 1924 as Sidney's source, but Kuin argues that there is also a strong likelihood that Sidney met Eden when both were in Paris in Aug.-Sept. 1572 (p. 559).

9 exercise of the mind exercises of the mind (Olney).

10 thorough throughout.

Vergilianae, when by sudden opening Virgil's Book they lighted upon some verse of his, as it is reported by many, whereof the histories[1] of the emperors' lives are full.[2] As of Albinus the governor of our island, who in his childhood met with this verse, Arma amens capio; nec sat rationis in armis,[3] and in his age performed it,[4] although it were[5] a very vain and godless superstition, as also it was to think spirits were commanded by such verses—whereupon this word "charms," derived of carmina,[6] commeth—so yet serveth it to show the great reverence those wits were held in, and altogether not without ground, since both the Oracles of Delphos and Sibylla's prophecies[7] were wholly delivered in verses;[8] for that same exquisite observing of number and measure in the words and that high flying liberty of conceit proper to the poet did seem to have some divine force in it.

And may not I presume a little farther, to show the reasonableness of this word vates, and say that the holy David's psalms are a divine poem?[9] If I do, I shall not do it without the testimony of great learned men both ancient and modern. But even the name of "psalms" will speak for me, which being interpreted is nothing but "songs"; then that it is fully written in meter, as all learned Hebritians[10] agree, although the rules be not yet fully found; lastly and principally, his handling his prophecy, which is merely poetical. For what else is the awaking his musical instruments,[11] the often and free changing of persons, his notable prosopopoeias,[12] when he maketh you, as it were, see God coming in his majesty, his telling of the beasts' joyfulness and hills leaping,[13] but a heavenly poesy, wherein almost he showeth himself a passionate lover of that unspeakable and everlasting beauty to be seen by the eyes of the mind only cleared by faith? But truly now having named him, I fear I seem[14] to profane that holy name, applying it to poetry which is among us thrown down to so ridiculous an estimation. But they that with quiet judgements will look a little deeper into it

[1] lighted upon some verse of his ...whereof the histories lighted upon any verse of his making, whereof the histories (Olney).

[2] Sortes Virgilianae The emperors Hadrian (reigned 117-38 CE), Clodius Albinus (r. 193-97 CE), Severus Alexander (r. 222-35 CE), and Claudius (r. 268-70 CE) all employed this method of divination. See Scriptores Historiae Augustae, Had., 1.2.8-10; Cl. Alb. 1.5.1-5; Alex. II.4.6; Claud., 3.10.1-7; trans. D. Magie, 3 vols. (Cambridge, MA, 2000).

[3] Arma ... armis from Virgil's Aeneid: "Frantic, I seize arms; yet little purpose is there in arms" (Eclogues, Georgics, Aeneid I-VI, trans. H.R. Fairclough [Cambridge, MA, 1932], 2.314). Aeneas has just roused himself from sleep to find that Troy is under attack and many houses are on fire; Albinus Clodius Albinus (d. 197 CE), later emperor, was governor of Britain when the island was under the control of the Roman Empire; this story also appears in "Clodius Albinus," Scriptores Historiae Augustae, 1.5.4.

[4] performed it i.e., accomplished the actions which fulfilled the prophecy.

[5] performed it, although it were performed it, which although it were (Olney).

[6] According to the OED "charms" is partly derived from the Latin, carmen, meaning "song or verse."

[7] both the Oracles of ... prophecies Ponsonby reads "both by the oracles of Delphos and Sibylla's prophecies," but Olney's reading is preferable.

[8] The oracles at Delphos and the prophecies of the Cumaean Sibyl were among the most famous prophetic utterances in the ancient world. In response to a question at a specific oracular site (here, the temple of Apollo at the sanctuary of Delphi and the temple of Apollo at Cumae, respectively), a god or hero would offer a response through their chosen priest or priestess. Some of these oracles and prophecies were written down and collected.

[9] King David is traditionally thought the author of the Book of Psalms.

[10] Hebritians Hebraists, those who study the Hebrew language and its literature.

[11] awaking his musical instruments See Psalm 57:9 and 108:2 (C.V. Kaske, "Another Echo of the Tremellius-Junius Libri Poetici in Sidney's Biblical Poetics," American Notes and Queries 5.2-3 [Apr.-Jul. 1992]: p. 83).

[12] prosopopoeias here, both a rhetorical figure by which an imaginary or absent person is represented as speaking or acting (the introduction of a pretended speaker); and a rhetorical figure by which an inanimate or abstract thing is represented as a person, or with personal qualities (i.e., personification). However, as Rudenstine asserts, both Tremellius-Junius and Sidney seem to have defined this rhetorical term even more broadly to include figures such as apostrophe, and "a whole set of devices which add vigour and immediacy to writing" (quoted in Kaske, p. 85).

[13] See Psalm 114:3-7. Kaske believes that Sidney also read the Tremellius-Junius commentary on Psalm 114 which "glosses three verses [3, 5, and 7] as prosopopoeia" (p. 85). The T-J commentary also glosses the quotation "awaking his instruments" (see p. 717, note 12) as prosopopoeia (Kaske, "Another Echo," p. 85). For other examples of the use of prosopopoeia in the psalms, see Psalm 98:8; Psalm 148:10.

[14] I fear I seem I fear me I seem (Olney).

shall find the end and working of it such as, being rightly applied, deserveth not to be scourged out of the Church of God.

But now let us see how the Greeks have named it, and how they have deemed of it. The Greeks named him poiētēn,[1] which name hath, as the most excellent, gone through other languages. It cometh of this word poiein which is "to make"; wherein, I know not whether by luck or wisdom, we Englishmen have met with the Greeks in calling him a maker. Which name, how high and incomparable a title it is, I had rather were known by marking the scope of other sciences[2] than by any partial allegation. There is no art delivered unto mankind that hath not the works of nature for his principal object, without which they could not consist and on which they so depend, as they become actors and players, as it were, of what nature will have set forth. So doth the astronomer look upon the stars, and by that he seeth set down what order nature hath taken therein. So doth the geometrician and arithmetician in their divers sorts of quantities. So doth the musicians in times[3] tell you which by nature agree, which not. The natural philosopher thereon hath his name, and the moral philosopher standeth upon the natural virtues, vices, or passions of man; and "Follow nature" sayeth he, "therein, and thou shalt not err." The lawyer sayeth what men have determined; the historian what men have done. The grammarian speaketh only of the rules of speech, and the rhetorician and logician, considering what in nature will soonest prove and persuade, thereon give artificial rules, which still are compassed within the circle of a question, according to the proposed matter.[4] The physician weigheth the nature of man's body, and the nature of things helpful or hurtful unto it. And the metaphysic, though it be in the second and abstract notions and therefore be counted supernatural,[5] yet doth he indeed build upon the depth of nature. Only the poet, disdaining to be tied to any such subjection, lifted up with the vigour of his own invention, doth grow in effect into another nature;[6] in making things either better than nature bringeth forth, or, quite anew, forms such as never were in nature: as the heroes, demigods, Cyclops, Chimeras, Furies,[7] and such like; so as he goeth hand in hand with nature, not enclosed within the narrow warrant of her gifts, but freely ranging within[8] the zodiac[9] of his own wit. Nature never set forth the earth in so rich tapestry as diverse poets have done, neither with so pleasant rivers,[10] fruitful trees, sweet-smelling flowers, nor whatsoever else may make the too-much-loved earth more lovely. Her world is brazen, the poets only deliver a golden.[11] But let

---

1 The Greeks named him poiētēn The Greeks called him a poet (Olney).

2 sciences bodies of knowledge.

3 in times in the correct rhythm.

4 which still are compassed … matter i.e., the questions which the rhetorician and the logician are able to answer are confined to those relevant to their particular subject matter.

5 metaphysic metaphysician, one who studies the science of things transcending what is physical or natural, including such concepts as being, substance, essence, time, space, cause, etc.; second and abstract notions and therefore be counted supernatural According to OED, "a first notion is the concept of a thing as it exists of itself ... a second notion is the concept, not of an object as it is in reality, but of the mode under which it is thought by the mind" (Sir W. Hamilton, Discuss., 139 note). Sidney's point is that even such metaphysical speculations as are involved in "second notions" must still be grounded in the "first notions" of the natural and material world.

6 doth grow in effect into another nature doth grown in effect another nature (Olney).

7 Cyclops in Homer, a race of one-eyed giants; in the Odyssey, the cyclops Polyphemus imprisons and devours some of Odysseus' men (Book 9), before Odysseus is able to blind him, ensuring their escape; Chimeras also, Chimaera, a fire-breathing monster with the foreparts of a lion, the tail of a dragon, and a third head (a goat's head); it was killed by the hero, Bellerophon; here, however, it may mean more generally any fantastic beast; Furies Also known as the Erinyes, the Furies were the Greek spirits of vengeance who implacably pursued those who murdered, violated, or otherwise wronged their own kin; for murdering his mother, Clytemnestra, Orestes was driven mad by the Furies.

8 ranging within ranging only within (Olney).

9 zodiac compass, range.

10 neither with so pleasant rivers neither with pleasant rivers (Olney).

11 Her world is brazen, the poets only deliver a golden Nature is part of a fallen and imperfect world, while the poet can depict worlds which are perfect and untainted by sin, violence, and cruelty. The division of human history into a series of increasingly corrupt ages can be traced back to Hesiod's Works and Days. Specifically, this poem ascribes to those things alone and go to man, for whom as the other things are, so it seemeth in him her uttermost cunning[1] is employed,[2] and know whether she have brought forth so true a lover as Theagenes, so constant a friend as Pylades, so valiant a man as Orlando, so right a prince as Xenophon's Cyrus, so excellent a man every way as Virgil's Aeneas.[3] Neither let this be jestingly conceived, because the works of the one be essential, the other in imitation or fiction: for every understanding[4] knoweth the skill of each artificer[5] standeth in that idea or foreconceit of the work, and not in the work itself. And that the poet hath that idea is manifest by delivering them forth in such excellency as he had imagined them: which delivering forth also is not wholly imaginative,[6] as we are wont to say by them that build castles in the air: but so far substantially it worketh, not only to make a Cyrus, which had been but a particular excellency as nature might have done, but to bestow a Cyrus upon the world to make many Cyruses, if they will learn aright why and how that maker made him. Neither let it be deemed too saucy a comparison to balance the highest point of man's wit with the efficacy of nature: but rather give right honour to the heavenly Maker of that maker, who having made man to his own likeness, set him beyond and over all the works of that second nature,[7] which in nothing he showeth so much as in poetry; when with the force of a divine breath he bringeth things forth surpassing her doings: with no small arguments to the incredulous of that first accursed fall of Adam, since our erected wit maketh us know what perfection is, and yet our infected will keepeth us from reaching unto it. But these arguments will by few be understood, and by fewer granted. Thus much, I hope, will be given me: that the Greeks with some probability of reason gave him the name above all names of learning.

Now let us go to a more ordinary opening of him,[8] that the truth may be the more[9] palpable: and so I hope though we get not so unmatched a praise as the etymology of his names will grant, yet his very description, which no man will deny, shall not justly be barred from a principal commendation. Poesy, therefore, is an art of imitation: for so Aristotle termeth it in the word[10] the golden age ideal perfection, harmony between man and nature, timelessness and immutability; to the brazen age belongs war, violence, and cruelty.

---

1 cunning Ponsonby has "coming," clearly an error.

2 I.e., if all of creation has been made for mankind (as indicated in Genesis 1:28-29), then we may assume that mankind is nature's last and best creation.

3 Theagenes In Heliodorus' Greek romance Aethiopica (c. 230 CE), also called the Ethiopian Story of Theagenes and Charicleia, Theagenes' love for Charicleia is conveyed through his determination to maintain his chastity for her sake, spurning the advances of other women throughout the narrative; Pylades In Sophocles' tragedy Electra, Pylades' friendship with Orestes leads him to aid his friend (and cousin) in the assassination of Clytemnestra, Orestes' mother, and Aegisthus, Clytemnestra's lover, who had murdered Orestes' father, Agamemnon; Orlando one of the central characters in Ludovico Ariosto's epic poetic romance, Orlando Furioso (1532). Orlando's valorous deeds are very nearly superhuman; see, for example, the description of how he single-handedly defeats the evil King Cimosco and his company of thirty men (9.64-80); Cyrus The Greek historian Xenophon (c. 428-c.354 BCE) represents Cyrus the Great (c. 560/59-530 BCE), founder of the Persian empire, in glowing terms in his Cyropaedia: "According to the opinions of Plato and of Cicero, the Cyropoedia of Xenophon was a moral romance, and they assert that the historian did not so much write what Cyrus had been, as what every true, good, and virtuous monarch ought to be" (Lempriére, p. 725). William Barker in his preface to his 1567 translation of the Cyropaedia says that Cyrus's education ("a model of perfect and princely education") led him finally to be "filled with all the noble virtues that may be wished with excellency in any ruler" (The School of Cyrus, ed. J. Tatum [New York, 1987], pp. 7, 3-4). Cf. Spenser's "Letter to Ralegh," p. 819, ll.53-60; Aeneas Virgil's Aeneas was viewed in the Renaissance as the exemplar of valour and piety, devoted both to his aged father (whom he carries out of the burning city of Troy on his back) and to his gods. For the English, in particular, he was a national hero, given that his descendants were believed to have founded London.

4 every understanding any understanding (Olney).

5 each artificer the artificer (Olney).

6 imaginative here, existing only in the imagination; unreal, fancied, imaginary; proverb, "To build castles in the air" (Tilley C126).

7 second nature i.e., all of creation which God has placed under the authority of humanity.

8 opening of him i.e., exposition of his qualities.

9 be the more be more (Olney).

10 the word his word (Olney).

"mimesis,"[1] that is to say, a representing, counterfeiting, or figuring forth; to speak metaphorically, a speaking picture,[2] with this end: to teach and delight.[3] Of this have been three general kinds:[4] the chief, both in antiquity and excellency, were they that did imitate the inconceivable excellencies of God. Such were David in his Psalms; Solomon in his Song of Songs, in his Ecclesiastes and Proverbs;[5] Moses and Deborah[6] in their hymns, and the writer of Job—which, beside other, the learned Immanuel Tremellius and Francis Junius do entitle the poetical part of the Scripture.[7] Against these none will speak that hath the Holy Ghost[8] in due holy reverence. In this kind, though in a full wrong divinity, were Orpheus, Amphion, Homer in his hymns,[9] and many others both Greek and Romans. And this poesy must be used by whosoever will follow St. Paul's counsel,[10] in singing psalms when they are merry, and I know is used with the fruit of comfort by some, when in sorrowful pangs of their death-bringing sins, they find the consolation of the never-leaving goodness. The second kind, is of them that deal with matters philosophical, either moral, as Tirteus, Phocilides, Cato;[11] or natural, as Lucretius, and Virgil's Georgics;[12] or astronomical, as Manilius and

[1] "Epic poetry and Tragedy, as also Comedy, Dithyrambic poetry, and most flute-playing and lyre-playing, are all, viewed as a whole, modes of imitation. But at the same time they differ from one another in three ways, either by a difference of kind in their means, or by differences in the objects, or in the manner of their imitations" (De Poetica: The Basic Works of Aristotle, trans. R. McKeon [New York, 1968], Chapter 1, ll.14-18, p. 1447). Compare Aristotle's comments on the nature of poetic mimesis: "Since the poet, like a painter or any other image-maker, is a mimetic artist, he must represent, in any instance, one of three objects: the kind of things which were or are the case; the kind of things that people say and think; the kind of things that ought [i.e., in moral or ideal terms] to be the case" (translated by S. Halliwell [Cambridge, MA, 1995], chapter 25, pp. 125-27).

[2] a speaking picture Latin, ut pictura poesis ("as in painting, so in poetry" or "poetry is similar to painting"). This expression comes from the Roman poet Horace's Ars Poetica ("The Art of Poetry"): "A poem is like a picture: one strikes your fancy more, the nearer you stand; another, the farther away. This courts the shade, that will wish to be seen in the light, and dreads not the critic insight of the judge. This pleased but once; that, though ten times called for, will always please" (Satires, Epistles, and Ars Poetica, trans. H.R. Fairclough [Cambridge, MA, 1961], ll. 361-65, p. 481).

[3] to teach and delight Latin, utile et dulce (literally, "useful and sweet/pleasurable"). This expression is also from Horace's Ars Poetica: "He has won every vote who has blended profit and pleasure, at once delighting and instructing the reader" (ll. 343-44, p. 479).

[4] three general kinds three several; i.e., separate, independent, kinds (Olney).

[5] Solomon, David's son, was traditionally thought the author of the Book of the Song of Solomon (also known as the Song of Songs), the Book of Ecclesiastes, and the Book of Proverbs.

[6] Moses Exodus 15.1-18; Deborah Judges 5.

[7] John Immanuel Tremellius (1510-80), professor of Hebrew at Cambridge University (appointed 1549) and Protestant convert from the Jewish faith. While living in Metz, having been deprived of his post as professor of Old Testament studies (Heidleberg) on account of his Calvinist opinions, he undertook his Latin translation of the Bible (published 1579), which became accepted as the most accurate and scholarly Latin translation available. Francis Junius (or François Du Jon) the Elder (1545-1603), Huguenot scholar and theologian, aided him, but his contribution was limited to the translation of the Apocrypha. The Preface to the Libri Poetici ("Poetical Books") of the Tremellius-Junius Bible is Sidney's source for Tremellius' and Junius' claim that these books and passages constitute Scripture's poetical parts. See C.V. Kaske, "Another Echo of the Tremellius-Junius Libri Poetici in Sidney's Biblical Poetics," American Notes and Queries 5.2-3 (Apr.-Jul. 1992): 83-86. See also p. 717, notes 11, 12, and 13.

[8] Holy Ghost the Holy Spirit, third member of the Christian trinity.

[9] Homer in his hymns traditionally attributed to Homer, the Homeric Hymns comprise "four long poems (addressed to Aphrodite, Apollo, Demeter, and Hermes) which [actually] date from the post-Homeric period (650-400 BCE) and 29 shorter poems which are probably later" (Dict. Ancient Hist., p. 321).

[10] St. Paul's counsel It is not actually St. Paul but James who offers this advice: "Is any among you afflicted? let him pray. Is any merry? let him sing psalms" (James 5:13). Olney's edition correctly cites St. James.

[11] For Tirteus and Phocilides, see p. 715, notes 8 and 9; Cato perhaps, the famous Marcus Porcius Cato (Cato the Censor) (234-149 BCE), orator and politician, author of over 150 speeches, of which fragments of eighty survive. Although sometimes called the father of Latin prose, Cato left behind no works that can be assigned to the category of moral philosophy. Sidney probably refers instead to the third-century CE author of the didactic Disticha Catonis (often erroneously ascribed to Cato the Elder [234 BCE-149 BCE]) "a collection of nearly 150 pithy phrases in verse and prose" which was a standard text for instruction in Latin from the seventh century CE to the Renaissance. See N. Hanlet, "Cato's Distichs [Latin]," Dict. Middle Ages, vol. 3, p. 193.

[12] Lucretius (Titus Lucretius Carus), ancient Epicurean poet, author most famously of De rerum natura ("On the Nature of Things"), a long poem in hexameter verse dealing with a variety of scientific and metaphysical topics, including the nature and composition of the cosmos, the nature and composition of matter (atomism), the causes of physical phenomenon (earthquakes, storms, etc.), and the nature of the human soul, etc; Virgil's Georgics a didactic poem in four books celebrating ancient Italian country life and dealing with cultivation, husbandry, and bee-keeping.

Pontanus;[1] or historical, as Lucan;[2] which who mislike, the fault is in their judgement quite out of taste, and not in the sweet food of sweetly uttered knowledge. But because this second sort is wrapped within the fold of the proposed subject, and takes not the free course[3] of his own invention, whether they properly be poets or no let grammarians dispute, and go to the third, indeed right poets, of whom chiefly this question ariseth. Betwixt whom and these second is such a kind of difference as betwixt the meaner sort of painters, who counterfeit only such faces as are set before them, and the more excellent, who, having no law but wit, bestow that in colours upon you which is fittest for the eye to see, as the constant though lamenting look of Lucretia, when she punished in herself another's fault; wherein he painteth not Lucretia whom he never saw, but painteth the outward beauty of such a virtue. For these third be they which most properly do imitate to teach and delight, and to imitate borrow nothing of what is, hath been, or shall be, but range, only reined with learned discretion, into the divine consideration of what may be and should be. These be they that, as the first and most noble sort may justly be termed vates, so these are waited on in the excellentest languages and best understandings with the foredescribed name of poets. For these indeed do merely[4] make to imitate, and imitate both to delight and teach, and delight to move men to take that goodness in hand which without delight they would fly as from a stranger, and teach to make them know that goodness whereunto they are moved; which being the noblest scope to which ever any learning was directed, yet want there not idle tongues to bark at them. These be subdivided into sundry more special denominations. The most notable be the heroic, lyric, tragic, comic, satyric, iambic, elegiac, pastoral, and certain others: some of these being termed according to the matter they deal with, some by the sort of verse they liked best to write in, for indeed the greatest part of poets have apparelled their poetical inventions in that numbrous kind of writing which is called verse, indeed but apparelled, verse being but an ornament and no cause to poetry, since there have been many most excellent poets that never versified, and now swarm many versifiers that need never answer to the name of poets. For Xenophon who did imitate so excellently as to give us effigiem iusti imperii, "the portraiture of a just empire" under the name of Cyrus, as Cicero sayeth of him, made therein an absolute heroical poem. So did Heliodorus, in his sugared invention of that picture of love in Theagenes and Chariclea, and yet both these wrote in prose, which I speak to show that it is not rhyming and versing that maketh a poet (no more than a long gown maketh an advocate, who though he pleaded in armour should be an advocate and no soldier), but it is that feigning[5] notable images of virtues, vices, or what else, with that delightful teaching, which must be the right describing note to know a poet by, although indeed the senate of poets hath chosen verse as their fittest raiment, meaning, as in matter they passed all in all, so in manner to go beyond them; not speaking table-talk fashion, or like men in a dream, words as they chanceably fall from the mouth, but peasing[6] each syllable of each word by just proportion according to the dignity of the subject.

[...]

[1] Marcus Manilius (fl. c. 14 BCE), proponent of Stoicism and author of the Astronomica, a didactic poem dealing with astronomy/astrology, particularly the effects of planetary and astral bodies on human beings (OCD, pp. 917-18); Pontanus Giovanni Pontano (1426-1503), Italian humanist and diplomat, author of literary works and political treatises; the reference here is to his Latin didactic poem on astrology called Urania (composed 1470s). See J.H. Bentley, "Pontano, Giovanni," Encycl. of the Renaissance, ed. P.F. Grendler, 6 vols. (New York, 1999), vol. 5, pp. 118-20; C. Trinkaus, "The Astrological Cosmos and Rhetorical Culture of Giovanni Gioviano Pontano," Renaissance Quarterly 38.3 (1985): 450.

[2] Lucan (Marcus Annaeus Lucanus; 39-65 CE), author of a ten-book poetic history of the Roman civil war: De bello civili (sometimes, also called Pharsalia) (OCD, p. 94).

[3] the free course the course (Olney).

[4] merely wholeheartedly, without any other aim or purpose.

[5] feigning inventing, representing.

[6] peasing peising: weighing.

The philosopher, therefore, and the historian are they which would win the goal, the one by precept, the other by example; but both, not having both, do both halt.[1] For the philosopher, setting down with thorny arguments the bare rule, is so hard of utterance, and so misty to be conceived,[2] that one that hath no other guide but him shall wade in him till he be old before he shall find sufficient cause to be honest.[3] For his knowledge standeth so upon the abstract and general that happy is that man who may understand him, and more happy that can apply what he doth understand. On the other side, the historian, wanting[4] the precept, is so tied not to what should be but to what is, to the particular truth of things and not to the general reason of things, that his example draweth no necessary consequence, and therefore a less fruitful doctrine. Now doth the peerless poet perform both, for whatsoever the philosopher sayeth should be done, he gives a perfect picture of it by some one, by whom he presupposeth it was done, so as he coupleth the general notion with the particular example. A perfect picture, I say, for he yieldeth to the powers of the mind an image of that whereof the philosopher bestoweth but a wordish description, which doth neither strike, pierce, nor possess the sight of the soul so much as that other doth. For as in outward things, to a man that had never seen an elephant or a rhinoceros, who should tell him most exquisitely all their shape, colour, bigness, and particular marks, or of a gorgeous palace an architecture, who declaring[5] the full beauties, might well make the hearer able to repeat, as it were by rote, all he had heard, yet should never satisfy his inward conceit with being witness to itself of a true lively knowledge; but the same man as soon as he might see those beasts well-painted, or that house well in model, should straightaways grow, without need of any description, to a judicial comprehending of them; so no doubt the philosopher with his learned definitions, be it of virtues or vices, matters of public policy or private government, replenisheth the memory with many infallible grounds of wisdom, which notwithstanding lie dark before the imaginative and judging power, if they be not illuminated or figured forth by the speaking picture of poesy.

[...]

For conclusion, I say the philosopher teacheth, but he teacheth obscurely, so as the learned only can understand him; that is to say, he teacheth them that are already taught. But the poet is the food for the tenderest stomachs; the poet is indeed the right popular philosopher, whereof Aesop's tales give good proof, whose pretty allegories, stealing under the formal tales of beasts,[6] makes many more beastly than beasts begin to hear the sound of virtue from those dumb speakers. But now may it be alleged that if this imagining of matters be so fit for the imagination, then must the historian needs surpass, who brings you images of true matters, such as indeed were done, and not such as fantastically or falsely may be suggested to have been done. Truly, Aristotle himself in his discourse of poesy plainly determineth this question, saying that poetry is philosophoteron and spoudaioteron; that is to say, it is more philosophical and more [studiously serious][7] than history. His reason is, because poesy dealeth with katholou, that is to say, with the universal consideration, and the history with kathekaston, the particular. "Now," sayeth he, "the universal weighs what is fit to be said or done, either in likelihood or necessity (which the poesy considereth in his imposed names), and the particular only marketh whether Alcibiades did or suffered this or

[1] halt proceed lamely, imperfectly, or falsely.

[2] misty to be conceived difficult to be understood.

[3] honest virtuous, of good moral character.

[4] wanting lacking.

[5] an architecture, who declaring the architecture, with declaring (Olney).

[6] the formal tales of beasts i.e., the tales seem to be simply stories about animals when considered in their outward form or appearance.

[7] These two words are dropped from Ponsonby's edition, and are thus supplied from Olney's.

that."[1] Thus far Aristotle: which reason of his, as all his, is most full of reason. For indeed if the question were whether it were better to have a particular act truly or faithfully set down, there is no doubt which is to be chosen, no more than whether you had rather have Vespasian's[2] picture right as he was, or at the painter's pleasure nothing resembling. But if the question be for your own use and learning, whether it be better to have it set down as it should be or as it was, then certainly is more doctrinable[3] the feigned Cyrus in Xenophon than the true Cyrus in Justin;[4] and the feigned Aeneas in Virgil than the right Aeneas in Dares Phrygius.[5] As to a lady that desired to fashion her countenance to the best grace, a painter should more benefit her to portrait[6] a most sweet face, writing Canidia upon it, than to paint Canidia as she was, who Horace sweareth was full ill-favoured.[7] If the poet do his part aright, he will show you in Tantalus, Atreus,[8] and such like, nothing that is not to be shunned; in Cyrus, Aeneas, Ulysses, each thing to be followed. Where the historian, bound to tell things as things were, cannot be liberal, without he will be poetical, of a perfect pattern, but, as in Alexander or Scipio[9]

---

1 "[I]t [i.e., the difference between history and poetry] consists really in this, that the one describes the thing that has been, and the other a kind of thing that might be. Hence poetry is something more philosophic and of graver import than history, since its statements are of the nature rather of universals, whereas those of history are singulars. By a universal statement I mean one as to what such or such a kind of man will probably or necessarily say or do—which is the aim of poetry, though it affixes proper names to the characters; by a singular statement, one as to what, Alcibiades did or had done to him" (Poetics, chapter 9, ll. 3-11).

2 Vespasian Titus Flavius Vespasianus (3-81 CE), Roman emperor (reigned 79-81 CE), celebrated in the ancient world for his virtues of clemency, modesty, and liberality. He hated flattery, encouraged austerity in life and manners, and patronized the arts and sciences. A popular ruler, he was the first Roman emperor to die of natural causes and be succeeded by his son. However, other classical authors have accused Vespasian of avarice, which led him to commit a number of legal and moral outrages, such as condemning wealthy men so he could seize their possessions (Classical Dict., p. 714).

3 doctrinable fit for instruction; instructive.

4 the feigned Cyrus in Xenophon See p. 719, note 3; the true Cyrus in Justin Marcus Junianus Justinus, Roman historian of uncertain date (2nd, 3rd, and 4th c. CE are all suggested), author of Historiarum Philippicarum. Being a summary of a universal history, and not a celebratory biography, HP presents a much briefer, although still largely positive representation of Cyrus. His account, however, eschews the invented dialogues and orations that dominate Xenophon's work. Justin's work was translated by Arthur Golding in 1564 as The Abridgement of the Histories of Trogus Pompeius.

5 the feigned Aeneas in Virgil See p. 719, note 3; the right Aeneas in Dares Phrygius In Homer's Iliad, Dares of Phrygia is a "Trojan priest of Hephaestus." He is also "the supposed author of a pre-Homeric account of the Trojan War," and thus was long-believed to have been an eye-witness to its events. Daretis Phyrgii de excidio Troiae historia (composed c. 5th or 6th c. CE) purports to be a translation of his much earlier account (OCD, p. 430).

6 portrait to make a portrait, picture, or image of; to portray.

7 was full ill-favoured was foul and ill-favoured (Olney). Horace (Quintus Horatius Flaccus) (65-8 BCE), Roman poet, represents Canidia as a sallow-hued witch, "hideous to behold" in his Satires, 1.8.23-26.

8 Tantalus King of Lydia and son of Zeus, Tantalus is famously represented as being punished in hell by being eternally frustrated in his attempts to slake his thirst by drinking the water that constantly drained away from him, and to satisfy his hunger by seizing the fruits that always moved out of his reach when he grasped for them. There is little agreement on the cause of his punishment; some say he stole the food of the gods (nectar and ambrosia) and gave these to mankind; others that he murdered his own son, Pelops, and served him as a banquet to visiting gods; still others that he kidnapped Ganymede, Jupiter's favourite cupbearer, to satisfy his lust; Atreus king of Mycenae, discovered that his brother, Thyestes, had seduced his (Atreus') queen and had had several children by her. In revenge, Atreus invited Thyestes to a banquet, the main dish of which was Thyestes' incestuously conceived offspring. Thyestes fled. Later, Atreus married Thyestes' daughter and adopted his son, Aegisthus. Atreus unsuccessfully attempted to suborn Aegisthus to murder Thyestes (Classical Dict., p. 656; 100).

9 Alexander Alexander III (the Great), king of Macedon (356-323 BCE), conqueror of the Persian empire. Plutarch's portrait of Alexander (perhaps the most widely known in the Renaissance) praises his virtues of self-control (especially sexual continence), temperance, noble ambition, piety, and military brilliance. Although his treatment of the defeated Thebans was ruthless, he later regretted his savagery and it led him to treat more mildly his other conquered peoples. Alexander's hasty temperament and impulsiveness, which were exacerbated when he drank, led him to murder his comrade Cleitus. Although Plutarch generally attempts to explain or excuse Alexander's less than noble actions, Quintus Curtius Rufus (fl. 1st or early 2nd century CE) represents Alexander's character as gradually degenerating, corrupted by his seemingly-endless victories and good fortune. See Plutarch, Lives "Life of Alexander the Great," vol. 2., pp. 1242-1353; and Curtius's The History of Alexander, trans. J. Yardley (London, 2001); Scipio Publius Cornelius Scipio Africanus (236-183 BCE), Roman general, often compared to Alexander, chiefly known for defeating Hannibal at Zama, ending the Second Punic (continued) himself, show doings, some to be liked, some to be misliked. And then how will you discern what to follow but by your own discretion, which you had without reading Quintus Curtius? And whereas a man may say, though in universal consideration of doctrine the poet prevaileth, yet that the history in his saying such a thing was done doth warrant a man more in that he shall follow, the answer is manifest, that if he stand upon that was (as if he should argue, because it rained yesterday, therefore it should rain today) then indeed hath it some advantage to a gross conceit. But if he know an example only informs a conjectured likelihood, and so go by reason, the poet doth so far exceed him, as he is to frame his example to that which is most reasonable, be it in warlike, politic, or private matters, where the historian in his bare was[1] hath many times that which we call fortune to overrule the best wisdom. Many times he must tell events whereof he can yield no cause, or if he do, it must be poetically. For that a feigned example hath as much force to teach as a true example (for as for to move, it is clear, since the feigned may be tuned to the highest key of passion), let us take one example wherein an historian and a poet did concur.[2] Herodotus and Justin doth both testify that Zopirus, King Darius' faithful servant, seeing his master long resisted by the rebellious Babylonians, feigned himself in extreme disgrace of his king, for verifying of which, he caused his own nose and ears to be cut off, and so flying to the Babylonians was received, and for his known valour so far credited, that he did find means to deliver them over to Darius.[3] Much like matter doth Livy record of Tarquinius and his son.[4] Xenophon excellently feigneth such another stratagem performed by Abradates in Cyrus' behalf.[5] Now would I fain[6] know, if occasion be presented unto you to serve your prince by such an honest dissimulation, why you do not as well learn it of Xenophon's fiction as of the others' verity (and truly so much the better, as you shall save your nose by the bargain, for Abradates did not counterfeit so far)? So then the best of the historian is subject to the poet, for whatsoever action or faction, whatsoever counsel, policy, or war stratagem the historian is bound to recite, that may the poet (if he list[7]) with his imitation make his own; beautifying it both for further teaching and more delighting, as it please him, having all from Dante his heaven to his hell under the authority of his pen.[8] Which if I be asked what poets have done so, as I might well name some, so yet say I, and say again, I speak of the art and not of the artificer. Now to that which commonly is attributed to the praise of history, in respect of the notable learning, is got by marking the success, as though therein a man should see virtue exalted and vice punished: truly that commendation is peculiar to poetry and far off from history. For indeed poetry ever sets virtue so out in her best colours, making fortune her well-waiting handmaid, that one must needs be enamoured of her. Well may you see Ulysses in a storm and in other hard plights, but they are but exercises of patience and magnanim-

War. He was regarded by his contemporaries and by later ages as "a pattern of virtue, innocence, courage and liberality" as well as sexual continence. However, in his conquering of Hannibal, he exacted the "most severe and humiliating terms." He also seems to have lacked political tact in dealing with the senate and populace of Rome, and was accused by rivals of having engaged in extortion in Africa (OCD, p. 398; Classical Dict., pp. 609-10).

[1] in his bare was i.e., in his unadorned statement of what has occurred.

[2] did concur do concur (Olney).

[3] See Herodotus, The Histories, trans. R. Waterfield (Oxford, 1998), 3.153-58; and Justin, Epitome of the Philippic History of Pompeius Trogus, 1.15-23.

[4] Lucius Tarquinius Superbus (534-510 BCE), the last king of Rome, employed his youngest son Sextus in a similar stratagem during the siege of Gabii. Sextus, fleeing to the enemy on the pretext that his father's cruelty had begun to threaten the lives of his own kin, won the trust of the Gabinians only to later execute en masse their leading men. See Livy, A History of Rome: Selections, trans. M. Hadas and J.P. Poe (New York, 1962), 1.53-54.

[5] In Xenophon's Cyropaedia, it is actually Cyrus' friend and servant Araspas who undertakes (at Cyrus' suggestion) to pretend that he has deserted to the enemy in order to further Cyrus' plans. See The School of Cyrus, ed. J. Tatum (New York, 1987), pp. 146-48, 157-58. During this episode, Abradates, whose wife is a captive of Cyrus and desired by Araspas, later becomes one of Cyrus' allies (pp. 148ff).

[6] fain gladly, willingly, with pleasure.

[7] list wish, desire.

[8] Dante his heaven … pen p. 715, note 3.

ity, to make them shine the more in the near-following prosperity. And of the contrary part, if evil men come to the stage, they ever go out (as the tragedy-writer answered to one that misliked the show of such persons) so manacled as they little animate folks to follow them. But the history[1] being captived to the truth of a foolish world is many times a terror from well-doing, and an encouragement to unbridled wickedness. For see we not valiant Milciades[2] rot in his fetters? The just Phocion and the accomplished Socrates[3] put to death like traitors? The cruel Severus live prosperously? The excellent Severus[4] miserably murdered? Sylla and Marius[5] dying in their beds? Pompey and Cicero[6] slain then when they would have thought exile a happiness? See we not virtuous Cato driven to kill himself, and rebel Caesar[7] so advanced that his name yet after 1600 years lasteth in the highest honour? And mark but even Caesar's own words of the forenamed Sylla, (who in that only did honestly, to put down his dishonest tyranny) litteras nescivit,[8] as if want of learning caused him to do well. He meant it not by poetry, which not content with earthly plagues deviseth new punishments in hell for tyrants; nor yet by philosophy, which teacheth occidendos esse;[9] but no doubt by skill in history, for that indeed can afford

[1] But the history but the historian (Olney).

[2] Milciades Miltiades, Athenian general, often credited with the Greeks' victory over the Persians at the crucial battle of Marathon. However, a later defeat at Paros led to his arrest and imprisonment; although his sentence of death was commuted to a heavy fine, he was unable to pay it before he succumbed to his wounds, dying in prison of gangrene in 489 BCE (Classical Dict., p. 413).

[3] Phocion (402/01-318 BCE), Athenian general and statesman, represented by Plutarch as a "blend of kindness and severity, of caution and daring, of solicitude for the safety of others and disregard for [his] own," as well as "indefatigable in the pursuit of justice." See "Life of Phocion," The Age of Alexander, trans., I. Scott-Kilvert (London, 1973), p. 221. He resisted war with Philip of Macedon on pragmatic grounds, although he later made Philip retreat from Euboea. Elected governor of Athens many times, his reputation for temperance and public service (he rejected bribes from both Philip and Alexander) did not save him from the machinations of his enemies; he was condemned for treason and drank the traditional cup of poison (Plutarch, pp. 246-51); Socrates (469-399 BCE) famed Athenian philosopher, condemned to death for supposedly corrupting the religious faith of the youth of Athens with his teachings; he also drank a cup of poison. The event is described in Plato's Apology.

[4] the cruel Severus Lucius Septimius Severus, Roman emperor (reigned 193-211 CE); guilty of murder and impiety during his struggle for the Imperial throne, he was admired by classical writers for his military prowess, but deplored for his cruelty (Classical Dict., p. 625); the excellent Severus Marcus Aurelius Severus Alexander, Roman emperor (reigned 222-35 CE), whose own high moral standards led him to expect and enforce moral rectitude in the civil service and strict discipline in the army; he founded schools and was a patron of literature; he was murdered in his tent while on campaign (Classical Dict., pp. 625-26).

[5] Sylla Lucius Cornelius Sulla Felix (b. c. 138), Roman statesman and military leader; among the deeds which leave Sidney outraged that such a man should have died in his bed are: the massacre of more than 7,000 Roman citizens; the abuse of absolute power in the violation of any laws that didn't suit him or his ambitions; his retirement to a country retreat where he indulged in sensual pleasures and debauchery. See Classical Dict., pp. 650-51 and Plutarch, Lives, "Life of Sylla," vol. 1, pp. 797-801; Marius Gaius Marius (b. c. 157 BCE), Roman military leader, who became one of Rome's most infamous tyrants; after being routed by his rival Sylla, Marius fled to Africa, raised an army, and returned to Rome. Once he had taken the city he ruthlessly executed not just his enemies, but even those whose greetings in the street went unacknowledged by Marius. He was intemperate, cruel, and illiterate (Classical Dict., pp. 387-88).

[6] Pompey Gnaeus Pompeius Magnus (Pompey the Great) (106-48 BCE), Roman military leader; in his struggle with Julius Caesar for control of the empire, he was decisively defeated at the battle of Pharsalus. Fleeing to Egypt, Pompey sought the aid and protection of Ptolomey, who instead had him assassinated; Cicero Marcus Tullius Cicero (106-43 BCE), Roman orator, politician, and writer; a supporter of Pompey, he was pardoned by Julius Caesar, but soon after Caesar's death he attacked in print Mark Antony. Condemned to death by the second triumvirate, Cicero was attempting to flee towards the sea, when he was caught and summarily executed.

[7] Cato Marcus Porcius Cato (Uticensis) (95-46 BCE), Roman politician and committed supporter of the Roman Republic. He supported the faction that wanted to see Pompey as sole consul to counterbalance the threat posed by Caesar. However, he committed suicide when he learned of Caesar's victory at Thapsus; Caesar Gaius Julius Caesar, Roman dictator (100-44 BCE) and general. After his successful campaigns in Gaul, the Roman senate, fearful of Caesar's power and the loyalty of his army, refused to allow him to stand for the consulship and looked for ways to prosecute him. As a result in 49 BCE, Caesar and his armies crossed the Rubicon, a stream in Northern Italy which ancient Roman law had made the boundary beyond which a Roman general could not lead his army. To do so was treason.

[8] Latin, "He was ignorant of letters." Suetonius reports in his life of Gaius Julius Caesar that Caesar had once said "that Sulla [see note 5 this page] was altogether unlettered and no grammarian, in giving over his dictatorship." See History of the Twelve Caesars, trans. P. Holland, ed. J.H. Freese, (1606; London, n.d.), section 77, p. 48.

[9] Latin, "they are to be executed."

you[1] Cipselus, Periander, Phalaris, Dionisius,[2] and I know not how many more of the same kennel,[3] that speed well enough in their abominable injustice of usurpation.[4] I conclude, therefore, that he excelleth history, not only in furnishing the mind with knowledge, but in setting it forward to that which deserves to be called and accounted good: which setting forward and moving to well doing, indeed setteth the laurel crown[5] upon the poets as victorious,[6] not only of the historian, but over the philosopher, howsoever in teaching it may be questionable. For suppose it be granted, that which I suppose with great reason may be denied, that the philosopher in respect of his methodical proceeding teach more perfectly than the poet, yet do I think that no man is so much philophilosophos,[7] as to compare the philosopher in moving with the poet. And that moving is of a higher degree than teaching it may by this appear, that it is well nigh both the cause and effect of teaching. For who will be taught, if he be not moved with desire to be taught? And what so much good doth that teaching bring forth (I speak still of moral doctrine) as that it moveth one to do that which it doth teach. For as Aristotle sayeth, it is not gnosis but praxis[8] must be the fruit. And how praxis can be without being moved to practice, it is no hard matter to consider. The philosopher showeth you the way, he informeth you of the particularities, as well of the tediousness of the way as of the pleasant lodging you shall have when your journey is ended, as of the many by-turnings that may divert you from your way. But this is to no man but to him that will read him, and read him with attentive, studious painfulness, which constant desire, whosoever hath in him, hath already passed half the hardness of the way, and therefore is beholding to the philosopher but for the other half. Nay, truly learned men have learnedly thought that, where once reason hath so much over-mastered passion as that the mind hath a free desire to do well, the inward light each mind hath in itself is as good as a philosopher's book, since in nature[9] we know it is well to do well, and what is well and what is evil, although not in the words of art which philosophers bestow upon us, for out of natural conceit the philosophers drew it. But to be moved to do that which we know, or to be moved with desire to know, Hoc opus, hic labor est.[10] Now therein of all sciences (I speak still of humane and according to the humane conceit) is our poet the monarch. For he doth not only show the way, but giveth so sweet a prospect into the way, as will entice any man to enter into it. Nay, he doth as if your journey should lie through a fair vineyard, at the very first give you a cluster of grapes, that full of the taste you may long to pass further. He beginneth not with obscure definitions, which [1] afford you afford your (Olney).

[2] Cipselus (c. 657-627 BCE), tyrant of Corinth; according to Herodotus, under Cypselus' rule, many Corinthians lost their property and were forced into exile, but a greater number were executed (Histories, 5.92). His son and heir, Periander (c. 627-587 BCE), was much more oppressive, killing "outstanding citizens" and treating his people "with unremitting brutality" (5.92); he sent 300 boys from Corcyra to Lydia for castration to punish the Corcyrans for murdering his son (3.48); he also murdered his wife, Melissa, and had intercourse with her after her death (5.92); Phalaris of Acragas (Agrigento) (c. 570-c. 549 BCE), "the first important Sicilian tyrant," he was also "a by-word in antiquity for cruelty (he was said to have roasted his enemies alive in a brazen bull)"; Dionisius both Dionysius I or the Elder, ruler of Sicily and Syrcuse (b. c. 430 BCE), and his heir, Dionysius II, tyrant of Syracuse (ruled, 367-57 BCE); the former was known for his cruelty, paranoia, impiety, and sacrilege; the latter for his cruelty and violence; he is said to have invited Plato to his court only then to have the philosopher sold into slavery for daring to counsel him to surrender his position of absolute power (OCD, pp. 1153; 476-77; Classical Dict., p. 235).

[3] kennel a pack, crew, or gang of persons.

[4] injustice of usurpation injustice or usurpation (Olney).

[5] laurel crown In the classical world, wreath-like crowns made of the bay tree would be worn by those who had achieved a great victory, often in the arenas of war or poetry.

[6] the poets as victorious the poet as victorious (Olney).

[7] philophilosophos a lover of philosophy.

[8] gnosis knowledge; praxis action, practice. Aristotle indicates that every body of knowledge is aimed at some action or practice, as "the end of medical art is health, that of shipbuilding a vessel, that of strategy victory, that of economics wealth" ("Nichomachean Ethics," Works of Aristotle, 12 vols., trans. and ed. W.D. Ross [Oxford, 1963], vol. 9, 1.1.8-10).

[9] since in nature seeing in nature (Olney).

[10] Latin, "This is the task, this is the toil" (Virgil, Aeneid, 6.129). This is the prophetic Sibyl's comment to Aeneas before he descends to the underworld: the journey down is easy, but the ascent is not.

must blur the margin with interpretations,[1] and load the memory with doubtfulness; but he cometh to you with words set in delightful proportion, either accompanied with or prepared for the well-enchanting skill of music; and with a tale forsooth he cometh unto you, with a tale which holdeth children from play and old men from the chimney corner. And, pretending no more, doth intend the winning of the mind from wickedness to virtue; even as the child is often brought to take most wholesome things by hiding them in such other as have a pleasant taste; which, if one should begin to tell them the nature of the aloes or rhabarbarum[2] they should receive, would sooner take their physic at their ears than at their mouth. So it is in men (most of which are childish in the best things, till they be cradled in their graves): glad they will be to hear the tales of Hercules, Achilles, Cyrus, Aeneas, and hearing them, must needs hear the right description of wisdom, valour, and justice; which if they had been barely (that is to say philosophically) set out, they would swear they be brought to school again. That imitation whereof poetry is, hath the most conveniency to nature of all other, insomuch that, as Aristotle sayeth, those things which in themselves are horrible, as cruel battles, unnatural monsters, are made in poetical imitation delightful.[3] Truly, I have known men that even with reading Amadis de Gaul,[4] which God knoweth wanteth much of a perfect poesy, have found their hearts moved to the exercise of courtesy, liberality, and especially courage. Who readeth Aeneas carrying old Anchises on his back, that wisheth not it were his fortune to perform so excellent an act?[5]

[...]

I think it may be manifest that the poet, with that same hand of delight, doth draw the mind more effectually than any other art doth. And so a conclusion not unfitly ensue that as virtue is the most excellent resting place for all worldly learning to make his end of, so poetry, being the most familiar to teach it, and most princely to move towards it, in the most excellent work is the most excellent workman.

[...]

Since then poetry is of all humane learnings the most ancient and of most fatherly antiquity, as from whence other learnings have taken their beginnings; since it is so universal that no learned nation doth despise it, nor barbarous nation[6] is without it; since both Roman and Greek gave such divine names unto it, the one of prophesying, the other of making; and that indeed that name of making is fit for him, considering, that where all other arts retain[7] themselves within their subject, and receive, as it were, their being from it, the poet only, only bringeth his own stuff, and doth not learn a conceit out of a matter, but maketh matter for a conceit. Since neither his description nor end containeth any evil,[8] the thing described cannot be

---

1 blur the margin with interpretations i.e., fill the margin with explanatory commentary to the point where the line between text and margin becomes obscured. Renaissance texts used marginal notes, not footnotes or endnotes, for glosses and explanations.

2 aloes here, in the plural, a drug of nauseous odour, bitter taste, and purgative qualities from the juice of the aloe plant; rhabarbarum rhubarb-root, a bitter purgative (Gerard's Herbal, 1636 [London, 1985], pp. 98-99).

3 Aristotle sayeth … delightful See Poetics, 4.9-13: "... it is also natural for all to delight in works of imitation. The truth of this second point is shown by experience: though the objects themselves may be painful to see, we delight to view the most realistic representations of them in art, the forms for example of the lowest animals and of dead bodies."

4 Amadis de Gaul Garcí Rodríguez de Montalvo's Amadís de Gaula ("Amadis of Gaul") (1508), a wildly popular Spanish version of the late thirteenth century French Arthurian tales. de Montalvo's prose romance and its many sequels were quickly translated into French, Italian, German, Dutch, Portuguese, and Hebrew; the first English translation of Amadis was published in 1572. Roundly condemned as obscene by English clergymen, these romances seem "to have functioned for educated Elizabethans as something of a sexual primer" (W. Schleiner, "Elizabethan Bawdy," Encycl. of the Renaissance, vol. 1, p. 193).

5 See p. 719, note 3. See Virgil's Aeneid, 2.707-804.

6 nor barbarous nation nor no barbarous nation (Olney).

7 that where all other arts retain that whereas other arts retain (Olney).

8 containeth any evil Ponsonby has "containing any," but Olney's reading is preferable.

evil; since his effects be so good as to teach goodness and delight the learners of it; since therein (namely in moral doctrine, the chief of all knowledges) he doth not only far pass the historian, but for instructing is well nigh comparable to the philosopher, for moving leaveth him behind him. Since the Holy Scripture (wherein there is no uncleanness) hath whole parts in it poetical, and that even our Saviour Christ vouchsafed to use the flowers of it; since all his kinds are not only in their united forms but in their severed dissections fully commendable: I think (and think I think rightly) the laurel crown appointed for triumphant captains doth worthily (of all other learnings) honour the poet's triumph. But because we have ears as well as tongues, and that the lightest reasons that may be will seem to weigh greatly, if nothing be put in the counterbalance, let us hear and, as well as we can, ponder what objections be made against this art, which may be worthy either of yielding, or answering.

[...]

Now then go we to the most important imputations laid to the poor poets. For ought I can yet learn, they are these. First, that there being many other more fruitful knowledges, a man might better spend his time in them than in this. Secondly, that it is the mother of lies. Thirdly, that it is the nurse of abuse, infecting us with many pestilent desires, with a siren's sweetness drawing the mind to the serpent's tail of sinful fancies;[1] and herein especially comedies give the largest field to err, as Chaucer sayeth,[2] how both in other nations and in ours, before poets did soften us, we were full of courage, given to martial exercises, the pillars of man-like liberty, and not lulled asleep in shady idleness with poets' pastimes. And lastly and chiefly, they cry out with open mouth, as if they had over-shot Robinhood,[3] that Plato banished them out of his commonwealth.[4] Truly this is much, if there be much truth in it. First to the first. That a man might better spend his time is a reason indeed, but it doth, as they say, but petere principium.[5] For if it be, as I affirm, that no learning is so good as that which teacheth and moveth to virtue, and that none can both teach and move thereto so much as poesy, then is the conclusion manifest: that ink and paper cannot be to a more profitable purpose employed. And certainly, though a man should grant their first assumption, it should follow (methinks) very unwillingly that good is not good because better is better. But I still and utterly deny that there is sprung out of earth a more fruitful knowledge. To the second, therefore, that they should be the principal liars, I answer paradoxically, but truly, I think truly, that of all writers under the sun the poet is the least liar, and, though he would,[6] as a poet can scarcely be a liar. The astronomer, with his cousin the geometrician, can hardly escape, when they take upon them to measure the height of the stars. How often, think you, do the physicians lie, when they aver things good for sicknesses, which afterwards send Charon a great number of souls drow

[1] fancies fancy (Olney).

[2] "The Knight's Tale" in The Canterbury Tales, ll.28-29: "I have, God woot, a large field to ere, / And wayke ben the oxen in my plough."

[3] over-shot Robin Hood Clearly a variation on the popular proverb "Many speak (talk) of Robin Hood that never shot in his bow" (i.e., many people talk about matters of which they know nothing) (Tilley R148).

[4] In his Republic, 2.377-83 and 3.386-402, Plato argues that poetry does not express or represent what is true, nor does it offer good models for youth. For these reasons it should be censored and there should be rules and regulations set down for it that poets must be obliged to follow. In 10.595-608, he further argues that all poets should be banned from the ideal state on account of the tendency of their medium to enthrall the emotions and hearts of men to the detriment of their reason and souls; he finds the models of behaviour offered in both comedy and tragedy to be equally detrimental to the character of the citizens of the ideal state. However, Plato does add that this banishment of poets must occur only if those who support poetry cannot refute the charges he brings against it.

[5] petere principium Latin, "to take for granted a beginning or principle [as the grounds for an argument]" (i.e., the logical fallacy known as "begging the question").

[6] and, though he would i.e., even if he wanted to be.

ned in a potion before they come to his ferry?[1] And no less of the rest, which take upon them to affirm. Now, for the poet, he nothing affirmeth, and therefore never lieth. For, as I take it, to lie is to affirm that to be true which is false. So as the other artists, and especially the historian, affirming many things, can, in the cloudy knowledge of mankind, hardly escape from many lies. But the poet, as I said before, never affirmeth. The poet never maketh any circles about your imagination, to conjure you to believe for true what he writeth.[2] He citeth not authorities of other histories, but even for his entry[3] calleth the sweet Muses to inspire unto him[4] a good invention; in truth, not labouring to tell you what is or is not, but what should or should not be. And therefore though he recount things not true, yet because he telleth them not for true, he lieth not, without we will say that Nathan lied in his speech before alleged to David,[5] which as a wicked man durst scarce say, so think I none so simple would say, that Aesop lied in the tales of his beasts. For who thinketh that Aesop wrote it for actually true were well worthy to have his name chronicled among the beasts he writeth of. What child is there that, coming to a play, and seeing Thebes written in great letters upon an old door, doth believe that it is Thebes?[6] If then a man can arrive to the child's age[7] to know that the poet's persons and doings are but pictures what should be, and not stories what have been, they will never give the lie to things not affirmatively but allegorically and figuratively written. And therefore as in history looking for truth, they may go away[8] full fraught with falsehood; so in poesy looking but for fiction, they shall use the narration but as an imaginative groundplat[9] of a profitable invention. But hereto is replied, that the poets give names to men they write of, which argueth a conceit of an actual truth, and so, not being true, proveth a falsehood. And doth the lawyer lie then, when under the names of "John of the Stile," and "John of the Nokes," he puteth his case?[10] But that is easily answered: their naming of men is but to make their picture the more lively, and not to build any history. Painting men, they cannot leave men nameless. We see we cannot play at chess but that we must give names to our chessmen; and yet methinks he were a very partial champion of truth that would say we lied for giving a piece of wood the reverend title of a bishop. The poet nameth Cyrus and Aeneas[11] no other way than to show what men of their fames, fortunes, and estates should do. Their third is, how much it abuseth men's wit, training it to wanton sinfulness and lustful love. For indeed that is the principal if not only abuse I can hear alleged. They say the comedies rather teach than reprehend amorous conceits. They say the lyric is larded with passionate sonnets, the elegiac weeps the want of his mistress, and that even to the heroical, Cupid hath ambitiously climbed. Alas, love, I would thou couldest as well

[1] Charon, the ferryman of the underworld, transported the souls of the dead across the river Styx.

[2] The poet never maketh any circles … writeth It was commonly believed that conjurers attempting to raise the spirits of the dead or call forth spirits would draw first a protective circle in which they would stand.

[3] entry beginning. Calling upon the Muses was a conventional way of beginning a poem, particularly an epic poem.

[4] inspire unto him inspire into him (Olney).

[5] The prophet Nathan uses a parable to convey God's displeasure with King David's arranging for the death of Uriah in battle so that David can take Uriah's wife, Bathsheba, as his own. In the story, a rich man with many flocks seizes a poor man's only and much-beloved lamb to feed a visitor. David, believing the story to be true, condemns the rich man to death, but Nathan then reveals that the story has been dictated to him by God for David's reproof (2 Samuel 12). Sidney uses this story earlier in the Defence when he offers examples of the power of poetry to persuade the reader to adopt and practice good moral and ethical percepts; he says that the "application [of Nathan's story was] most divinely true, [although] the discourse itself feigned [i.e., invented]."

[6] The Renaissance public stage in England, lacking scenic backdrops, relied partly on such pointers to indicate setting and shifts in setting.

[7] to the child's age at that child's age (Olney).

[8] they may go away they go away (Olney).

[9] groundplat ground-plot, ground-plan; foundation.

[10] doth the lawyer … case John-a-nokes and John-a-stiles were fictitious names for the parties in a legal action, and were used in contemporary Renaissance legal manuals and textbooks to describe cases.

[11] Cyrus and Aeneas Cyrus or Aeneas (Olney).

defend thyself as thou canst offend others. I would those on whom thou dost attend could either put thee away or yield good reason why they keep thee. But grant love of beauty to be a beastly fault, although it be very hard, since only man and no beast hath that gift to discern beauty; grant that lovely name of love to deserve all hateful reproaches, although even some of my masters, the philosophers, spent a good deal of their lamp-oil in setting forth the excellency of it; grant, I say, what they will[1] have granted, that not only love, but lust, but vanity, but (if they list) scurrility, possess many leaves of the poets' books: yet think I, when this is granted, they will find their sentence may with good manners put the last words foremost, and not say that poetry abuseth man's wit, but that man's wit abuseth poetry. For I will not deny, but that man's wit may make poesy, which should be eikastike, which some learned have defined, figuring forth good things, to be phantastike, which doth contrariwise infect the fancy with unworthy objects,[2] as the painter should give to the eye either some excellent perspective, or some fine picture, fit for building or fortification, or containing in it some notable example, as Abraham sacrificing his son Isaac,[3] Judith killing Holofernes,[4] David fighting with Goliath,[5] may leave those, and please an ill-pleased eye with wanton shows of better hidden matters. But what, shall the abuse of a thing make the right use odious? Nay truly, though I yield that poesy may not only be abused, but that being abused by the reason of his sweet charming force it can do more hurt than any other army of words, yet shall it be so far from concluding that the abuse should give reproach to the abused, that contrariwise it is a good reason, that whatsoever being abused doth most harm, being rightly used (and upon the right use each thing receives his title) doth most good. Do we not see skill of physic, the best rampire[6] to our often-assaulted bodies, being abused teach poison, the most violent destroyer? Doth not knowledge of law, whose end is to even and right all things, being abused grow the crooked fosterer of horrible injuries? Doth not (to go to the highest) God's word abused breed heresy, and his name abused become blasphemy? Truly, a needle cannot do much hurt, and as truly (with leave of ladies be it spoken) it cannot do much good. With a sword thou mayst kill thy father, and with a sword thou mayst defend thy prince and country. So that, as in their calling poets "fathers of lies," they said nothing, so in this their argument of abuse they prove the commendation.

They allege, herewith, that before poets began to be in price[7] our nation had set their hearts' delight upon action and not imagination, rather doing things worthy to be written, than writing things fit to be done.

[...]

[...] for as for poetry itself, it is the freest from this objection, for poetry is the companion of camps. I dare undertake, Orlando Furioso or honest King Arthur[8] will never displease a soldier, but the quiddity of ens and prima materia will hardly agree with a corcelet.[9] And therefore, as I said in the begin-

[1] grant, I say, what they will grant, I say, whatsoever they will (Olney).

[2] See Plato, Sophist, 236, 260, 265-67.

[3] Abraham sacrificing his son Isaac In Genesis 22:1-18, God commands Abraham to sacrifice his only son, Isaac, as a test of Abraham's fear of and obedience to God. As Abraham is about to fulfil God's command, an angel stops him.

[4] Judith killing Holofernes In the apocryphal Book of Judith, the beautiful and pious Jewish widow, Judith, saves her town, Bethulia, from the besieging forces of Holofernes, general of the Assyrian army. Presenting herself at Holofernes' tent, she wins him over with her beauty, and after he has become drunk entertaining her, she cuts off his head with a sword (see especially 10.1-13.10).

[5] David fighting with Goliath 1 Samuel 17:1-58.

[6] rampire rampart, bulwark, barrier.

[7] in price highly esteemed, thought much of.

[8] Orlando Furioso See p. 719, note 3; King Arthur semi-legendary early British king whose exploits were the subject of numerous poetic and prose romances, such as Thomas Malory's Morte d'Arthur (1469-70) and Spenser's Faerie Queene.

[9] Ens (Latin, "being") and prima materia (Latin, "first or prime matter") are both philosophical terms, the former meaning "something that has existence, a being, an entity, as opposed to a quality," the latter "a supposedly formless primordial matter out of which the universe was created" (Oxford Essential Dict. of Foreign Terms in English).

ning, even Turks and Tartars are delighted with poets. Homer, a Greek, flourished before Greece flourished. And if to a slight conjecture a conjecture may be opposed, truly it may seem that as by him their learned men took almost their first light of knowledge, so their active men received their first motions of courage. Only Alexander's example may serve, who by Plutarch is accounted of such virtue that fortune was not his guide but his footstool,[1] whose acts speak for him, though Plutarch did not,[2] indeed the phoenix of warlike princes. This Alexander left his schoolmaster, living Aristotle, behind him, but took dead Homer with him.[3] He put the philosopher Callisthenes to death for his seeming philosophical, indeed mutinous, stubbornness, but the chief thing he was ever heard to wish for was that Homer had been alive.[4] He well found he received more bravery of mind by the pattern of Achilles than by hearing the definition of fortitude.[5]

[...]

But now indeed my burden is great, that Plato[6] his name is laid upon me, whom, I must confess, of all philosophers I have ever esteemed most worthy of reverence, and with good reason,[7] since of all philosophers he is the most poetical. Yet if he will defile the fountain out of which his flowing streams have proceeded, let us boldly examine with what reasons he did it. First truly, a man might maliciously object that Plato being a philosopher was a natural enemy of poets. For indeed, after the philosophers had picked out of the sweet mysteries of poetry the right discerning true points of knowledge, they forthwith, putting it in method, and making a school art of that which the poets did only teach by a divine delightfulness, beginning to spurn at their guides like ungrateful prentices, were not content to set up shop for themselves, but sought by all means to discredit their masters; which by the force of delight being barred them, the less they could overthrow them the more they hated them. For indeed, they found for Homer seven cities strove who should have him for their citizen, where many cities banished philosophers as not fit members to live among them. For only repeating certain of Euripides' verses, many Athenians had their lives saved of the Syracusians,[8] where the Athenians[9] themselves thought many philosophers unworthy to live. Certain poets, as Simonides and Pindarus, had so prevailed with Hiero I,[10] that of a tyrant they made him a just king, where Plato could do so little with Dionysius, that he himself of a philosopher was made a slave.[11] But who should do thus, I confess, should

---

[1] fortune was not his guide but his footstool On Alexander, see p. 723, note 9. See also, Plutarch, Lives, "Life of Alexander," p. 1282.

[2] whose acts speak for him, though Plutarch did not perhaps a reference to Plutarch's preamble to his "Life of Alexander," where he notes that he does not record all of the illustrious actions of Alexander because as a biographer he believes that "the most brilliant exploits often tell us nothing of the virtues or vices of the men who performed them, while on the other hand a chance remark or a joke may reveal far more of a man's character than the mere feat of winning battles...." (The Age of Alexander, trans. I. Scott-Kilvert [London, 1973], p. 252).

[3] See Plutarch, Lives, "Life of Alexander," p. 1253 and 1281-83. In The Greek Alexander Romance, a fiction composed in the third or second century BCE, King Philip, Alexander's father, orders Aristotle to teach Alexander Homer's poems.

[4] For Alexander's dislike of Callisthenes' lack of tact and Callisthenes' execution for treason, see Plutarch, pp. 1320-25; and Laertius, "Aristotle," 2.449. Callisthenes was a philosopher, rhetorician, and a kinsman of Aristotle. Many classical writers, including Arrian, Cicero, and Plutarch mention Alexander's wish that Homer still lived so that he might have a great enough poet to do justice to his military exploits.

[5] Alexander believed himself descended from Achilles on his mother's side and treated his illustrious ancestor's life as a model for his own (Plutarch, p. 1250). Both Plutarch and Arrian record Alexander's honouring of Achilles' grave at the city of Ilium (Troy) (Plutarch, p. 1263, and Arrian, Life of Alexander, 1.11).

[6] that Plato now Plato (Olney).

[7] with good reason with great reason (Olney).

[8] In Plutarch's "Life of Nicias," after their defeat in battle, some of the defeated Athenians won their freedom by reciting Euripides' verses to the Sicilians.

[9] where the Athenians when the Athenians (Olney).

[10] Hieron I, tyrant of Syracuse (reigned 478-466 BCE), whose early harsh government was modified by his association with writers such as Epicharmus (poet and Pythagorean philosopher), Pindar (lyric poet), Aeschylus (dramatist), Bacchylides (lyric poet), and others. Both Pindar and Bacchylides wrote poems praising Hieron's accomplishments (Classical Dict., pp. 109; 309-10).

[11] where Plato ... Dionysius ... slave See p. 726, note 2.

requite the objections made against poets with like cavilations against philosophers; as likewise one should do that should bid one read Phaedrus or Symposium in Plato, or the discourse of love in Plutarch, and see whether any poet do authorize abominable filthiness as they do.[1] Again, a man might ask, out of what commonwealth Plato doth banish them? In sooth, thence where himself alloweth community of women.[2] So as belike this banishment grew not for effeminate wantonness, since little should poetical sonnets be hurtful when a man might have what woman he listed. But I honour philosophical instructions, and bless the wits which bred them, so as they be not abused, which is likewise stretched to poetry. St. Paul himself[3] sets a watch-word upon philosophy,[4] indeed upon the abuse. So doth Plato upon the abuse, not upon poetry. Plato found fault that the poets of his time filled the world with wrong opinions of the gods, making light tales of that unspotted essence, and therefore would not have the youth depraved with such opinions. Herein may much be said; let this suffice: the poets did not induce such opinions, but did imitate those opinions already induced. For all the Greek stories can well testify that the very religion of that time stood upon many and many-fashioned gods, not taught so by poets, but followed according to their nature of imitation. Who list may read in Plutarch the discourses of Isis and Osiris, of the cause why oracles ceased, of the divine providence, and see whether the theology of that nation stood not upon such dreams which the poets indeed superstitiously observed, and truly (since they had not the light of Christ) did much better in it than the philosophers, who, shaking off superstition, brought in atheism. Plato therefore, whose authority I had much rather justly construe than unjustly resist, meant not in general of poets, in those words of which Julius Scaliger sayeth, Qua authoritate barbari quidam atque hispidi abuti velint ad poetas e republica exigendos,[5] but only meant to drive out those wrong opinions of the Deity (whereof now, without further law, Christianity hath taken away all the hurtful belief), perchance (as he thought) nourished by then-esteemed poets. And a man need go no further than to Plato himself to know his meaning: who in his dialogue called Ion giveth high and rightly divine commendation unto poetry. So as Plato banishing the abuse not the thing, not banishing it but giving due honour to it, shall be our patron and not our adversary. For indeed I had much rather, since truly I may do it, show their mistaking of Plato, under whose lion's skin they would make an asslike braying against poesy,[6] than go about to overthrow his authority; whom, the wiser a man is, the more just cause he shall find to have in admiration; especially since he attributeth unto poesy more than myself do: namely, to be a very inspiring of a divine force, far above man's wit, as in the forenamed dialogue is apparent.

[...]

And who reads Plutarch's either history or philosophy, shall find he trimmeth both their garments with guards[7] of poesy. But I list not to defend poesy with the help of his underling historiography. Let it suffice to have showed it is a fit soil for

---

[1] as likewise ... do presumably because of the discussion of male same-sex love and desire in Phaedrus and Symposium, and in Plutarch's Erotikos ("Dialogue on Love").

[2] Republic, 2.377-78.

[3] St Paul himself The following is in Olney but not in Ponsonby: "St Paul himself, who yet, for the credit of poets, allegeth twice two poets, and one of them by the name of a prophet, setteth a watch-word ..."

[4] Colossians 2:8: "See to it that no one makes a prey of you by philosophy and empty deceit, according to human tradition, according to the elemental spirits of the universe, and not according to Christ."

[5] Latin, "which authority certain barbarians and hairy ones [i.e., unkempt and uncivilized men] desire to make use of in a perverted way in order to drive the poets out of the republic." (This quotation is probably from Scaliger's Poetice, which Sidney cites elsewhere: see p. 738, ll.1445-47.)

[6] The source of this image is in Aesop's fable "The Ass Clothed in the Skin of a Lion, and the Fox," where an ass, having disguised himself in a lion's skin, frightens many animals, but not the fox, who hears his braying voice. The moral is that unsophisticated, unlearned people who attempt to disguise their origins by assuming fine airs reveal themselves the minute they open their mouths.

[7] guards ornamental trimmings or borders on the edge of a garment.

praise to dwell upon; and what dispraise may set upon it is either easily overcome, or transformed into just commendation. So that since the excellencies of it may be so easily and so justly confirmed, and the low creeping objections so soon trodden down, it not being an art of lies, but of true doctrine; not of effeminateness, but of notable stirring of courage; not of abusing man's wit, but of strengthening man's wit; not banished, but honoured by Plato: let us rather plant more laurels for to engarland the poets' heads[1] (which honour of being laureate, as besides them only triumphant captains were,[2] is a sufficient authority to show the price they ought to be held in) than suffer the ill-favoured[3] breath of such wrong-speakers once to blow upon the clear springs of poesy.

[...]

For heretofore poets have in England also flourished and, which is to be noted, even in those times when the trumpet of Mars did sound loudest. And now that an over-faint quietness should seem to strew the house for poets, they are almost in as good reputation as the mountebanks[4] at Venice. Truly even that as of the one side it giveth great praise to poesy, which like Venus (but to better purpose) had rather be troubled in the net with Mars than enjoy the homely quiet of Vulcan;[5] so serveth it for a piece of a reason why they are less grateful to idle England, which now can scarce endure the pain of a pen. Upon this necessarily followeth, that base men with servile wits undertake it, who think it enough if they can be rewarded of the printer. And so as Epaminondas is said with the honour of his virtue to have made an office by his exercising it, which before was contemptible, to become highly respected,[6] so these men, no more but setting their names to it, by their own disgracefulness disgrace the most graceful poesy. For now, as if all the Muses were got with child to bring forth bastard poets, without any commission they do pass over[7] the banks of Helicon,[8] till they make the readers more weary than post-horses;[9] while in the meantime, they queis meliore luto finxit praecordia Titan[10] are better content to suppress the outflowings of their wit, than by publishing them to be accounted knights of the same order. But I that, before ever I durst aspire unto the dignity, am admitted into the company of the paper-blurrers,[11] do find the very true cause of our wanting estimation is want of desert, taking upon us to be poets in despite of Pallas.[12] Now wherein we want[13] desert were a thankworthy labour to express, but if I knew, I should have mended myself; but as I never desired the title, so have I neglected the means to come by it. Only, overmastered by some thoughts, I yielded an inky tribute unto them. Marry, they that delight in poesy itself should seek to know what they do, and how they do, and especially look themselves in an unflattering glass of reason, if they be inclinable unto it. For poesy must not be drawn by the ears; it must be gently led, or rather it must lead,

---

1 the poets' heads our poets' heads (Olney).

2 were wear (Olney).

3 ill-favoured ill-favouring (Olney).

4 mountebanks Itinerant quacks who from an elevated platform appealed to audiences by means of stories, tricks, juggling, and such like, in which they were often assisted by professional clowns or fools.

5 Venus, goddess of beauty, and wife of Vulcan, god of the forge, had an affair with Mars, the god of war. Vulcan used a magic net to ensnare the couple while they were making love and then called all the gods to see and laugh at them.

6 Epaminondas (d. 362 BCE), Theban general, famous for his personal and civic virtues. Cornelius Nepos' highly flattering biography makes clear Epaminondas' resistance to bribery and selfless service to his city, but it does not seem to make a statement exactly like this one.

7 do pass over do post over (Olney).

8 banks of Helicon The Helicon was a mountain sacred to the Muses, although Sidney represents it here and elsewhere as a river.

9 post-horses horses kept at an inn or post-house for the use of messengers who were often in haste.

10 slightly misquoted from Juvenal, Satire 14.34-35: "quibus arte benigna/et meliore luto finxit praecordia Titan" ("... one whose soul the Titan [i.e., Prometheus] has fashioned with kindlier skill and of a finer clay," trans. G.G. Ramsay [Cambridge, MA, 1957]).

11 paper-blurrers a contemptuous name for an inferior writer.

12 Pallas Athena, Greek goddess of wisdom.

13 want lack.

which was partly the cause that made the ancient learned affirm it was a divine gift and no human skill; since all other knowledges lie ready for any that have strength of wit; a poet no industry can make, if his own genius be not carried into it.[1] And therefore is an[2] old proverb, Orator fit, Poeta nascitur.[3] Yet confess I always that as the fertilest ground must be manured, so must the highest flying wit have a Daedalus[4] to guide him. That Daedalus, they say, both in this and in other, hath three wings to bear itself up into the air of due commendation: that is, art, imitation, and exercise. But these, neither artificial rules nor imitative patterns, we much cumber[5] ourselves withal. Exercise indeed we do, but that very forebackwardly; for where we should exercise to know, we exercise as having known, and so is our brain delivered of much matter which never was begotten by knowledge. For there being two principal parts, matter to be expressed by words and words to express the matter, in neither we use art or imitation rightly. Our matter is quodlibet[6] indeed, though wrongly performing, Ovid's verse Quicquid conabar dicere, Versus erit,[7] never marshalling it into any assured rank,[8] that almost the readers cannot tell where to find themselves. Chaucer undoubtedly did excellently in his Troilus and Criseyde; of whom truly I know not whether to marvel more, either that he in that misty time could see so clearly, or that we in this clear age go so[9] stumblingly after him. Yet had he great wants,[10] fit to be forgiven in so reverent an antiquity. I account the Mirror of Magistrates[11] meetly[12] furnished of beautiful parts, and in the earl of Surrey's lyrics[13] many things tasting of a noble birth and worthy of a noble mind. The Shepheardes Calender[14] hath much poetry in his eclogues indeed worthy the reading, if I be not deceived. That same framing of his style to an old rustic language I dare not allow, since neither Theocritus in Greek, Virgil in Latin, nor Sannazaro in Italian did affect it.[15] Besides these, I do not remember to have seen but few (to speak boldly) printed, that have poetical sinews in them. For proof whereof, let but most of the verses be put in prose, and then ask the meaning, and it will be found that one verse did but beget another, without ordering at the first what should be at the last; which becomes a confused mass of words,

1 carried into it carried unto it (Olney).

2 therefore is an therefore is it an (Olney).

3 Latin proverb, "The orator is made, the poet is born."

4 Daedalus legendary artist and craftsman; after having completed the labyrinth to house the Minotaur, Daedalus was imprisoned by King Minos. In order to escape, Daedalus fashioned wings of feathers and wax, which led to the demise of Daedalus' son Icarus who, disobeying his father's injunctions, flew too close to the sun, melting his wings, and then plunging to his death in the sea. Daedalus' name became synonymous with uncanny skill and ingenuity.

5 cumber encumber, burden.

6 Latin, "anything."

7 Ovid, Tristia, 4.10.26: "Et quod tentabam dicere versus erat." Recounting his attempts to abandon unprofitable poetry at his father's urging, Ovid tries to write prose: "But poetry in metre came unbidden, / And what I tried to write in verses ran" (Sorrows of an Exile: Tristia, trans. A.D. Melville [Oxford, 1992], 4.10.25-26).

8 rank order.

9 this clear age go so this clear age walk so (Olney).

10 wants deficiencies, failings, faults.

11 I.e., Mirror for Magistrates (1559; expanded and revised edition, 1563), an enormously popular collection of de casibus tragedies (i.e., concerning the fall of great men). The poetry of Thomas Sackville's "Induction" and "Complaint of the Duke of Buckingham" were particularly celebrated. See p. 735, note 2, and the selection in this anthology, pp. 289-99.

12 meetly appropriately, fittingly.

13 earl of Surrey's lyrics Henry Howard, earl of Surrey (?1517-47), poet and courtier, contributed to the development of English verse forms through his adoption and adaptation of Continental models. His lyrics appeared in the popular and influential anthology, Tottel's Miscellany (1557). He also translated books 2 and 3 of Virgil's Aeneid into blank verse.

14 The Shepheardes Calender (1579; see pp. 778-802 below), Edmund Spenser's innovative volume of twelve pastoral eclogues, dialogues between shepherds in an Arcadian landscape. Influenced by classical authors, such as Virgil and Theocritus, as well as Continental authors, such as Sannazaro and Marot, SC is characterized by an unusually wide variety of metrical forms and literary genres.

15 Theocritus (fl. 270 BCE), Greek poet, inventor of the pastoral eclogue (or bucolic); Virgil Publius Virgilius Maro (70-19 BCE), Roman poet, here referred to specifically as the author of the Eclogues (a collection of pastoral verse published 39-38 BCE); Sannazaro Jacopo Sannazaro (1458-1530), author of the Italian pastoral work Arcadia, which mixed prose and poetry proper; it was translated and much imitated in the sixteenth century: Sidney's complaint about Spenser's intentional use of archaism was echoed by Ben Jonson and other early seventeenth-century writers.

with a tingling sound of rhyme, barely accompanied with reasons.[1] Our tragedies and comedies, not without cause cried out against, observing rules neither of honest civility nor skillful poetry, excepting Gorboduc[2] (again I say of those that I have seen), which notwithstanding as it is full of stately speeches and well-sounding phrases, climbing to the height of Seneca his style, and as full of notable morality, which it doth most delightfully teach, and so obtain the very end of poesy; yet in truth it is very defectious in the circumstances,[3] which grieves me, because it might not remain as an exact model of all tragedies. For it is faulty both in place and time, the two necessary companions of all corporal actions. For where the stage should always represent but one place, and the uttermost time presupposed in it should be, both by Aristotle's precept[4] and common reason, but one day, there is both many days and places inartificially imagined. But if it be so in Gorboduc, how much more in all the rest, where you shall have Asia of the one side, and Africa of the other, and so many other under-kingdoms, that the player, when he comes in, must ever begin with telling where he is, or else the tale will not be conceived.[5] Now you shall have three ladies walk to gather flowers, and then we must believe the stage to be a garden. By and by we hear news of shipwreck in the same place, then we are to blame if we accept it not for a rock. Upon the back of that comes out a hideous monster with fire and smoke, and then the miserable beholders are bound to take it for a cave. While in the meantime two armies fly in, represented with four swords and bucklers, and then what hard heart will not receive it for a pitched field? Now, of time they are much more liberal: for ordinary it is that two young princes fall in love; after many traverses she is got with child, delivered of a fair boy; he is lost, groweth a man, falleth in love, and is ready to get another child, and all this in two hours' space; which how absurd it is in sense, even sense may imagine, and art hath taught, and all ancient examples justified, and, at this day, the ordinary players in Italy will not err in.

[...]

But besides these gross absurdities, how all their plays be neither right tragedies, nor right comedies, mingling kings and clowns, not because the matter so carrieth it, but thrust in the clown by head and shoulders to play a part in majestical matters, with neither decency nor discretion, so as neither the admiration and commiseration nor the right sportfulness is by their mongrel tragicomedy obtained. I know Apuleius[6] did somewhat so, but that is a thing recounted with space of time, not represented in one moment. And I know the ancients have one or two examples of tragicomedies, as Plautus hath Amphitrio.[7] But, if we mark them well, we shall find that they never, or very

---

1 with reasons with reason (Olney).

2 Gorboduc (1561) is a dramatic tragedy written by Thomas Sackville (1536-1608), first earl of Dorset, poet, lawyer, and courtier, and Sir Thomas Norton (1532-84), poet and dramatist. Heavily influenced by classical models (particularly the tragedies of the Roman playwright, Seneca) as well as the de casibus tradition, Gorboduc was the first English tragedy, and its blank verse form was enormously influential in the development of the period's drama.

3 defectious in the circumstances defective or flawed in the logical surroundings or "adjuncts" of an action; the time, place, manner, cause, occasion, etc.

4 The reference here is to what became known as the three unities (time, action, and place). In his Poetics, Aristotle states that in terms of time, tragedy should restrict itself to recounting events of a single day. In terms of action, the related actions of the plot should be dictated by necessity and probability. On the unity of place or setting (i.e., the notion that a dramatic action should take place in only one place), however, Aristotle is silent. Ludovico Castelvetro, the sixteenth-century Italian commentator on Aristotle's Poetics, is generally credited with formulating the rule of dramatic unity.

5 conceived understood.

6 Apuleius writer and orator (b. c. 125 CE), most famous for his Golden Ass or Metamorphoses (translated into English, 1566), a Latin romance which recounts the often violent and erotically charged adventures of Lucius who is transformed into an ass. The episodic nature of the narrative lends itself to the work's variety in terms of genre and tone. Apuleius' Golden Ass, in particular the tale of Cupid and Psyche, was generally held in high esteem in the middle ages and the Renaissance, especially in its predominantly moral-allegorical interpretations.

7 In the Prologue to Plautus' Amphitryon, the Roman god Mercury comments that since the play contains "kings and gods" as well as "a slave" it must be called a "tragicomedy." See Plautus: (continued)

daintily, match hornpipes[1] and funerals. So falleth it out that having indeed no right comedy in that comical part of our tragedy, we have nothing but scurrility, unworthy of any chaste ears, or some extreme show of doltishness, indeed fit to lift up a loud laughter and nothing else; where the whole tract[2] of a comedy should be full of delight, as the tragedy should be still maintained in a well-raised admiration. But our comedians[3] think there is no delight without laughter, which is very wrong, for though laughter may come with delight, yet cometh it not of delight, as though delight should be the cause of laughter. But well may one thing breed both together. Nay, rather in themselves they have, as it were, a kind of contrariety: for delight we scarcely do but in things that have a conveniency to ourselves or to the general nature. Laughter almost ever commeth of things most disproportioned to ourselves and nature. Delight hath a joy in it, either permanent or present. Laughter hath only a scornful tickling. For example, we are ravished with delight to see a fair woman, and yet are far from being moved to laughter. We laugh at deformed creatures, wherein certainly we cannot delight. We delight in good chances, we laugh at mischances. We delight to hear the happiness of our friends and country, at which he were worthy to be laughed at that would laugh. We shall contrarily laugh sometimes to find a matter quite mistaken and go down the hill against the bias,[4] in the mouth of some such men, as for the respect of them one shall be heartily sorry, he cannot[5] choose but laugh, and so is rather pained than delighted with laughter. Yet deny I not but that they may go well together; for as in Alexander's picture well set out we delight without laughter, and in twenty mad antics[6] we laugh without delight, so in Hercules, painted with his great beard and furious countenance, in a woman's attire, spinning at Omphale's commandment,[7] it breeds both delight and laughter; for the representing of so strange a power in love procures delight, and the scornfulness of the action stirreth laughter. But I speak to this purpose, that all the end of the comical part be not upon such scornful matters as stir laughter only, but mix with it that[8] delightful teaching which is the end of poesy. And the great fault even in that point of laughter, and forbidden plainly by Aristotle, is that they stir laughter in sinful things, which are rather execrable than ridiculous; or in miserable, which are rather to be pitied than scorned.[9] For what is it to make folks gape at a wretched beggar and a beggarly clown,[10] or against law of hospitality to

The Comedies, trans. C. Carrier, ed. D.R. Slavitt and P. Bovie (Baltimore, 1995), vol. 1, ll. 58-61. Dramatic tragicomedy was not unknown in the classical world: Euripides' Alcestis and Iphigeneia in Tauris are tragedies that end happily, while Aristotle's Poetics suggests that plays with double endings (where the good characters are rewarded and the bad characters are punished) were more popular with audiences than those which ended badly for everyone (i.e., pure tragedy). Aristotle also classifies as "second-best" the play with a double-ending, suggesting that it arises from the playwright's desire to "pander to the taste of the spectators."

[1] hornpipes a wind instrument used to accompany dancing and merrymaking, especially of sailors; also the name of a dance performed on such occasions.

[2] tract course or continuity.

[3] comedians comic writers.

[4] against the bias literally in the wrong direction (as in a game of bowls where the ball was weighted—the weight is called the "bias"—so that it would run obliquely, but which could be diverted from its path by small dips or mounds in the bowling surface); thus, to be under a misconception or mistaken idea.

[5] be heartily sorry, he cannot be heartily sorry, yet he cannot (Olney).

[6] antics performers who play grotesque or ludicrous parts; clowns, mountebanks.

[7] Classical writers give different accounts of how and why the great hero, Hercules, ends up wearing women's clothes and spinning for Omphale, queen of Lydia. Some say that he was enslaved figuratively by his love for her, others that he was enslaved literally. This incident was often represented and alluded to as an example of how a man's surrender of authority to a woman would lead to his effeminization.

[8] laughter only, but mix with it that laughter only, but, mixed with it, that (Olney).

[9] laughter … scorned "Rather, the laughable is one category of the shameful. For the laughable comprises any fault or mark of shame which involves no pain or destruction: most obviously, the laughable mask is something ugly and twisted, but not painfully." See Aristotle, Poetics, trans., S. Halliwell (Cambridge, MA, 1995), chapter 5, p. 45.

[10] a wretched beggar and a beggarly clown a wretched beggar or a beggarly clown (Olney).

jest at strangers, because they speak not English so well as we do? What do we learn, since it is certain, Nil habet infelix paupertas durius in se, Quam quod ridiculos homines facit.[1] But rather a busy-loving courtier, and a heartless, threatening Thraso,[2] a self-wise-seeming schoolmaster, a wry transformed traveller:[3] these if we saw walk in stage names, which we play naturally, therein were delightful laughter, and teaching delightfulness; as in the other the tragedies of Buchanan[4] do justly bring forth a divine admiration. But I have lavished out too many words of this play matter; I do it because, as they are excelling parts of poesy, so is there none so much used in England, and none can be more pitifully abused, which like an unmannerly daughter showing a bad education causeth her mother Poesy's honesty to be called in question. Other sort of poetry almost have we none, but that lyrical kind of songs and sonnets; which Lord, if he gave us so good minds, how well it might be employed, and with how heavenly fruits, both private and public, in singing the praises of the immortal beauty, the immortal goodness of that God who giveth us hands to write and wits to conceive; of which we might well want words, but never matter; of which we could turn our eyes to nothing, but we should ever have new budding occasions. But truly many of such writings as come under the banner of irresistible love, if I were a mistress, would never persuade me they were in love; so coldly they apply fiery speeches, as men that had rather read lovers' writings, and so caught up certain swelling phrases, which hang together like a man that once told me the wind was at northwest and by south, because he would be sure to name winds enough, than that in truth they feel those passions, which easily (as I think) may be bewrayed by that same forcibleness or energia (as the Greeks call it) of the writer.[5] But let this be a sufficient though short note, that we miss the right use of the material point of poesy. Now for the outside of it, which is words, or (as I may term it) diction, it is even well worse. So is it that[6] honey-flowing matron Eloquence apparelled, or rather disguised, in a courtesan-like painted affectation; one time with so far-fet[7] words, that many seem monsters, but must seem strangers to any poor Englishman; another time with coursing of a letter, as if they were bound to follow the method of a dictionary; another time with figures and flowers, extremely winter-starved. But I would this fault were only peculiar to versifiers, and had not as large possession among prose-printers and (which is to be marvelled) among many scholars, and (which is to be pitied) among some preachers. Truly I could wish, if at least I might be so bold to wish in a thing beyond the reach of my capacity, the diligent imitators of Tully and

[1] "Of all the woes of luckless poverty none is harder to endure than this, that it exposes men to ridicule." Juvenal, "Satire 3," Juvenal and Persius, trans. G.G. Ramsay (Cambridge, MA, 1957), ll. 152-53, p. 43.

[2] Thraso is a vain, boasting soldier (miles gloriosus) in The Eunuch by the Roman playwright Terence (Publius Terentius Afer) (?190-?159 BCE), and thus exemplifies a popular comic type in Renaissance drama.

[3] a wry transformed traveller a awry transformed traveller (Olney); given the context, someone who has returned from travel abroad wearing strange fashions and accoutrements; such individuals are often the objects of satire in Greene and Nashe.

[4] George Buchanan (1506-82), historian, scholar, teacher, and reformist. He translated Euripides' tragedies Medea and Alcestis into Latin verse, and composed two original Latin plays based on biblical stories: the Baptistes and the Jephthes. With the exception of Medea, composed somewhat earlier than the other three, the plays were meant for performance by Buchanan's students at the Collège de Guyenne in Bordeaux. Sidney perhaps admired the plays' strong moral and educative qualities; as Buchanan notes in his preface to the Alcestis: "For once the action is brought to life with speech and breath, it makes a stronger impression on the senses than bare moral lessons, and influences the mind more easily. And where it has penetrated, it clings more firmly, and virtually takes root" (quoted in P.J. Ford, George Buchanan: Prince of Poets [Aberdeen, 1982], p. 71).

[5] energia (as the Greeks call it) of the writer "Energeia" is generally defined as "vividness," with Quintilian discussing it in terms of rhetorical ornament as a tool of persuasion in oratory: "enargeia, or vigour ... derives its name from action and finds its peculiar function in securing that nothing that we say is tame" (Institutio Oratoria ["Education of an Orator"], 8.3.86-90).

[6] so is it that so is that (Olney).

[7] far-fet far-fetched.

Demosthenes,[1] most worthy to be imitated, did not so much keep Nizolian paper books[2] of their figures and phrases, as by attentive translation, as it were, devour them whole, and make them wholly theirs. For now they cast sugar and spice upon every dish that is served to the table: like those Indians, not content to wear ear-rings at the fit and natural place of the ears, but they will thrust jewels through their nose and lips, because they will be sure to be fine.

[...]

So that since the ever-praiseworthy poesy is full of virtue-breeding delightfulness, and void of no gift that ought to be in the noble name of learning; since the blames laid against it are either false or feeble; since the cause why it is not esteemed in England is the fault of poet-apes, not poets; since, lastly, our tongue is most fit to honour poesy, and to be honoured by poesy: I conjure you all that have had the evil luck to read this ink-wasting toy of mine, even in the name of the nine Muses, no more to scorn the sacred mysteries of poesy, no more to laugh at the name of poets, as though they were next inheritors to fools, no more to jest at the reverent title of a rhymer; but to believe, with Aristotle, that they were the ancient treasurers of the Grecians' divinity; to believe, with Bembus,[3] that they were first bringers-in of all civility; to believe, with Scaliger,[4] that no philosopher's precepts can sooner make you an honest man than the reading of Virgil; to believe, with Clauserus, the translator of Cornatus, that it pleased the heavenly Deity by Hesiod and Homer under the veil of fables to give us all knowledge, logic, rhetoric, philosophy—natural and moral—and quid non?; to believe, with me, that there are many mysteries contained in poetry, which of purpose were written darkly, lest by profane wits it should be abused;[5] to believe, with Landin,[6] that they are so beloved of the gods that whatsoever they write proceeds of a divine fury; lastly, to believe themselves when they tell you they will make you immortal by their verses. Thus doing,

[1] Tully Marcus Tullius Cicero (see p. 725, note 6); Cicero's writings were central texts in the Renaissance, particularly those which treated philosophical and rhetorical topics. During the Renaissance, he was among the most imitated and influential of classical authors; Demosthenes famed Athenian orator (384-322 BCE); there were five Greek editions of works by Demosthenes between 1586 and 1597; the first Latin edition appeared in 1571 and the first English translation from the Greek in 1570; often paired with Cicero in the period as the greatest of classical orators and rhetoricians.

[2] Nizolian paper books a reference to commonplace books containing entries copied not from Cicero directly but from Mario Nizzoli's popular Ciceronian dictionary (68 editions between 1535 and 1635).

[3] Bembus Pietro Bembo (1470-1547), Italian philologist, literary theorist, poet, historian, and cardinal, was a prolific writer and these comments on the nature of the poet may be contained in any number of his writings, but the most likely candidates are De imitatione, or Prose della volgar lingua ("Prose writings on the vernacular language").

[4] Scaliger Julius Caesar Scaliger (Giulio Cesare Scaligero) (1484-1558), French physician, humanist, and classical scholar, author of an influential Latin grammar (1540) as well as works on botany and zoology. Published posthumously, his Poetics (1561) makes the case for Virgil's superiority to Homer as a poet. See Select Translations from Scaliger's Poetics by F.M. Padelford (New York, 1905), pp. 73-81.

[5] to believe, with Clauserus ... abused Conrad Clauser translated into Latin the rhetorician Lucius Annaeus Cornutus' first-century CE De natura deorum gentilium commentarius (Oporinus, 1543). This idea that classical myths were essentially allegorical can also be found in Natale Conti's Mythologiae (Venice, 1551): "For who does not know that nearly all the mysteries of the gentile Gods have been hidden under the guise of fable by the ancients?" See Natale Conti's Mythologies: A Select Translation, trans. A. DiMatteo (New York, 1994), p. 5, and "Nor would we write about such Gods of the ancients as these that we know now to have been long since ridiculed and mocked at were it not that under these tales of Gods, which ambitious men would apply to themselves, with their flatterers following after, wise men have hidden even mystical things as we will reveal" (p. xviii). See also Spenser's "Letter to Ralegh" and the preface to Harrington's translation of Ariosto's chivalric romance, Orlando Furioso. Similarly, it was a common notion that the highly cryptic and image-laden apocalyptic books and passages of the Bible had been so written in order to ensure that only the elect would have access to them.

[6] Landin Cristoforo Landino (c. 1424-98), Italian poet, humanist, professor of literature and rhetoric at the University of Florence, and author of a number of influential translations into Italian, including Pliny's Natural History (1476), as well as commentaries on classical authors, such as Horace (1482), Virgil (1488), and Juvenal and Persius (in manuscript). He also published a set of dialogues called Disputationes Camaldulenses, which deals at least partly with the moral allegory that he saw as the primary approach to literary texts, seeking (for example) "the higher allegorical truth contained in [Virgil's] Aeneid" (p. 379). His edition of Dante's works contains a highly influential allegorical commentary.

your name shall flourish in the printers' shops. Thus doing, you shall be of kin to many a poetical preface. Thus doing, you shall be most fair, most rich, most wise, most all; you shall dwell upon superlatives. Thus doing, though you be libertino patre natus,[1] you shall suddenly grow Herculea proles,[2] Si quid mea carmina possunt.[3] Thus doing, your soul shall be placed with Dante's Beatrice, or Virgil's Anchises.[4] But if (fie of such a "but") you be borne so near the dull-making[5] cataract of Nilus, that you cannot hear the planet-like music of poetry;[6] if you have so earth-creeping a mind that it cannot lift itself up to look to the sky of poetry, or rather by a certain rustical disdain will become such a mome as to be a Momus of poetry:[7] then, though I will not wish unto you the ass' ears of Midas, nor to be driven by a poet's verses, as Bubonax[8] was, to hang himself, nor to be rhymed to death as is said to be done in Ireland,[9] yet thus much curse I must send you in the behalf of all poets: that while you live, you live in love, and never get favour for lacking skill of a sonnet, and when you die, your memory die from the earth for want of an epitaph.

FINIS

—1595

Appendix 1: Selected Correspondence between Sir Philip Sidney and Edmund Molyneux[10]

Sir Philip Sidney to Edmund Molyneux

Mr[11] Mollineax

Few words are best. My letters to my father have come to the eyes of some. Neither can I condemn any but you for it. If it be so, you have played the very knave with me; and so I will make you know, if I have good proof of it. But that for so much as is past. For that is to come, I assure you before God, that if ever I know you do so much as read any letter I write to my father, without his commandment, or my consent, I will

[1] Latin, "born of a freedman" (i.e., an individual who at once time had been a slave).

[2] Latin, "a descendant of Hercules" (one of the great Graeco-Roman heroes, son of Jupiter, king of the gods, and the mortal woman, Alcmene).

[3] Virgil, Aeneid, 9.446 ("if aught my verse avail"). Nisus has just avenged the death of his dear friend Euryalus; dying himself, he throws himself down beside Euryalus' lifeless body. Virgil exclaims: "Happy pair! If aught my verse avail, no day shall ever blot you from the memory of time, so long as the house of Aeneas shall dwell on the Capitol's unshaken rock, and the Father of Rome hold sovereign sway!" (446-49). The great friendship of Nisus and Euryalus became proverbial.

[4] Dante's Beatrice dwells in heaven, taking her place among the Blest in the final canto of the Paradiso (33.38); in Virgil's Aeneid (6.679-898), Aeneas encounters his father, Anchises, in Elysium, the home of the blessed dead in classical mythology.

[5] dull-making thunderous, and thus deafening.

[6] planet-like music of poetry i.e., the music of poetry is as sublime as the music produced by the heavenly spheres. Sidney refers to the Ptolemaic notion of the universe as a series of concentric spheres, set one inside of the other with the earth at its centre; these spheres, in their motion, created a harmonious and divine music.

[7] mome a fool, dunce, or blockhead; Momus of poetry The Greek god of ridicule and severe, excessive censure, Momus was banished from Heaven when he criticized the other gods, and thus his name has come to mean more generally, a fault-finder or unreasonably severe critic.

[8] Bubonax an unknown variant on the name of the Greek sculptor Bupalus who, along with his brother sculptor Anthermus, created a true-to-life statue of the physically-deformed poet Hipponax; in revenge he wrote bitter satires of the two which finally drove them to hang themselves (Classical Dict., p. 313).

[9] rhymed to death … Ireland It was a long-held popular notion that rats could be exterminated by cursing them in rhyme.

[10] Edmund Molyneux Edmund Molyneux (d. 1605), biographer and politician, MP for Bridgnorth (1579), and the trusted secretary and assistant of Sir Henry Sidney (Philip's father), in whose service he seems to have spent most of his life. Molyneux contributed a highly-appreciative biography of Henry Sidney for inclusion in Holinshed's Chronicles (1586). In terms of rank, Molyneux was certainly a gentleman: he was the son of Sir Edmund Molyneux (d. 1552), justice of the bench of Common Pleas, and knight of Bath (P. Sherlock, "Edmund Molyneux [d. 1605]," DNB online, 2005). This exchange of letters between Philip and Molyneux occurred in the context of Philip's perception that Molyneux was actively obstructing the suit of Fulke Greville (a close friend of Philip's) to gain the income he had expected when appointed clerk of the Signet in the Council of the Marches of Wales. See L. Magnusson, "'Power to Hurt': Language and Service in the Sidney Household Letters and Shakespeare's Sonnets," in her Shakespeare and Social Dialogue (Cambridge, 1999).

[11] Mr abbreviation of "Master," a general title of respect given to gentlemen.

thrust my dagger into you. And trust to it, for I speak it in earnest. In the meantime, farewell. From court this last of May, 1578.

By me

Philip Sidney.

Sir Philip Sidney to Edmund Molyneux, Esq.

I pray you, for my sake, you will not make yourself an instrument to cross my cousin Fulke's title in any part, or construction of his letters patents. It will turn to other bodies' good, and to hurt him willingly were a foolish discourtesy. I pray you, as you make account of me, let me be sure you will deal herein according to my request, and so I leave you to God. At Bainard's Castle, this 10th of April, 1581.

Your loving friend,

Philip Sidney.

Edmund Molyneux, Esq; to Sir Philip Sidney.

Sir,

I have received your letters, and do acknowledge the same as a special note of your loving favour, that it would please you to write unto me; and what may lie in me in any sort to do, you shall not need to require me. But you have (if it may so like you) full power and good warrant to command me. Sir, it seemeth by your said letters, that you have been informed, that I either have already, or in some sort pretend hereafter, to be an adversary to Mr. Greville in his suit here; and that I make not that good account of the validity and goodness of his patent, as in reason and courteous friendly dealing, I should do, somewhat, as you gather, to his disadvantage, being a matter, as you say, of no benefit to myself; which, if I should so forget myself (if it were only in respect that you esteem Mr. Greville as your dear and entire friend) I should justly condemn myself of unadvised and too great inconsiderate dealing. And therefore I pray you, and so effectually desire him to hold a better opinion of me, till you have further proof how I do deal, and have dealt, in the cause from the beginning. And as I have neither will nor power to hurt in this case if I would, having only to walk in the path I am directed: So if I had either, being otherwise directed by you, I would not. And therefore beseech you, whatsoever course be held in the matter, lay no further fault in me, than I justly deserve. For assure yourself, you and yours have, and ever shall have, that undoubted interest in me, as I will obey your commandment, as far as in duty and credit I may, which I crave it may like you to accept. And evenso I take my leave. From Salloppe, the 28th of April, 1581.

Yours ever in all to be commanded as your obedient servant,

E. Molyneux.

Sir Philip Sidney to Edm. Molyneux, Esq;

Mollineaux,

I pray thee write to me diligently. I would you came down yourself. Solicit my Lord Treasurer, and Mr. Vice Chamberlain for my being of the Council. I would fain bring in my cousin Conningsby if it were possible. You shall do me much pleasure to labour it. Farewell, even very well, for so I wish you. From Hereford, this 23rd of July, 1582.

Your loving friend,

Philip Sidney.

Appendix 2: Selected Correspondence of Lady Mary Sidney[1] to Edmund Molyneux

Lady Mary Sidney to Edmund Molyneux, Esq;

Molenox,

I thought good to put you in remembrance to move my Lord Chamberlain, in my lord's name, to have some other room than my chamber for my lord to have his resort unto, as he was wont to have; or else my lord will be greatly troubled, when he shall have any matters of dispatch:[1] my lodging, you see, being very little, and myself continually sick, and not able to be much out of my bed. For the nighttime, on roof, with God's grace, shall serve us; for the daytime, the Queen will look to have my chamber always in a readiness for her Majesty's coming thither; and though my lord himself can be no impediment thereto by his own presence, yet his lordship trusting to[2] no place else to be provided for him, will be, as I said before, troubled for want of a convenient place for the dispatch[3] of such people as shall have occasion to come to him. Therefore I pray you, in my lord's own name, move my Lord of Sussex for a room for that purpose, and I will have it hanged and lined[4] for him, with stuff[5] from hence. I wish you not to be unmindful hereof. And so for this time I leave you to the Almighty. From Chiswike this 11th of October, 1578.

[1] Lady Mary Sidney (b. between 1530 and 1535; d. 1586), courtier, wife of Sir Henry Sidney, mother of Sir Philip Sidney and Lady Mary Sidney Herbert, countess of Pembroke. She was the sister of Robert Dudley, earl of Leicester. Her service at court included nursing the Queen through a serious case of smallpox, in which service she herself contracted the disease, resulting in serious facial scarring; the

Your very assured, loving Mistress and Friend,

M. Sidney.

Lady Mary Sidney to Edmund Molyneux, Esq;

You have used the matter very well; but we must do more yet for the good dear lord than let him thus be dealt withal. Hampton Court[6] I never yet knew so full, as there were not spare rooms in it, what it hath been thrice better filled than at this presen[7] it is. But some would be sorry, perhaps, my lord should have so sure footing in the court. Well, all may be as well when the good God will. The whilst, I pray let us do what we may for our lord's ease and quiet. Whereunto I think, if you go to my Lord Howard, and in my lord's name also move his lordship, to show his brother, my lord, as they call each other, to show him a cast of his office,[8] and that it shall not be known, and allege your former causes,[9] I think he will find out some place to serve that purpose; and also, if you go to Mr. Bowyer, the gentleman usher,[10] and tell him, his mother requireth him, which is myself, to help my lord with some on[11] room, but only for the dispatch of the multitude of Irish and Welsh people, that follow him;[12] and that you will give your word in my lord's behalf and mine, it shall not be accounted as a lodging, nor known of. I believe he will make what shift[13] he can; you must assure him it is but for the daytime for his business, as indeed it is for my brother's answer[14] of my stay here for five or six days; he knows I have ventured far already,[15] with so long absence, and am ill thought on for it, so as that may not be. But when the worst is known, old Lord Harry and his old Moll,[16] will do as well as the[y] can in parting

---

Queen was reportedly very fond of her, although she and Henry from the end of the 1560s onward were "increasingly embittered by what they regarded as shabby treatment at the Queen's hands," the nature of their accommodation at court being one of their complaints. Mary's court career (as a gentlewoman of the Queen's Privy Chamber) came to an end around 1579 on account of her poor health. See S. Adams, "Mary [née Dudley] Sidney, Lady Sidney," DNB online, 2005.

1 matters of dispatch urgent matters, requiring immediate action.

2 trusting to being able to rely upon.

3 dispatch prompt dealing with the business of.

4 hanged hung with tapestries, a common practice both to please the eye and keep out the cold; lined no appropriate OED definition, but the general sense is "to furnish."

5 stuff furniture and other necessaries for a room to be used for official state business; Lady Mary makes it clear that she does not expect to have the room furnished at the Queen's household's expense.

6 Hampton Court one of the most important of Elizabeth's five palaces.

7 presen i.e., present time.

8 to show him a cast of his office the sense is "to remind him gently and discreetly of the power of his position."

9 I.e., presumably those reasons why Henry Sidney needs this room which Mary Sidney laid out in her earlier letter, above.

10 the gentleman usher the individual responsible for the assignment and maintenance of rooms at court.

11 on i.e., one.

12 a reference to the individuals who would be attending on Sir Henry Sidney in his office as lord deputy of Ireland and lord president of Wales, important administrative posts in Elizabeth's government.

13 shift attempt.

14 my brother's answer my brother's word or testimony.

15 I.e., I have seriously risked my position at court.

16 Harry … Moll in the period, common and affectionate nicknames for Henry and Mary, respectively.

like good friends, the small portion allotted our long service in court; which, as little as it is, seems something too much. And this being all I can say to the matter. Farewell, Mr. Ned. In haste, this Monday, 1578.

Your assured loving mistress and friend,

M. Sidney.

If all this will not serve, prove[1] Mr. Huggins, for I know my lord would not for no good be destitute in this time for some convenient place for his followers and friends to resort to him, which in this case[2] I am in, is not possible to be in my chamber, till after sunset; when the dear good lord, shall be as best becomes him, lord of his own.

[1] prove try.

[2] case i.e., situation; an oblique reference to Mary's condition as an invalid.

Mary Sidney Herbert, countess of Pembroke
1561-1621

In a letter chastising Mary Wroth for the publication of her sensational prose romance, Urania, Edward, Lord Denny, invokes a negative comparison with her aunt and namesake, Mary Sidney Herbert, "who translated so many godly books and especially the holy psalms of David, that no doubt now she sings in the choir of Heaven those divine meditations which being left us here on earth will beget her daily more and more glory in Heaven as others by whom shall be enlightened." This saintly reputation developed through her devotion to the preservation of the memory of her brother, Philip, and to their joint project of psalm translation. However, to view Mary Sidney solely as the literary heir to her brother is to ignore her varied literary and religious interests, as well as the considerable power she wielded in both spheres.

Mary Sidney was born at Tickenhall, on the Welsh border, and grew up in Ludlow Castle while her father Henry Sidney served as lord governor of the Marches of Wales. Although born at the geographical margin of the country, she and her three brothers and sister were also well-connected at court through their mother, Mary Dudley. The latter was the daughter of the earl of Northumberland who headed the Council of Regency in the latter part of the reign of Edward VI and sister to Elizabeth I's favourite, Robert Dudley, earl of Leicester. Mary Dudley was also a close friend of the Queen's, nursing her through a bout of smallpox from which she herself emerged badly scarred, and Henry Sidney had been a close friend and companion of Edward VI. The Sidney daughters received an excellent education that included study of Latin, French, and Italian language and literature. At 15, Mary Sidney became the third wife of Henry Herbert, earl of Pembroke, who was an ally of her father and uncle, the earl of Leicester, at Elizabeth's court. Together they had four children, Katherine, Anne, William, and Philip, although both daughters died by early adulthood.[1]

A combination of religio-political interest and personal crisis served as the impetus for Mary Sidney's entry into the world of letters. The Dudley family controlled more than two thirds of the land under Elizabeth I's rule, with the result that their interests had a significant influence over foreign policy.[2] As staunch reformists, they were strongly committed to the Protestant cause on the Continent and particularly concerned with the fate of the Huguenots—French Protestants on whose behalf they urged Elizabeth to intervene. It was in aid of the Protestants in the Low Countries that Sidney's elder brother, Philip, died in 1586 at Zutphen[3] from an infected wound incurred in a skirmish with the Spanish.

After his death, his sister patronized the production of a collection of elegies for him that included her own pastoral poem, "The Doleful Lay of Clorinda." Ongoing interest in Protestant politics found expression in Antonius, a translation of Robert Garnier's play, Marc Antonie (1578), a historical drama commenting on contemporary religious politics. Published with this work in 1592 was a translation of de Mornay's Discours de la vie et de la mort (1576), which was part of a programme of translation instituted by Philip Sidney to support de Mornay and the Huguenot cause. Through the 1590s, Mary Sidney functioned as a major literary patron, supporting a circle of writers that included Edmund Spenser, Samuel Daniel, Michael Drayton, Nicholas Breton, Thomas Nashe, Gabriel Harvey, Ben Jonson, and John Donne.

At the same time, in a move that combined the personal with the political, Mary Sidney took on the task of completing a translation of the Psalms that her brother had begun in 1584. Psalms have always had a place in Judeo-Christian worship, but were especially significant to Protestant reformers. After all, the Hebrew psalms themselves emphasize deliverance and vengeance, an orientation which allowed for any psalm that spoke of persecution of the godly, the righteous, or of Israel to be read as though it referred to Protestants.[4] At the same time the personal nature of the psalmist's voice in communication with God also made them highly attractive. In the 1530s, reformist-leaning court poet Clément Marot translated some of the Psalms into French in a variety of poetic forms and meters, creating a rage for

---

[1] See M. Hannay "Mary Sidney Herbert, Countess of Pembroke," DLB 167 (Detroit, 1996), pp. 184-93. For a detailed biography, see M. Hannay Philip's Phoenix (New York, 1990).

[2] M. Hannay, "'Princes you as men must dy': Genevan Advice to Monarchs in the Psalmes of Mary Sidney," English Literary Renaissance 19 (1989): p. 25.

[3] Ibid., p. 25.

[4] Hannay, "'Princes you as men must dy,'" p. 30.

them at the French court where Sir Henry Sidney, as a representative of Edward VI, encountered them. Sidney in turn brought the custom of psalm-singing, in both sacred and secular contexts, back to Edward's court. Marot's Huguenot psalter was continued after his death in 1544 by Théodore de Bèze who completed it in 1563, by which point Henry Sidney had returned to the French court as a representative of Elizabeth I. The popularity of the Marot-de Bèze psalter was such that approximately sixty editions were published by 1565. In England a tradition of Protestant psalm translation dated back to Miles Coverdale's Goostly Psalms (1530) and Thomas Wyatt's versification of the seven penitential psalms,[1] both of which attempted to replicate the courtly popularity of Marot's work. However, the translation that gained the greatest popularity was Sternhold and Hopkins' metrical psalms. This version was adopted by the English Calvinists in Geneva and consisted of verses in the familiar and comfortable ballad stanza (i.e., a four-stress line followed by a three-stress line), which could be sung to popular tunes. Appearing in 280 editions by 1640,[2] Sternhold and Hopkins became the unofficial psalter of the English Church, despite its monotonous rhythm and exceedingly plain language.

Around 1590, Mary Sidney began her revision and completion of the psalm translation begun by her brother, Philip. Both she and her brother made use of commentaries on the Hebrew, particularly those by Calvin and other Continental writers, as well as the Marot-de Bèze psalter and Coverdale's prose translation from the 1539 Great Bible. Through the unprecedented 128 verse forms used in her 107 translations[3] Mary Sidney attempted to convey the complexities of the original Hebrew versification. The manuscript was completed about 1599, at which point Sidney prepared a presentation copy prefaced by two original dedicatory poems, "Even Now That Care" and "To the Angel Spirit of the Most Excellent Sir Philip Sidney," in anticipation of Elizabeth I's proposed visit to her house at Wilton.[4] While the visit never materialized, the Tixall manuscript draws together Sidney's dual commitment to the memory of her brother and the advancement of Protestant concerns.

In the last 20 years of her life, however, while letters indicate that she continued to write in some fashion and remained active at court until close to the time of her death from smallpox, both Mary Sidney Herbert's literary patronage and political activities were largely taken over by her sons.

EDITIONS: "The Dolefull Lay of Clorinda." Colin Clouts come home againe. Edmund Spenser. London: William Ponsonby, 1595. STC 23077. Gir-Giiv; "E'en Now That Care." The Collected Works of Mary Sidney Herbert, Countess of Pembroke. Vol. 1. Ed. Margaret P. Hannay, Noel J. Kinnamon, and Michael G. Brennan. Oxford: Clarendon P, 1998, pp. 102-04; "To the Angell Spirit of the most excellent, S. Phillip Sidney." The whole workes of Samuel Daniel Esquire in poetrie. London: Nicholas Oakes for Simon Waterson, 1623. STC 6238. Mviiv-Mviiiv; "Dialogue between two shepherds, Thenot and Piers, in praise of Astraea, made by the excellent Lady, the Lady Mary Countess of Pembroke, at the Queen's Majesty's being at her house at Anno 15—." A poetical rapsody containing, diverse sonnets, odes, elegies, madrigalls, and other poesies, both in rime, and measured verse. Francis Davison. London: V. Simmes for J. Baily, 1602. STC 6373. B5r-B6r; "Psalms" 45, 49, 51, 57, 58, 72, 73, 82, 100, 139. British Library MS Additional 12047 (from microfilm).

[1] H. Smith, "English Metrical Psalms in the Sixteenth Century and their Literary Significance," Huntington Library Quarterly 9 (1946): pp. 260-62.

[2] Ibid., p. 251.

[3] Hannay, "Mary Sidney Herbert," p. 186.

[4] M. Brennan, "The Queen's Proposed Visit to Wilton House in 1599 and the 'Sidney Psalms,'" Sidney Journal 20 (2002): p. 28.

The Doleful Lay of Clorinda[1]

Ay me, to whom shall I my case complain,
That may compassion my impatient grief?
Or where shall I unfold my inward pain,
That my enriven[2] heart may find relief?
Shall I unto the heavenly powers it show?
Or unto earthly men that dwell below?

To heavens? Ah they, alas, the authors were,
And workers of my unremedied woe:
For they foresee what to us happens here,
And they foresaw, yet suffered this be so.
From them comes good, from them comes also ill,
That which they made, who can them warn to spill.

To men? Ah they, alas, like wretched be,
And subject to the heavens' ordinance:[3]
Bound to abide whatever they decree,
Their best redress, is their best sufferance.[4]
How then can they like wretched comfort me,
The which no less, need comforted to be?

Then to myself will I my sorrow mourn,
Sith none alive like sorrowful remains:
And to myself my plaints[5] shall back return,
To pay their usury[6] with doubled pains.
The woods, the hills, the rivers shall resound
The mournfull accent of my sorrow's ground.

Woods, hills and rivers now are desolate,
Sith he is gone the which them all did grace:
And all the fields do wail their widow state,
Sith death their fairest flower did late deface.
The fairest flower in field that ever grew,
Was Astrophel;[7] that was, we all may rew.

What cruel hand of cursed foe unknown,
Hath cropped the stalk which bore so fair a flower?
Untimely cropped, before it well were grown,
And clean defaced in untimely hour.
Great loss to all that ever him did see,
Great loss to all, but greatest loss to me.

Break now your garlands, O ye shepherds' lasses,
Sith the fair flower, which them adorned, is gone.
The flower, which them adorned, is gone to ashes.
Never again let lass put garland on.
Instead of garland, wear sad cypress[8] now,
And bitter elder, broken from the bow.

Ne[9] ever sing the love-lays[10] which he made,
Who ever made such lays of love as he?
Ne ever read the riddles, which he said
Unto yourselves, to make you merry glee.
Your merry glee is now laid all abed,
Your merry maker now, alas, is dead.

Death the devourer of all world's delight,
Hath robbed you and reft from me my joy:
Both you and me, and all the world he quite
Hath robbed of joyance,[11] and left sad annoy.
Joy of the world, and shepherd's pride was he,
Shepherd's hope never like again to see.

O death that hast us of such riches reft,
Tell us at least, what hast thou with it done?
What is become of him whose flower here left
Is but shadow of his likeness gone.
Scarce like the shadow of that which he was,
Nought like, but that he like a shade did pass.

But that immortal spirit, which was decked
With all the dowries of celestial grace,
By sovereign choice from th'heavenly quires[12] select,

---

[1] Contained in Edmund Spenser's Colin Clouts Come home againe (1595).
[2] enriven split, torn asunder.
[3] ordinance direction, regulation.
[4] sufferance endurance, forbearance.
[5] plaints lamentations, grieving.
[6] usury interest.
[7] Astrophel name of Philip Sidney's pastoral persona.
[8] cypress symbol of mourning.
[9] Ne nor.
[10] love-lays love songs.
[11] joyance delight, enjoyment.
[12] quires choirs.

And lineally derived from angel's race,
Oh, what is now of it become, aread.
Ay me, can so divine a thing be dead?

Ah no, it is not dead, ne can it die,
But lives for aye,[1] in blissful paradise,
Where like a new-born babe it soft doth lie,
In bed of lilies wrapped in tender wise.
And compassed all about with roses sweet,
And dainty violets from head to feet.

There thousand birds all of celestial brood,
To him do sweetly carol day and night;
And with strange notes, of him well understood,
Lull him asleep in angelic delight,
Whilest[2] in sweet dream to him presented be Immortal beauties, which no eye may see.

But he them sees and takes exceeding pleasure
Of their divine aspects, appearing plain,
And kindling love in him above all measure,
Sweet love still joyous, never feeling pain.
For what so goodly form he there doth see,
He may enjoy from jealous rancour[3] free.

There liveth he in everlasting bliss,
Sweet spirit never fearing more to die,
Ne dreading harm from any foes of his,
Ne fearing savage beasts' more cruelty.
Whilest we here wretches wail his private lack,
And with vain vows do often call him back.

But live thou there still happy, happy spirit,
And give us leave thee here thus to lament:
Not thee that dost thy heaven's joy inherit,
But our own selves that here in dole[4] are drent.[5]
Thus do we weep and wail, and wear our eyes,
Mourning in others, our own miseries.

—1595

[1] aye ever.
[2] Whilest meanwhile.
[3] rancour animosity, grudge.
[4] dole grief, sorrow.
[5] drent drowned.

Even Now that Care[6]

Even now that care which on thy crown attends
And with thy happy greatness daily grows
Tells me, thrice sacred Queen, my Muse offends,
And of respect to thee the line outgoes,
One instant will, or willing can she lose
I say not reading, but receiving rhymes,
On whom in chief dependeth to dispose
What Europe acts in these most active times?[7]

Yet dare I so, as humbleness may dare
Cherish some hope they shall acceptance find;
Not weighing less thy state, lighter thy care,
But knowing more thy grace, abler thy mind.
What heavenly powers thee highest throne assigned,
Assigned thee goodness suiting that degree;
And by thy strength thy burthen so defined,
To others toil, is exercise to thee.

Cares though still great, cannot be greatest still,
Business must ebb, though leisure never flow.
Then these the posts of duty and goodwill
Shall press to offer what their senders owe;
Which once in two, now in one subject go,
The poorer left, the richer reft away:
Who better might (oh might, ah word of woe.)
Have giv'n for me what I for him defray.

How can I name whom sighing sighs extend,
And not unstop my tears' eternal spring?
But he did warp, I weav'd this web to end;
The stuff not ours, our work no curious thing,
Wherein yet well we thought the Psalmist King[8]
Now English denizened,[9] though Hebrew born,
Would to thy music undispleased sing,
Oft having worse, without repining[10] worn;

[6] Even Now that Care This poem prefaces the Juel-Jensen, or Tixall, manuscript of the Sidney Psalms.
[7] One instant … most active times i.e., can she or will she, who governs Europe, lose an instant in receiving poems?
[8] Psalmist King David, king of Judea and author of the Psalms.
[9] denizened naturalized.
[10] repining fretting, complaining.

And I the cloth in both our names present,
A livery robe to be bestowed by thee:
Small parcel of that undischarged rent,
From which nor pains, nor payments can us free.
And yet enough to cause our neighbours see
We will our best, though scanted[1] in our will:
And those nigh fields where sow'n thy favours be Unwealthy do, not else unworthy till.

For in our work what bring we but thine own?
What English is, by many names is thine.
There humble laurels in thy shadows grown
To garland others would, themselves repine.
Thy breast the cabinet, thy seat the shrine,
Where Muses hang their vowed memories:
Where wit, where art, where all that is divine
Conceived best, and best defended lies.

Which if men did not (as they do) confess,
And wronging worlds would otherwise consent:
Yet here who minds so meet a patroness
For author's state or writing's argument?
A king should only to a queen be sent.
God's loved choice unto his chosen love:
Devotion to devotion's president:
What all applaud, to her whom none reprove.

And who sees ought, but sees how justly square
His haughty[2] ditties to thy glorious days?
How well beseeming thee his triumphs are?
His hope, his zeal, his prayer, plaint, and praise,
Needless thy person to their height to raise:
Less need to bend them down to thy degree:
These holy garments each good soul assays,
Some sorting all, all sort to none but thee.

For even thy rule is painted in his reign:
Both clear in right: both nigh by wrong oppressed:
And each at length (man crossing God in vain)
Possessed of place, and each in peace possessed.
Proud Philistines[3] did interrupt his rest,
The foes of Heaven no less have been thy foes;
He with great conquest, thou with greater blessed;
Thou sure to win, and he secure to lose.

Thus hand in hand with him thy glories walk:
But who can trace them where alone they go?
Of thee two hemispheres on honour talk,
And lands and seas thy trophies jointly show.
The very winds did on thy party blow,
And rocks in arms thy foe men eft defy:
But soft my Muse, thy pitch is earthly low;
Forbear this heaven, where only eagles fly.

Kings on a queen enforced their states to lay;
Mainlands for empire waiting on an isle;
Men drawn by worth a woman to obey;
One moving all, herself unmoved the while:
Truth's restitution, vanity exile,
Wealth sprung of want, war held without annoy,
Let subject be of some inspired style,
Till then the object of her subjects' joy.

Thy utmost can but offer to her sight
Her handmaid's task, which most her will endears;
And pray unto thy pains life from that light
Which lively lightsome court, and kingdom cheers,
What wish she may (far past her living peers
And rival still to Judah's faithful king)[4]
In more than he and more triumphant years,
Sing what God doth, and do what men may sing.

—1599

[1] scanted diminished, restricted.

[2] haughty elevated, lofty.

[3] Philistines alien warlike people, of uncertain origin, who occupied the S sea-coast of Palestine, and in early times constantly harassed the Israelites.

[4] Judah's faithful king King David.

To the Angel Spirit of the Most Excellent Sir Philip Sidney.[1]

To thee pure spirit, to thee alone addressed
Is this joint work, by double interest thine,
Thine by this own, and what is done of mine
Inspired by thee, thy secret power impressed.
My Muse with thine, itself dared to combine
As mortal stuff with that which is divine:
Let thy fair beams give lustre to the rest.

That Israel's king[2] may deign his own transformed
In substance no, but superficial tire:[3]
And English guised[4] in some sort may aspire
To better grace thee what the vulgar formed:
His sacred tones, age after age admire:
Nations grow great in pride, and pure desire
So to excel in holy rites performed.

Oh, had that soul which honour brought to rest
Too soon not left, and reft the world of all.
What man could show, which we perfection call,
This precious piece had sorted with the best.
But ah! wide festered[5] wounds that never shall
Nor must be closed, unto fresh bleeding fall,
Ah memory, what needs this new arrest.

Yet blessed grief, that sweetness can impart
Since thou art blest. Wrongly do I complain,
What ever weights my heavy thoughts sustain
Dear feels my soul for thee. I know my part
Nor be my weakness to thy rites a stain
Rites to aright, life, blood would not refrain:
Assist me then, that life what thine did part.

Time may bring forth, what time hath yet suppressed
In whom, thy loss hath laid to utter waste,
The wrack[6] of time, untimely all defaced,
Remaining as the tomb of life deceased:
Where, in my heart the highest room thou hast
There, truly there, thy earthly being is placed Triumph of death: in life how more than blessed.

Behold, oh that thou were now to behold,
This finished long perfections part begun
The rest but pieced, as left by thee undone,
Pardon blest soul, presumption overbold:
If love and zeal hath to this error run
'Tis zealous love, love that hath never dun,[7]
Nor can enough, though justly here controlled.

But since it hath no other scope to go,
Nor other purpose but to honour thee,
That thine may shine, where all the graces be;
And that my thoughts (like smallest streams that flow,
Pay to their sea their tributary[8] fee)
Do strive, yet have no means to quit[9] nor free,
That mighty debt of infinites I owe.

To thy great worth which time to times enroll,
Wonder of men, sole born, soul of thy kind,
Complete in all, but heavenly was thy mind,
For wisdom, goodness, sweetness, fairest soul:
Too good to wish, too fair for earth, refined
For Heaven, where all true glory rests confined:
And where but there no life without control.

O when from this accompt, this cast-up sum,
This reckoning made, the audit of my woe,
Some time of ease my swelling passions know,

---

[1] The following version of "To the Angel Spirit" is an earlier draft of the poem that appears in Mary Sidney's thoroughly revised version in the 1599 Juel-Jensen (Tixall) MS. For the 1599 revision, see Schleiner, Tudor and Stuart Women Writers, pp. 77-79; J.C.A. Rathmell, ed. The Psalms, pp. xxxv-xxxviii; and The Norton Anthology of English Literature: The Major Authors, 7th ed., vol. 1, ed. S. Greenblatt et. al., pp. 451-54; see also Norton's online version at <http://www.wwnorton.com/college/english/nael/noa/pdf/27636_16u35Pembroke.1_4.tp.pdf>.

[2] Israel's king King David.

[3] tire garb, ornament.

[4] guised dressed, disguised.

[5] festered rotted, putrified.

[6] wrack ruin, downfall.

[7] dun dulled.

[8] tributary both, a stream flowing into a larger stream or river and payment to an overseer.

[9] quit deliver, release.

How work my thoughts, my sense is stricken dumb
That would thee more than words could ever show,
Which all fall short. Who knew thee best do know
There lives no wit that may thy prayer become.

And rest fair monuments of thy fair fame,
Though not complete. Nor can we reach, in thought,
What on that goodly piece time would have wrought.
Had diverse so spared that life (but life) to frame
The rest: alas such loss the world hath nought
Can equal it, nor, o more grievance brought,
Yet what remains must ever crown thy name.

Receive these hymns, these obsequies[1] receive,
(If any mark of thy secret spirit thou bear)
Made only thine, and no name else must wear.
I can no more dear soul, I take my leave,
My sorrow strives to mount the highest sphere.

—composed, 1592; published, 1623

Dialogue between Two Shepherds, Thenot and Piers,[2] in Praise of Astraea,[3] Made by the Excellent Lady, the Lady Mary Countess of Pembroke, at the Queen's Majesty's Being at Her House at Anno 15—.[4]

Then. I sing divine Astraea's praise,
O Muses! help my wits to raise,
And heave my verses higher.

Piers. Thou needst the truth but plainly tell,
Which much I doubt thou canst not well,
Thou art so oft a liar.

Then. If in my song no more I show,
Than heaven, and earth, and sea do know,
Then truly I have spoken.

Piers. Sufficeth not no more to name,
But being no less, the like, the same,
Else laws of truth be broken.

Then. Then say, she is so good, so fair,
With all the earth she may compare,
Not Momus'[5] self denying.

Piers. Compare may think where likeness holds,
Nought like to her the earth enfolds,
I looked to find you lying.

Then. Astraea sees with wisdom's sight,
Astraea works by virtue's might,
And jointly both do stay in her.

Piers. Nay take from them, her hand, her mind,
The one is lame, the other blind,
Shall still you lying stain her?

Then. Soon as Astraea shows her face,
Straight every ill avoids the place,
And every good aboundeth.

Piers. Nay long before her face doth show,
The last doth come, the first doth go,
How loud this lie resoundeth!

Then. Astraea is our chiefest joy,
Our chiefest guard against annoy,
Our chiefest wealth, our treasure.

Piers. Where chiefest are, three others be,
To us none else but only she;
When wilt thou speak in measure?

Then. Astraea may be justly said,
A field in flowery robe arrayed,
In season freshly springing.

---

[1] obsequies funeral rites.

[2] Thenot and Piers names frequently used for the speakers in pastoral dialogue. Both names appear in Spenser's Shepheardes Calender.

[3] Astraea goddess of justice in classical mythology who abandoned the earth when it entered its sinful Iron Age and whose return will herald the return of the Golden Age and its perpetual spring. She functions here and elsewhere as a figure for Elizabeth I (Spenser Encycl.).

[4] Queen's Majesty's … Anno 15— a projected state visit of Elizabeth I to Wilton in 1599, which never took place.

[5] Momus son of Night, grumbler and constant critic of the actions of the gods.

Piers. That spring endures but shortest time,
This never leaves Astraea's clime,
Thou liest, instead of singing.

Then. As heavenly light that guides the day,
Right so doth thine each lovely ray,
That from Astraea flyeth.
Piers. Nay, darkness oft that light enclouds,
Astraea's beams no darkness shrouds;
How loudly Thenot lieth!

Then. Astraea rightly term I may,
A manly palm, a maiden bay,
Her verdure[1] never dying.
Piers. Palm oft is crooked, bay is low,
She still upright, still high doth grow,
Good Thenot leave thy lying.

Then. Then Piers, of friendship tell me why,
My meaning true, my words should lie,
And strive in vain to raise her.
Piers. Words from conceit[2] do only rise,
Above conceit her honour flies;
But silence, nought can praise her.

—composed, c. 1599?; published, 1623

from Psalms

Psalm 45
Eructavit cor meum

My heart indicts[3] an argument of worth,
The praise of him that doth the sceptre sway:
My tongue the pen to paint his praises forth,
Shall write as swift, as swiftest writer may.
Then to the king these are the word I say:
Fairer art thou than sons of mortal race:
Because high God hath blessed thee for aye,[4]
Thy lips, as springs, do flow with speaking grace.

Thy honour's sword gird[5] to thy mighty side,
O thou that dost all things in might excel
With glory prosper, on with triumph ride,
Since justice, truth, and meekness with thee dwell.
So that right hand of thine shall teaching tell
Such things to thee, as well may terror bring,
And terror such, as never erst befell
To mortal minds at sight of mortal king.

Sharp are thy shafts to cleave their hearts in twain
Whose heads do cast thy conquests to withstand,
Good cause to make the meaner people fain[6]
With willing hearts to undergo thy hand.
Thy throne, O God, doth never-falling stand.
Thy sceptre ensign[7] of thy kingly might,
To righteousness is linked with such a band,
That righteous hand still holds thy sceptre right.

Justice in love, in hate thou holdest wrong,
This makes that God, whoso doth hate and love,
Glad-making oil, that oil on thee hath flung,
Which thee exalts thine equals far above.
The fragrant riches of Sabean[8] grove
Myrrh, aloes, casia,[9] all thy robes do smell;
When thou from ivory palace dost remove
Thy breathing odours all thy train excel.

Daughters of kings among thy courtly band,
By honouring thee of thee do honour hold.
On thy right side thy dearest queen doth stand
Richly arrayed in cloth of Ophir[10] gold.
O daughter hear what now to thee is told;
Mark what thou hear'st, and what thou mark'st obey;
Forget to keep in memory enrolled
The house, and folk, where first thou sawest the day.

---

1 verdure greenness.
2 conceit idea, conception.
3 indicts proclaims, declares.
4 aye ever.
5 gird fasten with a belt.
6 fain glad.
7 ensign sign, standard.
8 Sabean group of Arab tribes who produced incense from the gummy sap of the almug tree.
9 Myrrh, aloes, cassia all fragrances (i.e., the gum resin used in incense, fragrant plants, tree with aromatic bark).
10 Ophir name of a place or region mentioned in the Old Testament, where fine gold was obtained.

So in the king, thy king, a dear delight
Thy beauty shall both breed, and bred, maintain,
For only he on thee hath lordly right,
Him only thou with awe must entertain.
Then unto thee both Tyrus[1] shall be fain
Presents present, and richest nations moe,[2]
With humble suit thy royal grace to gain,
To thee shall do such homage as they owe.

This queen that can a king her father call,
Doth only she in upper garment shine?
Nay under clothes, and what she weareth all,
Gold is the stuff the fashion art divine,
Brought to the king in robe embroidered fine,
Her maids of honour shall on her attend:
With such, to whom more favour shall assign
In nearer place their happy days to spend.

Brought shall they be with mirth and marriage joy,
And enter so the palace of the king:
Then let no grief thy mind, O queen, annoy,
Nor parents left thy sad remembrance sting.
Instead of parents, children thou shalt bring,
Of partaged[3] earth the kings and lords to be.
Myself thy name in lasting verse will sing,
The world shall make no end of thanks to thee.

Psalm 49
Audite haec omnes.

World-dwellers all give heed to what I say,
To all I speak, to rich, poor, high, and low;
Knowledge the subject is my heart conceives,
Wisdom the words shall from my mouth proceed,
Which I will measure by melodious ear
And riddled speech to tuned harp accord.

The times of evil why should they me dismay,
When mischief shall my footsteps overflow?
And first from him whom fickle wealth deceives,
Which his though great vain confidence doth breed
Since no man can his brother's life out-bear
Nor yield for him his ransom to the Lord.

For dear the price that for a soul must pay,
And death his prisoner never will forgo.
Nay tell me whom but longer time he leaves
Respited[4] from the tomb for treasure's meed?[5]
Sure at his summons, wise and fools appear,
And others spend the riches they did hoard.

A second thinks his house shall not decay,
Nor time his glorious buildings overthrow,
Named proudly of his name, where folly reaves
Exalted men of sense, and they indeed
A brutish life and death, as beasts they were,
Do live and die of whom is no record.

And these, whose race applaud their words and way,
Death in the grave his carrion food doth stow
And lo, the first succeeding light perceives
The just installed in the great man's stead.
Nay far his prince, when once that lovely cheer
Lovely in house, in earth becomes abhorred.

But God, my God, to intercept the prey
Of my life from the grave shall not foreslow,[6]
For he it is, he only me receives:
Then though one rich becomes, though honour's seed
Spring with increase, yet stand thou free from fear,
Of all his pomp death shall him nought afford.

Please they themselves, and think at happiest stay
Who please themselves, yet to their fathers go
Shall they, and they are dead, for folly reaves

[1] Tyrus land adjacent to Israel known for its seafaring and trade.
[2] moe more.
[3] partaged divided into parts.
[4] Respited delayed, postponed.
[5] meed reward.
[6] foreslow delay, hinder.

Exalted men of sense, and such indeed
A brutish life and death, as beasts they were,
Do live, and die, of whom is no record.

Psalm 51
Miserere mei Deus

O Lord, whose grace no limits comprehend;
Sweet Lord, whose mercies stand from measure free;
To me that grace, to me that mercy send,
And wipe, O Lord, my sins from sinful me.
Oh cleanse, oh wash my foul iniquity;
Cleanse still my spots, still wash away my stainings,
Till stains and spots in me leave no remainings.

For I, alas, acknowledging do know
My filthy fault, my faulty filthiness
To my soul's eye incessantly doth show
Which done to thee, to thee I do confess,
Just judge, true witness, that for righteousness
Thy doom may pass against my guilt awarded,
Thy evidence for truth may be regarded.

My mother, lo, when I began to be,
Conceiving me, with me did sin conceive,
And as with living heat she cherished me
Corruption did like cherishing receive.
But lo, thy love to purest good doth cleave,
And inward truth, which hardly else discerned,
My truant soul in thy hid school hath learned.

Then as thyself to lepers hast assigned,
With hyssop,[1] Lord, thy hyssop, purge me so
And that shall cleanse the leapry[2] of my mind.
Make over me thy mercy's streams to flow,
So shall my whiteness scorn the whitest snow.
To ear and heart send sounds and thoughts of gladness,
That bruised bones may dance away their sadness.

Thy ill-pleas'd eye from my misdeeds avert;
Cancel the registers my sins contain;
Create in me a pure, clean, spotless heart;
Inspire a sprite[3] where love of right may reign.
Ah! cast me not from thee; take not again
Thy breathing grace; again thy comfort send me,
And let the guard of thy free sprite attend me.

So I to them a guiding hand will be,
Whose faulty feet have wandered from thy way
And turned from sin will make return to thee,
Whom, turn'd from thee, sin erst[4] had led astray.
O God, God of my health, oh, do away
My bloody crime. So shall my tongue be raised
To praise thy truth, enough cannot be praised.

Unlock my lips, shut up with sinfull shame;
Then shall my mouth, O Lord, thy honour sing.
For bleeding fuel for thy altar's flame,
To gain thy grace what boots it me to bring?
Burnt-offerings are to thee no pleasant thing.
The sacrifice that God will hold respected
Is the heart-broken soul, the sprite dejected.

Lastly, O Lord, how so I stand or fall,
Leave not thy loved Sion[5] to embrace,
But with thy favour build up Salem's wall,[6]
And still in peace, maintain that peaceful place.
Then shalt thou turn a well-accepting face
To sacred fires with offered gifts perfumed,
Till even whole calves on altars be consumed.

[1] hyssop small bushy aromatic herb.
[2] leapry leprosy.
[3] sprite spirit.
[4] erst first.
[5] Sion Jerusalem.
[6] Salem's Wall i.e., city wall of Jerusalem.

Psalm 57
Miserere mei Deus

Thy mercy Lord, Lord now thy mercy show,
On thee I lie,
To thee I fly.
Hide me, hive[1] me, as thine own,
Till these blasts be overblown,
Which now do fiercely blow.

To highest God I will erect my cry,
Who quickly shall
Dispatch this all.
He shall down from Heaven send
From disgrace me to defend
His love and verity.[2]

My soul encaged lies with lion's brood,
Villains whose hands
Are fiery brands,
Teeth more sharp than shaft or spear,
Tongues far better edge do bear
Than swords to shed my blood.

As high as highest heaven can give thee place
O Lord ascend,
And thence extend
With most bright, most glorious show
Over all the earth below
The sunbeams of thy face.

Me to entangle every way they go,
Their trap and net
Is ready set.
Holes they dig but their own holes
Pitfalls make for their own souls,
So Lord, oh serve them so.

My heart prepared; prepared is my heart
To spread thy praise
With tuned lays.

Wake my tongue, my lute awake,
Thou my harp the consort make,
Myself will bear a part.

Myself when first the morning shall appear,
With voice and string
So will thee sing,
That this earthly globe, and all
Treading on this earthly ball,
My praising notes shall hear.

For God, my only God, thy gracious love
Is mounted far
Above each star.
Thy unchanged verity
Heavenly wings do lift as high
As clouds have room to move.

As high as highest heaven can give thee place
O Lord ascend
And thence extend
With most bright most glorious show
Over all the earth below,
The sunbeams of thy face.

Psalm 58
Si vere utique

And call ye this to utter what is just,
You that of justice hold the sovereign throne?
And call ye this to yield, O sons of dust,
To wronged brethren every man his own?
Oh no, it is your long malicious will
Now to the world to make by practice known
With whose oppression you the balance fill,
Just to yourselves, indifferent else to none.

But what could they, who even in birth declined
From truth and right to lies and injuries?
To show the venom of their cankered[3] mind,
The adder's image scarcely can suffice.

[1] hive shelter.
[2] verity truth.
[3] cankered infected.

Nay scarce the aspick[1] may with them contend,
On whom the charmer all in vain applies
His skillfulest spells, aye[2] missing of his end,
While she, self-deaf and unaffected, lies.

Lord crack their teeth, Lord crush these lions' jaws,
So let them sink as water in the sand.
When deadly bow their aiming fury draws,
Shiver[3] the shaft ere[4] past the shooter's hand.
So make them melt as the dishoused snail
Or as the embryo, whose vital band[5]
Breaks ere it holds, and formless eyes do fail
To see the sun, though brought to lightful land.

Oh, let their brood, a brood of springing thorns,
Be by untimely rooting overthrown
Ere bushes waxed,[6] they push with pricking horns,
As fruits yet green are of by tempest blown.
The good with gladness this revenge shall see,
And bathe his feet in blood of wicked one,
While all shall say: the just rewarded be.
There is a God that carves to each his own.

Psalm 72
Deus Judicium

Teach the king's son, who king himself shall be,
Thy judgments Lord, thy justice make him learn
To rule thy realm as justice shall decree,
And poor men's right in judgment to discern.
Then fearless peace
With rich increase
The mountains proud shall fill,
And justice shall Make plenty fall
On every humble hill.

He shall the weak support, th'oppressed relieve,
Supply the poor, the quarrel-pickers quail,[7]
So ageless ages shall thee reverence give,
Till eyes of heaven, the sun and moon, shall fail.
And thou again
Shalt blessings rain,
Which down shall mildly flow,
As showers thrown
On meads[8] new mown
Whereby they freshly grow.

During his rule the just shall aye be green,
And peaceful plenty join with plenteous peace.
All while sad night the many-formed queen[9]
Decreased shall grow, and grown again decrease.
From sea to sea
He shall survey
All kingdoms as his own:
And from the trace
Of Physon's race,[10]
As far as land is known.

The desert-dwellers at his beck[11] shall bend;
His foes them suppliant at his feet shall fling;
The kings of Tharsis[12] homage gifts shall send;
So Seba, Saba,[13] every island king.
Nay all, even all,
Shall prostrate[14] fall,
That crowns and sceptres wear,
And all that stand
At their command,
That crowns and sceptres bear.

For he shall hear the poor when they complain;
And lend them help, who helpless are oppressed.

---

1 aspick asp.
2 aye ever.
3 Shiver break, split.
4 ere before.
5 vital band umbilical cord.
6 waxed grew.
7 quail cower.
8 meads meadows.
9 many-formed queen i.e., the moon.
10 Physon's race i.e., Egyptians. Physon is another name for Ptolemy, king of Egypt.
11 beck will, command.
12 Tharsis Tarshish, a land associated with merchants, trade, and ships in the Old Testament.
13 Seba, Saba Seba and Sheba, biblical lands associated with Africa.
14 prostrate facedown.

His mercy shall the needy sort sustain;
  His force shall free their lives that live distressed.
From hidden sleight,[1]
  From open might
    He shall their souls redeem.
  His tender eyes
  Shall dearly prize,
    And highly their blood esteem.

So shall he long, so shall he happy live;
  Health shall abound, and wealth shall never want.
They gold to him, Arabia gold, shall give,
  Which scantness dear, and dearness maketh scant.
    They still shall pray
    That still he may
      So live, and flourish so.
    Without his praise
    No nights, no days,
      Shall passport have to go.

Look how the woods, where interlaced trees
  Spread out their arms each other to embrace,
Join at the head, though distant at the knees,
  Waving with wind, and lording on the place.
    So woods of corn
    By mountains born
      Shall on their shoulders wave:
    And men shall pass
    The numbrous grass,
      Such store each town shall have.

Look how the sun, so shall his name remain,
  As that in light, so this in glory one,
All glories that, at this all lights shall stain,
  Nor that shall fail, nor this be overthrown.
    The dwellers all
    Of earthy ball
      In him shall hold them blest,
    As one that is
    Of perfect bliss
      A pattern to the rest.

O God who art, from whom all beings be;
  Eternal Lord, whom Jacob's stock[2] adore,
All wondrous works are done by only thee,
  Blessed be thou, most blessed evermore.
    And let thy name,
    Thy glorious fame,
      No end of blessing know:
    Let all this round
    Thy honour sound,
      So Lord, Oh, be it so.

Psalm 73
Quam bonus Israel

It is most true that God to Israel,
I mean to men of undefiled hearts,
Is only good, and nought but good imparts.
Most true, I see, albeit, almost I fell
From right conceit[3] into a crooked mind
And from this truth with straying steps declined.
For lo, my boiling breast did chafe and swell
When first I saw the wicked proudly stand,
Prevailing still in all they took in hand
And sure no sickness dwelleth where they dwell.
Nay so they guarded are with health and might,
It seems of them death dares not claim his right.

They seem as privileged from others' pain;
The scourging plagues, which on their neighbours fall,
Torment not them, nay touch them not at all.
Therefore with pride, as with a gorgeous chain,
Their swelling neck encompassed they bear,
All clothed in wrong, as if a robe it were,
So fat become, that fatness doth constrain
Their eyes to swell, and if they think on ought,[4]
Their thought they have, yea have beyond their thought.

[1] sleight deceit, trickery.

[2] Jacob's stock descendants of Jacob, son of Isaac and Rebekah and divinely chosen heir of God's promise to make from the seed of Abraham a great nation (i.e., the chosen people).

[3] conceit conception, understanding.

[4] ought anything.

They wanton grow, and in malicious vein
Talking of wrong, pronounce as from the skies,
So high a pitch their proud presumption flies.

Nay Heaven itself, high Heaven, escapes not free
From their base mouths, and in their common talk
Their tongues no less than all the earth do walk.
Wherefore even godly men, when so they see
Their horn of plenty freshly flowing still,
Leaning to them, bend from their better will.
And thus, they reasons frame: how can it be
That God doth understand? that he doth know,
Who sits in Heaven, how earthly matters go?
See here the godless crew, while godly we
Unhappy pine, all happiness possess:
Their riches more, our wealth still growing less.

Nay even within myself, myself did say
In vain my heart I purge, my hands in vain
In cleanness washed I keep from filthy stain,
Since thus afflictions scourge[1] me every day:
Since never a day from early east is sent,
But brings my pain, my check,[2] my chastisement.
And shall I then these thoughts in words bewray?[3]
Oh let me, Lord, give never such offence
To children thine that rest in thy defence.
So then I turned my thoughts another way,
Sounding, if I this secret's depth might find,
But cumbrous[4] clouds my inward sight did blind.

Until at length nigh weary of the chase,
Unto thy house I did my steps direct.
There, lo, I learned what end did these expect,
And what; but that in high, but slippery place,
Thou didst them set; whence, when they least of all
To fall did fear, they fell with headlong fall.
For how are they in less than moment's space
With ruin overthrown? with frightful fear
Consumed so clean, as if they never were?
Right as a dream, which waking doth deface,
So, Lord, most vain thou dost their fancies make
When thou dost them from careless sleep awake.

Then for what purpose was it? to what end
For me to fume with malcontented heart,
Tormenting so in me each inward part?
I was a fool (I can it not defend)
So quite deprived of understanding might,
That as a beast I bear me in thy sight.
But as I was, yet did I still attend,
Still follow thee, by whose upholding-hand,
When most I slide, yet still upright I stand.
Then guide me still, then still upon me spend
The treasures of thy sure advice, until
Thou take me hence into thy glory's hill.

Oh, what is he will teach me climb the skies?
With thee, thee good, thee goodness to remain
No good on earth doth my desires detain.
Often my mind, and oft my body tries
Their weak defects, but thou, my God, thou art
My endless lot, and fortress of my heart.
The faithless fugitives who thee despise,
Shall perish all, they all shall be undone,
Who leaving thee to whorish idols run.
But as for me, nought better in my eyes
Than cleave to God, my hopes in him to place,
To sing his works while breath shall give me space.

Psalm 82
Deus stetit

Where poor men plead at princes' bar,
Who gods (as God's vicegerents) are,
The God of gods hath his tribunal pight,[5]
Adjudging right,
Both to the judge and judged wight.

[1] scourge beat, flog.
[2] check stop, restraint.
[3] bewray betray, reveal.
[4] cumbrous oppressive, obstructive.
[5] pight pitched.

How long will ye just doom neglect?
How long sayeth he, bad men respect?
You should his own unto the helpless give,
The poore relieve,
Ease him with right, whom wrong doth grieve.

You should the fatherless defend;
You should unto the weak extend
Your hand, to loose and quit[1] his estate[2]
Through lewd[3] men's hate
Entangled now in deep debate.

This should you do, but what do ye?
You nothing know, you nothing see:
No light, no law. Fie,[4] fie, the very ground
Becomes unsound,
So right, wrong, all, your faults confound.

Indeed to you the style I gave
Of gods, and sons of God, to have,
But err not princes, you as men must die.
You that sit high,
Must fall, and low, as others lie.

Since men are such, O God arise.
Thyself most strong, most just, most wise,
Of all the earth king, judge, disposer be,
Since to decree
Of all the earth belongs to thee.

Psalm 100
Jubilate Deo

O all you lands the treasures of your joy
In merry shout upon the Lord bestow.
Your service cheerfully on him employ
With triumph song into his presence go.
Know first that he is God, and after know
This God did us, not we ourselves, create.
We are his flock, for us his feedings grow;
We are his folk, and he upholds our state.

With thankfulness, oh enter then his gate;
Make through each porch of his your praises ring.
All good, all grace, of his high name relate;
He of all grace and goodness is the spring.
Time in no terms his mercy comprehends;
From age to age his truth itself extends.

Psalm 139
Domine probasti

O Lord in me there lieth nought,[5]
But to thy search revealed lies:
For when I sit
Thou markest it;
No less thou notest when I rise.
Yea, closest closet of my thought
Hath open windows to thine eyes.

Thou walkest with me when I walk.
When to my bed for rest I go,
I find thee there,
And everywhere.
Not youngest thought in me doth grow,
No not one word I cast to talk,
But yet unuttered thou dost know.

If forth I march, thou goest before;
If back I turn, thou comest behind;
So forth nor back
Thy guard I lack,
Nay on me too, thy hand I find.
Well I thy wisdom may adore,
But never reach with earthy mind.

To shun thy notice, leave thine eye
Oh whither might I take my way?
To starry sphere?
Thy throne is there.
To dead men's undelightsome stay?
There is thy walk, and there to lie
Unknown, in vain I should assay.[6]

---

1 quit deliver, release.
2 estate condition.
3 lewd common, low.
4 Fie exclamation expressing disgust or indignant reproach.
5 nought nothing.
6 assay try, test.

O sun, whom light nor flight can match,
Suppose thy lightful, flightful wings
Thou lend to me,
And I could flee
As far as thee the evening brings,
Even led to west he would me catch,
Nor should I lurk with western things.

Do thou thy best, O secret night,
In sable veil to cover me.
Thy sable[1] veil
Shall vainly fail;
With day unmasked my night shall be.
For night is day, and darkness light,
O father of all lights, to thee.

Each inmost piece in me is thine;
While yet I in my mother dwelt,
All that me clad
From thee I had.
Thou in my frame hast strangely dealt;
Needs in my praise thy works must shine
So inly them my thoughts have felt.

Thou, how my back was beam-wise[2] laid,
And raftering of my ribs dost know,
Know'st every point
Of bone and joint,
How to this whole these parts did grow,
In brave embroidery fair arrayed,
Though wrought in shop both dark and low.

Nay fashionless, ere[3] form I took,
Thy all and more beholding eye
My shapeless shape
Could not escape.
All these, with times appointed by,
Ere one had being, in the book
Of thy foresight, enrolled did lie.

My God, how I these studies prize,
That do thy hidden workings show,
Whose sum is such,
No sum so much,
Nay summed as sand they sumless grow.
I lie to sleep, from sleep I rise,
Yet still in thought with thee I go.

My God, if thou but one would'st kill,
Then straight would leave my further chase
This cursed brood
Inured[4] to blood,
Whose graceless taunts at thy disgrace
Have aimed oft, and hating still
Would, with proud lies, thy truth outface.[5]

Hate not I them, who thee do hate?
Thine, Lord, I will the censure be.
Detest I not,
The cankered[6] knot,
Whom I against thee banded[7] see?
O Lord, thou knowst in highest rate
I hate them all as foes to me.

Search me, my God, and prove my heart;
Examine me, and try my thought,
And mark in me
If ought there be
That hath with cause their anger wrought.
If not (as not) my life's each part,
Lord, safely guide from danger brought.

—completed by 1599

[1] sable black.
[2] beam-wise like a roof-beam.
[3] ere before.
[4] Inured accustomed, habituated.
[5] outface deny boldly, contradict.
[6] cankered infected.
[7] banded united.

Richard Barnfield
1574-1620

Born into the Shropshire gentry, Richard Barnfield was raised by his aunt Elizabeth, his mother having died when Barnfield was a young boy. After taking his BA (Brasenose College, Oxford) in 1592, Barnfield may have entered Grey's Inn to study law. Soon after, he began to publish verse: Greene's Funerals (1594);[1] The Affectionate Shepherd (1594); Cynthia, With Certain Sonnets and the Legend of Cassandra (1595); and a 1598 collection of four verse pamphlets issued together in one volume—"The Encomium of Lady Pecunia," "The Complaint of Poetry for the Death of Liberality," "The Combat Between Conscience and Covetousness," and "Poems in Divers Humours." Two of the "Poems in Divers Humours" were long attributed to Shakespeare. Little else is known about Barnfield. There is evidence, however, that he was a friend of some contemporary poets and editors, including Thomas Watson, Michael Drayton, and Francis Meres. Although Barnfield has long been thought to have died in 1627 (on the basis of a will signed with that name), a recent critic has suggested that this will is more likely that of his father.[2] In fact it seems that Barnfield "[had] been disinherited by his father twenty years earlier," and we know nothing about his circumstances when he died in February 1620 at the age of 46.[3]

The love of the shepherd Daphnis for a beautiful boy clearly caused some objections at the time of publication, since Barnfield justifies the sexual innocence of this relationship in his prefatory letter to Cynthia (printed below). However, the truly scandalous aspect of The Affectionate Shepherd perhaps lay in the connections between the volume's characters and contemporary individuals.[4] The nature of the poem's topical allusions remains very much in dispute,[5] and recent critics have pointed out that only the identification of Barnfield as Daphnis is certain.[6]

Evaluations of Barnfield's verse have changed considerably over the past four hundred years. While Frances Meres lavished praise on the verse's poetic virtues (ranking it with that of Spenser and Sidney), C.S. Lewis and others have contemptuously dismissed both its technical merits and homoerotic subject matter. Although Barnfield's homoerotic themes distressed most eighteenth-, nineteenth-, and early twentieth-century critics, more recent criticism has explored among other things Barnfield's homoerotic transformation of the Petrarchan tradition, the sonnet sequence, and the pastoral eclogue.

EDITIONS: The affectionate shepheard. London: Printed by John Danter for T. G[ubbin] and E. N[ewman], 1594. STC 1480; Cynthia With certaine sonnets. London: Humfrey Lownes, 1595. STC 1484.

[1] For the controversy over the volume's authorship and a convincing argument for its attribution to Barnfield, see G. Klawitter, ed., Richard Barnfield: The Complete Poems (Selinsgrove, 1990), pp. 26-29.

[2] The notion that Barnfield retired from the life of a publishing poet and settled down as an affluent country gentleman in Staffordshire is largely based on the misattribution of this will.

[3] S. Massai, "Richard Barnfield," DNB online, 2005.

[4] See "Penelope Devereux as Sidney's Stella," Huntington Library Bulletin 7 (April 1935): pp. 89-129.

[5] In 1935, H.H. Hudson suggested that Queen Guendolen represented Lady Penelope Rich; the Old Man, Guendolen's husband, Lord Rich; the Youth, her devoted admirer, Sir Philip Sidney; Ganymede, Guendolen's unrequited lover, Sir Charles Blount, Penelope Rich's extra-marital lover; and Daphnis, the unrequited lover of Ganymede, Barnfield himself.

[6] For a detailed account of the controversy, as well as alternate identifications for the poem's main characters, see L. Daughtery, "The Question of Topical Allusion in Richard Barnfield's Pastoral Verse," The Affectionate Shepherd: Celebrating Richard Barnfield (Selinsgrove, 2001), pp. 45-61; and in the same volume, G. Klawitter, "Barnfield's Penelope Devereux, Exalted and Reviled," pp. 62-82.

from The Affectionate Shepherd. Containing the Complaint of Daphnis[1] for the Love of Ganymede.[2]

To the Right Excellent and Most Beautiful Lady, the Lady Penelope Rich[3]

Fair lovely lady, whose angelic eyes
Are vestal[4] candles of sweet beauty's treasure,
Whose speech is able to enchant the wise,
Converting joy to pain, and pain to pleasure;
Accept this simply toy[5] of my soul's duty,
Which I present unto thy matchless beauty.

And albeit the gift be all too mean,[6]
Too mean an off'ring for thine ivory shrine;
Yet must thy beauty my just blame sustean,[7]
Since it is mortal, but thyself divine.
Then, noble lady, take in gentle worth[8]
This new-born babe which here my Muse brings forth.

Your Honour's most affectionate and perpetually devoted shepherd, Daphnis.

The Tears of an Affectionate Shepherd Sick for Love. Or, The Complaint of Daphnis for the Love of Ganymede

Scarce had the morning star[9] hid from the light
Heaven's crimson canopy with stars bespangled,
But I began to rue[10] th'unhappy sight
Of that fair boy that had my heart entangled;
Cursing the time, the place, the sense, the sin;
I came, I saw, I viewed, I slipped in.

If it be sin to love a sweet-faced boy,
(Whose amber locks trussed up in golden trammels[11]
Dangle adown his lovely cheeks with joy,
When pearl and flowers his fair hair enamels)
If it be sin to love a lovely lad,
Oh then sin I, for whom my soul is sad.

His ivory-white and alabaster skin
Is stained throughout with rare vermillion red,
Whose twinkling starry lights do never blin[12]

---

1 Daphnis a popular name for shepherds in pastoral poetry, Daphnis is credited in the classical tradition with inventing this genre; he appears in Theocritus and Virgil (Virgil's "Eclogue V" mourns Daphnis' death and celebrates his deification; see Eclogues, Georgics, Aeneid I-VI). See also Longus' third-century pastoral romance, Daphnis and Chloe. On Ganymede, see p. 762, note 3.

2 The title page contains the Latin epigram "Amor plus mellis, quam fellis, est" (Love has more honey than gall [i.e., Love is more sweet than bitter]). Cf. p. 766, note 1.

3 Lady Penelope Rich (née Devereux) (1563-1607), noblewoman, famous for her beauty and her skill in languages. Many writers (such as Sidney and Henry Constable) dedicated works to her and/or celebrated her in prose and verse, acknowledging her power and influence in Tudor court society. There were preliminary marital negotiations between Penelope's father and the Sidney family, which came to nothing. This was an unfortunate outcome since by all accounts Sidney fell in love with her when he finally met her at court in 1581. Sidney's sonnet sequence Astrophil and Stella (see above, pp. 677-86) supposedly represents his unrequited love for her, with Penelope shadowed in the figure of "Stella." Penelope married Robert Rich (1559?-1619), later first earl of Warwick, in late 1581 (A. Wall, "Rich [née Devereux], Penelope, Lady Rich," DNB online). Although she bore her husband five children by 1590, she refused to retire from court to the country-side where her husband preferred to live, and her career at court included an extra-marital affair with the courtier Sir Charles Blount (1563-1606). This affair was common knowledge at the time, although it does not seem to have occasioned any public estrangement from her husband, and it resulted in six illegitimate children, the first born in 1592 (A. Wall, "Rich [née Devereux], Penelope, Lady Rich," DNB online). See headnote, p. 676, above.

4 vestal chaste, pure, virginal.

5 toy fantastic or trifling speech or piece of writing; a trifle.

6 mean inferior.

7 sustean sustain.

8 take in gentle worth take kindly or charitably.

9 morning star the planet Venus which appears in the eastern sky at or just before sunrise; named for the goddess of love.

10 rue repent or regret.

11 trammels the plaits, braids, or tresses of a woman's hair.

12 blin cease.

To shine on lovely Venus (beauty's bed),
But as the lily and the blushing rose,[1]
So white and red on him in order grows.

Upon a time the nymphs[2] bestirred themselves
To try[3] who could his beauty soonest win;
But he accounted them but all as elves,[4]
Except it were the fair queen Guendolen:[5]
Her he embraced, of her was beloved,
With plaints he proved, and with tears he moved.

But her an Old Man had been suitor to,
That in his age began to dote[6] again;
Her would he often pray, and often woo,
When through old age enfeebled was his brain:
But she before had loved a lusty youth
That now was dead, the cause of all her ruth.[7]

[...]

This was the doting fool, this was the man
That loved fair Guendolena, queen of beauty;
She cannot shake him off, do what she can,
For he hath vowed to her his soul's last duty:
Making him trim upon the holy-days;[8]
And crowns his love with garlands made of bays.[9]

Now doth he stroke his beard; and now (again)
He wipes the drivel from his filthy chin;
Now offers he a kiss; but high disdain
Will not permit her heart to pity him:
Her heart more hard than adamant[10] or steel,
Her heart more changeable than Fortune's wheel.[11]

But leave we him in love (up to the ears)
And tell how Love[12] behaved himself abroad;
Who seeing one that mourned still in tears
(A Young Man groaning under love's great load)
Thinking to ease his burden, rid his pains,
For men have grief as long as life remains.

Alas (the while) that unawares he drew
The fatal shaft that Death had dropped before;[13]
By which deceit great harm did then ensue,
Staining his face with blood and filthy gore,
His face, that was to Guendolena more dear
Than love of lords or any lordly peer.

---

[1] The lily and the rose are conventionally placed in the Petrarchan beloved's cheeks, as emblems of her fair and perfect complexion.

[2] nymphs semi-divine beings in classical mythology, imagined as beautiful maidens.

[3] try find out.

[4] elves An elf could sometimes be a more malignant being than a "fairy"; sometimes a synonym for "imp" or "demon."

[5] Guendolen (or Gwendolen) is from the Welsh "gwen" (meaning "fair" or "blessed") and the English "dolen" (meaning "ring" or "bow"). In Geoffrey of Monmouth's History, she is the wife of the early Welsh king, Locrine. When he takes the German princess Estrildis as his mistress and has a daughter by her (Sabrina), Gwendolen has the two women drowned in a river (P. Hanks and F. Hodges, "Gwendolen," Oxford Dictionary of First Names, online). In Spenser's version, Gwendolen (who to her husband "alwaies faithfull prov'd") raises an army, defeats her husband in battle, and has him imprisoned until he dies. Assuming the throne until her son is of age, Gwendolen is called by Spenser "the glorie of her sex, / [Who] first taught men a woman to obay" (FQ, 2.10.17; 2.10.20).

[6] dote be infatuatedly fond of; be foolishly in love with.

[7] ruth grief.

[8] trim upon holy-days neatly or smartly-dressed on those days set apart in the liturgical calendar for special religious observance; often an occasion for socializing and courting.

[9] In the classical world, the leaves or sprigs of the bay (or laurel) tree were traditionally made into a wreath, crown, or garland to celebrate and reward a conqueror or poet.

[10] adamant a semi-fabulous stone famed for its unsurpassed hardness and impermeability.

[11] Fortune's wheel Traditionally the goddess Fortuna is depicted as blind-folded and holding a wheel, respectively emblems of the inscrutable nature of her favour and her perpetual inconstancy.

[12] Love Cupid.

[13] In earlier stanzas not included here, Death and Cupid meet at one of Bacchus's banquets. There, Fortune arranges for Death to end up with one of Cupid's love arrows, and Cupid to end up with one of Death's bolts. Intending to kill the Old Man, Death unwittingly shoots him with Cupid's arrow, thus renewing his passion for Guendolena. Intending to help the grieving Young Man, Cupid equally unwittingly shoots him with Death's dart, thus killing him.

This was that fair and beautiful Young Man
Whom Guendolena so lamented for;
This is that Love whom she doth curse and ban,[1]
Because she doth that dismal chance abhor;
And if it were not for his mother's[2] sake,
Even Ganymede[3] himself she would forsake.

Oh, would she would forsake my Ganymede,
Whose sugred[4] love is full of sweet delight,
Upon whose forehead you may plainly read
Love's pleasure 'graved in ivory tables bright;
In whose fair eyeballs you may clearly see
Base love still stained with foul indignity.

Oh, would to God he would but pity me,
That love him more than any mortal wight;[5]
Then he and I with love would soon agree,
That now cannot abide his suitor's[6] sight.
Oh, would to God (so I might have my fee)[7]
My lips were honey, and thy mouth a bee.

Then shouldst thou suck my sweet and my fair flower
That now is ripe, and full of honey-berries;
Then would I lead thee to my pleasant bower[8]
Filled full of grapes, of mulberries, and cherries;
Then shouldst thou be my wasp or else my bee,
I would thy hive, and thou my honey be.

I would put amber bracelets on thy wrists,
Crownets of pearl about thy naked arms;
And when thou sitst at swilling Bacchus'[9] feasts,
My lips with charms should save thee from all harms;
And when in sleep thou tookst thy chiefest pleasure,
Mine eyes should gaze upon thine eye-lids' treasure.

And every morn by dawning of the day,
When Phoebus[10] riseth with a blushing face,
Silvanus' chapel-clarks shall chaunt a lay,
And play thee hunts-up in thy resting place:[11]
My coot[12] thy chamber, my bosom thy bed
Shall be appointed for thy sleepy head.

And when it pleaseth thee to walk abroad
(Abroad into the fields to take fresh air),
The meads with Flora's treasure should be strowed[13]
(The mantled meadows and the fields so fair).
And by a silver well (with golden sands)
I'll sit me down and wash thine ivory hands.

---

1 ban a synonym for "curse": anathematize.

2 his mother's i.e., Love's (or Cupid's) mother, Venus.

3 Ganymede a beautiful youth with whom Zeus (Jupiter/Jove) fell in love. He subsequently took Ganymede to Olympus, home of the gods, and made him his cupbearer; in the period, "Ganymede" is a synonym for "catamite," a boy kept to provide sexual services to his master.

4 sugred sugared.

5 wight person, living creature.

6 his suitor's i.e., Daphnis, the suitor of Ganymede.

7 fee prize, reward.

8 bower a shady recess or arbour.

9 Bacchus the Roman name for the Greek god Dionysus, associated with wine, fertility, and wild orgiastic emotions.

10 Phoebus i.e., the sun (Phoebus Apollo is the Greek god of the sun).

11 Silvanus' chapel-clarks shall chaunt a lay Silvanus was a Roman forest god who fell in love with the beautiful young man, Cyparissus. In Ovid, it is Apollo who loves the young boy; when Cyparissus accidentally kills a stag which he loves, the young boy pines away from grief. Apollo turns him into a cypress, a symbol of mourning (Metamorphoses, book 10; Classical Dict., p. 630). Silvanus is an appropriately pastoral god, turning up in Virgil's Georgics, along with Pan, as the guiding spirit of a happy rural life (2.490-98). Chapel-clarks are ministers, deacons, and ordained clergymen, imagined here as chanting a religious song; figuratively, the chapel-clarks of Silvanus are birds, whose singing at dawn is likened to a "hunts-up," a song traditionally used to awaken hunstmen in the morning.

12 coot cot or cottage.

13 meads meadows; Flora classical goddess of flowers and the spring; strowed strewn; scattered about.

And in the sweltering heat of summer time,
I would make cabinets[1] for thee, my love;
Sweet-smelling arbours made of eglantine[2]
Should be thy shrine, and I would be thy dove.
Cool cabinets of fresh green laurel boughs
Should shadow us, ore-set with thick-set yews.[3]

Or if thou list to bathe thy naked limbs
Within the crystal of a pearl-bright brook,
Paved with dainty pibbles[4] to the brims;
Or clear, wherein thyself thy self mayst look,
We'll go to Ladon,[5] whose still trickling noise
Will lull thee fast asleep amids thy joys.

Or if thoult[6] go unto the river side
To angle for the sweet fresh-water fish,
Armed with thy implements that will abide (Thy rod, hook, line) to take a dainty dish:
Thy rods shall be of cane, thy lines of silk,
Thy hooks of silver, and thy baits of milk.

Or if thou lov'st to hear sweet melody,
Or pipe a round upon an oaten reed,[7]
Or make thyself glad with some mirthful glee,
Or play them music whilst thy flock doth feed:
To Pan's own pipe I'll help my lovely lad,
(Pan's golden pipe) which he of Syrinx[8] had.

Or if thou dar'st to climb the highest trees
For apples, cherries, medlars,[9] pears, or plums,
Nuts, walnuts, filbeards, chestnuts, cervices,[10]
The hoary peach, when snowy winter comes:
I have fine orchards full of mellowed fruit,
Which I will give thee to obtain my suit.

Not proud Alcynous himself can vaunt[11]
Of goodlier orchards or of braver trees
Than I have planted; yet thou wilt not graunt
My simple suit; but like the honey bees
Thou suckst the flow'r till all the sweet be gone,
And lov'st me for my coin till I have none.

Leave Guendolen, sweet heart; though she be fair
Yet is she light, not light in virtue shining,
But light[12] in her behaviour, to impair
Her honour in her chastity's declining.
Trust not her tears, for they can wantonize,[13]
When tears in pearl are trickling from her eyes.

---

1 cabinets here, a summer house or a bower in a garden.

2 eglantine the sweet briar rose.

3 yew a tree often planted in churchyards; a common symbol of sadness.

4 pibbles i.e., pebbles.

5 Ladon a river of Arcadia, an important pastoral site since on its banks both Daphne and Syrinx were transformed. Daphne was a Greek mountain nymph; fleeing from the sexual attentions of Apollo, she prayed for rescue and was transformed into a laurel tree, out of which Apollo fashioned the crown which the classical world awarded to conquering heroes and superlative poets. On Syrinx, p. 763, note 8.

6 thoult i.e., thou wilt.

7 round a song sung by two or more persons, each taking up the tune in turn; oaten reed a reed made into a rustic musical pipe.

8 Syrinx, an Arcadian nymph, fled the sexual attentions of the god Pan and, praying for rescue, was transformed into a reed, out of which Pan subsequently made his musical pipes (Classical Dict., p. 345).

9 medlar a fruit resembling a small brown-skinned apple, usually only edible when decayed to a soft pulp.

10 filbeards filberts, the nut of the hazel tree; cervices a small pear-shaped or round fruit, only edible (like the medlar) when over-ripe.

11 Alcynous king of the Phaeacians, grandson of Poseidon; in Book 6 of Homer's Odyssey, he offers the ship-wrecked Odysseus the hospitality of his famously fertile island; vaunt boast.

12 light wanton, unchaste, or sexually provocative.

13 wantonize play the wanton; indulge in lasciviousness.

If thou wilt come and dwell with me at home,
My sheep-cote[1] shall be strowed with new green rushes;
We'll haunt the trembling prickets[2] as they roam
About the fields along the hawthorn bushes;
I have a piebald cur[3] to hunt the hare:
So we will live with dainty forest fare.[4]

Nay more than this, I have a garden-plot,
Wherein there wants nor herbs, nor roots, nor flowers
(Flowers to smell, roots to eat, herbs for the pot),
And dainty shelters when the welkin lowers:[5]
Sweet-smelling beds of lilies and of roses,[6]
Which rosemary[7] banks and lavender encloses.

There grows the gilliflow'r,[8] the mint, the daisy
(Both red and white), the blue-veined-violet,[9]
The purple hyacinth,[10] the spike to please thee,
The scarlet-dyed carnation[11] bleeding yet,
The sage, the savoury, and sweet margerum,[12]
Isop, thyme, and eye-bright,[13] good for the blind and dumb.

The pink, the primrose, cowslip, and daffadilly,[14]
The hare-bell blue, the crimson columbine,[15]
Sage, lettuce, parsley, and the milk-white lily,

---

[1] sheep-cote a slight building for sheltering sheep.

[2] pricket a buck or young stag; also a slang term for "young boy."

[3] piebald cur parti-coloured shepherd's dog.

[4] fare food.

[5] welkin lowers i.e., the sky lours (looks stormy or threatening).

[6] See p. 761, note 1. Of the flowers and herbs mentioned in the following stanzas, several (roses, lilies, violets, rosemary, mint, lettuce, carnations) were used in herbal treatments for love melancholy or erotomania. See J. Ferrand, A Treatise on Lovesickness, trans. and ed., D.A. Beecher and M. Ciavolella (Syracuse, NY, 1990), especially Chapter XXXIX, "Pharmaceutical Remedies for Love and Erotic Melancholy." Another medical tradition, however, saw mint as a hot plant, and thus one that would encourage lust and desire. See pp. 1192-93.

[7] Rosemary was an emblem of remembrance and was often used to decorate both weddings and funerals. Lavender was an emblem of those lovers who remain true only until they have attained sexual satisfaction ("A Nosegay Always Sweet," in C. Robinson's A Handful of Pleasant Delights [1584], ll. 25-32; ll.17-24).

[8] the gillyflow'r the clove-scented pink (or clove gillyflower); sometimes also refers to the July-flower or carnation. Like lavender, it was prized for its perfume. The gillyflower was also an emblem of gentleness between lovers (Robinson, "Nosegay," ll. 73-80).

[9] violet John Gerard's Herbal (1636) points to its beauty and odour and its primary use in "garlands for the head, nosegays, and posies" (M. Woodward, Gerard's Herbal (London, 1985), p. 198). Gerard emphasizes the violet's ability to "stir up a man to that which is comely and honest" (p. 198), and the seventeenth-century physician Nicholas Culpeper adds that it is "a fine pleasing plant of Venus, of a mild nature, no way harmful" (Culpeper's Complete Herbal and English Physician Enlarged [Glenwood, IL, 1990], p. 188). It was also a common emblem of faithfulness in love (Robinson, "Nosegay," ll. 49-56).

[10] hyacinth Apollo loved the youth Hyacinthus, but in a discus contest Apollo accidentally struck and killed him, the discus having been deliberately diverted by the jealous god of the wind, Zephyrus, whose love Hyacinthus had rejected in favour of Apollo's. Apollo transformed Hyacinthus' blood into the flower which still bears his name, and inscribed it with the letters AI AI ("Alas") to immortalize his love and grief. The spike probably refers to the shape of the hyacinth, although there is also a variety of lavender called "Lavender Spica."

[11] carnation the cultivated varieties of clove-pinks; the carnation was an emblem of "graciousness" in love (Robinson, "Nosegay," ll. 81-88).

[12] Sage is an emblem of "sustenance, / That should man's life sustain" (Robinson, "Nosegay," ll. 33-34). Savoury and margerum (marjoram) were both hot plants. In the Renaissance medical tradition deriving from the ancient Graeco-Roman physician Galen, temperature is one of the fundamental qualities of the humours (those bodily fluids that governed the human body's overall health), bodies, and elements (such as herbs and plants). If a physician wanted to cure a "hot" disease (such as love-sickness or love melancholy), he would employ "cooling" ointments, drugs, and herbal remedies.

[13] Isop i.e., "hyssop," an aromatic herb with many medicinal uses in the period; Culpeper says it is good for "swellings in the throat" and Gerard for "the old cough," and thus it must have been thought useful for helping to restore speech (Culpeper's Complete Herbal, p. 95; Gerard's Herbal, p. 131). Culpeper attributes similar powers to thyme, and says it can treat as well "dulness of sight" (Culpeper's Complete Herbal, p. 183); eye-bright euphrasy (euphrasia), a plant traditionally used to treat diseases of the eye (Gerard's Herbal, p. 151; Culpeper's Complete Herbal, p. 71).

[14] Primroses and cowslips were varieties of mulleins (Gerard's Herbal, p. 177). The cowslip was an emblem of keeping counsel in love (Robinson, "Nosegay," ll. 105-06). The primrose could help treat "frenzy," various types of madness, perhaps including that attendant on love melancholy (Gerard's Herbal, p. 179).

[15] The hare-bell is the name of the English hyacinth or jacinth (see p. 764, note 10). The columbine was popular as an ornamental plant.

The rose, and speckled flow'r called sops-in-wine,[1]
Fine pretty king-cups, and the yellow boots,[2]
That grows by rivers and by shallow brooks.

And many thousand moe[3] (I cannot name)
Of herbs and flowers that in gardens grow
I have for thee; and coneys[4] that be tame,
Young rabbits, white as swan and black as crow,
Some speckled here and there with dainty spots:
And more I have two milch[5] and milk-white goats.

All these, and more, I'll give thee for thy love;
If these, and more, may 'tice[6] thy love away:
I have a pigeon-house, in it a dove,
Which I love more than mortal tongue can say;
And last of all, I'll give thee a little lamb
To play withal, new weaned from her dam.

But if thou wilt not pity my complaint,
My tears, nor vows, nor oaths, made to thy beauty,
What shall I do? But languish, die, or faint,
Since thou dost scorn my tears and my soul's duty:
And tears contemned,[7] vows and oaths must fail,
For where tears cannot, nothing can prevail.

Compare the love of fair queen Guendolin
With mine, and thou shalt see how she doth love thee:
I love thee for thy qualities divine,
But she doth love another swain[8] above thee;
I love thee for thy gifts, she for her pleasure;
I for thy virtue, she for beauty's treasure.

And always (I am sure) it cannot last,
But sometime nature will deny those dimples;
In stead[9] of beauty (when thy blossom's past)
Thy face will be deformed, full of wrinkles:
Then she that loved thee for thy beauty's sake,
When age draws on, thy love will soon forsake.

But I that loved thee for thy gifts divine,
In the December of thy beauty's waning,
Will still admire (with joy) those lovely eine,[10]
That now behold me with their beauties baning:[11]
Though January will never come again,
Yet April years will come in showers of rain.

When will my May come, that I may embrace thee?
When will the hour be of my soul's joying?
Why dost thou seek in mirth still to disgrace me?
Whose mirth's my health, whose grief's my heart's annoying.
Thy bane my bale,[12] thy bliss my blessedness,
Thy ill my hell, thy weal my welfare is.[13]

---

1 sops-in-wine another name for the clove pink or gillyflower.
2 king-cup buttercup or marsh marigold; yellow boot unidentified.
3 moe i.e., more.
4 coneys rabbits.
5 milch said of domestic animals that are kept for their milk.
6 'tice entice.
7 contemned despised, disdained, scorned.
8 swain country dweller; wooer, sweetheart.
9 In stead in the place of.
10 eine eyes.
11 baning cursing.
12 bane harm, woe, fatal mischance; bale torment, suffering, injury; in earliest use, often "death" or "infliction of death."
13 "Weal" and "welfare" are synonyms meaning "well-being, happiness."

Thus do I honour thee that love thee so,
And love thee so, that so do honour thee,
Much more than any mortal man doth know
Or can discern by love or jealousy.
But if that thou disdain'st my loving ever,
Oh, happy I if I had loved never.

Finis.

Plus fellus quam mellis amor.[1]

The Second Day's Lamentation of the Affectionate Shepherd.

Next morning when the golden sun was risen,
And new had bid good morrow to the mountains;
When night her silver light had locked in prison,
Which gave a glimmering on the crystal fountains:
Then ended sleep, and then my cares began,
Ev'n with the uprising of the silver swan.[2]

"O glorious Sun," quoth I, (viewing the sun)
"That lightenst every thing but me alone!
Why is my summer season almost done?
My spring-time past, and age's autumn gone?
My harvest's come, and yet I reaped no corn;
My love is great, and yet I am forlorn.

"Witness these wat'ry eyes my sad lament
(Receiving cisterns of my ceaseless tears);
Witness my bleeding heart, my soul's intent;
Witness the weight distressed Daphnis bears:
Sweet love, come ease me of thy burden's pain,
Or else I die, or else my heart is slain.

"And thou love-scorning boy, cruel, unkind—
Oh, let me once again entreat some pity.
May be thou wilt relent thy marble mind,
And lend thine ears unto my doleful ditty.[3]
Oh, pity him that pity craves so sweetly,
Or else thou shalt be never named meekly.

"If thou wilt love me, thou shalt be my boy,
My sweet delight, the comfort of my mind,
My love, my dove, my solace, and my joy.
But if I can no grace nor mercy find,
I'll go to Caucasus to ease my smart,
And let a vulture gnaw upon my heart.[4]

"Yet if thou wilt but show me one kind look
(A small reward for my so great affection),
I'll grave thy name in Beauty's golden book,
And shroud thee under Helicon's[5] protection;
Making the Muses chaunt thy lovely praise
(For they delight in shepherds' lowly lays).[6]

"And when th'art weary of thy keeping sheep
Upon a lovely down,[7] (to please thy mind)
I'll give thee fine ruff-footed doves to keep,
And pretty pigeons of another kind.
A robin redbreast shall thy minstrel be,
Chirping thee sweet and pleasant melody.

"Or if thou wilt go shoot at little birds
With bow and bolt (the thrustle-cock and sparrow)
Such as our country hedges can afford's,[8]
I have a fine bow and an ivory arrow.

---

1 Latin, "Love has more gall than honey" (a reversal of the volume's opening epigram). See p. 760, note 2.

2 silver swan the beloved boy. He is also compared to a swan in Sonnet 7 of Cynthia, With Certain Sonnets (1595).

3 ditty song.

4 a reference to the myth of Prometheus. Condemned by Zeus for the crime of giving mankind fire, Prometheus was chained to a mountain in the Caucasus, condemned to have his liver, which was miraculously renewed each day, gnawed away by a vulture.

5 Helicon the sacred mountain residence of the Muses, those divine sponsors of the arts and sciences.

6 lowly lays unsophisticated or humble songs.

7 down an upland area used for pasturage.

8 afford's i.e., afford us.

And if thou miss, yet meat thou shalt not lack,
I'll hang a bag and bottle at thy back.[1]

"Wilt thou set springes[2] in a frosty night
To catch the long-billed woodcock and the snipe?[3]
(By the bright glimmering of the starry night)
The partridge, pheasant, or the greedy gripe?
I'll lend thee lime-twigs,[4] and fine sparrow calls,
Wherewith the fowlers silly[5] birds enthralls.

"Or in a misty morning if thou wilt
Make pit-falls for the lark and pheldifare;[6]
Thy prop and sweek shall both be over-gilt:[7]
With Cyparissus'[8] self thou shalt compare
For gins and wiles, the oozels[9] to beguile;
Whilst thou under a bush shalt sit and smile.[10]

"Or with hare-pipes (set in a muset hole)[11]
Wilt thou deceive the deep-earth-delving coney?[12]
Or wilt thou in a yellow boxen bowl[13]
Taste with a wooden splent the sweet lythe[14] honey?
Clusters of crimson grapes I'll pull thee down,
And with vine-leaves make thee a lovely crown.

"Or wilt thou drink a cup of new-made wine[15]
Frothing at top, mixed with a dish of cream;
And strawberries or bilberries in their prime,
Bathed in a melting sugar-candy stream.
Bunnell and perry[16] I have for thee (alone)
When vines are dead, and all the grapes are gone.

"I have a pleasant noted nightingale
(That sings as sweetly as the silver swan)
Kept in a cage of bone as white as whale,

[1] K. Borris shows that this stanza is full of sexual double entendres, since in the period's sexual slang all of these objects were bawdy terms related to sex and the male genitalia: bows, bolts, and arrows were associated with Cupid, the god of love, and were often themselves phallic images, while archery itself could represent sexual intercourse; the ivory colour of Daphnis' arrow links this object to the ideal, fair complexion of the traditional beloved in Petrarchan discourse; the sparrow was a standard symbol for lechery and sexual promiscuity; "thrustle-cock" as a word obviously suggests sexual penetration, while the related word "throstle" could mean a sexually ambiguous male; like John Donne's famous "country pleasures" ("The Good Morrow," l.3), Barnfield's "country hedges" may play upon the slang term for the female genitalia still common today: "cunt"; "hedges" were often depicted as a popular place for sexual encounters; "meat" was a common way of referring obliquely to the penis and the participants in sexual intercourse; and finally Daphnis' bag and bottle were common euphemisms for the testicles and erect penis ("'Ile hang a bag and bottle at thy back': Barnfield's Homoerotic Advocacy and the Construction of Homosexuality," The Affectionate Shepherd: Celebrating Richard Barnfield, p. 209).

[2] springes snares.

[3] The woodcock and the snipe were popular Renaissance game birds.

[4] lime-twigs twigs smeared with a sticky substance to catch small birds.

[5] silly "stupid" (the woodcock was proverbially dim), but perhaps also "innocent" or "harmless."

[6] pit-fall a trap for birds that used a trap-door or similar device set over a hole or cavity; pheldifare a fieldfare, a type of thrush.

[7] prop and sweek both parts of a bird trap; over-gilt gilded all over.

[8] Cyparissus See p. 762, note 11.

[9] gins and wiles contrivances and tricks; oozels blackbirds.

[10] Ferrand says sufferers from love melancholy should not eat many of the birds mentioned in ll. 39-60. Because their meat was classified as hot and melancholy, these birds' flesh would tend to encourage rather than retard the disease, by heating the blood and increasing the amount of sperm in the body. Lemnius's list of those birds that encourage desire and fertility include all of Ferrand's and also thrushes, blackbirds (oozels), and woodcocks (A Treatise on Lovesickness, p. 544).

[11] A hare-pipe was a trap for catching hares; here, it would be placed over a muset hole (a meuse), a gap in a hedge through which animals would habitually pass.

[12] coney rabbit.

[13] boxen bowl a bowl made from boxtree wood.

[14] splent a splint (here, makeshift eating utensil); lythe light (here, perhaps, pale-coloured).

[15] Most physicians agreed that wine tended to heat the blood and make men open to love (Ferrand, A Treatise on Lovesickness, p. 320).

[16] Bunnell is a beverage made from the crushed apples or pears left over after all their juice has been expressed to make cider or perry.

Which I with singing of Philemon wan;[1]
Her shalt thou have, and all I have beside,
If thou wilt be my boy, or else my bride.

"Then will I lay out all my lardary[2]
(Of cheese, of cracknels, curds, and clouted-cream)[3]
Before thy male-content[4] ill-pleasing eye:
But why do I of such great follies dream?
Alas, he will not see my simple cote,[5]
For all my speckled lamb, nor milk-white goat.

"Against[6] my birthday thou shalt be my guest:
We'll have green-cheeses and fine silly-bubs,[7]
And thou shalt be the chief of all my feast.
And I will give thee two fine pretty cubs,
With two young whelps, to make thee sport withal,
A golden racket and a tennis-ball.

"A gilded nutmeg and a race[8] of ginger,
A silken girdle and a drawn-work band,[9]
Cuffs for thy wrists, a gold ring for thy finger,
And sweet rose-water for thy lily-white hand,
A purse of silk, bespang'ed with spots of gold,
As brave[10] a one as ere thou didst behold.

"A pair of knives, a green hat and a feather,
New gloves to put upon thy milk-white hand
I'll give thee, for to keep thee from the weather;
With phoenix[11] feathers shall thy face be fanned
Cooling those cheeks, that being cooled wex[12] red,
Like lilies in a bed of roses shed.

"Why do thy coral lips disdain to kiss
And suck that sweet which many have desired?
That balm my bane, that means would mend my miss:[13]
Oh, let me then with thy sweet lips b'inspired.
When thy lips touch my lips, my lips will turn
To coral too, and being cold ice will burn.

"Why should thy sweet love-lock[14] hang dangling down,
Kissing thy girdle-steed[15] with falling pride?
Although thy skin be white, thy hair is brown:
Oh, let not then thy hair thy beauty hide;
Cut off thy lock, and sell it for gold wire:
(The purest gold is tried in hottest fire).

---

[1] Philemon another common pastoral name; here, a rival shepherd whom Daphnis bests in a singing context, a conventional activity in pastoral eclogues; wan i.e., won.

[2] lardary lardry, pantry.

[3] cracknel a light, crisp biscuit; clouted-cream the thick or clotted cream made by scalding milk.

[4] male-content malcontent.

[5] cote Here, both the shepherd's simple cottage (or cot) and the out-buildings where he keeps his animals.

[6] Against at the time of.

[7] green-cheese a fresh or new cheese (one not completely dried); silly-bub a sillabub; here, a sweetened or flavoured drink of new milk or cream, curdled by the addition of wine, ale, or cider.

[8] race root. Given that this stanza deals with the ornamental gifts the shepherd imagines giving to the boy, the nutmeg and ginger may be intended as part of a pomander, a bag full of sweet-smelling spices meant to ward off the bad air thought responsible for many virulent diseases. Unlike the native foodstuffs of the previous stanzas, ginger and nutmeg were both imported and expensive. Ginger and nutmeg were also believed to be aphrodisiacs (J. Turner, Spice: The History of a Temptation [Knopf, 2005], pp. 215-16).

[9] A drawn-work band is a collar or ruff worn around the neck, ornamented with patterned needlework.

[10] brave fine, splendid.

[11] phoenix a mythic bird that every 500 years builds its own funeral pyre, climbs upon it and is consumed by the flames; a new bird arises miraculously from its ashes.

[12] wex grow.

[13] miss lack, privation.

[14] love-lock a lock of hair worn longer than the rest and arranged so as to hang forward over one shoulder, often being tied with a ribbon (popular among late sixteenth- and early seventeenth-century courtiers).

[15] girdle-steed girdle-stead: waist.

"Fair-long-hair-wearing Absolon was killed,
Because he wore it in a bravery;[1]
So that which graced his beauty, beauty spild,[2]
Making him subject to vile slavery
In being hanged: a death for him too good
That sought his own shame and his father's blood.[3]

"Again, we read of old King Priamus,
(The hapless sire of valiant Hector slain)
That his hair was so long and odious
In youth, that in his age it bred his pain:
For if his hair had not been half so long,
His life had been, and he had had no wrong.

"For when his stately city was destroyed
(That monument of great antiquity),
When his poor heart (with grief and sorrow cloyed)
Fled to his wife (last hope in misery),
Pyrrhus (more hard than adamantine rocks)
Held him and haled him by his aged locks.[4]

"These two examples by the way I show
To prove th'indecency of men's long hair.
Though I could tell thee of a thousand moe,[5]
Let these suffice for thee (my lovely fair)
Whose eye's my star; whose smiling is my sun;
Whose love did end before my joys begun.

"Fond[6] love is blind, and so art thou, my dear,
For thou seest not my love and great desart;[7]
Blind love is fond, and so thou dost appear;
For fond and blind, thou griev'st my grieving heart;
Be thou fond-blind, blind-fond, or one, or all;
Thou art my love, and I must be thy thrall.

"Oh, lend thine ivory forehead for Love's book,
Thine eyes for candles to behold the same,
That when dim-sighted ones therein shall look
They may discern that proud disdainful dame;
Yet clasp that book, and shut that casement[8] light;
Lest th'one obscured, the other shine too bright.

"Sell thy sweet breath to'th'dainty musk-ball-makers;[9]
Yet sell it so as thou mayst soon redeem it.
Let others of thy beauty be partakers,
Else none but Daphnis will so well esteem it:
For what is beauty except it be well known?
And how can it be known except first shown?

"Learn of the gentlewomen of this age,
That set their beauties to the open view,
Making disdain their lord, true love their page,[10]
A custom zeal doth hate, desert doth rue:[11]
Learn to look red, anon wax[12] pale and wan,
Making a mock of love, a scorn of man.

---

1 bravery ostentatious display.

2 spild spilled, destroyed.

3 Absalom attempted to usurp his father, King David. The "shame" may be specifically Absalom's seizing of his father's concubines, and his subsequent sexual intercourse with them as a public sign of his assumption of the kingship (2 Samuel 16:20-23). When David finally defeated Absalom's forces, the king's order that his rebellious son be taken alive was ignored. The fleeing Absalom's long hair was caught up in the branches of a tree, and as he dangled there he was killed (18:9-15).

4 For the story of Priamus and Pyrrhus, see Virgil, Aeneid, 2.526-59.

5 moe more.

6 Fond foolish.

7 desart desert, deserving.

8 casement window.

9 musk-ball-makers those who fashion balls of soap scented with musk.

10 page a boy or youth in the service of a knight, nobleman, or gentleman.

11 rue pity.

12 anon in a short time, in a little while; wax grow.

"A candle light and covered with a veil
Doth no man good, because it gives no light;[1]
So beauty of her beauty seems to fail,
When being not seen it cannot shine so bright.
Then show thyself and know thyself withal,[2]
Lest climbing high thou catch too great a fall.

"Oh, foul eclipser of that fair sun-shine,
Which is entitled beauty in the best;
Making that mortal, which is else divine,
That stains the fair which women 'steem[3] not least:
Get thee to Hell again (from whence thou art)
And leave the centre of a woman's heart.

"Ah, be not stained, sweet boy, with this viled[4] spot,
Indulgence daughter,[5] mother of mischance;
A blemish that doth every beauty blot;
That makes them loathed, but never doth advance
Her clients, fautors,[6] friends, or them that love her,
And hates them most of all that most reprove her.

[...]

"Oh, then, be not so proud because th'art fair;
Virtue is only the rich gift of God.
Let not self-pride thy virtue's name impair;
Beat not green youth with sharp repentance rod:[7]
(A fiend, a monster, a misshapen devil; Virtue's foe, vice's friend, the root of evil.)

"Apply thy mind to be a virtuous man;
Avoid ill company (the spoil of youth);
To follow virtue's lore[8] do what thou can (Whereby great profit unto thee ensuth).[9]
Read books, hate ignorance, (the foe to art,
The dam[10] of error, envy of the heart).

"Serve Jove (upon thy knees) both day and night;
Adore his name above all things on earth:
So shall thy vows be gracious in his sight,
So little babes are blessed in their birth.
Think on no worldly woe, lament thy sin,
(For lesser cease, when greater griefs begin).

"Swear no vain oaths; hear much, but little say;
Speak ill of no man; tend thine own affairs;
Bridle thy wrath; thine angry mood delay
(So shall thy mind be seldom cloyed[11] with cares).
Be mild and gentle in thy speech to all;
Refuse no honest gain when it doth fall.

"Be not beguiled with words; prove not ungrateful;
Relieve thy neighbour in his greatest need;
Commit no action that to all is hateful;
Their want[12] with wealth, the poor with plenty feed.
Twit no man in the teeth[13] with what th'hast done;
Remember flesh is frail, and hatred shun.

---

1 Matthew 5:14-16: "You are the light of the world. A city set on a hill cannot be hid. Nor do men light a lamp and put it under a bushel, but on a stand, and it gives light to all in the house. Let your light so shine before men, that they may see your good works and give glory to your Father who is in heaven."

2 withal as well.

3 the fair the beauty; 'steem i.e., esteem.

4 viled defiling, debasing.

5 Indulgence daughter i.e., Indulgence's daughter.

6 client the recipient of patronage or protection; fautor adherent, supporter; protector, patron.

7 green callow, inexperienced; repentance rod i.e., repentance's rod.

8 lore body of knowledge; principles.

9 ensuth i.e., ensues.

10 dam the female parent (of animals), but also used contemptuously to refer to human mothers.

11 cloyed overloaded to the point of weariness or disgust.

12 want lack; penury, destitution.

13 Twit no man in the teeth taunt, reproach.

[...]

"Use not thy lovely lips to loathsome lies;
By crafty means increase no worldly wealth;
Strive not with mighty men (whose fortune flies);
With temp'rate diet nourish wholesome health.
Place well thy words, leave not thy friend for gold;
First try, then trust; in vent'ring[1] be not bold.

[...]

"Take not a flatt'ring woman to thy wife,
A shameless creature, full of wanton words,
(Whose bad, thy good; whose lust will end thy life,
Cutting thy heart with sharp two-edged swords):
Cast not thy mind on her whose looks allure,
But she that shines in truth and virtue pure.

"Praise not thyself, let other men commend thee;
Bear not a flatt'ring tongue to glaver[2] any;
Let parents' due correction not offend thee;
Rob not thy neighbour; seek the love of many;
Hate not to hear good counsel given thee;
Lay not thy money unto usury.[3]

[...]

"This lear I learned of a beldame trot[4]
(When I was young and wild as now thou art),
But her good counsel I regarded not;
I marked[5] it with my ears, not with my heart:
But now I find it too-too true, my son,
When my age-withered spring is almost done.

"Behold my grey head full of silver hairs,
My wrinkled skin, deep furrows in my face.
Cares bring old age, old age increaseth cares;
My time is come, and I have run my race.
Winter hath snowed upon my hoary head,
And with my winter all my joys are dead.

"And thou love-hating boy, (whom once I loved),
Farewell, a thousand-thousand times farewell;
My tears the marble stones to ruth[6] have moved,
My sad complaints the babbling echoes tell,
And yet thou wouldst take no compassion on me,
Scorning that cross which love hath laid upon me.

"The hardest steel with fire doth mend his miss,[7]
Marble is mollified[8] with drops of rain,
But thou (more hard than steel or marble is)
Dost scorn my tears, and my true love disdain,
Which for thy sake shall everlasting be,
Wrote in the annals of eternity."

By this, the night (with darkness over-spread)
Had drawn the curtains of her coal-black bed,
And Cynthia[9] muffling her face with a cloud,
(Lest all the world of her should be too proud)
Had taken conge[10] of the sable night,
(That wanting[11] her cannot be half so bright);

---

1 try test the strength, goodness or value of; vent'ring i.e., venturing.
2 glaver deceive.
3 usury the practice of lending out money at interest, condemned by Scripture and by many commentators in Renaissance England.
4 lear lesson, instruction; beldame trot "beldame": an aged woman or matron of advanced years; in the sixteenth century often used to address nurses (those who cared for children); "trot": old woman, hag.
5 marked heeded, paid attention to.
6 ruth pity.
7 mend his miss repair the flaw (in the steel).
8 mollified made softer.
9 Cynthia another name for Diana or Artemis, the goddess of the moon, the hunt, and virginity; one of Elizabeth's classical epithets.
10 taken conge made a formal farewell; received formal leave or permission (to go).
11 wanting lacking.

When I poor forlorn man and outcast creature
(Despairing of my love, despised of beauty)
Grew male-content,[1] scorning his lovely feature,
That had disdained my ever-zealous duty:
I hied[2] me homeward by the moon-shine light,
Forswearing Love and all his fond delight.

Finis.[3]

—1594

from Cynthia. With Certain Sonnets, and the Legend of Cassandra.[4]

[...]

To the Courteous Gentlemen Readers.

Gentlemen, the last term[5] there came forth a little toy[6] of mine entitled The Affectionate Shepherd; in the which, his country "Content"[7] found such friendly favour that it hath encouraged me to publish my second fruits—The Affectionate Shepherd being the first, howsoever undeservedly (I protest) I have been thought (of some) to have been the author of two books heretofore. I need not to name them, because they are too well-known already, nor will I deny them because they are disliked, but because they are not mine. This protestation (I hope) will satisfy the indifferent;[8] as for them that are maliciously envious, as I cannot so I care not to please. Some there were that did interpret The Affectionate Shepherd otherwise than (in truth) I meant, touching the subject thereof, to wit, the love of a shepherd to a boy; a fault the which I will not excuse, because I never made. Only this, I will unshadow my conceit,[9] being nothing else but an imitation of Virgil[10] in the second eclogue of Alexis. In one or two places (in this book[11]) I use the name of Eliza pastorally; wherein, lest anyone should misconstrue my meaning (as I hope none will), I have here briefly discovered my harmless conceit as concerning that name, whereof once (in a simple shepherd's device) I wrote this epigram:

> One name there is, which name above all other
> I most esteem, as time and place shall prove:
> The one is Vesta, th'other Cupid's mother,
> The first my goddess is, the last my love;
> Subject to both I am: to that by birth
> To this for beauty; fairest on the earth.

Thus, hoping you will bear with my rude conceit of Cynthia (if for no other cause, yet, for that it is the first imitation of the verse of that excellent poet Master Spenser, in his Faerie Queen), I leave you to the reading of that which I so much desire may breed your delight.

Richard Barnfield.

[...]

---

1 male-content malcontent.

2 hied hurried.

3 In the last of the volume's pastoral poems, "The Shepherd's Content, Or The Happiness of a Harmless Life. Written Upon Occasion of the Former Subject," the speaker—it is not clear that it is Daphnis—compares the shepherd's life to that of prince, courtier, scholar, soldier, etc.; he finds that only the shepherd enjoys true peace and serenity; he could be said to have the perfect life if not for the tormenting power of love. The poem, however, does not mention the speaker's love for the young boy, focusing instead on love generally as a destructive and debasing force. The poem, however, also includes three verses praising Sir Philip Sidney and lamenting his death (ll. 113-34).

4 The title page includes the Latin epigram "Quod Cupio nequeo" (What I long for I cannot have).

5 term the four periods of activity within the legal year (i.e., when the courts were in session): Michaelmas, Hilary, Easter, and Trinity terms.

6 toy a trifling piece of writing, a light composition.

7 "Content" See p. 772, note 3.

8 indifferent unprejudiced.

9 unshadow my conceit disclose or reveal my work's governing idea.

10 Virgil Publius Virgilius Maro (70-19 BCE), Roman poet, author of Georgics and Eclogues, which served as a source for the conventional topics and images of Renaissance pastoral poetry. Barnfield refers here to the unrequited and tormenting love of the shepherd Corydon for the beautiful boy Alexis.

11 in this book i.e., in Cynthia, With Certain Sonnets.

To His Mistress[1]

Bright star of beauty, fairest fair alive,
Rare president[2] of peerless chastity
(In whom the Muses and the Graces strive,[3]
Which shall possess the chiefest part of thee):
Oh, let these simple lines accepted be,
Which here I offer at thy sacred shrine,
Sacred, because sweet beauty is divine.

And though I cannot please each curious[4] ear,
With sugared notes of heavenly harmony,
Yet if my love shall to thyself appear,
No other Muse I will invoke but thee:
And if thou wilt my fair Thalia[5] be,
I'll sing sweet hymns and praises to thy name,
In that clear temple of eternal fame.

But ah (alas) how can mine infant muse
(That never heard of Helicon before)
Perform my promise past, when they refuse
Poor shepherds' plaints? yet will I still adore
Thy sacred name, although I write no more.
Yet hope I shall, if this accepted be,
If not, in silence sleep eternally.

[...]

Sonnet 1

Sporting at fancy, setting light by love,
There came a thief and stole away my heart,
(And therefore robbed me of my chiefest part)
Yet cannot reason him a felon prove:
For why[6] his beauty (my heart's thief) affirmeth,
Piercing no skin (the body's 'fensive wall)
And having leave, and free consent withal,
Himself not guilty, from love guilty tearmeth,
Conscience the judge, twelve reasons are the jury.
They find mine eyes the beauty t'have let in,
And on this verdict given, agreed they bin:[7]
"Wherefore, because his beauty did allure ye,
Your doom is this: in tears still to be drowned,
When his fair forehead with disdain is frowned."

Sonnet 6

Sweet coral lips, where nature's treasure lies,
The balm of bliss, the sovereign salve of sorrow,
The secret touch of love's heart-burning arrow,
Come quench my thirst or else poor Daphnis dies.
One night I dreamed (alas 'twas but a dream)
That I did feel the sweetness of the same,
Where-with inspired, I young again became,
And from my heart a spring of blood did stream;
But when I waked, I found it nothing so,
Save that my limbs (methought) did wax more strong
And I more lusty far, and far more young.
This gift on him rich nature did bestow.
Then if in dreaming so, I so did speed,[8]
What should I do, if I did so indeed?

---

[1] Given that the volume's first poem "Cynthia" is an encomium to Elizabeth I, represented under one of her common poetic epithets, clearly Barnfield's "mistress" here is also the Queen.

[2] president the original spelling suggests both "precedent" and "ruling authority."

[3] In Hesiod, the Graces (Charites or Gratiae) are three sister-goddesses—Aglaia, Thalia, and Euphrosyne—who embody and have the power to bestow on mortals grace, beauty, and attractiveness. They are often represented as Venus' attendants.

[4] curious overly fastidious or exacting.

[5] Thalia muse of pastoral and comic poetry (Classical Dict., p. 668).

[6] For why because.

[7] bin been.

[8] speed succeed, prosper; attain (my) desire.

Sonnet 8

Sometimes I wish that I his pillow were,
So might I steal a kiss, and yet not seen,
So might I gaze upon his sleeping eine,[1]
Although I did it with a panting fear.
But when I well consider how vain my wish is,
Ah, foolish bees (think I) that do not suck
His lips for honey, but poor flowers do pluck
Which have no sweet in them, when his sole kisses
Are able to revive a dying soul.
Kiss him, but sting him not, for if you do,
His angry voice your flying will pursue.
But when they hear his tongue, what can control
Their back-return? for then they plain may see How honey-combs from his lips dropping be.

Sonnet 9

Diana[2] (on a time) walking the wood
To sport herself, of her fair train forlorn,
Chanced for to prick her foot against a thorn,
And from thence issued out a stream of blood.
No sooner she was vanished out of sight,
But love's fair Queen[3] came there away by chance,
And having of this hap a glimm'ring[4] glance,
She put the blood into a crystal bright;
When being now come unto Mount Rhodope,[5]
With her fair hands she forms a shape of snow,
And blends it with this blood, from whence doth grow
A lovely creature, brighter than the day.
And being christened in fair Paphos' shrine,[6]
She called him Ganymede, as all divine.[7]

Sonnet 10

Thus was my love, thus was my Ganymed
(Heaven's joy, world's wonder, nature's fairest work,
In whose aspect[8] hope and despair do lurk)
Made of pure blood in whitest snow yshed,[9]
And for sweet Venus only formed his face,
And his each member delicately framed,
And last of all fair Ganymede him named,
His limbs (as their creatrix) her embrace.
But as for his pure, spotless, virtuous mind,
Because it sprung of chaste Diana's blood
(Goddess of maids, directress of all good),
It wholly is to chastity inclined.
And thus it is: as far as I can prove,[10]
He loves to be beloved, but not to love.

---

1 eine eyes.

2 Diana See p. 771, note 9.

3 love's fair Queen Venus.

4 glimm'ring glimmering: to see indistinctly or with half-closed eyes.

5 Mount Rhodope a very high mountain in Greece, sacred to Bacchus. Rhodope was the wife of Haemus, king of Thrace; she was changed into this mountain as a punishment for boasting that she was more beautiful than Juno, queen of the gods (Classical Dict., p. 588).

6 Paphos' shrine There was a famous temple to Venus in the city of Paphos on the isle of Cyprus; the city itself was particularly devoted to the goddess (Classical Dict., pp. 481-82).

7 This account of the birth of Ganymede seems to be Barnfield's invention, and it gives the youth a pedigree acceptable to rank-conscious Elizabethan readers (C. Charles, "Barnfield's Lover's Discourse," The Affectionate Shepherd: Celebrating Richard Barnfield, p. 185). As Klawitter notes, however, there is something vaguely Spenserian about Ganymede's apparently immaculate conception, reminding readers of the "birth" of the false Florimel (Faerie Queene, 3.8.6). See Richard Barnfield: The Complete Poems, p. 232, note 10.

8 aspect countenance, look, expression.

9 yshed dropped, sprinkled.

10 prove find out, learn or know by experience.

Sonnet 11

Sighing and sadly sitting by my love,
He asked the cause of my heart's sorrowing,
Conjuring me by Heaven's eternal king
To tell the cause which me so much did move.
"Compelled," quoth I, "to thee will I confess:
Love is the cause, and only love it is
That doth deprive me of my heavenly bliss.
Love is the pain that doth my heart oppress."
"And what is she," quoth he, "whom thou dost love?"
"Look in this glass," quoth I. "There shalt thou see
The perfect form of my felicity."
When, thinking that it would strange magic prove,
He opened it, and taking off the cover,
He straight perceived himself to be my lover.

Sonnet 12

Some talk of Ganymede th'Idalian boy,[1]
And some of fair Adonis[2] make their boast;
Some talk of him whom lovely Laeda lost,[3]
And some of Echo's love that was so coy.[4]
They speak by heresay, I of perfect truth;
They partially commend the persons named,
And for them sweet encomiums[5] have framed,
I only t'him have sacrificed my youth.
As for those wonders of antiquity,
And those whom later ages have enjoyed,
(But, ah, what hath not cruel death destroyed?
Death, that envies this world's felicity),
They were (perhaps) less fair than poets write,
But he is fairer than I can indite.[6]

Sonnet 14

Here; hold this glove (this milk-white cheveril[7] glove),
Not quaintly over-wrought with curious knots,[8]
Not decked with golden spangs,[9] nor silver spots,
Yet wholesome for thy hand as thou shalt prove.
Ah no, sweet boy, place this glove near thy heart,
Wear it, and lodge it still within thy breast,
So shalt thou make me (most unhappy) blest.
So shalt thou rid my pain, and ease my smart:
How can that be (perhaps) thou wilt reply,
A glove is for the hand not for the heart,
Nor can it well be proved by common art,
Nor reason's rule. To this, thus answer I:
If thou from glove dost take away the g,
Then glove is love: and so I send it thee.

---

[1] Ganymede is called the "Idalian boy" because he was seized by Zeus (Jupiter/Jove) while shepherding his father's flocks on Mount Ida.

[2] Adonis the beautiful mortal youth with whom Venus fell in love; while out hunting, Adonis died after being gored by a boar.

[3] him ... lost Leda's son, Castor, famously beautiful.

[4] Echo's love was Narcissus, a spectacularly beautiful youth, son of the river god Cephisus and the nymph Liriope. Narcissus rejected Echo and she pined away and died, leaving only her voice behind. Narcissus' "coyness" refers to the overwhelming pride which led him to reject not just Echo, but all the young men and women who desired him.

[5] encomium a formal or high-flown expression of praise; a panegyric.

[6] indite put into words; express, describe.

[7] cheveril kid-skin.

[8] quaintly over-wrought elaborately over-decorated or ornamented; curious knots overly-intricate, fussy decorations.

[9] spangs i.e., spangles, small glittering ornaments.

Sonnet 16

Long have I longed to see my love again,
Still have I wished, but never could obtain it;
Rather than all the world (if I might gain it)
Would I desire my love's sweet precious gain.
Yet in my soul I see him every day,
See him, and see his still stern countenance,
But, ah, what is of long continuance
Where majesty and beauty bears the sway?
Sometimes, when I imagine that I see him,
(As love is full of foolish fantasies)
Weening[1] to kiss his lips, as my love's fees,
I feel but air, nothing but air to be him.
Thus with Ixion, kiss I clouds in vain;
Thus with Ixion, feel I endless pain.[2]

Sonnet 17

Cherry-lipped Adonis in his snowy shape
Might not compare with his pure ivory white,
On whose fair front a poet's pen may write,
Whose rosiate[3] red excels the crimson grape.
His love-enticing delicate soft limbs
Are rarely framed t'intrap poor gazing eyes;
His cheeks the lily and carnation dyes
With lovely tincture which Apollo's dims.[4]
His lips ripe strawberries in nectar wet,
His mouth a hive, his tongue a honey-comb,
Where muses (like bees) make their mansion.
His teeth pure pearl in blushing coral set.
Oh, how can such a body sin-procuring
Be slow to love, and quick to hate, enduring?

Sonnet 20

But now my Muse toiled with continual care
Begins to faint, and slack her former pace,
Expecting favour from that heavenly grace,
That may (in time) her feeble strength repair.
Till when, sweet youth, th'essence of my soul,
(Thou that dost sit and sing at my heart's grief, Thou that dost send thy shepherd no relief)
Behold these lines, the sons of tears and dole.
Ah, had great Colin,[5] chief of shepherds all,
Or gentle Rowland,[6] my professed friend,
Had they thy beauty or my penance penned,
Greater had been thy fame and less my fall:
But since that everyone cannot be witty,
Pardon I crave of them, and of thee pity.

—1595

---

[1] Weening expecting, hoping.

[2] Ixion, king of Thessaly, shunned and rejected by all mankind because of his treacherous murder of his father-in-law, Deioneus, was pitied by Jupiter, who invited him to one of the gods' banquets. There, Ixion fell in love with Juno, Jupiter's wife and queen of the gods; his attempts to seduce her, however, were prevented by Jupiter who replaced Juno with a cloud shaped like her. Ixion's punishment was to be bound in hell to an eternally spinning wheel (Classical Dict., p. 333).

[3] rosiate rose-coloured.

[4] I.e., which dim the colour of the cheeks of Apollo, Greek god of the sun and famously handsome.

[5] Colin Edmund Spenser (?1552-99), known as "Colin" after the shepherd-poet of the same name in his Shepheardes Calender (1579) and Colin Clouts Come Home Againe (1594).

[6] Rowland Michael Drayton (1563-1631) adopted this poetic name in his Idea: The Shepheardes Garland (1593).

Edmund Spenser
?1552-1599

Rising from the ranks of the citizenry to a career in civil service, poetic fame, and a monarch's favour, Edmund Spenser embodied late Elizabethan humanist fantasies of literary and political success. A tantalizing combination of an incomplete historical record and autobiographical allusion in his works indicates that he was born in London around 1552, the child of a cloth worker named John and his wife Elizabeth.[1] He was educated at the newly established Merchant Taylors' School under humanist educator Richard Mulcaster and matriculated at Pembroke Hall, Cambridge, where he was a sizar or "poor scholar," who performed servant duties in exchange for room and board. In 1573, Spenser's name appears on a list of students awarded the BA and, in 1576, on an MA list.

While at Cambridge, Spenser made his acquaintance with some of the people who would figure significantly in his later literary life, including friend and mentor Gabriel Harvey, who achieved his own fame through a pamphlet war with Thomas Nashe in the 1590s. He also published his first literary effort in this period, translations for Jan van der Noot's miscellany, Theatre for Worldlings (1569), later revised as The Visions of Petrarch and The Visions of Bellay (both 1591). After completing his education, Spenser was left to select one of the avenues available to a young man with an MA, typically a career in the Church, a post as a college fellow leading to a further career as a schoolmaster, or, for the select few, entry into government service. Spenser followed the latter path, beginning with a post as secretary to Dr. John Young, bishop of Rochester, who had been master of Pembroke Hall during Spenser's tenure. Possibly as a result of Young's influence, Spenser moved into service with Robert Dudley, earl of Leicester, by 1579. During this year, he made the acquaintance of Leicester's nephew, Sir Philip Sidney, a young courtier and champion of English letters, and published his first significant work, The Shepheardes Calender. Spenser's association with the literary power of the Sidney family provided an entry to the world of Elizabeth's Court that continued even during his long absences from England.

By 1580, a newly married Spenser became secretary to Lord Grey of Wilton, the new lord deputy of Ireland, and spent the rest of of his life largely in that country in a variety of posts. By 1588, he had achieved some stature of his own as owner of Kilcolman Castle in Cork, as well as through his connection to neighbours like Sir Walter Raleigh, to whom he addressed the prefatory epistle to The Faerie Queene. While in Ireland in the 1580s, Spenser wrote his epic Faerie Queene and presented the first three books to Queen Elizabeth during a visit to England in 1589. These were printed in 1590, with the latter three added in 1596. By 1591, possibly the year in which his first wife died, he returned to Ireland to resume his duties, but also became the recipient of an annual pension of £50. In the last part of his life he rose to some prominence in the civil service as Queen's justice for Cork (1594) and later sheriff (1598). In 1594, he married Elizabeth Boyle after a courtship documented in the Amoretti and Epithalamion. Spenser's fortunes fell toward the end of the decade when, in 1598, Kilcolman was attacked and burned during the Earl of Tyrone's uprising. He left for London on 9 December 1598, to deliver his report on the Irish situation and died 13 January 1599. Spenser was survived by his wife, Elizabeth, the two children from his first marriage, Katherine and Sylvanus, and Peregrine, the only child of his second marriage.

EDITIONS: The Complete Works of Edmund Spenser: A Variorum Edition. Ed. R. Morris. London: Macmillan, 1893.

ADDITIONAL ONLINE TEXTS: "Book II, Canto XII" and "Book III, Canto VI" from The Faerie Queene (1590, 1596); from A View of the Present State of Ireland (1596; published, 1809).

[1] Biographical details are taken from Spenser Encycl., pp. 668b-671a.

The Shepheardes Calender (1579)

As his first independent published work, The Shepheardes Calender (1579) marked Spenser's entry into the world of Elizabethan letters and functioned as a kind of literary apprenticeship in which he integrated multiple genres and the standard set pieces of pastoral poetry, along with experimentation with a wide variety of meters and stanza forms.[1] At the same time, Spenser was concerned with the development of a native literary tradition of a stature similar to the literatures of other powerful cultures. Here Spenser rooted his work in a tradition of pastoral poetry that stretches from classical texts by Virgil and Theocritus to more contemporary Continental works by Sannazaro, Petrarch, Mantuan, and Marot.[2] Carefully woven into this tissue of imitation and allusion is a native English tradition represented by Spenser's use of characters like Colin Clout found in texts by Chaucer and Skelton, along with deliberately archaic language and spelling. The overarching form of the work itself is drawn from a familiar English pastoral almanac, The Kalender of Shepardes, whose mixture of folk wisdom, meteorological prediction, and agricultural advice had been in print since the beginning of the century[3] and in existence since the Middle Ages. At the same time, the use of eclogue gestures back to Virgil and Theocritus and consequently functions as a stepping stone toward epic, the pinnacle of a classical poetic career. That Spenser in his opening dialogue, "Januarye," imitates Virgil's second eclogue reinforces the intent he articulates in the prefatory material to the work as a whole: to imitate Virgil's career, in which he progressed from pastoral eclogues to his epic Aeneid in a pattern that became known as the "paideia." The result of this complex grounding is the elevation of the English vernacular to the status of a literary language on par with Latin, Italian, and French. Moreover, Spenser's concern with establishing the authority of his text extends to its scholarly apparatus, in which a fictitious editorial figure, identified as "E.K.," adds a series of apparently explanatory notes. In them, E.K.'s pedantic and sometimes misleading commentary creates an air of intellectual authority and the sense that the poem is "a significant statement of a significant poet."[4] E.K. is responsible for the division of the eclogues in The Shepheardes Calender into three categories: plaintive, recreative, and moral. It has been argued that the functions of these different groups of eclogues seem to be, respectively, examination of the poet's relationship to the pastoral world, celebration of the idyllic life of shepherds, and allegorical consideration of the problems of contemporary England.[5]

Traditionally, pastoral narratives examined current issues from the idealized perspective of rural life, a position that offers the opportunity to present both praise and critique under the guise of describing the lives of simple shepherds.[6] Spenser exploits this flexibility to respond to contemporary social and political concerns and the poet's role in them. In this sequence of poems, the figure of Colin Clout—the unhappy lover-poet—reappears several times to comment on his lack of progress in wooing Rosalind, while other shepherd characters discuss other topics: problems of patronage, Reformation concerns with ecclesiastical abuses and the question of Christian salvation, and the function of poetry in a Protestant political world. Spenser's version of pastoral thus functions as a fusion of two impulses: idealistic longing for escape from the problems of a world of religio-political power and profound concern with its workings.

from The Shepheardes Calender

To His Booke.

Goe little booke: thy selfe present,
As child whose parent is unkent:[7]
To him that is the president[8]
Of noblesse and of chevalree,

---

[1] Spenser Encycl., p. 645c.

[2] See J.M. King, Spenser's Poetry and the Reformation Tradition (Princeton, 1990), pp. 14-18.

[3] Spenser Encycl., p. 645c.

[4] R. Mallette "Spenser's Portrait of the Artist in The Shepheardes Calender and Colin Clouts Come Home Again," Studies in English Literature 19 (1979): p. 23.

[5] A.C. Hamilton, "The Argument of Spenser's Shepheardes Calender," English Literary History 23 (1956): pp. 175-76.

[6] See L.A. Montrose, "'Eliza, Queene of shepheardes,' and the Pastoral of Power," English Literary Renaissance 10 (1980): pp. 153-82.

[7] unkent unknown.

[8] president precedent, pattern.

And if that Envie barke at thee,
As sure it will, for succoure flee
Under the shadow of his wing,
And asked, who thee forth did bring,
A shepheards swaine saye did thee sing,
All as his straying flocke he fedde:
And when his honor has thee redde,[1]
Crave pardon for my hardyhedde.[2]
But if that any aske thy name,
Say thou wert base begot with blame:
For thy thereof thou takest shame.
And when thou art past jeopardee,
Come tell me, what was sayd of mee:
And I will send more after thee.
Immeritô.[3]

To the most excellent and learned both Orator and Poete, Mayster Gabriell Harvey,[4] his verie special and singular good friend E.K. commendeth the good lyking of this his labour, and the patronage of the new Poete

Uncouthe unkiste,[5] Sayde the olde famous Poete Chaucer: whom for his excellencie and wonderfull skil in making, his scholler Lidgate,[6] a worthy scholler of so excellent a maister, calleth the Loadestarre of our Language: and whom our Colin Clout in his Æglogue calleth Tityrus the God of shepheards, comparing hym to the worthines of the Roman Tityrus Virgile. Which proverbe, myne owne good friend Ma. Harvey, as in that good old Poete it served well Pandares purpose, for the bolstering of his baudy brocage,[7] so very well taketh place in this our new Poete, who for that he is uncouthe (as said Chaucer) is unkist, and unknown to most men, is regarded but of few. But I dout[8] not, so soone as his name shall come into the knowledg of men, and his worthines be sounded in the tromp[9] of fame, but that he shall be not onely kiste, but also beloved of all, embraced of the most, and wondred at of the best. No lesse I thinke, deserveth his wittinesse in devising, his pithinesse in uttering, his complaints of love so lovely, his discourses of pleasure so pleasantly, his pastorall rudenesse,[10] his morall wisenesse, his dewe[11] observing of Decorum everye where, in personages, in seasons, in matter, in speach, and generally in al seemely simplycitie of handeling his matter, and framing his words: the which of many thinges which in him be straunge, I know will seeme the straungest, the words them selves being so auncient, the knitting of them so short and intricate, and the whole Periode[12] and compasse[13] of speache so delightsome for the roundnesse, and so grave for the straungenesse. And firste of the wordes to speake, I graunt they be something hard, and of most men unused, yet both English, and also used of most excellent Authors and most famous Poetes. In whom whenas this our Poet hath bene much traveiled[14] and throughly redd, how could it be, (as that worthy Oratour sayde) but that walking in the sonne although for other cause he walked, yet needes he mought[15] be sunburnt;[16] and having the sound of those auncient Poetes still ringing in his eares, he mought needes in singing hit out some of theyr tunes. But whether he useth them by such casualtye[17] and custome, or of set purpose and choyse, as thinking them fittest for such rusticall rudenesse of

---

1 redde seen.
2 hardyhedde boldness.
3 Immeritô meaning, "the undeserving one."
4 Gabriell Harvey Gabriel Harvey (c. 1550-1631), poet, rhetorician, and friend of Spenser from Cambridge.
5 Uncouthe unkiste unknown and unrecognized, after Chaucer Troilus and Criseyde, l.809.
6 Lidgate John Lydgate (?1370-1449), poet in the Chaucerian tradition.
7 brocage pimping.
8 dout doubt.
9 tromp trumpet.
10 rudenesse lack of education, ignorance.
11 dewe due.
12 Periode duration; also, in rhetoric, a complete sentence.
13 compasse boundary.
14 traveiled studied, worked at.
15 mought must, ought to be.
16 Oratour … sunburnt from Cicero De Oratore 2.14.60. The "Oratour" is Antonius.
17 casualtye chance, accident.

shepheards, eyther for that theyr rough sounde would make his rymes more ragged and rustical, or els because such olde and obsolete wordes are most used of country folke, sure I think, and think I think not amisse, that they bring great grace and, as one would say, auctoritie[1] to the verse [...] as in most exquisite pictures they use to blaze and portraict[2] not onely the daintie lineaments of beautye, but also rounde about it to shadow the rude thickets and craggy clifts, that by the basenesse of such parts, more excellency may accrew to the principall; for oftimes we fynde ourselves, I knowe not how, singularly delighted with the shewe of such naturall rudeness, and take great pleasure in that disorderly order. Even so doe those rough and harsh termes enlumine and make more clearly to appeare the brightnesse of brave and glorious words. So oftentimes a dischorde in Musick maketh a comely concordaunce: so great delight tooke the worthy Poete Alceus[3] to behold a blemish in the joynt of a wel shaped body. But if any will rashly blame such his purpose in choyse of old and unwonted words, him may I more justly blame and condemne, or of witlesse headinesse in judging, or[4] of heedlesse hardinesse[5] in condemning; for not marking the compasse of hys bent, he wil judge of the length of his cast. For in my opinion it is one special prayse, of many whych are dew to this Poete, that he hath laboured to restore, as to theyr rightfull heritage such good and naturall English words, as have ben long time out of use and almost cleane disherited. Which is the onely cause, that our Mother tonge, which truely of it self is both ful enough for prose and stately enough for verse, hath long time ben counted most bare and barrein of both. Which default when as some endevoured to salve and recure, they patched up the holes with peces and rags of other languages, borrowing here of the French, there of the Italian, every where of the Latine, not weighing how il, those tongues accorde with themselves, but much worse with ours: So now they have made our English tongue, a gallimaufray[6] or hodgepodge of al other speches. Other some not so wel seene in the English tonge as perhaps in other languages, if they happen to here an olde word albeit very naturall and significant, crye out streight way, that we speak no English, but gibbrish, or rather such, as in old time Evanders mother[7] spake. Whose first shame is, that they are not ashamed, in their own mother tonge straungers to be counted and alienes. The second shame no lesse then the first, that what so they understand not, they streight way deeme to be sencelesse, and not at al to be understode. Much like to the Mole in Æsopes fable, that being blynd her selfe, would in no wise be perswaded, that any beast could see. The last more shameful then both, that of their owne country and natural speach, which together with their Nources[8] milk they sucked, they have so base regard and bastard judgement, that they will not onely themselves not labor to garnish and beautifie it, but also repine,[9] that of other it shold be embellished. Like to the dogge in the maunger, that him selfe can eate no hay, and yet barketh at the hungry bullock, that so faine would feede: whose currish kind though it cannot be kept from barking, yet I conne them thanke that they refrain from byting.

Now for the knitting of sentences, whych they call the joynts and members therof, and for al the compasse of the speach, it is round without roughnesse, and learned wythout hardnes, such indeede as may be perceived of the leaste, understoode of the moste, but judged onely of the learned. For what in most English wryters useth to be loose, and as it were ungyrt, in this Authour is well grounded, finely framed, and strongly trussed

1 auctoritie authority.

2 pourtraict portray.

3 Alceus Greek poet (c. 620-580 BCE), many of whose lyrics dealt with contemporary politics (TIM).

4 or ... or either ... or.

5 hardinesse boldness, audacity.

6 gallimaufray heterogeneous mixture, confused jumble.

7 Evander's mother Carmenta, a prophetic goddess. Evander was regarded as the first settler of Rome and he welcomed Aeneas on the Palatine Hill when the latter sought aid in battle against the Latins (OCD).

8 Nources nurse's (i.e., wetnurse).

9 repine complain.

up together. In regard wherof, I scorne and spue out the rakehellye[1] route of our ragged rymers (for so themselves use to hunt the letter) which without learning boste, without judgement jangle, without reason rage and fome, as if some instinct of Poeticall spirite had newly ravished them above the meanenesse of commen capacitie. [...]

Nethelesse let them a God's name feede on theyr owne folly, so they seeke not to darken the beames of others glory. As for Colin, under whose person the Author selfe is shadowed, how furre he is from such vaunted titles and glorious showes, both him selfe sheweth, where he sayeth.

> Of Muses Hobbin. I conne no skill. And,
> Enough is me to paint out my unrest, &c.

And also appeareth by the basenesse of the name, wherein, it semeth, he chose rather to unfold great matter of argument covertly, then professing it, not suffice thereto accordingly. Which moved him rather in Æglogues,[2] then other wise to write, doubting perhaps his habilitie, which he little needed, or mynding to furnish our tongue with this kinde, wherein it faulteth, or following the example of the best and most auncient Poetes, which devised this kind of wryting, being both so base for the matter, and homely for the manner, at the first to trye theyr habilities: and as young birdes, that be newly crept out of the nest, by little first to prove theyr tender wyngs, before they make a greater flyght. So flew Theocritus,[3] as you may perceive he was all ready full fledged. So flew Virgile, as not yet well feeling his winges. So flew Mantuane,[4] as being not full somd.[5] So Petrarque. So Boccace; So Marot, Sanazarus,[6] and also divers other excellent both Italian and French Poetes, whose foting[7] this Author every where followeth, yet so as few, but they be wel sented can trace him out. So finally flyeth this our new Poete, as a bird, whose principals[8] be scarce growen out, but yet as that in time shall be hable to keepe wing with the best.

Now as touching the generall dryft and purpose of his Æglogues, I mind not to say much, him selfe labouring to conceale it. Onely this appeareth, that his unstayed yougth had long wandred in the common Labyrinth of Love, in which time to mitigate and allay the heate of his passion, or els to warne (as he sayth) the young shepheard .s. his equalls and companions of his unfortunate folly, he compiled these xij. Æglogues, which for that they be proportioned to the state of xij. monethes, he termeth the Shepheards Calendar, applying an olde name to a new worke.[9] Hereunto have I added a certain Glosse or scholion for th'exposition of old wordes and harder phrases: which maner of glosing and commenting, well I wote, wil seeme straunge and rare in our tongue: yet for so much as I knew many excellent and proper devises both in wordes and matter would passe in the speedy course of reading, either as unknowen, or as not marked,[10] and that in this kind, as in other we might be equal to the learned of other nations, I thought good to take the paines upon me, the rather for that by meanes of some familiar acquaintaunce I was made privie to his counsell and secret meaning in them, as also in sundry other works of his. [...] These my present paynes if to any they be pleasurable or profitable, be you judge, mine own good Maister Harvey, to whom I have both in respect of your worthinesse generally, and otherwyse upon some [1] rakehellye rascally, immoral.

[2] Æglogues i.e., eclogues: short pastoral poems typically in dialogue form, particularly those by Virgil.

[3] Theocritus (c. 310-250 BCE), last of the great poets of ancient Greece noted for his use of the eclogue form. He initiated the literary pastoral with his Idylls (Spenser Encycl., p. 685c).

[4] Mantuane Giovanni Baptista Spagnolo (1448-1516) was author of neo-Latin eclogues used as a school text throughout Europe in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries (Spenser Encycl., p. 452b).

[5] somd having the feathers full grown.

[6] Petrarque ... Sanazarus European poets who wrote eclogues (Variorum).

[7] foting footing, i.e., path.

[8] principals each of the two principal feathers in each wing (the two outermost primaries).

[9] olde name ... new worke The old Kalender of Shepardes was a medley of verse and prose containing information on topics ranging from the saints of the whole year, the signs of the zodiac, the properties of the twelve months of the year, rules for bloodletting, proverbial knowledge, etc. It appeared in seven editions between 1503 and 1559. Spenser's Shepheardes Calender replaces the Kalender's Roman Catholic doctrine with Protestant (Variorum).

[10] not marked not noticed or observed.

particular and special considerations voued[1] this my labour, and the maydenhead of this our commen frends Poetrie, himselfe having already in the beginning dedicated it to the Noble and worthy Gentleman, the right worshipfull Ma. Phi. Sidney,[2] a special favourer and maintainer of all kind of learning. Whose cause I pray you Sir, yf Envie shall stur up any wrongful accusasion, defend with your mighty Rhetorick and other your rare gifts of learning, as you can, and shield with your good wil, as you ought, against the malice and outrage of so many enemies, as I know wilbe set on fire with the sparks of his kindled glory. And thus recommending the Author unto you, as unto his most special good frend, and my selfe unto you both, as one making singuler account of two so very good and so choise frends, I bid you both most hartely farwel, and commit you and your most commendable studies to the tuicion of the greatest.

Your owne assuredly to be commaunded
E.K.

[...]

Januarye.

ARGUMENT

In this fyrst Æglogue[3] Colin Cloute a shepheardes boy complaineth him of his unfortunate love, being but newly (as semeth) enamoured of a countrie lasse called Rosalinde: with which strong affection being very sore traveled, he compareth his carefull case[4] to the sadde season of the yeare, to the frostie ground, to the frosen trees, and to his owne winterbeaten flocke. And lastlye, fynding himselfe robbed of all former pleasaunce and delights, hee breaketh his Pipe[5] in peeces, and casteth him selfe to the ground.

COLIN CLOUTE

A Shepeheards boye (no better doe him call)
When Winters wastful spight was almost spent,
All in a sunneshine day, as did befall,
Led forth his flock, that had bene long ypent.[6]
So faynt they woxe,[7] and feeble in the folde,
That now unnethes their feete could them uphold.

All as the Sheepe, such was the shepeheards looke,
For pale and wanne he was, (alas the while,)
May seeme he loved, or els some care he tooke:
Well couth he tune his pipe, and frame his stile.
Tho to a hill his faynting flocke he ledde,
And thus him playnd,[8] the while his shepe there fedde.

Ye Gods of love, that pitie lovers payne,
(If any gods the paine of lovers pitie:)
Looke from above, where you in joyes remaine,
And bowe your eares unto my dolefull dittie.
And Pan[9] thou shepheards God, that once didst love,
Pitie the paines, that thou thy selfe didst prove.

Thou barrein ground, whome winters wrath hath wasted,
Art made a myrhhour, to behold my plight:
Whilome thy fresh spring flowrd, and after hasted
Thy sommer prowde with Daffadillies dight.[10]
And now is come thy wynters stormy state,
Thy mantle mard, wherein thou maskedst late.

Such rage as winters, reigneth in my heart,
My life bloud friesing with unkindly cold:
Such stormy stoures[11] do breede my balefull smart,[12]
As if my yeare were wast, and woxon old.

---

1 voued vowed.

2 Ma. Phi. Sidney Sir Philip Sidney (1554-86), friend of Spenser and author of a pastoral romance and a treatise on poetry (A Defence of Poesy).

3 this fyrst Æglogue amorous complaint modelled on Virgil's Eclogue 2 (Spenser Encycl., p. 646a).

4 carefull case troublesome situation.

5 Pipe panpipe or oaten reed, a symbol of poetic composition or song in classical poetry (Yale).

6 ypent confined, penned-up.

7 woxe grew.

8 playnd bewailed, deplored.

9 Pan god of the pastures.

10 dight decked.

11 stoures times of turmoil and stress. This usage originates with Spenser.

12 balefull smart painful pain (Yale).

And yet alas, but now my spring begonne,
And yet alas, yt is already donne.

You naked trees, whose shady leaves are lost,
Wherein the byrds were wont to build their bowre:
And now are clothd with mosse and hoary frost,
Instede of bloosmes, wherwith your buds did flowre:
I see your teares, that from your boughes doe raine,
Whose drops in drery ysicles remaine.

All so my lustfull leafe is drye and sere,
My timely buds with wayling all are wasted:
The blossome, which my braunch of youth did beare,
With breathed sighes is blowne away, and blasted
And from mine eyes the drizling teares descend,
As on your boughes the ysicles depend.

Thou feeble flocke, whose fleece is rough and rent,[1]
Whose knees are weake through fast and evill fare:
Mayst witnesse well by thy ill governement,
Thy maysters mind is overcome with care.
Thou weake, I wanne: thou leane, I quite forlorne:
With mourning pyne I, you with pyning mourne.

A thousand sithes[2] I curse that carefull hower,
Wherein I longd the neighbour towne to see:
And eke tenne thousand sithes I blesse the stoure,
Wherein I sawe so fayre a sight, as shee.
Yet all for naught: such sight hath bred my bane.
Ah God, that love should breede both joy and payne.

It is not Hobbinol,[3] wherefore I plaine,
Albee my love he seeke with dayly suit:
His clownish gifts and curtsies I disdaine,
His kiddes, his cracknelles, and his early fruit.
Ah foolish Hobbinol, thy gyfts bene vayne:
Colin them gives to Rosalind againe.

I love thilke[4] lasse, (alas why doe I love?)
And am forlorne, (alas why am I lorne?)
Shee deignes not my good will, but doth reprove,
And of my rurall musick holdeth scorne.
Shepheards devise[5] she hateth as the snake,
And laughes the songes, that Colin Clout doth make.

Wherefore my pype, albee[6] rude Pan thou please,
Yet for thou pleasest not, where most I would:
And thou unlucky Muse, that wontst to ease
My musing mynd, yet canst not, when thou should:
Both pype and Muse, shall sore the while abye.[7]
So broke his oaten pype, and downe dyd lye.

By that, the welked[8] Phœbus[9] gan availe,
His weary waine, and nowe the frosty Night
Her mantle black through heaven gan overhaile.
Which seene, the pensife boy halfe in despight
Arose, and homeward drove his sonned[10] sheepe,
Whose hanging heads did seeme his carefull case to weepe.

Colins Embleme.
Anchôra speme.[11]

---

1 rent torn, ragged.
2 sithes times, occasions.
3 Hobbinol reference to Gabriel Harvey, Spenser's Cambridge friend.
4 thilke that, this.
5 devise song, speech; possibly, "appearance" (Yale).
6 albee although.
7 abye abide.
8 welked faded.
9 Phœbus god of the sun (i.e., setting sun).
10 sonned sunned.
11 Anchôra speme Italian, "There is yet hope," alluding to the Christian symbol of the anchor of hope (Hebrews 6:18-19) (Spenser Encycl., p. 652b).

GLOSSE

COLIN CLOUTE) is a name not greatly used, and yet have I sene a Poesie of M. Skelton's[1] under that title. But indeede the word Colin is Frenche, and used of the French Poete Marot (if he be worthy of the name of a Poete) in a certein Æglogue. Under which name this Poete secretly shadoweth himself, as sometime did Virgil under the name of Tityrus, thinking it much fitter, then such Latine names, for the great unlikelyhoode of the language.

unnethes) scarcely.

couthe) commeth of the verbe Conne, that is, to know or to have skill. As well interpreteth the same the worthy Sir Tho. Smitth[2] in his booke of government: wherof I have a perfect copie in wryting, lent me by his kinseman, and my verye singular good freend, M. Gabriel Harvey: as also of some other his most grave and excellent wrytings.

Sythe) time.

Neighbour towne) the next towne: expressing the Latine Vicina.

Stoure) a fitt.

Sere) withered.

His clownish gyfts) imitateth Virgils verse,
Rusticus es Corydon, nec munera curat Alexis.[3]

Hobbinol) is a fained country name, whereby, it being so commune and usuall, seemeth to be hidden the person of some his very speciall and most familiar freend, whom he entirely and extraordinarily beloved, as peradventure[4] shall be more largely declared hereafter. In thys place seemeth to be some savour of disorderly love, which the learned call pæderastice:[5] but it is gathered beside his meaning. For who that hath read Plato his dialogue called Alcybiades,[6] Xenophon and Maximus Tyrius of Socrates opinions, may easily perceive, that such love is muche to be alowed and liked of, specially so meant, as Socrates used it: who sayeth, that in deede he loved Alcybiades extremely, yet not Alcybiades person, but hys soule, which is Alcybiades owne selfe. And so is pæderastice much to be præferred before gynerastice, that is the love whiche enflameth men with lust toward woman kind. But yet let no man thinke, that herein I stand with Lucian or hys devilish disciple Unico Aretino,[7] in defence of execrable and horrible sinnes of forbidden and unlawfull fleshlinesse. Whose abominable errour is fully confuted of Perionius,[8] and others.

I love) a prety Epanorthosis in these two verses, and withall a Paronomasia or playing with the word, where he sayth I love thilke lasse alas &c.

Rosalinde) is also a feigned name, which being wel ordered, wil bewray[9] the very name of hys love and mistresse, whom by that name he coloureth. So as Ovide shadoweth hys love under the name of Corynna,[10] which of some is supposed to be Julia, themperor Augustus his daughter, and wyfe to Agryppa. So doth Aruntius Stella every where call his Lady Asteris and Ianthis, albe it is wel knowen that her right name was Violantilla: as witnesseth Statius in his Epithalamium. And so the famous Paragone of Italy, Madonna Cœlia in her letters envelopeth her selfe under the name of Zima: and Petrona under the name of Bellochia. And this generally hath bene a common custome of counterfeicting the names of secret Personages.

---

[1] Skelton John Skelton (c. 1460-1529; see above pp. 1-9), Henrician poet laureate, wrote an ecclesiastical satire lampooning Cardinal Wolsey, entitled Colin Clout (1529) after its central character, a shrewdly observant clerk (Spenser Encycl., p. 660a). Clément Marot, a Huguenot poet, also assumed the name in his elegy for the mother of Francis I (Variorum).

[2] Sir Tho. Smitth Thomas Smith, Greek professor, ambassador, secretary of state, and author of the Common Wealth of England (1565). During the 1570s he helped Gabriel Harvey obtain his fellowship at Pembroke Hall, Cambridge.

[3] Rusticus es ... Alexis Latin, "Corydon is a bumpkin and Alexis does not pay attention to gifts."

[4] peradventure by chance.

[5] pæderastice the erotic and sexual passion that one man feels for another.

[6] Alcybiades (c. 450-404 BCE), Athenian general and statesman and friend of Socrates (OCD).

[7] Aretino Pietro Aretino (1492-1556), author of a number of particularly lascivious plays and satires (Oxford Companion).

[8] Perionius Joachim Perionius (?1499-1559), a Benedictine humanist who made an attack on Aretino.

[9] bewray disclose, reveal.

[10] Corynna See Ovid, Amores 1.5,11; 2.12,13,17.

Avail) bring downe.
Overhaile) drawe over.

Embleme.

His Embleme or Poesye is here under added in Italian, Anchôra speme: the meaning whereof is, that notwithstandeing his extreme passion and lucklesse love, yet leaning on hope, he is some what recomforted.

Aprill.[1]

ARGUMENT

This Æglogue is purposely intended to the honor and prayse of our most gracious sovereigne, Queene Elizabeth. The speakers herein be Hobbinoll and Thenott, two shepheardes: the which Hobbinoll being before mentioned, greatly to have loved Colin, is here set forth more largely, complayning him of that boyes great misadventure in Love, whereby his mynd was alienate and with drawen not onely from him, who moste loved him, but also from all former delightes and studies, as well in pleasaunt pyping, as conning ryming and singing, and other his laudable exercises. Whereby he taketh occasion, for proofe of his more excellencie and skill in poetrie, to recorde a songe, which the sayd Colin sometime made in honor of her Majestie, whom abruptely he termeth Elysa.[2]

THENOT. HOBBINOLL.

Tell me good Hobbinoll, what garres thee greete?
What? hath some Wolfe thy tender Lambes ytorne?
Or is thy Bagpype broke, that soundes so sweete?
Or art thou of thy loved lasse forlorne?

Or bene thine eyes attempred to the yeare,
Quenching the gasping furrowes thirst with rayne?
Like April shoure, so stremes the trickling teares
Adowne thy cheeke, to quenche thy thristye payne.

HOBBINOLL.

Nor thys, nor that, so muche doeth make me mourne,
But for the ladde, whome long I lovd so deare,
Nowe loves a lasse, that all his love doth scorne:
He plongd[3] in payne, his tressed[4] locks dooth teare.

Shepheards delights he dooth them all forsweare,
Hys pleasaunt Pipe, whych made us meriment,
He wylfully hath broke, and doth forbeare
His wonted songs, wherein he all outwent.[5]

THENOT.

What is he for a Ladde, you so lament?
Ys love such pinching payne to them, that prove?
And hath he skill to make so excellent,
Yet hath so little skill to brydle love.

HOBBINOLL.

Colin thou kenst, the Southerne shepheardes boye:[6]
Him Love hath wounded with a deadly darte.
Whilome on him was all my care and joye,
Forcing with gyfts to winne his wanton heart.

But now from me hys madding mynd is starte,
And woes the Widdowes daughter of the glenne:
So nowe fayre Rosalind hath bredde hys smart,
So now his frend is chaunged for a frenne.

THENOT.

But if hys ditties bene so trimly dight,
I pray thee Hobbinoll, recorde some one:
The whiles our flockes doe graze about in sight,
And we close shrowded in thys shade alone.

---

[1] Aprill Models for Colin's panegyric of Elisa can be found in Theocritus' Idyll 17 and Virgil's Eclogue 4 (Spenser Encycl., p. 647a).

[2] Elysa Eliza, short form of Elizabeth.

[3] plongd plunged.

[4] tressed curled.

[5] outwent surpassed.

[6] Southerne shepheardes boye John Young, bishop of Rochester and former master of Pembroke Hall, Cambridge, which was Spenser's college. He was Young's secretary in 1578 (Variorum).

HOBBINOLL.

Contented I: then will I singe his laye[1]
Of fayre Eliza, Queene of shepheardes all:
Which once he made, as by a spring he laye,
And tuned it unto the Waters fall.

Ye daynty Nymphs, that in this blessed Brooke
Doe bathe your brest,
Forsake your watry bowres, and hether looke,[2]
At my request:
And eke you Virgins, that on Parnasse dwell,
Whence floweth Helicon the learned well,
Helpe me to blaze
Her worthy praise,
Which in her sexe doth all excell.

Of fayre Elisa be your silver song,
That blessed wight:[3]
The flowre of Virgins, may shee florish long,
In princely plight.
For shee is Syrinx daughter without spotte,
Which Pan[4] the shepheards God of her begot:
So sprong her grace
Of heavenly race,
No mortall blemishe may her blotte.

See, where she sits upon the grassie greene,
(O seemely sight)
Ycald in Scarlot like a mayden Queene,
And Ermines white.
Upon her head a Cremosin[5] coronet,
With Damaske roses and Daffadillies set:
Bayleaves betweene,
And Primroses greene
Embellish the sweete Violet.

Tell me, have ye seene her angelick face,
Like Phœbe fayre?
Her heavenly haveour,[6] her princely grace
Can you well compare?
The Redde rose medled with the White[7] yfere,
In either cheeke depeincten[8] lively chere.
Her modest eye,
Her Majestie,
Where have you seene the like, but there?

I sawe Phœbus thrust out his golden hedde,
Upon her to gaze:
But when he sawe, how broade her beames did spredde,
It did him amaze.
He blusht to see another Sunne belowe,
Ne durst againe his fyrye face out showe:
Let him, if he dare,
His brightnesse compare
With hers, to have the overthrowe.

Shewe thy selfe Cynthia[9] with thy silver rayes,
And be not abasht:
When shee the beames of her beauty displayes,
O how art thou dasht?
But I will not match her with Latonaes seede,[10]
Such follie great sorow to Niobe did breede.
Now she is a stone,
And makes dayly mone,
Warning all other to take heede.

Pan may be proud, that ever he begot
Such a Bellibone,
And Syrinx rejoyse, that ever was her lot
To beare such an one.
Soone as my younglings cryen for the dam,

---

1 laye short lyric or narrative poem intended to be sung (Oxford Companion).

2 hether looke i.e., look here.

3 wight person.

4 Syrinx ... Pan Syrinx was a nymph from Artemis' company who was pursued by Pan. In order to preserve her virginity, she begged the river nymphs to help her and they turned her into a bed of reeds. Upon reaching the river, Pan made his pipes from the same reeds (Dict. Gods and Mortals).

5 Cremosin crimson.

6 haveour bearing.

7 Redde rose ... White As well as being a conventional representation of female beauty, the red rose superimposed on a white rose was the emblem of the house of Tudor.

8 depeincten depict.

9 Cynthia goddess of the moon.

10 Latonaes seede Apollo and Diana, who killed the children of Niobe after the latter bragged that she had fourteen to Latona's (or Leto's) two (Dict. Gods and Mortals). See Ovid, Metamorphoses, Book 6.

To her will I offer a milkwhite Lamb:
Shee is my goddesse plaine,
And I her shepherds swayne,[1]
Albee forswonck and forswatt I am.

I see Calliope[2] speede her to the place,
Where my Goddesse shines:
And after her the other Muses trace,
With their Violines.
Bene they not Bay braunches, which they doe beare,
All for Elisa in her hand to weare?
So sweetely they play,
And sing all the way,
That it a heaven is to heare.

Lo how finely the Graces can it foote
To the Instrument:
They dauncen deffly,[3] and singen soote,[4]
In their meriment.
Wants not a fourth Grace, to make the daunce even?
Let that rowme to my Lady be yeven:
She shalbe a grace,
To fyll the fourth place,
And reigne with the rest in heaven.

And whither rennes this bevie of Ladies bright,
Raunged in a rowe?
They bene all Ladyes of the lake behight,
That unto her goe.
Chloris, that is the chiefest Nymph of al,
Of Olive braunches beares a Coronall:
Olives bene for peace,
When wars doe surcease:
Such for a Princesse bene principall.

Ye shepheards daughters, that dwell on the greene,
Hye[5] you there apace:
Let none come there, but that Virgins bene,
To adorne her grace.
And when you come, whereas shee is in place,
See, that your rudenesse doe not you disgrace:
Binde your fillets[6] faste,
And gird in your waste,
For more finesse, with a tawdrie lace.

Bring hether the Pincke and purple Cullambine,
With Gelliflowres:
Bring Coronations, and Sops in wine,
Worne of Paramoures.
Strowe me the ground with Daffadowndillies
And Cowslips, and Kingcups, and loved Lillies:
The pretie Pawnce,
And the Chevissaunce,
Shall match with the fayre flowre Delice.[7]

Now ryse up Elisa, decked as thou art,
In royall aray:
And now ye daintie Damsells may depart
Eche one her way,
I feare, I have troubled your troupes to longe:
Let dame Elisa thanke you for her song.
And if you come hether,
When Damsines[8] I gether,
I will part with them all you among.

THENOT.

And was thilk[9] same song of Colins owne making?
Ah foolish boy, that is with love yblent:
Great pittie is, he be in such taking,
For naught caren, that bene so lewdly bent.

---

1 swayne male servant.
2 Calliope Muse of heroic epic.
3 deffly deftly.
4 soote sweet(ly).
5 hye hasten.
6 fillets headbands.
7 Pincke, Cullambine, Gelliflowres, Coronations, Sops in wine, Pawnce, flowre Delice i.e., pinks, columbine, gillyflowers (clove pinks), carnations, clove pink used to flavour wine, pansy, fleur de lis. The last was the French royal emblem, significant because Elizabeth I's title proclaimed her Queen of France.
8 Damsines damsons, small blue plums.
9 thilk this.

HOBBINOLL.

Sicker[1] I hold him, for a greater fon,[2]
That loves the thing, he cannot purchase.
But let us homeward: for night draweth on,
And twincling starres the daylight hence chase.

Thenots Embleme.
O quam te memorem virgo?

Hobbinols Embleme.
O dea certe.[3]

GLOSSE.

Gars thee greete) causeth thee weepe and complain.

Forlorne) left and forsaken.

Attempred to the yeare) aggreable to the season of the yeare, that is Aprill, which moneth is most bent to shoures and seasonable rayne: to quench, that is, to delaye the drought, caused through drynesse of March wyndes.

The Ladde) Colin Clout.

The Lasse) Rosalinda.

Tressed locks) wrethed and curled.

Is he for a ladde) A straunge manner of speaking .s. what maner of Ladde is he?

To make) to rime and versifye. For in this word making, our olde Englishe Poetes were wont to comprehend all the skil of Poetrye, according to the Greeke woorde ποιεῖν,[4] to make, whence commeth the name of Poetes.

Colin thou kenst) knowest. Seemeth hereby that Colin perteyneth to some Southern noble man, and perhaps in Surrye or Kent, the rather bicause he so often nameth the Kentish downes, and before, As lythe as lasse of Kent.

The Widowes) He calleth Rosalind the Widowes daughter of the glenne, that is, of a country Hamlet or borough, which I thinke is rather sayde to coloure and concele the person, then simply spoken. For it is well knowen, even in spighte of Colin and Hobbinoll, that shee is a Gentle woman of no meane house, nor endewed with anye vulgare and common gifts both of nature and manners: but suche indeede, as neede nether Colin be ashamed to have her made knowne by his verses, nor Hobbinoll be greved, that so she should be commended to immortalitie for her rare and singular Vertues: Specially deserving it no lesse, then eyther Myrto the most excellent Poete Theocritus his dearling, or Lauretta the divine Petrarches Goddesse, or Himera the worthye Poete Stesichorus[5] hys Idole: Upon whom he is sayd so much to have doted, that in regard of her excellencie, he scorned and wrote against the beauty of Helena. For which his præsemptuous and unheedie hardinesse, he is sayde by vengeaunce of the Gods, thereat being offended, to have lost both his eyes.

Frenne) a straunger. The word I thinke was first poetically put, and afterwarde used in commen custome of speach for forenne.

Dight) adorned.

Laye) a songe. As Roundelayes and Virelayes.[6] In all this songe is not to be respected, what the worthinesse of her Majestie deserveth, nor what to the highnes of a Prince is agreeable, but what is moste comely for the meanesse of a shepheards witte, or to conceive, or to utter. And therefore he calleth her Elysa, as through rudenesse tripping in her name: and a shepheards daughter, it being very unfit, that a shepheards boy brought up in the shepefold, should know, or ever seme to have heard of a Queenes roialty.

Ye daintie) is, as it were an Exordium ad preparandos animos.[7]

---

[1] Sicker surely.

[2] fon fool.

[3] O quam te memorem virgo? ... O dea certe Latin, "Oh what shall I call thee, virgin? ... Oh goddess surely!" Both Thenot's and Hobbinoll's emblems are from the same incident in Aeneid Book 1, in which Aeneas mistakes his mother Venus for Diana (Spenser Encycl., p. 652c).

[4] ποιεῖν poiein (Greek), "to do, make, create" (Yale).

[5] Myrto … Stesichorus pairs of classical and Italian love poets and the ladies who inspired their poetry.

[6] Roundelayes and Virelayes roundelays short simple songs with refrains; virelays songs or short lyric pieces, of a type originating in France in the fourteenth century, usually consisting of short lines arranged in stanzas with only two rhymes, the end-rhyme of one stanza being the chief one of the next.

[7] Exordium ad preparandos animos Latin, "an introduction to prepare the hearers" (Yale).

Virgins) the nine Muses, daughters of Apollo and Memorie, whose abode the Poets faine to be on Parnassus, a hill in Grece, for that in that countrye specially florished the honor of all excellent studies.

Helicon) is both the name of a fountaine at the foote of Parnassus, and also of a mounteine in Bæotia, out of which floweth the famous Spring Castalius, dedicate also to the Muses: of which spring it is sayd, that when Pegasus the winged horse of Perseus (whereby is meant fame and flying renowme) strooke the grownde with his hoofe, sodenly thereout sprange a wel of moste cleare and pleasaunte water, which fro thence forth was consecrate to the Muses and Ladies of learning.

Your silver song) seemeth to imitate the lyke in Hesiodus

ἀργυρέον μέλος.[1]

Syrinx) is the name of a Nymphe of Arcadie, whom when Pan being in love pursued, she flying from him, of the Gods was turned into a reede. So that Pan catching at the Reedes in stede of the Damosell, and puffing hard (for he was almost out of wind) with hys breath made the Reedes to pype: which he seeing, tooke of them, and in remembraunce of his lost love, made him a pype thereof. But here by Pan and Syrinx is not to bee thoughte, that the shephearde simplye meante those Poetical Gods: but rather supposing (as seemeth) her graces progenie to be divine and immortall (so as the Paynims were wont to judge of all Kinges and Princes, according to Homeres saying.

Θυμὸς δὴ μέγας ἐστὶ διοτρεφέως βασιλήως τιμὴ δ᾽ ἐκ διός ἐστι, φιλεῖ δε ὸ μητίετα Ζεύς[2])

could devise no parents in his judgement so worthy for her, as Pan the shepeheards God, and his best beloved Syrinx. So that by Pan is here meant the most famous and victorious King, her highnesse Father, late of worthy memorye K. Henry the eyght. And by that name, oftymes (as hereafter appeareth) be noted kings and mighty Potentates: And in some place Christ himselfe, who is the verye Pan and god of Shepheardes.

Cremosin coronet) he deviseth her crowne to be of the finest and most delicate flowers, instede of perles and precious stones, wherewith Princes Diademes use to bee adorned and embost.

Embellish) beautifye and set out.

Phebe) the Moone, whom the Poets faine to be sister unto Phæbus, that is the Sunne.

Medled) mingled.

Yfere) together. By the mingling of the Redde rose and the White, is meant the uniting of the two principall houses of Lancaster and of Yorke: by whose longe discord and deadly debate, this realm many yeares was sore traveiled, and almost cleane decayed. Til the famous Henry the seventh, of the line of Lancaster, taking to wife the most vertuous Princesse Elisabeth, daughter to the fourth Edward of the house of Yorke, begat the most royal Henry the eyght aforesayde, in whom was the firste union of the Whyte Rose and the Redde.

Calliope) one of the nine Muses: to whome they assigne the honor of all Poetical Invention, and the firste glorye of the Heriocall verse. Other say, that shee is the Goddesse of Rhetorick: but by Virgile it is manifeste, that they mystake the thyng. For there in hys Epigrams, that arte semeth to be attributed to Polymnia, saying:

> Signat cuncta manu, loquiturque
> Polymnia gestu.[3]

which seemeth specially to be meant of Action and elocution, both special partes of Rhetorick: besyde that her name, which (as some construe it) importeth great remembraunce, conteineth another part. But I holde rather with them, which call her Polymnia or Polyhymnia[4] of her good singing.

---

[1] ἀργυρέου μέλος Greek, "argurion melos" (i.e., "silver song"), but not in Hesiod (Yale).

[2] Θυμὸς ... Ζεύς Greek, "For the anger of god-upheld kings is a great matter, to whom honour and love are given from Zeus to the counsels" (Iliad 2.196-97; Yale).

[3] Signat ... gestu Latin, "Polymnia indicates everything with her hand and speaks through action."

[4] Polyhymnia Muse of sacred poetry.

Bay branches) be the signe of honor and victory, and therfore of myghty Conquerors worn in theyr triumphes, and eke of famous Poets, as saith Petrarch in hys Sonets.

Arbor vittoriosa triomphale,
Honor d'Imperadori & di Poëti, &c.[1]

The Graces) be three sisters, the daughters of Jupiter, (whose names are Aglaia, Thalia, Euphrosyne, and Homer onely addeth a fourth .s. Pasithea) otherwise called Charites, that is thanks. Whom the Poetes feyned to be the Goddesses of al bountie and comelines, which therefore (as sayth Theodontius) they make three, to wete, that men first ought to be gracious and bountiful to other freely, then to receive benefits at other mens hands curteously, and thirdly to requite them thankfully: which are three sundry Actions in liberalitye. And Boccace[2] saith, that they be painted naked, (as they were indeede on the tombe of C. Julius Cæsar) the one having her backe toward us, and her face fromwarde, as proceeding from us: the other two toward us, noting double thanke to be due to us for the benefit, we have done.

Deffly) Finelye and nimbly.

Soote) Sweete.

Meriment) Mirth.

Bevie) A beavie of Ladyes, is spoken figuratively for a company or troupe. The terme is taken of Larkes. For they say a Bevie of Larkes, even as a Covey of Partridge, or an eye of Pheasaunts.

Ladyes of the lake) be Nymphes. For it was an olde opinion amongste the Auncient Heathen, that of every spring and fountaine was a goddesse the Soveraigne. Whiche opinion stucke in the myndes of men not manye yeares sithence, by meanes of certain fine fablers and lowd lyers, such as were the Authors of King Arthure the great and such like, who tell many an unlawfull leasing[3] of the Ladyes of the Lake, that is, the Nymphes. For the word Nymphe in Greeke signifieth Well water, or otherwise a Spouse or Bryde.

Behight) called or named.

Cloris) the name of a Nymph, and signifieth greenesse, of whome is sayd, the Zephyrus the Westerne wind being in love with her, and coveting her to wyfe, gave her for a dowrie, the chiefedome and soveraigntye of al flowres and greene herbes, growing on earth.

Olives bene) The Olive was wont to be the ensigne of Peace and quietnesse, eyther for that it cannot be planted and pruned, and so carefully looked to, as it ought, but in time of peace: or els for that the Olive tree, they say, will not growe neare the Firre tree, which is dedicate to Mars the God of battaile, and used most for speares and other instruments of warre. Whereupon is finely feigned, that when Neptune and Minerva strove for the naming of the citie of Athens, Neptune striking the ground with his mace, caused a horse to come forth, that importeth warre, but at Minervaes stroke sprong out an Olive, to note that it should be a nurse of learning, and such peaceable studies.

Binde your) Spoken rudely, and according to shepheardes simplicitye.

Bring) all these be names of flowers. Sops in wine a flowre in colour much like to a Coronation, but differing in smel and quantitye. Flowre delice, that which they use to misterme, Flowre de luce, being in Latine called Flos delitiarum.[4]

A Bellibone) or Bonibell. Homely spoken for a fayre mayde or Bonilasse.

Forswonck and forswatt) overlaboured and sunneburnt.

I saw Phæbus) the sunne. A sensible Narration, and present view of the thing mentioned, which they call παρουσία.[5]

Cynthia) the Moone so called of Cynthus a hyll, where she was honoured.

---

[1] Arbor … &c. Italian, "Victorious and triumphant tree, the honour of emperors and poets" (Petrarch, Rime Sparse 263).

[2] Boccace Giovanni Boccaccio (1313-75), popular Italian writer whose Genealogia Deorum ("The Genealogy of the Gods") was a principle source for Spenser's use of myth (Spenser Encycl., p. 98b).

[3] leasing lie (Yale).

[4] Flos delitiarum Latin, "flower of pleasure" (Yale).

[5] παρουσία Greek, "parousia" (i.e., making a thing seem present) (Yale).

Latonaes seede) Was Apollo and Diana. Whom when as Niobe the wife of Amphion scorned, in respect of the noble fruict of her wombe, namely her seven sonnes, and so many daughters, Latona being therewith displeased, commaunded her sonne Phœbus to slea al the sonnes, and Diana all the daughters: whereat the unfortunate Niobe being sore dismayed, and lamenting out of measure, was feigned of the Poetes, to be turned into a stone upon the sepulchre of her children. For which cause the shepheard sayth, he will not compare her to them, for feare of like mysfortune. Now rise) is the conclusion. For having so decked her with prayses and comparisons, he returneth all the thanck of hys laboure to the excellencie of her Majestie.

When Damsins) A base reward of a clownish giver.

Yblent) Y is a poeticall addition. Blent blinded.

Embleme.

This Poesye is taken out of Virgile, and there of him used in the person of Æneas to his mother Venus, appearing to him in likenesse of one of Dianaes damosells: being there most divinely set forth. To which similitude of divinitie Hobbinoll comparing the excelency of Elisa, and being through the worthynes of Colins song, as it were, overcome with the hugeness of his imagination, brusteth out in great admiration, (O quam te memorem virgo?) being otherwise unhable, then by soddein silence, to expresse the worthinesse of his conceipt.[1] Whom Thenot answereth with another part of the like verse, as confirming by his graunt and approvaunce, that Elisa is no whit inferiour to the Majestie of her, of whome that Poete so boldly pronounced, O dea certe.

[1] conceipt idea.

October

ARGUMENT.

In Cuddie is set out the perfecte paterne of a Poete, whiche finding no maintenaunce of his state and studies, complayneth of the contempte of Poetrie,[2] and the causes thereof: Specially having bene in all ages, and even amongst the most barbarous alwayes of singular accounpt and honor, and being indede so worthy and commendable an arte: or rather no arte, but a divine gift and heavenly instinct not to bee gotten by laboure and learning, but adorned with both: and poured into the witte by a certaine ἐνθουσιχσμὸς.[3] and celestiall inspiration, as the Author hereof els where at large discourseth, in his booke called the Englishe Poete, which booke being lately come to my hands, I mynde also by Gods grace upon further advisement to publish.

PIERS. CUDDIE.

Cuddie, for shame hold up thy heavye head,
And let us cast with what delight to chace,
And weary thys long lingring Phœbus race.[4]
Whilome thou wont the shepheards laddes to leade,
In rymes, in ridles, and in bydding[5] base:
Now they in thee, and thou in sleepe art dead.

CUDDIE.

Piers, I have pyped erst so long with payne,
That all mine Oten reedes[6] bene rent and wore:
And my poore Muse hath spent her spared[7] store,
Yet little good hath got, and much less gayne.

[2] contempte of Poetrie a topic explored in Theocritus' "Idyll 16" and Mantuan's "Eclogue 5."

[3] ἐνθουσιχσμὸς Greek, "enthusiasmos" (i.e., enthusiasm, inspiration, possession by a divinity) (Yale).

[4] Phœbus race Sun god (i.e., course of the day).

[5] bydding game, here probably a poetry contest.

[6] Oten reedes rustic pipes.

[7] spared saved up (Yale).

Such pleasaunce makes the Grashopper so poore,[1]
And ligge so layd, when Winter doth her straine:

The dapper ditties, that I wont devise,
To feede youthes fancie, and the flocking fry,
Delighten much: what I the bett for thy?[2]
They han the pleasure, I a sclender[3] prise.
I beate the bush, the byrds to them doe flye:
What good thereof to Cuddie can arise?

PIERS.

Cuddie, the prayse is better, then the price,
The glory eke much greater then the gayne:
O what an honor is it, to restraine
The lust of lawlesse youth with good advice:
Or pricke them forth with pleasaunce of thy vaine,
Whereto thou list[4] their trayned willes entice.

Soone as thou gynst to sette thy notes in frame,[5]
O how the rurall routes to thee doe cleave:
Seemeth thou dost their soule of sence bereave,
All as the shepheard, that did fetch his dame
From Plutoes balefull bowre[6] withouten leave:
His musicks might the hellish hound did tame.[7]

CUDDIE.

So praysen babes the Peacoks spotted traine,
And wondren at bright Argus[8] blazing eye:
But who rewards him ere the more for thy?
Or feedes him once the fuller by a graine?

Sike prayse is smoke, that sheddeth in the skye,
Sike words bene wynd, and wasten soone in vayne.

PIERS.

Abandon then the base and viler clowne,
Lyft up thy selfe out of the lowly dust:
And sing of bloody Mars, or wars, of giusts,[9]
Turne thee to those, that weld[10] the awful crowne.
To doubted Knights, whose woundlesse armour rusts,
And helmes unbruzed wexen[11] dayly browne.

There may thy Muse display her fluttryng wing,
And stretch her selfe at large from East to West:
Whither thou list in fayre Elisa rest,
Or if thee please in bigger notes to sing,
Advaunce the worthy whome shee loveth best,
That first the white beare to the stake did bring.[12]

And when the stubborne stroke of stronger stounds,[13]
Has somewhat slackt the tenor of thy string:
Of love and lustihead[14] tho mayst thou sing,
And carrol lowde, and leade the Myllers rownde,
All were Elisa one of thilke[15] same ring.
So mought our Cuddies name to Heaven sownde.

CUDDIE.

Indeede the Romish Tityrus, I heare,
Through his Mecœnas[16] left his Oaten reede,
Whereon he earst had taught his flocks to feede,
And laboured lands to yield the timely eare,

[1] Grashopper so poore In Aesop's fable, the ant works hard all summer to build a house and lay in supplies for winter, while the grasshopper dances and plays the summer away. In winter the grasshopper is left without food or shelter and dies in the cold.

[2] what ... thy? how does that better me?

[3] sclender small, trifling .

[4] list wish, will.

[5] frame order (Yale).

[6] Plutoes balefull bowre the Underworld or classical dwelling of the dead.

[7] His musicks ... tame Cerberus, the three-headed dog who guards the entrance to Hades was quelled by Orpheus, which allowed Orpheus to bring his wife, Eurydice up from the underworld (Dict. Gods and Mortals).

[8] Argus many-eyed monster.

[9] giusts jousts.

[10] weld wield.

[11] wexen grew.

[12] white beare ... bring A bear chained to an uprooted tree stump was on the Dudley family (i.e., on Leicester's) crest (Yale).

[13] stounds blows.

[14] lustihead pleasure, lustfullness.

[15] thilke this.

[16] Mecœnas Maecenas was friend, counsellor, and diplomatic agent of the Roman emperor Octavian (Augustus) and patron of Virgil, Horace, and Propertius. His name came to symbolize generous patronage (OCD). "Tityrus" here refers to Virgil.

And eft did sing of warres and deadly drede,
So as the Heavens did quake his verse to here.

But ah Mecœnas is yclad in claye,
And great Augustus[1] long ygoe is dead:
And all the worthies liggen wrapt in leade,[2]
That matter made for Poets on to play:
For ever, who in derring doe were dreade,
The loftie verse of hem was loved aye.

But after vertue gan for age to stoupe,
And mighty manhode brought a bedde of ease:
The vaunting Poets found nought worth a pease,
To put in preace[3] emong the learned troupe.
Tho gan the streames of flowing wittes to cease,
And sonnebright honour pend in shamefull coupe.

And if that any buddes of Poesie,
Yet of the old stocke gan to shoote agayne:
Or it mens follies mote be forst to fayne,
And rolle with rest in rymes of rybaudrye:[4]
Or as it sprong, it wither must agayne:
Tom Piper[5] makes us better melodie.

PIERS.

O pierlesse Poesye, where is then thy place?
If nor in Princes pallace thou doe sitt:
(And yet is Princes pallace the most fitt)
Ne brest of baser birth doth thee embrace.
Then make thee winges of thine aspyring wit,
And, whence thou camst, flye backe to heaven apace.

CUDDIE.

Ah Percy[6] it is all to weake and wanne,
So high to sore, and make so large a flight:
Her peeced pyneons[7] bene not so in plight,
For Colin fittes[8] such famous flight to scanne:[9]
He, were he not with love so ill bedight,[10]
Would mount as high, and sing as soote[11] as Swanne.

PIERS.

Ah fon,[12] for love does teach him climbe so hie,
And lyftes him up out of the loathsome myre:
Such immortall mirrhor, as he doth admire,
Would rayse ones mynd above the starry skie.
And cause a caytive corage to aspire,
For lofty love doth loath a lowly eye.

CUDDIE.

All otherwise the state of Poet stands,
For lordly love is such a Tyranne fell:
That where he rules, all power he doth expell.
The vaunted verse a vacant head demaundes,
Ne wont with crabbed care the Muses dwell.
Unwisely weaves, that takes two webbes in hand.

Who ever casts to compasse weightye prise,
And thinks to throwe out thondring words of threate:
Let powre in lavish cups and thriftie bitts of meate,
For Bacchus fruite is frend to Phœbus[13] wise.
And when with Wine the braine begins to sweate,
The nombers[14] flowe as fast as spring doth ryse.

Thou kenst[15] not Percie howe the ryme should rage.
O if my temples were distaind with wine,
And girt in girlonds of wild Yvie twine,
How I could reare the Muse on stately stage,
And teache her tread aloft in buskin fine,
With queint Bellona in her equipage.

---

1 Augustus the emperor who favoured Virgil.
2 liggen wrapt in leade lie buried (in lead-lined caskets).
3 preace i.e., press, exercise, put in practice.
4 rybaudrye i.e., ribaldry, obscenity, coarse language.
5 Tom Piper a piper who accompanied morris dancers.
6 Percy Piers.
7 peeced pyneons patched wings.
8 fittes is suitable for.
9 scanne attempt.
10 bedight apparelled, arrayed.
11 soote sweetly.
12 fon fool.
13 Bacchus … Phœbus respectively, the god of wine and the sun god, leader of the Muses.
14 nombers verses.
15 kenst know, understand.

But ah my corage cooles ere it be warme,
For thy, content us in thys humble shade:
Where no such troublous tydes han us assayde,
Here we our slender pipes may safely charme.

PIERS.

And when my Gates shall han their bellies layd:
Cuddie shall have a Kidde to store his farme.

Cuddies Embleme.
Agitante calescimus illo &c.[1]

GLOSSE

This Æglogue is made in imitation of Theocritus[2] his xvi. Idilion, wherein hee reproved the Tyranne Hiero of Syracuse[3] for his nigardise towarde Poetes, in whome is the power to make men immortal for theyr good dedes, or shameful for their naughty lyfe. And the lyke also is in Mantuane,[4] The style hereof as also that in Theocritus, is more loftye then the rest, and applyed to the heighte of Poeticall witte.

Cuddie) I doubte whether by Cuddie be specified the authour selfe, or some other. For in the eyght Æglogue the same person was brought in, singing a Cantion of Colins making, as he sayeth. So that some doubt, that the persons be different.

Whilome) sometime.

Oaten reedes) Avena.

Ligge so layde) lye so faynt and unlustye.

Dapper) pretye.

Frye) is a bold Metaphore, forced from the spawning fishes. For the multitude of young fish be called the frye.

To restraine.) This place seemeth to conspyre with Plato, who in his first booke de Legibus sayeth, that the first invention of Poetry was of very vertuous intent. For at what time an infinite number of youth usually came to theyr great solemne feastes call Panegyrica, which they used every five yeere to hold, some learned man being more hable then the rest, for speciall gyftes of wytte and Musicke, would take upon him to sing fine verses to the people, in prayse eyther of vertue or of victory or of immortality or such like. At whose wonderful gyft al men being astonied and as it were ravished, with delight, thinking (as it was indeed) that he was inspired from above, called him vatem:[5] which kinde of men afterwarde framing their verses to lighter musick (as of musick be many kinds, some sadder, some lighter, some martiall, some heroical: and so diversly eke affect the mynds of men) found out lighter matter of Poesie also, some playing wyth love, some scorning at mens fashions, some powred out in pleasures, and so were called Poetes or makers.

Sence bereave) what the secrete working of Musick is in the myndes of men, as well appeareth, hereby, that some of the auncient Philosophers, and those the moste wise, as Plato and Pythagoras held for opinion, that the mynd was made of a certaine harmonie and musicall nombers,[6] for the great compassion and likenes of affection in thone and in the other as also by that memorable history of Alexander: to whom when as Timotheus the great Musitian playd the Phrygian melodie, it is said, that he was distraught with such unwonted fury, that streight way rysing from the table in great rage, he caused himselfe to be armed, as ready to goe to warre (for that musick is very war like): And immediatly whenas the Musitian chaunged his stroke into the Lydian and Ionique harmony, he was so furr from warring, that he sat as styl, as if he had bene in matters of counsell. Such might is in musick. Wherefore

[1] Agitante calescimus illo &c. Latin, "There is a god within us. It is when he stirs that our bosom warms; it is his impulse that sows the seeds of inspiration" (Ovid, Fasti 6) (Spenser Encycl., p. 653c).

[2] Theocritus third-century BCE originator of the pastoral genre, particularly noted for his use of the eclogue (Spenser Encycl., p. 685c).

[3] Hiero of Syracuse Hieron II (c. 306-215 BCE), reigned as tyrant of Syracuse for 54 years (OCD).

[4] Mantuane Giovanni Baptista Spagnolo (1448-1516), author of neo-Latin eclogues used as a school text throughout Europe in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries (Spenser. Encycl., p. 452b).

[5] vatem seer, prophet.

[6] certaine harmonie and musicall nombers Pythagoras determined that music and mathematics were related because the chief musical intervals could be demonstrated as simple ratios based on their position on a lyre string. Plato then argued that music has the capacity to affect not only emotions but character, making certain styles more morally salubrious than others (OCD).

Plato and Aristotle forbid the Arabian[1] Melodie from children and youth. For that being altogither on the fyft and vii, tone, it is of great force to molifie and quench the kindly courage, which useth to burne in yong brests. So that it is not incredible which the Poete here sayth, that Musick can bereave the soule of sence.

The shepheard that) Orpheus:[2] of whom is sayd, that by his excellent skil in Musick and Poetry, he recovered his wife Eurydice from hell.

Argus eyes) of Argus is before said, that Juno to him committed hir husband Jupiter his Paragon Iô, bicause he had an hundred eyes: but afterwarde Mercury wyth hys Musick lulling Argus aslepe, slew him and brought Iô away, whose eyes it is sayd that Juno for his eternall memory placed in her byrd the Peacocks tayle. For those coloured spots indeede resemble eyes.

Woundlesse armour) unwounded in warre, doe rust through long peace.

Display) A poeticall metaphore: whereof the meaning is, that if the Poet list showe his skill in matter of more dignitie, then is the homely Æglogue, good occasion is him offered of higher veyne and more Heroicall argument, in the person of our most gratious soveraign, whom (as before) he calleth Elisa. Or if mater of knighthoode and chevalrie please him better, that there be many Noble and valiaunt men, that are both worthy of his payne in theyr deserved prayses, and also favourers of hys skil and faculty.

The worthy) he meaneth (as I guesse) the most honorable and renowmed the Erle of Leycester,[3] whom by his cognisance[4] (although the same be also proper to other) rather then by his name he bewrayeth, being not likely, that the names of noble princes be known to country clowne.

Slack) that is when thou chaungest thy verse from stately discourse, to matter of more pleasaunce and delight.The Millers) a kind of daunce.

Ring) company of dauncers.

The Romish Tityrus) wel knowen to be Virgile, who by Mecænas means was brought into the favour of the Emperor Augustus, and by him moved to write in loftier kinde, then he erst had doen.

Whereon) in these three verses are the three severall workes of Virgile intended. For in teaching his flocks to feede, is meant his Æglogues. In labouring of lands, is hys Bucoliques. In singing of wars and deadly dreade, is his divine Æneis figured.

In derring doe) In manhoode and chevalrie.

For ever) He sheweth the cause, why Poetes were wont be had in such honor of noble men; that is, that by them worthines and valor shold through theyr famous Posies be commended to al posterities. Wherfore it is sayd, that Achilles had never bene so famous, as he is, but for Homeres immortal verses. Which is the only advantage, which he had of Hector. And also that Alexander the great comming to his tombe in Sigeus, with naturall teares blessed him, that ever was his hap to be honoured with so excellent a Poets work: as so renowmed and ennobled onely by hys meanes. Which being declared in a most eloquent Oration of Tullies,[5] is of Petrarch no lesse worthely sette forth in a sonet

Guinto Alexandro a la famosa tomba
Del fero Achille sospírando disse
O fortunato che si chiara tromba. Trouasti &c.[6]

---

[1] Phrygian … Lydian … Ionique … Arabian musical modes with particular effects on character. Plato considered the Lydian and Ionic effeminate, while the Phrygian (and Dorian) encouraged courage and sobriety (OCD).

[2] Orpheus the supreme minstrel of Greek mythology, devoted to his wife, Eurydice, whose loss silences his music.

[3] Erle of Leycester Robert Dudley (c. 1532-88), favourite of Queen Elizabeth and uncle of Philip Sidney, whom Spenser served briefly and who may have been the intended dedicatee for The Shepheardes Calender (Spenser Encycl., p. 432a).

[4] cognisance badge, crest.

[5] Oration of Tullies referring to Cicero's Pro Archia Poetae, a speech written in defence of Aulus Licinius Archias, a poet accused of not being a Roman citizen. The speech addresses the power and importance of poetry.

[6] Guinto … Trouasti &c. Italian, "When Alexander reached the famous tomb of fierce Achilles, he sighed and said 'O fortunate man who found so clear a trumpet'" (Petrarch, Rime Sparse 187).

And that such account hath bene alwayes made of Poetes, as well sheweth this that the worthy Scipio in all his warres against Carthage and Numantia had evermore in his company, and that in a most familiar sort the good olde Poet Ennius: as also that Alexander destroying Thebes, when he was enformed that the famous Lyrick Poet Pindarus was borne in that citie, not onely commaunded streightly, that no man should upon payne of death do any violence to that house by fire or otherwise: but also specially spared most, and some highly rewarded, that were of hys kinne. So favoured he the only name of Poete. Whych prayse otherwise was in the same man no lesse famous, that when he came to ransacking of king Darius coffers, whom he lately had overthrowen, he founde in a little coffer of silver the two bookes of Homers works, as layd up there for speciall jewells and richesse, which he taking thence, put one of them dayly in his bosome, and thother every night layde under his pillowe. Such honor have Poetes alwayes found in the sight of princes and noble men. Which this author here very well sheweth, as els where more notably.

But after) he sheweth the cause of contempt of Poetry to be idlenesse and basenesse of mynd.

Pent) shut up in slouth, as in a coope or cage.

Tom piper) An Ironicall Sarcasmus, spoken in derision of these rude wits, whych make more account of a ryming rybaud, then of skill grounded upon learning and judgment.

Ne brest) the meaner sort of men.

Her peeced pinions) unperfect skil. Spoken wyth humble modestie.

As soote as Swanne) The comparison seemeth to be strange: for the swanne hath ever wonne small commendation for her swete singing: but is sayd of the learned that the swan a little before hir death, singeth most pleasantly, as prophecying by a secrete instinct her neere destinie. As wel sayth the Poete elswhere in one of his sonetts.

> The silver swanne doth sing before her dying day
> As shee that feeles the deepe delight that is in death &c.

Immortall myrrhour) Beauty, which is an excellent object of Poeticall spirites, as appeareth by the worthy Petrarchs saying.

> Fiorir faceua il mio debile ingegno
> A la sua ombra, et crescer ne gli affanni.

A caytive corage) a base and abject minde.

For lofty love) I think this playing with the letter to be rather a fault then a figure, as wel in our English tongue, as it hath bene alwayes in the Latine, called Cacozelon.[1]

A vacant) imitateth Mantuanes saying, vacuum curis divína cerebrum Poscit.[2] Lavish cups) Resembleth that comen verse Fæcundi calices quem non fecere disertum.[3]

O if my) He seemeth here to be ravished with a Poetical furie. For (if one rightly mark) the numbers rise so ful, and the verse groweth so big, that it seemeth he hath forgot the meanenesse of shepheards state and stile.

Wild yvie) for it is dedicated to Bacchus and therefore it is sayd that the Mænades (that is Bacchus franticke priestes) used in theyr sacrifice to carry Thyrsos, which were pointed staves or Javelins, wrapped about with yvie.

In buskin) it was the maner of Poetes and plaiers in tragedies to were buskins, as also in Comedies to use stockes and light shoes. So that the buskin in Poetry is used for tragical matter, as is said in Virgile, Sola sophocleo tua carmina digna cothurno. And the like in Horace, Magnum loqui, nitique cothurno.[4] Queint) strange Bellona; the goddesse of battaile, that is Pallas, which may therefore wel be called

---

[1] Cacozelon cacozelia: new or rare applications of old words (Spenser Encycl., p. 717c).

[2] vacuum … Poscit Latin, "Divine [poetry] requires a brain freed from worries" (Yale).

[3] Fæcundi calices quem non fecere disertum Latin, "Who is the man whom brimming cups have failed to make eloquent?" (Horace, Epistles 1.519) (Yale).

[4] Sola sophocleo … nitique cothurno Latin, "Your songs are deserving of the Sophoclean buskin [i.e., tragedy]" (Virgil, Eclogues 8.10; Yale) and "[Aeschylus taught actors] to speak grandly and walk in buskins" (Horace, Ars Poetica 280).

queint for that (as Lucian saith) when Jupiter hir father was in traveile of her, he caused his sonne Vulcane with his axe to hew his head. Out of which leaped forth lustely a valiant damsell armed at all poyntes, whom seeing Vulcane so faire and comely, lightly leaping to her, proferred her some cortesie, which the Lady disdeigning, shaked her speare at him, and threatned his saucinesse. Therefore such straungenesse is well applyed to her.

Æquipage.) order.

Tydes) seasons.

Charme) temper and order. For Charmes were wont to be made by verses as Ovid sayeth, Aut si carminibus.[1]

Embleme.

Hereby is meant, as also in the whole course of this Æglogue, that Poetry is a divine instinct and unnatural rage passing the reache of comen reason. Whom Piers answereth Epiphonematicos[2] as admiring the excellencye of the skyll whereof in Cuddie hee hadde alreadye hadde a taste.

November

ARGUMENT.

In this xi. Æglogue he bewayleth the death of some mayden of greate bloud,[3] whom he calleth Dido. The personage is secrete, and to me altogether unknowne, albe of him selfe I often required the same. This Æglogue is made in imitation of Marot his song, which he made upon the death of Loys the frenche Queene.[4] But farre passing his reache, and in myne opinion all other the Eglogues of this booke.

THENOT. COLIN.

Colin my deare, when shall it please thee sing,
As thou were wont songs of some jouisaunce?
Thy Muse to long slombreth in sorrowing,
Lulled a sleepe through loves misgovernance.
Now somewhat sing, whose endles sovenaunce,[5]
Emong the shepeheards swaines may aye remaine,
Whether thee list thy loved lasse advaunce,
Or honor Pan[6] with hymnes of higher vaine.

COLIN.

Thenot, now nis[7] the time of merimake.
Nor Pan to herye,[8] nor with love to playe:
Sike[9] myrth in May is meetest for to make,
Or summer shade under the cocked haye.
But now sadde Winter welked[10] hath the day,
And Phœbus weary of his yerely taske,
Ystabled hath his steedes in lowlye laye,
And taken up his ynne in Fishes haske.
Thilke[11] sollein[12] season sadder plight doth aske:
And loatheth sike delightes, as thou doest prayse:
The mornefull Muse in myrth now list ne maske,
As shee was wont in youngth and sommer dayes.
But if thou algate[13] lust light virelayes,[14]
And looser songs of love to underfong[15]
Who but thy selfe deserves sike Poetes prayse?
Relieve thy Oaten pypes, that sleepen long.

THENOT.

The Nightingale is sovereigne of song,
Before him sits the Titmose silent bee:
And I unfitte to thrust in skilfull thronge,
Should Colin make judge of my fooleree.
Nay, better learne of hem, that learned bee,
And han be watered at the Muses well:
The kindlye dewe drops from the higher tree,
And wets the little plants that lowly dwell.
But if sadde winters wrathe and season chill,

---

1 Aut si carminibus Latin, "or if in songs" (Yale).

2 Epiphonematicos exclamation to end a discourse (Yale).

3 bloud descent.

4 Loys the frenche Queene mother of Francis I, for whom Clément Marot wrote his lament, "Complaincte de Madame Loyse de Savoye" (Spenser Encycl., p. 649c)

5 sovenaunce remembrance, memory.

6 Pan god of the pastures.

7 nis is not.

8 herye praise, honour.

9 Sike such.

10 welked diminished, shrunk.

11 Thilke this.

12 sollein gloomy, solemn.

13 algate in any case.

14 virelaye See p. 788, note 6.

15 underfong receive, possess.

Accorde not with thy Muses meriment:
To sadder times thou mayst attune thy quill,
And sing of sorrowe and deathes dreeriment.
For deade is Dido, dead alas and drent,[1]
Dido the greate shepehearde his daughter sheene:
The fayrest May she was that ever went,
Her like shee has not left behinde I weene.[2]
And if thou wilt bewayle my wofull tene:
I shall thee give yond Cosset[3] for thy payne:
And if thy rymes as rownd and rufull bene,
As those that did thy Rosalind complayne,
Much greater gyfts for guerdon thou shalt gayne,
Then Kidde or Cosset, which I thee bynempt:[4]
Then up I say, thou jolly shepeheard swayne,
Let not my small demaund be so contempt.

COLIN.

Thenot to that I choose, thou doest me tempt,
But ah to well I wote my humble vaine,
And howe my rymes bene rugged and unkempt:
Yet as I conne, my conning[5] I will strayne.
Up then Melpomene[6] thou mournefulst Muse of nyne,
Such cause of mourning never hadst afore:
Up grieslie ghostes and up my rufull ryme,
Matter of myrth now shalt thou have no more.
For dead shee is, that myrth thee made of yore.
Dido my deare alas is dead,
Dead and lyeth wrapt in lead:
O heavie herse,
Let streaming teares be poured out in store:
O carefull verse.

Shepheards, that by your flocks on Kentish downes abyde,
Waile ye this wofull waste of natures warke:[7]
Waile we the wight,[8] whose presence was our pride:
Waile we the wight, whose absence is our carke.[9]
The sonne of all the world is dimme and darke:
The earth now lacks her wonted light,
And all we dwell in deadly night,
O heavie herse.
Breake we our pypes, that shrild as lowde as Larke,
O carefull verse.

Why doe we longer live, (ah why live we so long)
Whose better dayes death hath shut up in woe?
The fayrest floure our gyrlond all emong,
Is faded quite and into dust ygoe.
Sing now ye shepheards daughters, sing no moe
The songs that Colin made in her prayse,
But into weeping turne your wanton layes,
O heavie herse,
Now is time to dye. Nay time was long ygoe,
O carefull verse.

Whence is it, that the flouret of the field doth fade,
And lyeth buryed long in Winters bale:
Yet soone as spring his mantle doth displaye,
It floureth fresh, as it should never fayle?
But thing on earth that is of most availe,
As vertues braunch and beauties budde,
Reliven not for any good.
O heavie herse,
The braunch once dead, the budde eke[10] needes must quaile,[11]
O carefull verse.

She while she was, (that was, a woful word to sayne)
For beauties prayse and plesaunce had no pere:
So well she couth the shepherds entertayne,
With cakes and cracknells[12] and such country chere.
Ne would she scorne the simple shepheards swaine,

---

1 drent drowned.
2 weene think, surmise.
3 Cosset a lamb brought up by hand.
4 bynempt promised with an oath.
5 conne, my conning i.e., study, my wit.
6 Melpomene Muse of tragedy.
7 warke work.
8 wight person.
9 carke burden, distress.
10 eke also.
11 quaile wither.
12 cracknells biscuits.

For she would cal hem often heme[1]
And give hem curds and clouted Creame.
O heavie herse,
Als Colin cloute she would not once disdayne.
O carefull verse.

But nowe sike[2] happy cheere is turnd to heavie chaunce,
Such pleasaunce now displast by dolors dint:
All Musick sleepes, where death doth leade the daunce,
And shepherds wonted solace is extinct.
The blew is black, the greene in gray is tinct,
The gaudie girlonds deck her grave,
The faded flowres her corse embrave.[3]
O heavie herse,
Morne now my Muse, now morne with teares besprint.[4]
O carefull verse.

O thou greate shepheard Lobbin, how great is thy griefe,
Where bene the nosegayes that she dight for thee:
The colourd chaplets[5] wrought with a chiefe,
The knotted rushrings, and gilte Rosemaree?
For shee deemed nothing too deere for thee.
Ah they bene all yclad in clay,
One bitter blast blewe all away.
O heavie herse,
Thereof nought remaynes but the memoree.
O carefull verse.

Ay me that dreerie death should strike so mortall stroke,
That can undoe Dame natures kindly course:
The faded lockes fall from the loftie oke,
The flouds do gaspe, for dryed is theyr sourse,
And flouds of teares flowe in theyr stead perforse.
The mantled medowes mourne,
Theyr sondry colours tourne.

O heavie herse,
The heavens doe melt in teares without remorse.
O carefull verse.

The feeble flocks in field refuse their former foode,
And hang theyr heads, as they would learne to weepe:
The beastes in forest wayle as they were woode,
Except the Wolves, that chase the wandring sheepe:
Now she is gon that safely did hem keepe,
The Turtle[6] on the bared braunch,
Laments the wound, that death did launch.[7]
O heavie herse,
And Philomele[8] her song with teares doth steepe.
O carefull verse.

The water Nymphs, that wont with her to sing and daunce,
And for her girlond Olive braunches beare,
Now balefull boughes of Cypres doen aduance:
The Muses, that were wont greene bayes to weare,
Now bringen bitter Eldre braunches seare,
The fatall sisters eke repent,
Her vitall threde so soone was spent,
O heavie herse,
Morne now my Muse, now morne with heavie cheare.
O carefull verse.

---

1 heme home.
2 sike such.
3 embrave embellish, beautify.
4 besprint sprinkled.
5 chaplets garlands of flowers for the head.
6 Turtle turtledove, a symbol of fidelity in love.
7 launch lance, pierce.
8 Philomele the nightingale, whose story is told in Ovid, Metamorphoses, Book 6. While visiting her recently married sister, Procne, Philomela became the object of her brother-in-law Tereus' lust. After he raped her and removed her tongue to prevent her from revealing his crime, Philomela wove a tapestry telling the story. In revenge, Procne and Philomela cut up Tereus' son and heir and served him to his father for dinner. Realizing what he had eaten, Tereus chased after the two women, who were turned into birds (Dict. Gods and Mortals).

O trustlesse state of earthly things, and slipper[1] hope
Of mortal men, that swincke[2] and sweate for nought,
And shooting wide, doe misse the marked scope:[3]
Now have I learned (a lesson derely bought)
That nys on earth assuraunce to be sought:
For what might be in earthlie mould,
That did her buried body hould,
O heavie herse,
Yet saw I on the beare[4] when it was brought
O carefull verse.

But maugre[5] death, and dreaded sisters deadly spight,
And gates of hel, and fyrie furies forse:
She hath the bonds broke of eternall night,
Her soule unbodied of the burdenous corpse.
Why then weepes Lobbin so without remorse?
O Lobb, thy losse no longer lament,
Dido nis dead, but into heaven hent.[6]
O happye herse,
Cease now my Muse, now cease thy sorrowes sourse,
O joyfull verse.

Why wayle we then? why weary we the Gods with playnts,
As if some evill were to her betight?
She raignes a goddesse now emong the saintes,
That whilome[7] was the saynt of shepheards light:
And is enstalled nowe in heavens hight.
I see thee blessed soule, I see,
Walke in Elisian fieldes[8] so free.
O happy herse,
Might I once come to thee (O that I might)
O joyfull verse.

Unwise and wretched men to weete whats good or ill
We deeme of Death as doome of ill desert:
But knewe we fooles, what it us bringes until,
Dye would we dayly, once it to expert.[9]
No daunger there the shepheard can astert:
Fayre fieldes and pleasaunt layes there bene,
The fieldes ay fresh, the grasse ay greene:
O happy herse,
Make hast ye shepheards, thether to revert,
O joyfull verse.

Dido is gone afore (whose turne shall be the next?)
There lives shee with the blessed Gods in blisse,
There drincks she Nectar with Ambrosia mixt,
And joyes enjoyes, that mortall men doe misse.
The honour now of highest gods she is,
That whilome was poore shepheards pryde,
While here on earth she did abyde.
O happy herse,
Ceasse now my song, my woe now wasted is.
O joyfull verse.

THENOT.

Ay francke[10] shepheard, how bene thy verses meint
With doolful pleasaunce, so as I ne wotte,[11]
Whether rejoyce or weepe for great constrainte?
Thyne be the cossette, well hast thow it gotte.
Up Colin up, ynough thou morned hast,
Now gynnes to mizzle, hye we homeward fast.

Colins Embleme.
La mort ny mord.[12]

---

1 slipper slippery, unreliable.
2 swincke labour, work hard.
3 scope target.
4 beare bier.
5 maugre in spite of, notwithstanding.
6 hent taken (Yale).
7 whilome at one time.
8 Elisian fieldes Isles of the Blest, to which favoured classical heroes are translated after death (OCD).
9 expert experience (Yale).
10 francke free.
11 wotte knew.
12 La mort ny mord personal motto of Clément Marot, a sixteenth-century French poet whose work influenced Spenser's (Spenser Encycl., p. 563c). EK's gloss below translates the phrase correctly as "Death byteth not."

GLOSSE.

Jouisaunce) myrth.

Sovenaunce) remembraunce.

Herie) honour.

Welked) shortned or empayred. As the Moone being in the waine is sayde of Lidgate to welk.

In lowly lay) according to the season of the moneth November, when the sonne draweth low in the South toward his Tropick or returne.

In fishes haske) the sonne, reigneth that is, in the signe Pisces all November. A haske is a wicker pad, wherein they use to cary fish.

Virelaies) a light kind of song.

Bee watred) For it is a saying of Poetes, that they have dronk of the Muses well Castalias, whereof was before sufficiently sayd.

Dreriment) dreery and heavy cheere.

The great shepheard) is some man of high degree, and not as some vainely suppose God Pan. The person both of the shephearde and of Dido is unknowen and closely buried in the Authors conceipt. But out of doubt I am, that it is not Rosalind, as some imagin: for he speaketh soone after of her also.

Shene) fayre and shining.

May) for mayde.

Tene) sorrow.

Guerdon) reward.

Bynempt) bequethed.

Cosset) a lambe brought up without the dam.

Unkempt) Incompti. Not comed,[1] that is rude and unhansome.

Melpomene) The sadde and waylefull Muse used of Poets in honor of Tragedies: as saith Virgile, Melpomene tragico proclamat mæsta boatu.[2]

Up griesly gosts) The maner of Tragicall Poetes, to call for helpe of Furies and damned ghostes: so is Hecuba of Euripides, and Tantalus brought in of Seneca. And the rest of the rest.

Herse) is the solemne obsequie[3] in funeralles.

Wast of) decay of so beautifull a peece.

Carke) care.

Ah why) an elegant Epanorthosis.[4] As also soone after. Nay time was long ago.

Flouret) a diminutive for a little floure. This is a notable and sententious comparison A minore ad maius.

Reliven not) live not againe .s. not in theyr earthly bodies: for in heaven they enjoy their due reward.

The braunch) He meaneth Dido, who being, as it were the mayne braunch now withered the buddes that is beautie (as he sayd afore) can no more flourish.

With cakes) fit for shepheards bankets.

Heame) for home. After the northerne pronouncing.

Tinct) deyed or stayned.

The gaudie) the meaning is, that the things, which were the ornaments of her lyfe, are made the honor of her funerall, as is used in burialls.

Lobbin) the name of a shepherd, which seemeth to have bene the lover and deere frende of Dido.[5] Rushrings) agreeable for such base gyftes.

Faded lockes) dryed leaves. As if Nature her selfe bewayled the death of the Mayde.

Sourse) spring.

Mantled medowes) for the sondry flowres are like a Mantle or coverlet wrought with many colours.

Philomele) the Nightingale. Whome the Poetes faine once to have bene a Ladye of great beauty, till being ravished by hir sisters husbande, she desired to be turned into a byrd of her name. Whose complaintes be very well set forth of Ma. George Gaskin[6] a wittie gentleman, and the very chefe of our late rymers, who and if some partes of learning wanted not (albee it is well knowen he altogyther wanted not learning) no doubt would have attayned to the excellencye of those famous Poets. For gifts of wit and naturall promptnesse appeare in hym aboundantly.

---

[1] Incompti Not comed "unkempt, not combed."

[2] Melpomene … boatu Latin, "Melpomene cries aloud with the echoing voice of gloomy tragedy" (Yale).

[3] obsequie religious service for the dead.

[4] Epanorthosis rhetorical figure in which a word is repeated as a correction (Yale).

[5] Dido Queen of Carthage who fell in love with Aeneas and killed herself when he left the city to continue his journey.

[6] Ma. George Gaskin George Gascoigne (?1528-77), author of The Complaint of Philomene.

Cypresse) used of the old Paynims in the furnishing of their funerall Pompe. And properly the signe of all sorow and heavinesse.

The fatall sisters) Clotho, Lachesis and Atropos, daughters of Herebus and the Nighte, whom the Poetes fayne to spinne the life of man, as it were a long threde, which they drawe out in length, till his fatal howre and timely death be come; but if by other casualtie his dayes be abridged, then one of them, that is Atropos, is sayde to have cut the threde in twain. Hereof commeth a common verse.

Clotho colum baiulat, Lachesis trahit,
Atropos occat.[1]

O trustlesse) a gallant exclamation moralized with great wisedom and passionate wyth great affection.

Beare) a frame, wheron they use to lay the dead corse.

Furies) of Poetes be feyned to be three, Persephone, Alecto and Megera,[2] which are sayd to be the Authours of all evill and mischiefe.

Eternall might) Is death or darknesse of hell.

Betight) happened.

I see) a lively Icon, or representation as if he saw her in heaven present.

Elysian fieldes) be devised of Poetes to be a place of pleasure like Paradise, where the happye soules doe rest in peace and eternal happynesse.

Dye would) the very expresse saying of Plato in Phædone.[3] Astert) befall unwares.

Nectar and Ambrosia) be feigned to be the drink and foode of the gods: Ambrosia they liken to Manna in scripture and Nectar to be white like Creme, whereof is a proper tale of Hebe, that spilt a cup of it, and stayned the heavens, as yet appeareth. But I have already discoursed that at large in my Commentarye upon the dreames of the same Authour.

Meynt) Mingled.

Embleme.

Which is as much to say, as death biteth not. For although by course of nature we be borne to dye, and being ripened with age, as with a timely harvest, we must be gathered in time, or els of our selves we fall like rotted ripe fruite fro the tree: yet death is not to be counted for evil, nor (as the Poete sayd a little before) as doome of ill desert. For though the trespasse of the first man brought death into the world, as the guerdon of sinne, yet being overcome by the death of one, that dyed for al, it is now made (as Chaucer sayth) the grene path way to lyfe. So that it agreeth well with that was sayd, that Death byteth not (that is) hurteth not at all.

—1579

[1] Clotho ... occat Latin, "Clotho manages the distaff, Lachesis draws out the thread, Atropos snips it." These figures are the three Fates.

[2] Persephone, Alecto and Megera the Furies, female spirits of justice and vengeance.

[3] Plato in Phædone in Plato's dialogue, Phaedo, although the allusion is incorrect (Yale).

Amoretti and Epithalamion

Spenser's Amoretti and Epithalamion memorialize his courtship of and marriage to Elizabeth Boyle on St. Barnabas' Day (June 11) 1594, as well as representing his foray into the world of love poetry. Amoretti, or "little love poems," is a series of eighty-nine sonnets with a distinctive abab bcbc cde dcd rhyme scheme. As do other sonnet sequences from the 1580s and 1590s, Spenser's features the varied emotional experience of a poet-lover wooing a beautiful lady who draws him beyond the mundane world to a Neo-Platonic realm of Beauty and Goodness,[4] albeit not without considerable emotional confusion and anguished frustration of desire. Unusually, the lady's identity is not concealed and, in perhaps an even more radical move, she is not sexually unavailable. By dedicating his sequence to a woman he may ultimately win, Spenser creates an innovative solution to the twin risks of idolatry and infidelity inherent in the Petrarchan tradition.[1] Amoretti's roughly tripartite structure reinforces this rapprochement between sexual love and Christian spirituality by paralleling part of the Church year and hinting at the complete calendar year. After twenty-one sonnets that include a reference to January, Sonnet 22 makes note of the "holy season" of Lent and Easter that begins with Ash Wednesday (the "holy day" mentioned). This poem is followed by as many sonnets as there are days in Lent until immediately after the lady allows herself to be captured, when Sonnet 68 alludes to Easter. In the twenty-one sonnets that follow, the speaker returns to unhappy alienation from his beloved,[2] but the sequence ends with the image of a solitary dove. Although the speaker is isolated and miserable in Sonnet 89, the dove is a symbol of the holy spirit that returns in the form of the infant Christ after the autumnal season of Advent.

[4] See A.L. Prescott, "Spenser's Shorter Poems," The Cambridge Companion to Spenser, ed. A. Hadfield (Cambridge, 2001): p. 152.

In terms of both narrative and structure, the promise of Amoretti is fulfilled in Epithalamion. Formally, this poem is a canzone, a lyric made up of equal stanzas followed by an envoy, which adapts the epithalamium or "marriage song." This tradition has a long history, stretching to Latin and Greek examples by Catullus, Sappho, and Theocritus and even to scriptural antecedents in the Song of Solomon and Psalm 45.[3] The closest classical model for Spenser's is Catullus' "Carmen 61," a wedding song for Junia Aurunculeia and Manlius Torquatus, from which he draws the chronological description of the day, the invocation of Hymen and invitation to join in the festivities, some of the events, and the use of a refrain. However, one of the unusual features of Spenser's wedding song is that it is occasioned by the poet's own wedding, rather than that of someone else.

Structurally, Epithalamion is interesting because of the elaborate numerological scheme that highlights the poem's profound concern with time. The action of the poem takes place over the course of a single day—the summer solstice and longest day of the year—which is recreated in its 24 stanzas.[4] These are grouped into a daytime cluster of 16 1/4, with the remaining 7 3/4 detailing events after nightfall; this pattern matches the number of hours of daylight in the latitudes of southern Ireland on June 11, 1594.[5] Within the stanzas, there are typically four groups of long lines with three interpolated short lines, and the groups of long lines appear to mark quarter hours. For example, nightfall occurs after 16 1/4 hours and the first group of long lines in the sixteenth stanza. As well as the passage of a day, the poem marks the year with a total of 365 long lines. In a similar vein, a temporal joke occurs in stanza 15 where Spenser draws attention to the summer solstice as the longest day of the year by substituting an extra long line for one of the short lines.[6] Spenser's dual concern with linear and cyclical time is appropriate for the epithalamium as a celebration of the beginning of married life for the couple: on the one hand lies the urgency of the passage of hours before consummation in the marriage bed and its "little death," while on the other lies the immortalizing potential of resulting offspring. Ultimately, the limited span of a single life is absorbed into a larger cycle of regeneration.

from Amoretti

1

Happy ye leaves when as those lilly hands,
Which hold my life in their dead doing[7] might
Shall handle you and hold in loves soft bands,
Lyke captives trembling at the victors sight.
And happy lines, on which with starry light,
Those lamping eyes will deigne sometimes to look
And reade the sorrowes of my dying spright,[8]
Written with teares in harts close bleeding book.

[1] Ibid, p. 153.

[2] Ibid., pp. 153-54, and for a fuller discussion of structural patterns in the sequence, see D. Gibbs, Spenser's "Amoretti": A Critical Study (Aldershot, 1990), pp. 10-28.

[3] See H. Dubrow, A Happier Eden: The Politics of Marriage in the Stuart Epithalamium (Ithaca, 1990), pp. 28-29.

[4] See K. Hieatt, Short Time's Endless Monument: The Symbolism of Numbers in Edmund Spenser's "Epithalamion" (New York, 1960), from which this discussion of numerological patterns is drawn.

[5] Ibid., pp. 10, 62-63.

[6] Ibid., pp. 67-68.

[7] dead doing killing.

[8] spright spirit.

And happy rymes bath'd in the sacred brooke,
Of Helicon[1] whence she derived is,
When ye behold that angels blessed looke,
My soules long lacked foode, my heavens blis.
Leaves, lines, and rymes, seeke her to please alone,
Whom if ye please, I care for other none.

3

The soverayne beauty which I doo admyre,
Witnesse the world how worthy to be prayzed:
The light whereof hath kindled heavenly fyre,[2]
In my fraile spirit by her from basenesse[3] raysed
That being now with her huge brightnesse dazed,
Base thing I can no more endure to view:
But looking still on her I stand amazed,
At wondrous sight of so celestiall hew.[4]
So when my toung would speak her praises dew,
It stopped is with thoughts astonishment:
And when my pen would write her titles true,
It ravisht is with fancies wonderment:
Yet in my hart I then both speake and write,
The wonder that my wit cannot endite.

6

Be nought dismayd that her unmoved mind,
Doth still persist in her rebellious pride:
Such love not lyke to lusts of baser kynd,
The harder wonne, the firmer will abide.
The durefull[5] Oake, whose sap is not yet dride,
Is long ere it conceive the kindling fyre:
But when it once doth burne, it doth divide
Great heat, and makes his flames to heaven aspire.
So hard it is to kindle new desire,
In gentle brest that shall endure for ever:
Deepe is the wound, that dints the parts entire
With chast effects, that naught but death can sever.
Then thinke not long in taking litle paine,
To knit the knot, that ever shall remaine.

9

Long-while I sought to what I might compare
Those powrefull eies, which lighten my dark spright,
Yet find I nought on earth to which I dare
Resemble th'ymage[6] of their goodly light.
Not to the Sun: for they doo shine by night;
Nor to the Moone: for they are changed never;
Nor to the Starres: for they have purer sight;
Nor to the fire: for they consume not ever;
Nor to the lightning: for they still persever;
Nor to the Diamond: for they are more tender;
Nor unto Christall: for nought may them sever;
Nor unto glasse: such baseness mought[7] offend her;
Then to the Maker selfe they likest be,
Whose light doth lighten all that here we see.

15

Ye tradefull Merchants that with weary toyle,
Do seeke most pretious[8] things to make your gain:
And both the Indias of their treasures spoile,
What needeth you to seeke so farre in vaine?
For loe my love doth in her selfe containe
All this worlds riches that may farre be found,
If Saphyres, loe her eies be saphyres plaine,
If Rubies, loe hir lips be Rubies sound:
If Pearles, hir teeth be pearles both pure and round;
If Yvorie, her forhead yvory weene;[9]
If Gold, her locks are finest gold on ground;
If Silver, her faire hands are silver sheene,
But that which fairest is, but few behold,
Her mind adornd with vertues manifold.

---

1 Helicon mountain upon which the Muses reside.
2 fyre ire.
3 basenesse lowly or mean estate; moral turpitude.
4 hew hue.
5 durefull lasting, durable.
6 th'ymage the image.
7 mought may.
8 pretious precious.
9 weene suppose, conceive.

16

One day as I unwarily did gaze
On those fayre eyes my loves immortall light:
The whiles my stonisht[1] hart stood in amaze,
Through sweet illusion of her lookes delight.
I mote perceive how in her glauncing[2] sight,
Legions of loves with little wings did fly:
Darting their deadly arrowes fyry bright,
At every rash beholder passing by.
One of those archers closely I did spy,
Ayming his arrow at my very hart:
When suddenly with twincle of her eye,
The Damzell broke his misintended dart.
Had she not so doon, sure I had bene slayne,
Yet as it was, I hardly scap't with paine.

22

This holy season fit to fast and pray,
Men to devotion ought to be inclynd:
Therefore, I lykewise on so holy day,
For my sweet Saynt some service fit will find.
Her temple fayre is built within my mind,
In which her glorious ymage placed is,
On which my thoughts doo day and night attend
Lyke sacred priests that never thinke amisse.
There I to her as th'author of my blisse,
Will builde an altar to appease her yre:
And on the same my hart will sacrifise,
Burning in flames of pure and chast desyre:
The which vouchsafe[3] O goddesse to accept,
Amongst thy deerest relicks[4] to be kept.

26

Sweet is the Rose, but growes upon a brere;[5]
Sweet is the Junipere, but sharpes his bough;
Sweet is the Eglantine, but pricketh nere;
Sweet is the firbloome, but his braunches rough.
Sweet is the Cypresse, but his rynd is tough,
Sweet is the nut, but bitter is his pill;
Sweet is the broome-flowre, but yet sowre enough;
And sweet is Moly,[6] but his root is ill.
So every sweet with soure is tempred still,
That maketh it be coveted the more:
For easie things that may be got at will,
Most sorts of men doe set but little store.
When then should I accoumpt of little paine,
That endlesse pleasure shall unto me gaine.

34

Lyke as a ship that through the Ocean wyde,
By conduct[7] of some star doth make her way.
When as a storme hath dimd her trusty guyde.
Out of her course[8] doth wander far astray.
So I whose star, that wont with her bright ray,
Me to direct, with cloudes is overcast,
Doe wander now in darknesse and dismay,
Through hidden perils round about me plast.[9]
Yet hope I well, that when this storme is past
My Helice[10] the lodestar[11] of my lyfe
Will shine again, and looke on me at last,
With lovely light to cleare my cloudy grief,
Till then I wander carefull comfortlesse,
In secret sorow and sad pensivenesse.

37

What guyle is this, that those her golden tresses,
She doth attyre under a net of gold:
And with sly skill so cunningly them dresses,
That which is gold or heare, may scarse be told?

---

1 stonisht stunned, shocked.
2 glauncing glancing.
3 vouchsafe confer, bestow.
4 relicks objects, such as a parts of the body or clothing, which remain as a memorial of a departed saint, martyr, or other holy person.
5 brere briar.
6 Rose ...moly the first of two catalogues of flowers between the Ash Wednesday (#22) and Easter (#68) sonnets. This one emphasizes the "lower" senses of taste and touch. Eglantine is a European rose, also called sweetbriar. Broome-flower is a European shrub with large yellow flowers, whose twigs are used to make brooms. Moly is a magical white flower with black root used by Odysseus as an antidote to Circe's magic (Yale).
7 conduct guidance.
8 course movement in a particular path.
9 plast placed.
10 Helice the Big Dipper or North Star.
11 lodestar guiding star.

Is it that mens frayle eyes, which gaze too bold,
She may entangle in that golden snare:
And being caught may craftily enfold,
Theyr weaker harts, which are not wel aware?
Take heed therefore, myne eyes, how ye doe stare
Henceforth too rashly on that guilefull net,
In which if ever ye entrapped are,
Out of her bands ye by no meanes shall get.
Fondnesse it were for any being free,
To covet fetters,[1] though they golden bee.

54

Of this worlds Theatre in which we stay,
My love lyke the Spectator ydly sits;
Beholding me that all the pageants play,
Disguysing diversly[2] my troubled wits.
Sometimes I joy when glad occasion fits,
And mask in myrth lyke to a Comedy:
Soone after when my joy to sorrow flits,
I waile and make my woes a Tragedy.
Yet she beholding me with constant eye,
Delights not in my merth nor rues my smart:
But when I laugh she mocks, and when I cry
She laughes, and hardens evermore her hart.
What then can move her? if nor merth nor mone,
She is no woman, but a sencelesse stone.

56

Fayre ye be sure, but cruell and unkind,
As is a Tygre that with greedinesse
Hunts after bloud, when he by chance doth find
A feeble beast, doth felly[3] him oppresse.
Fayre be ye sure but proud and pittilesse,
As is a storme, that all things doth prostrate:
Finding a tree alone all comfortlesse,
Beats on it strongly it to ruinate.
Fayre be ye sure, but hard and obstinate,
As is a rocke amidst the raging floods:
Gaynst which a ship of succour[4] desolate,
Doth suffer wreck both of her selfe and goods.
That ship, that tree, and that same beast am I,
Whom ye doe wreck, doe ruine, and destroy.

64

Comming to kisse her lyps, (such grace I found)
Me seem'd I smelt a gardin of sweet flowres:[5]
That dainty odours from them threw around
For damzels fit to decke their lovers bowres.
Her lips did smell lyke unto Gillyflowers,
Her ruddy cheekes lyke unto Roses red:
Her snowy browes lyke budded Bellamoures,
Her lovely eyes lyke Pincks but newly spred,
Her goodly bosome lyke a Strawberry bed,
Her neck lyke to a bounch of Cullambynes:
Her brest lyke lillyes, ere theyr leaves be shed,
Her nipples lyke yong blossomd Jessemynes,[6]
Such fragrant flowres doe give most odorous[7] smell,
But her sweet odour did them all excell.

67

Lyke as a huntsman after weary chace,
Seeing the game from him escapt away:
Sits downe to rest him in some shady place,
With panting hounds beguiled of their pray.[8]
So after long pursuit and vaine assay,[9]
When I all weary had the chace forsooke,
The gentle deare returnd the selfe-same way,
Thinking to quench her thirst at the next brooke.
There she beholding me with mylder looke,
Sought not to fly, but fearelesse still did bide:
Till I in hand her yet halfe trembling tooke,

---

[1] fetters chains or shackles.
[2] diversly variously.
[3] felly fiercely, cruelly.
[4] succour aid, help, assistance.
[5] gardin of sweet flowres See Song of Solomon 4:10-16.
[6] Gillyflowers … Jessamynes the second catalogue of flowers in the sequence, stressing sight and smell, higher senses than taste and touch. Gillyflowers are a variety of pinks noted for its clove-like scent. Bellamoures are an unidentified white flower. Cullambynes (columbines) are small and often violet in colour. Jessamynes (jasmines) are shrubs of southern origin with fragrant white and yellow flowers, introduced into England in the sixteenth century (Yale).
[7] odourous fragrant.
[8] pray prey.
[9] assay attempt, trial.

And with her owne goodwill hir fyrmely tyde.
Strange thing me seemd to see a beast so wyld,
So goodly wonne with her owne will beguyld.

68

Most glorious Lord of lyfe that on this day,[1]
Didst make thy triumph over death and sin:[2]
And having harrowd hell[3] didst bring away,
Captivity thence captive us to win.
This joyous day, deare Lord, with joy begin,
And grant that we for whom thou diddest dye
Being with thy deare blood clene washt from sin,
May live for ever in felicity.
And that thy love we weighing worthily,
May likewise love thee for the same againe:
And for thy sake that all lyke deare didst buy,
With love may one another entertayne.
So let us love, deare love, lyke as we ought,
Love is the lesson which the Lord us taught.

69

The famous warriors of the anticke[4] world,
Used Trophees to erect in stately wize:
In which they would the records have enrold,
Of theyr great deeds and valarous emprize.[5]
What trophee then shall I most fit devize,
In which I may record the memory
Of my loves conquest, peerelesse beauties prise,
Adorn'd with honour, love, and chastity.
Even this verse vowd to eternity,
Shall be thereof immortall moniment:[6]
And tell her prayse to all posterity,
That may admire such worlds rare wonderment.
The happy purchase of my glorious spoile,
Gotten at last with labour and long toyle.

70

Fresh spring the herald of loves mighty king,
In whose cote armour[7] richly are displayd,
All sorts of flowers the which on earth do spring
In goodly colours gloriously arrayd.
Goe to my love, where she is carelesse layd,
Yet in her winters bowre not well awake:
Tell her the joyous time wil not be staid
Unlesse she doe him by the forelock take.
Bid her therefore her selfe soone ready make,
To wayt on love amongst his lovely crew:
Where every one that misseth then her make,
Shall be by him amearst[8] with penance dew.
Make hast therefore sweet love, whilest it is prime,[9]
For none can call againe the passed time.

74

Most happy letters fram'd by skilfull trade,
With which that happy name was first desynd:
The which three times thrise happy hath me made,
With guists of body, fortune and of mind.
The first my being to me gave by kind,
From mothers womb deriv'd by dew descent,
The second is my sovereigne Queene most kind,
That honour and large richesse to me lent.
The third my love, my lives last ornament,
By whom my spirit out of dust was raysed:
To speake her prayse and glory excellent,
Of all alive most worthy to be praysed.
Ye three Elizabeths for ever live,
That three such graces[10] did unto me give.

---

1 this day Easter (Variorum).

2 Didst … death and sin See 1 Corinthians 15:20 (Variorum).

3 harrowd hell allusion to the medieval doctrine, drawn from the apocryphal gospel of Nicodemus, that Christ descended to Hell and redeemed worthy men who lived prior to his time (Variorum).

4 anticke antique: ancient.

5 emprize undertaking, enterprise.

6 moniment monument.

7 cote armour coats of arms.

8 amearst punished (Yale).

9 prime the canonical hour of the Divine Office that is appointed for the first hour of the day, beginning either at six o'clock throughout the year, or at the varying time of sunrise; also sometimes used for the period between the first hour and tierce, the end of which period (about nine o'clock) is believed to have been high prime, or prime large; the beginning or first appearance of the new moon; spring; state of full perfection.

10 three such graces both the three classical Graces and the three Elizabeths (Spenser's mother, wife, and queen).

75

One day I wrote her name upon the strand,
But came the waves and washed it away:
Agayne I wrote it with a second hand,
But came the tyde, and made my paynes his pray.
Vayne man, sayd she, that doest in vaine assay,
A mortall thing so to immortalize.
For I my selve shall lyke to this decay,
And eek[1] my name bee wyped out lykewize.
Not so, (quod I) let baser things devize,
To dy in dust, but you shall live by fame:
My verse your vertues rare shall eternize,
And in the hevens wryte your glorious name.
Where whenas death shall all the world subdew,
Our love shall live, and later life renew.

80

After so long a race as I have run
Through Faery land, which those six books[2] compile,
Give leave to rest me being halfe fordonne,[3]
And gather to my selfe new breath awhile.
Then as a steed refreshed after toyle,
Out of my prison I will breake anew:
And stoutly will that second worke assoyle,[4]
With strong endevour and attention dew.
Till then give leave to me in pleasant mew,[5]
To sport my muse and sing my loves sweet praise:
The contemplation of whose heavenly hew,
My spirit to an higher pitch will rayse.
But let her prayses yet be low and meane,
Fit for the handmayd of the Faery Queene.

82

Joy of my life, full oft for loving you
I blesse my lot, that was so lucky placed:
But then the more your owne mishap I rew,
That are so much by so meane love embased.[6]
For had the equall hevens so much you graced
In this as in the rest, ye mote invent
Som hevenly wit, whose verse could have enchased[7]
Your glorious name in golden moniment.
But since ye deigned so goodly to relent
To me your thrall, in whom is little worth,
That little that I am, shall all be spent,
In setting your immortall prayses forth.
Whose lofty argument uplifting me,
Shall lift you up unto an high degree.

89

Lyke as the Culver on the bared bough
Sits mourning for the absence of her mate:
And in her songs sends many a wishfull vow,
For his returne that seemes to linger late,
So I alone now left disconsolate,
Mourne to my selfe the absence of my love:
And wandring here and there all desolate,
Seek with my playnts to match that mournful dove.
Ne joy of ought that under heaven doth hove
Can comfort me, but her owne joyous sight:
Whose sweet aspect both God and man can move,
In her unspotted pleasauns to delight.
Dark is my day, whyles her fayre light I mis,
And dead my life that wants such lively blis.

—1595

Epithalamion

Ye learned sisters[8] which have oftentimes
Beene to me ayding, others to adorne:
Whom ye thought worthy of your gracefull rymes,
That even the greatest did not greatly scorne

[1] eek also.

[2] Faery land … six books the 1596 edition of The Faerie Queene. Spenser planned to write a further set of six books.

[3] fordonne exhausted, overcome.

[4] assoyle assail.

[5] mew hiding, confinement.

[6] embased to lower in rank, dignity, office, condition, or character; to humble, humiliate; often with the sense of degrade.

[7] enchased to "set" as a jewel; to engrave or ornament.

[8] learned sisters the Muses.

To heare theyr names sung in your simple layes,
But joyed in theyr prayse.
And when ye lift your owne mishaps to mourne,
Which death, or love, or fortunes wreck did rayse,
Your string could soone to sadder tenor[1] turne,
And teach the woods and waters to lament
Your dolefull dreriment.
Now lay those sorrowfull complaints aside,
And having all your heads with girland[2] crownd,
Helpe me mine owne loves prayses to resound,
Ne[3] let the same of any be envide,[4]
So Orpheus[5] did for his owne bride,
So I unto my selfe alone will sing,
The woods shall to me answer and my eccho ring.

Early before the worlds light giving lampe,
His golden beame upon the hils doth spred,
Having disperst the nights unchearefull dampe,
Doe ye awake and with fresh lusty hed,[6]
Go to the bowre of my beloved love,
My truest turtle dove[7]
Bid her awake; for Hymen[8] is awake,
And long since ready forth his maske to move,
With his bright Tead[9] that flames with many a flake,[10]
And many a bachelor to waite on him,
In theyr fresh garments trim.
Bid her awake therefore and soone her dight,[11]
For lo the wished day is come at last,
That shall for al the paynes and sorrowes past,
Pay to her usury of long delight,
And whylest she doth her dight,
Doe ye to her of joy and solace sing,
That all the woods may answer and your eccho ring.

Bring with you all the Nymphes[12] that you can heare
Both of the rivers and the forrests greene:
And of the sea that neighbours to her neare,
Al with gay girlands goodly wel beseene.
And let them also with them bring in hand,
Another gay girland
For my fayre love of lillyes and of roses,
Bound truelove wize with a blew silke riband.[13]
And let them make great store of bridale poses,[14]
And let them eeke[15] bring store of other flowers
To deck the bridale bowers.
And let the ground whereas her foot shall tread,
For feare the stones her tender foot should wrong
Be strewed with fragrant flowers all along,
And diapred lyke the discoloured mead.[16]
Which done, doe at her chamber dore awayt,
For she will waken strayt,
The whiles doe ye this song unto her sing.
The woods shall to you answer and your eccho ring.

Ye Nymphes of Mulla[17] which with carefull heed,
The silver scaly trouts doe tend full well,
And greedy pikes which use therein to feed,
(Those trouts and pikes all others doo excell)
And ye likewise which keepe the rushy lake,[18]
Where none doo fishes take.
Bynd up the locks the which hang scatterd light,

---

1 tenor quality, character, tone.
2 girland garland.
3 Ne nor.
4 envide envied.
5 Orpheus supreme minstrel of Greek mythology devoted to his wife, Eurydice, whose loss caused him to retreat to the wilderness, where he moved animals, trees, and rocks with his lament (OCD).
6 lusty hed lustiness.
7 turtle dove bird known for its deep affection for its mate.
8 Hymen god of marriage.
9 Tead torch.
10 flake portion of ignited matter thrown off by a burning or incandescent body (i.e., a detached portion of flame).
11 dight equip, fit out, furnish.
12 Nymphes female spirits of nature representing the divine power of mountains, waters, woods, and trees (OCD).
13 blew silke riband Blue symbolizes fidelity.
14 poses posies.
15 eeke also.
16 diapred ... discoloured mead patterned like a variously coloured meadow.
17 Mulla river bounding Spenser's Irish estate, Kilcolman, on the S and W sides (Variorum).
18 the rushy lake small lake near Kilcolman reputedly inhospitable to fish (Variorum).

And in his waters which your mirror make,
Behold your faces as the christall bright,
That when you come whereas my love doth lie,
No blemish she may spie.
And eke ye lightfoot mayds which keepe the dore,[1]
That on the hoary mountayne use to towre,
And the wylde wolves which seeke them to devoure,
With your steele darts doo chace from comming neer
Be also present heere,
To helpe to decke her and to help to sing,
That all the woods may answer and your eccho ring.

Wake now my love, awake; for it is time,
The Rosy Morne long since left Tithones[2] bed,
All ready to her silver coche[3] to clyme,
And Phœbus[4] gins to shew his glorious hed.
Hark how the cheerefull birds do chaunt theyr laies[5]
And carroll of loves praise.
The merry Larke[6] hir mattins[7] sings aloft,
The thrush replyes, the Mavis[8] descant playes,
The Ouzell[9] thrills, the Ruddock[10] warbles soft,
So goodly all agree with sweet consent,
To this dayes merriment.
Ah my deere love why doe ye sleepe thus long,
When meeter were that ye should now awake,
T'awayt the comming of your joyous make,[11]
And hearken to the birds love learned song,
The deawy leaves among.
For they of joy and pleasance to you sing,
That all the woods them answer & theyr eccho ring.

My love is now awake out of her dreame,
And her fayre eyes like stars that dimmed were
With darksome cloud, now shew theyr goodly beams
More bright then[12] Hesperus[13] his head doth rere.
Come now ye damzels,[14] daughters of delight,
Helpe quickly her to dight,
But first come ye fayre houres[15] which were begot
In loves sweet paradice, of Day and Night,
Which doe the seasons of the yeare allot,
And al that ever in this world is fayre
Doe make and still repayre.
And ye three handmayds of the Cyprian Queene[16]
The which doe still adorne her beauties pride,
Helpe to addorne my beautifullest bride
And as ye her array, still throw betweene
Some graces to be seene,
And as ye use to Venus,[17] to her sing,
The whiles the woods shal answer & your eccho ring.

Now is my love all ready forth to come,
Let all the virgins therefore well awayt,
And ye fresh boyes that tend upon her groome
Prepare your selves; for he is comming strayt.
Set all your things in seemely good array
Fit for so joyfull day,
The joyfulst day that ever sunne did see.
Faire Sun, shew forth thy favourable ray,
And let thy lifull heat not fervent be
For feare of burning her sunshyny face,
Her beauty to disgrace.

---

1 lightfoot mayds … dore woodland nymphs (Yale).
2 Tithones husband of Aurora, goddess of the dawn (OCD).
3 coche coach.
4 Phœbus Roman version of Apollo, god of the sun.
5 laies songs.
6 Larke songbird associated with dawn (Variorum).
7 mattins morning office recited at daybreak.
8 Mavis variety of thrush (Variorum).
9 Ouzell blackbird (Variorum).
10 Ruddock robin (Variorum).
11 make mate.
12 then than.
13 Hesperus evening star.
14 damzels the bridesmaids.
15 fayre houres the Horae, Hours, three daughters of Zeus associated with the principle of order, particularly the seasons and later the hours of the day. They are also keepers of Heaven's gate. Commonly their mother is identified as Themis, the earth goddess, rather than Night (Yale).
16 handmayds of the Cyprian Queene the Graces (Aglaia, Euphrosyne, Thalia) who attend Venus.
17 Venus goddess of love.

O fayrest Phœbus, father of the Muse,[1]
If ever I did honour thee aright,
Or sing the thing, that mote thy mind delight,
Doe not thy servants simple boone[2] refuse,
But let this day, let this one day be myne,
Let all the rest be thine.
Then I thy soverayne prayses loud wil sing,
That all the woods shal answer and theyr eccho ring.

Harke how the Minstrels gin to shrill aloud,
Their merry Musick that resounds from far,
The pipe, the tabor,[3] and the trembling Croud,[4]
That well agree withouten breach or jar.
But most of all the Damzels doe delite,
When they their tymbrels[5] smyte,
And thereunto doe daunce and carrol sweet,
That all the sences they doe ravish quite,
The whyles the boyes run up and downe the street,
Crying aloud with strong confused noyce,
As if it were one voyce.
Hymen io Hymen,[6] Hymen they do shout,
That even to the heavens theyr shouting shrill
Doth reach, and all the firmament doth fill,
To which the people standing all about,
As in approvance doe thereto applaud
And loud advaunce her laud,
And evermore they Hymen Hymen sing,
That al the woods them answer and theyr eccho ring.

Loe where she comes along with portly pace,
Lyke Phœbe[7] from her chamber of the East,
Arysing forth to run her mighty race,
Clad all in white, that seemes a virgin best.
So well it her beseemes[8] that ye would weene
Some angell she had beene.
Her long loose yellow locks lyke golden wyre,
Sprinckled with perle, and perling flowres a tweene,[9]
Doe lyke a golden mantle her attyre,
And being crowned with a girland greene,
Seeme lyke some mayden Queene,[10]
Her modest eyes abashed to behold
So many gazers, as on her do stare,
Upon the lowly ground affixed are.
Ne dare lift up her countenance too bold,
But blush to heare her prayses sung so loud,
So farre from being proud.
Nathlesse[11] doe ye still loud her prayses sing,
That all the woods may answer and your eccho ring.

Tell me ye merchants daughters did ye see
So fayre a creature in your towne before,
So sweet, so lovely, and so mild as she,
Adornd with beautyes grace and vertues store,
Her goodly eyes lyke Saphyres shining bright,
Her forehead yvory white,
Her cheekes lyke apples which the sun hath rudded,
Her lips lyke cherryes charming men to byte,
Her brest like to a bowle of creame uncrudded,[12]
Her paps[13] lyke lyllies budded,[14]
Her snowie necke lyke to a marble towre,[15]
And all her body lyke a pallace fayre,
Ascending uppe with many a stately stayre,
To honours seat and chastities sweet bowre.
Why stand ye still ye virgins in amaze,
Upon her so to gaze,

---

1 father of the Muse Jove is usually understood as father of the Muses, although Phoebus Apollo as patron of arts, especially music, governs them.

2 boone request.

3 tabor drum.

4 Croud celtic fiddle.

5 tymbrels tambourines.

6 Hymen io Hymen ritual cry to the god of marriage at weddings.

7 Phœbe the virginal moon goddess, Diana.

8 beseemes suits, becomes.

9 perling flowres a tweene i.e., glistening flowers scattered amidst them.

10 mayden Queene allusion to Queen Elizabeth.

11 Nathlesse nonetheless.

12 uncrudded uncurdled.

13 paps breasts.

14 Her brest … budded allusion to Song of Solomon 4:5.

15 marble towre See Song of Solomon 4:4 and 7:4. The passage from lines 167 to 200 echoes both the imagery of the Song of Solomon and assertions in Plato's Symposium concerning the spiritual beauty of the lady (Variorum).

Whiles ye forget your former lay to sing,
To which the woods did answer and your eccho ring.

But if ye saw that which no eyes can see,
The inward beauty of her lively spright,
Garnisht with heavenly guifts of high degree,
Much more then would ye wonder at that sight,
And stand astonisht lyke to those which red[1]
Medusaes[2] mazeful hed.
There dwels sweet love and constant chastity,
Unspotted fayth and comely womanhood,
Regard of honour and mild modesty,
There vertue raynes as Queene in royal throne,
And giveth laws alone.
The which the base affections doe obay,
And yeeld theyr services unto her will,
Ne thought of thing uncomely ever may
Thereto approch to tempt her mind to ill.
Had ye once seene these her celestial threasures,
And unrevealed pleasures,
Then would ye wonder and her prayses sing,
That al the woods should answer and your eccho ring.

Open the temple gates unto my love,
Open them wide that she may enter in,
And all the postes adorne as doth behove,
And all the pillours deck with girlands trim,
For to recyve this Saynt with honour dew,
That commeth in to you,
With trembling steps and humble reverence,
She commeth in, before th'Almighties vew,
Of her ye virgins learne obedience,
When so ye come into those holy places,
To humble your proud faces
Bring her up to th'high altar that she may,
The sacred ceremonies there partake,
The which do endlesse matrimony make,
And let the roring Organs loudly play;
The praises of the Lord in lively notes,
The whiles with hollow throates.

The Choristers the joyous Antheme sing,
That al the woods may answere and their eccho ring.

Behold whiles she before the altar stands
Hearing the holy priest that to her speakes
And blesseth her with his two happy hands,
How the red roses flush up in her cheekes,
And the pure snow with goodly vermill[3] stayne,
Like crimsin dyde in grayne,
That even th'Angels[4] which continually,
About the sacred Altare doe remaine,
Forget their service and about her fly,
Ofte peeping in her face that seemes more fayre,
The more they on it stare.
But her sad[5] eyes still fastened on the ground,
Are governed with goodly modesty,
That suffers not one looke to glaunce awry,
Which may let in a little thought unsownd,
Why blush ye love to give to me your hand,[6]
The pledge of all our band,
Sing ye sweet Angels, Alleluya sing,
That all the woods may answere and your eccho ring.

Now al is done; bring home the bride againe,
Bring home the triumph of our victory,
Bring home with you the glory of her gaine,
With joyance bring her and with jollity.
Never had man more joyfull day then this,
Whom heaven would heape with blis.
Make feast therefore now all this live long day,
This day for ever to me holy is,
Poure out the wine without restraint or stay,
Poure not by cups, but by the belly full,
Poure out to all that wull,[7]
And sprinkle all the postes and wals with wine,
That they may sweat, and drunken be withall.

---

[1] red saw.

[2] Medusa mythological figure who petrified those who saw her, sometimes associated with chastity.

[3] vermill vermilion: red.

[4] Angels highest rank in the community of celebrants assembled (Yale).

[5] sad sober, serious.

[6] give to me your hand Rings have been exchanged and this is likely the moment when the priest joins the hands of the new husband and wife.

[7] wull will, desire (the wine).

Crowne ye God Bacchus[1] with a coronall,
And Hymen also crowne with wreathes of vine,
And let the Graces daunce unto the rest;
For they can doo it best:
The whiles the maydens doe theyr carroll sing,
To which the woods shal answer & theyr eccho ring.

Ring ye the bels, ye yong men of the towne,
And leave your wonted labours for this day:
This day is holy; doe ye write it downe,
That ye for ever it remember may.
This day the sunne is in his chiefest hight,
With Barnaby[2] the bright,
From whence declining daily by degrees,
He somewhat loseth of his heat and light,
When once the Crab[3] behind his back he sees.
But for this time it ill ordained was,
To chose the longest day in all the yeare,[4]
And shortest night, when longest fitter weare.
Yet never day so long, but late would passe.
Ring ye the bels, to make it weare away,
And bonefiers make all day,
And daunce about them, and about them sing:
That all the woods may answer, and your eccho ring.

Ah when will this long weary day have end,
And lende me leave to come unto my love?
How slowly do the houres theyr numbers spend?
How slowly does sad Time his feathers move?
Hast thee O fayrest Planet[5] to thy home
Within the Westerne fome:
Thy tyred steedes long since have need of rest.
Long though it be, at last I see it gloome,
And the bright evening star with golden creast[6]
Appeare out of the East.
Fayre childe of beauty, glorious lampe of love
That all the host of heaven in rankes doost lead,
And guydest lovers through the nights dread,
How chearefully thou lookest from above,
And seemst to laugh atweene thy twinkling light
As joying in the sight
Of these glad many which for joy doe sing,
That all the woods them answer and their eccho ring.

Now cease ye damsels[7] your delights forepast,
Enough is it, that all the day was youres:
Now day is doen, and night is nighing[8] fast:
Now bring the Bryde into the brydall boures.
Now night is come,[9] now soone her disarray,
And in her bed her lay,
Lay her in lillies and in violets,
And silken courteins over her display,
And odourd sheetes, and Arras[10] coverlets,
Behold how goodly my faire love does ly
In proud humility;
Like unto Maia,[11] when as Ioue her tooke,
In Tempe, lying on the flowry gras,
Twixt sleepe and wake, after she weary was,
With bathing in the Acidalian brooke.[12]
Now it is night, ye damsels may be gon,
And leave my love alone,
And leave likewise your former lay to sing:
The woods no more shal answere, nor your echo ring.

---

1 Bacchus god of wine.

2 Barnaby St. Barnabas' Day, June 11, the longest day of the year. Spenser is reckoning by the old calendar, at that time ten days different from the current calendar.

3 Crab The sun moves from the zodiacal sign of Cancer to Leo in mid-June.

4 longest day in all the yeare summer solstice.

5 O fayrest Planet sun.

6 bright evening star with golden creast Venus, as well as Hesperus, is the evening star. Hesperus is usually represented as a boy rider bearing a torch (OCD), but the lines that follow indicate that Spenser refers to Venus here.

7 damsels bridesmaids referred to earlier.

8 nighing nearing.

9 Now night is come The placement of this comment 1/4 of the way through the stanza reflects the indication in contemporary almanacs of 16 1/4 hours of daylight on June 11 in southern Ireland (Hieatt, Short Time's Endless Monument, p. 10).

10 Arras French city known for its tapestries.

11 Maia mother of Hermes (Mercury) by Zeus (Jove) and eldest of the Pleiades, the seven daughters of Atlas (Dict. Gods and Mortals).

12 Acidalian brooke place associated with Venus (Variorum).

Now welcome night, thou night so long expected,
That long daies labour doest at last defray,
And all my cares, which cruell love collected,
Hast sumd in one, and cancelled for aye:
Spread thy broad wing over my love and me,
That no man may us see,
And in thy sable mantle us enwrap,
From feare of perrill and foule horror free,
Let no false treason seeke us to entrap,
Nor any dread disquiet once annoy
The safety of our joy:
But let the night be calme and quietsome,
Without tempestuous storms or sad afray:
Lyke as when Ioue with fayre Alcmena[1] lay,
When he begot the great Tirynthian groome:
Or lyke as when he with thy selfe did lie,
And begot Majesty.
And let the mayds and yongmen cease to sing:
Ne let the woods them answer, nor theyr eccho ring.

Let no lamenting cryes, nor dolefull teares
Be heard all night within nor yet without:
Ne let false whispers breeding hidden feares,
Breake gentle sleepe with misconceived dout.
Let no deluding dreames, nor dreadful sights
Make sudden sad affrights;
Ne let housefyres, nor lightnings helplesse harmes,
Ne let the Pouke,[2] nor other evill sprights,
Ne let mischivous witches with theyr charmes,
Ne let hob Goblins, names whose fence we see not,
Fray us with things that be not.
Let not the shriech Oule,[3] nor the Storke[4] be heard:
Nor the night Raven[5] that still deadly yels,
Nor damned ghosts cald up with mighty spels,
Nor griesly vultures make us once affeard:
Ne let th' unpleasant Quyre of Frogs still croking
Make us to wish theyr choking.
Let none of these theyr drery accents sing;
Ne let the woods them answer, nor theyr eccho ring.

But let stil Silence trew night watches keepe,
That sacred peace may in assurance rayne,
And tymely sleep, when it is tyme to sleepe,
May poure his limbs forth on your pleasant playne,
The whiles an hundred little winged loves,
Like divers fethered doves,
Shall fly and flutter round about your bed,
And in the secret darke, that none reproves,
Their prety stealthes shal worke, & snares shal spread
To filch away sweet snatches of delight,
Conceald through covert night.
Ye sonnes of Venus, play your sports at will,
For greedy pleasure, carelesse of your toyes,
Thinks more upon her paradise of joyes,
Then what ye do, albe it good or ill.
All night therefore attend your merry play,
For it will soone be day:
Now none doth hinder you, that say or sing,
Ne will the woods now answer, nor your eccho ring.

Who is the same, which at my window peepes?
Or whose is that faire face, that shines so bright,
Is it not Cinthia,[6] she that never sleepes,
But walkes about high heaven al the night?
O fayrest goddesse, do thou not envy
My love with me to spy:
For thou likewise didst love, though now unthought
And for a fleece of woll, which privily,
The Latmian shephard[7] once unto thee brought,

[1] Alcmena mother of Heracles by Zeus.

[2] Pouke mischievous sprite known as Puck, hobgoblin, or Robin Goodfellow.

[3] Oule bird of ill-omen presaging death (Variorum).

[4] Storke according to Deuteronomy 14, an unclean bird (Variorum).

[5] Raven bird reputed to be able to smell death (Variorum).

[6] Cinthia Roman goddess of the moon.

[7] Latmian shephard Endymion, with whom the moon fell in love and bore 50 daughters before putting him to sleep forever in order to avoid his death (OCD).

His pleasures with thee wrought.
Therefore to us be favourable now;
And sith of wemens labours thou hast charge,
And generation goodly dost enlarge,
Encline they will t'effect our wishfull vow,
And the chast wombe informe with timely seed,
That may our comfort breed:
Till which we cease our hopefull hap to sing,
Ne let the woods us answere, nor our eccho ring.

And thou great Juno,[1] which with awful might
The lawes of wedlock still dost patronize,
And the religion of the faith first plight
With sacred rites hast taught to solemnize:
And eeke for comfort often called art
Of women in their smart,
Eternally bind thou this lovely band,
And all thy blessings unto us impart.
And thou glad Genius,[2] in whose gentle hand,
The bridale bowre and geniall bed remaine,
Without blemish or staine.
And the sweet pleasures of theyr loves delight
With secret ayde doest succour and supply,
Till they bring forth the fruitfull progeny,
Send us the timely fruit of the same night.
And thou fayre Hebe,[3] and thou Hymen free,
Grant that it may so be.
Til which we cease your further prayse to sing,
Ne any woods shal answer, nor your eccho ring.

And ye high heavens, the temple of the gods,
In which a thousand torches flaming bright
Doe burne, that to us wretched earthly clods:
In dreadful darknesse lend desired light;
And all ye powers which in the same remayne,
More then we men can fayne,
Poure out your blessing on us plentiously,
And happy influence upon us raine,
That we may raise a large posterity,
Which from the earth, which they may long possesse,
With lasting happinesse,
Up to your haughty pallaces may mount,
And for the guerdon[4] of theyr glorious merit
May heavenly tabernacles there inherit,
Of blessed Saints for to increase the count.
So let us rest, sweet love, in hope of this,
And cease till then our tymely joyes to sing,
The woods no more us answer, nor our eccho ring.

Song made in lieu of many ornaments,
With which my love should duly have bene dect,[5]
Which cutting off[6] through hasty accidents,[7]
Ye would not stay[8] your dew[9] time to expect,
But promist both to recompens,
Be unto her a goodly ornament,
And for short time an endlesse moniment.

—1595

The Faerie Queene (1590)

Spenser's poetic narrative of the adventures of knights and ladies operates on a grand scale, moving as it does from the details of individual lives to the psychology of desire, politics of the nation, issues of religious doctrine, and providential visions of the future of humanity. The poem is also fundamentally concerned with the mongrel genealogy of the English language, an interest Spenser shared with Sir Philip Sidney, who in his Defence of Poesy argues that "our tongue is most fit to honour poesy and to be honoured by poesy." One of the bases for this fitness is the fact that the linguistic and literary remnants left by Roman, Saxon, Danish, and Norman invaders give English poetry an impressively long lineage. Spenser, in his turn, often used deliberately

[1] Juno Roman version of Hera, wife of Jupiter (Zeus), goddess of women and marriage.
[2] Genius male spirit associated with fertility.
[3] Hebe daughter of Zeus (Jove) and Hera (Juno) and cupbearer to the gods (OCD).
[4] guerdon reward.
[5] dect decked, adorned.
[6] cutting off preventing.
[7] hasty accidents sudden occurrences, mishaps.
[8] stay delay.
[9] dew due.

archaic vocabulary and spelling that recall both the language's more recent medieval past and its Latin roots. The poem exists in two forms, both published by William Ponsonby. The 1590 version ends after Book III, which is drawn to a close with the hermaphroditic image of Scudamore and Amoret entwined into a single being. In the 1596 edition, however, this moment of closure disappears and the romantic narrative of Book III is reopened and extended into Book IV (Friendship), whose characters return in various capacities in Books V (Justice) and VI (Courtesy).

Generically, too, The Faerie Queene emphasizes hybridity. Through this compendious work, Spenser undertook the task of producing a foundational narrative for his nation that both celebrates its past and envisions a glorious future culminating in the reign of his sovereign, Elizabeth I. In the poem as a whole, Spenser borrowed a number of features from Virgil's Aeneid, from its proposed structure of twelve books each divided into twelve cantos to echoes of particular episodes and even specific lines. Although The Faerie Queene incorporates elements of epic, particularly in Book II, it also emphasizes "knights and ladies gentle deeds" and draws on the resources of more contemporary Italian literary romances. For example, Ariosto's Orlando Furioso (1516) and Tasso's Gerusalemme Liberata (1581) particularly inform Book III.[1] However, Italianate elements are integrated with recognizably English material, which is especially evident in the identification of the hero of Book I as St. George and in the appearance in each book of the young Prince Arthur as he seeks the elusive Gloriana. While concerned with imitation of linguistic and literary forerunners, Spenser is also innovative, a trait shown linguistically in his employment of the hybrid roots of English to introduce new words into the language and formally through the complex stanza used throughout the poem. This "Spenserian stanza" consists of nine lines, eight of iambic pentameter followed by one of iambic hexameter, rhyming ababbcbcc.

In his prefatory "Letter to Raleigh" Spenser outlined the moral and didactic thrust of his project, that is, "to fashion a gentleman or noble person in vertuous and gentle discipline" through "a continued allegory, or darke conceit." He originally proposed twenty four books, comprising the twelve private and twelve public virtues. Although he later shortened this plan to twelve books in total, Spenser maintained the division of private and public virtues. While he finally completed only six and a few cantos for a seventh, the overall plan presents clues for reading both the frame story presented at the end of the dedicatory epistle and the work that follows. The multi-stranded narrative of the poem emphasizes concerns that are both individual and political, spiritual and secular, emotional and intellectual. For example, the virtues embodied in the first three books, of Holiness, Temperance, and Chastity, are primarily individual and moral, while the latter three, of Friendship, Justice, and Courtesy, are largely social and political. In every instance, the heroes and heroines must mature emotionally in order to act effectively in their newly understood roles.

Multiple levels of meaning are carried through the poem by means of a technique of multi-layered narrative derived from the practice of medieval biblical exegesis. In this tradition, known as "typology," events and figures of the Old Testament were read as foreshadowing events in the life of Christ.[2] For example, Adam, who lost humanity's bond with God through the Fall, is seen as a prefiguring of Christ, whose sacrifice restores that connection. Similarly, the Tree of Knowledge through which Adam brought death into the world becomes a "type" for the Cross, which brings about Christ's death but also heralds resurrection and eternal life. In literary allegory, the narrative contains details like iconic names, for example "Duessa," that suggest further levels of meaning to be worked out by readers. Because of its demand for active engagement on the part of readers, allegory is inherently didactic and designed to lead readers through a series of moral exercises as they interact with the text. In this way, it fulfills the humanist conception of poetry's function as, in Sidney's words, "a speaking picture, with this end to teach and delight."[3] The seminal statement on Renaissance allegory appears in Dante's "Letter to Can

[1] See Spenser Encycl., p. 364c. For a lengthier discussion of Ariosto and Tasso in the tradition of Italian romantic epic, see G. Hough, A Preface to "The Faerie Queene" (London, 1962), pp. 9-81.

[2] Spenser Encycl., pp. 19c-20a

[3] See the excerpts from Sidney's Defence of Poesy, pp. 719-20.

Grande" (c. 1319), in which he articulates a four-level model for reading his Divine Comedy. In it, the first level, identified as the literal, is interpretation of the actual events of the narrative, while the next, the allegorical, seeks to identify characters and incidents with their Biblical counterparts. Beyond these more concrete stages, the moral level addresses principles for the conduct of life, while the anagogical seeks the universal truths revealed by the text about human spiritual life.[1] To these four levels, Spenser added a fifth, the historical, which refers to events of contemporary history through symbolic figures, inset stories, and patterns of biblical allusion. This final level is highlighted in the "Letter to Raleigh" by both the instruction to understand Gloriana as a figure for Elizabeth I and the setting of the frame story of the romance of Gloriana and Prince Arthur at Gloriana's court, from which the knight-protagonists begin their quests.

Spenser's historical allegory fulfills a number of functions, from commentary on national concerns with religious politics to the humanist goal of offering advice to the monarch and the personal one of establishing himself as poet laureate through panegyric to his queen. However, particularly in the first half of the poem, the historical allegory of The Faerie Queene is discontinuous, in that it is not always fully realized. In the first book, "Holiness," the historical allusions comment on the establishment of a Protestant English Church in the face of the continental threat of Roman Catholicism, and its anti-Roman Catholic argument is conveyed through imagery and allusions drawn from Revelation. For example, Duessa, the chief representative of the Roman Church, is described as a scarlet-clad woman riding a many-headed beast, both of which are images associated with the apocalypse. Additionally, adornment with a contemporary symbol, the papal triple crown, serves to confirm Duessa's Catholicism. These iconic images are counterbalanced by the virginal Una, who represents the one true Church headed by the Queen, and the iconoclastic lion, a symbol of England who protects his lady from assault. Simultaneously, the questing knight, who bears the red cross of St. George on his shield, encounters figures representing spiritual errors like Pride and Despair, both of which indicate the failure of faith. His correction occurs in the House of Holiness, where Red Cross is healed by the spiritual virtues of faith, hope, and charity and given a vision of his genealogy, which is effectively a history of his nation beginning with its purported origin with the Trojan Brutus. The intervention of Prince Arthur at Red Cross's moment of despair confirms the historical and national relevance of his individual spiritual quest. Exploration of the classical virtue of temperance in Book II lends itself less well to extended consideration of contemporary politics, but the politics of the court become a focus of Book III through the struggles of Britomart, the "martiall mayd," to maintain her chasitity while learning the womanly virtue of love in marriage. The virginal representative of a warlike Britain clearly reflects Elizabeth I and her complex negotations of gender, rule, and marriage.[2] The various reflections and refractions of Elizabeth I in the poem offer both positive and negative examples of powerful women that serve to instruct the monarch on the characteristics of successful rule. Typically, the negative examples—Duessa in Book I, Acrasia in Book II, and Malecasta in Book III, for instance—are balanced against more ideal counterparts like Una, Alma, Amoret, and Belphoebe, who are more positively identified as aspects of Elizabeth. The overarching figure for Spenser's queen is Gloriana, who rules the ideal earthly city of Cleopolis and embodies the collective virtues of the other female characters. Her romance with Prince Arthur places her in an idealized British past, which, by virtue of Henry Tudor's Welsh ancestry, was used in contemporary propaganda to legitimize the Tudor dynasty. Through this panegyric, Spenser praised and legitimized Elizabeth, both placing himself in her service and indicating the power of his craft to represent her. These dual functions establish Spenser as both Elizabeth's laureate and the poet of the nation.[3]

[1] Ibid., 20a-20b.

[2] R.H. Wells, Spenser's "Faerie Queene" and the Cult of Elizabeth (London, 1983), pp. 74-75.

[3] See R. Helgerson, Self-Crowned Laureates: Spenser, Jonson, Milton and the Literary System (Berkeley, 1983), pp. 96-100.

from The Faerie Queene

To the Right Noble, and Valorous, Sir Walter Raleigh[1] Knight, Lo. Wardein of the Stanneryes, and Her Majesties Liefetenaunt of the County of Cornewayll.

Sir knowing how doubtfully all Allegories may be construed, and this booke of mine, which I have entituled the Faery Queene, being a continued Allegory, or darke conceit, I have thought good as well for avoyding of gealous opinions and misconstructions, as also for your better light in reading therof, (being so by you commanded,) to discover unto you the general intention and meaning, which in the whole course therof I have fashioned, without expressing of any particular purposes or by-accidents therein occasioned. The generall end therefore of all the booke is to fashion[2] a gentleman or noble person in vertuous and gentle discipline. Which for that I conceived shoulde be most plausible and pleasing, being coloured with an historicall fiction, the which the most part of men delight to read, rather for variety of matter, then for profite of the ensample: I chose the historye of king Arthure, as most fitte for the excellency of his person, being made famous by many mens former workes, and also furthest from the daunger of envy, and suspition of present time. In which I have followed all the antique Poets historicall, first Homere, who in the Persons of Agamemnon and Ulysses hath ensampled a good governour and a vertuous man, the one in his Ilias, the other in his Odysseis:[3] then Virgil,[4] whose like intention was to doe in the person of Aeneas: after him Ariosto[5] comprised them both in his Orlando: and lately Tasso[6] dissevered them againe, and formed both parts in two persons, namely that part which they in Philosophy call Ethice, or vertues of a private man, coloured in his Rinaldo: The other named Politice in his Godfredo. By ensample of which excellente Poets, I labour to pourtraict in Arthure, before he was king, the image of a brave knight, perfected in the twelve private morall vertues, as Aristotle[7] hath devised, the which is the purpose of these first twelve bookes: which if I finde to be well accepted, I may be perhaps encoraged, to frame the other part of polliticke vertues in his person, after that hee came to be king. To some I know this Methode will seeme displeasaunt, which had rather have good discipline delivered plainly in way of precepts, or sermoned at large, as they use, then thus clowdily enwrapped in Allegoricall devises. But such, me seeme, should be satisfide with the use of these dayes, seeing all

[1] Walter Raleigh See above, pp. 1110-11. Ralegh (1554-1618) was involved in overseas exploration as part of the effort to establish England as an empire. A favourite of Elizabeth I, with a brief falling-out after his marriage to Elizabeth Throckmorton in 1591, he was also courtier, poet, and historian. Early in his career, Ralegh was given a position with Lord Grey, Lord Deputy of Ireland, to whom Spenser was secretary, and it is likely that they met in this period (Spenser Encycl., p. 584a). For selections from Ralegh's works, see pp. 1111-36.

[2] fashion two meanings of this word are at work here: to represent and also to train or educate.

[3] Ilias … Odysseis The Iliad and the Odyssey were Homer's two epics. The Iliad features Achilles, the physical hero, while the Odyssey focusses on Odysseus, the intellectual hero. Ulysses is the Latin equivalent of Odysseus.

[4] Virgil Roman poet (70-19 BCE) whose epic, the Aeneid, is the foundational myth for the Roman empire. His poetic career, which progressed from the Eclogues, a set of pastoral poems, through the Georgics, a glorification of agriculture and Italy, to the epic Aeneid, provided a model for the careers of Spenser and, later, Milton.

[5] Ariosto Lodovico Ariosto (1474-1533) wrote Orlando Furioso, which fused Virgilian epic and medieval romance and provided a model for Spenser's work. Spenser combines Ariosto's division of his poem into cantos with Virgil's subdivision into twelve books, although only six were ultimately completed.

[6] Tasso Torquato Tasso (1544-95) was an Italian contemporary of Spenser whose Gerusalemme Liberata (1581) was seen as the greatest achievement of modern poetry. Tasso's two heroes, Goffredo and Rinaldo, embody the two sets of virtues that Spenser combines in a single figure, Arthur.

[7] Aristotle Spenser alludes to Aristotle's Nicomachean Ethics, which discusses private virtue, being a good man, with the good citizen, or public virtue, the subject of his Politics. While Aristotle does not distinguish twelve virtues, Spenser follows the convention of medieval and early sixteenth-century commentators (Spenser Encycl., pp. 58c-59a).

things accounted by their showes, and nothing esteemed of, that is not delightfull and pleasing to commune sence. For this cause is Xenophon[1] preferred before Plato, for that the one in the exquisite depth of his judgement, formed a Commune welth[2] such as it should be, but the other in the person of Cyrus and the Persians fashioned a governement such as might best be: So much more profitable and gratious is doctrine by ensample then by rule. So have I laboured to doe in the person of Arthure: whome I conceive after his long education by Timon, to whom he was by Merlin delivered to be brought up, so soone as he was borne of the Lady Igrayne, to have seene in a dream or vision the Faery Queen, with whose excellent beauty ravished, he awaking resolved to seeke her out, and so being by Merlin armed, and by Timon throughly instructed, he went to seeke her forth in Faerye land. In that Faery Queene I meane glory in my generall intention, but in my particular I conceive the most excellent and glorious person of our soveraine the Queene, and her kingdome in Faery land. And yet in some places els, I doe otherwise shadow her. For considering she beareth two persons, the one of a most royall Queene or Empresse, the other of a most vertuous and beautifull Lady, this latter part in some places I doe expresse in Belphœbe, fashioning her name according to your owne excellent conceipt of Cynthia,[3] (Phœbe and Cynthia being both names of Diana.) So in the person of Prince Arthure I sette forth magnificence[4] in particular, which vertue for that (according to Aristotle and the rest) it is the perfection of all the rest, and conteineth in it them all, therefore in the whole course I mention the deedes of Arthure applyable to that vertue, which I write of in that booke. But of the xii. other vertues, I make xii. other knights the patrones, for the more variety of the history: Of which these three bookes contayn three, The first of the knight of the Redcrosse, in whome I expresse Holynes: The seconde of Sir Guyon, in whome I sette forth Temperaunce: The third of Britomartis a Lady knight, in whome I picture Chastity. But because the beginning of the whole worke seemeth abrupte and as depending upon other antecedents, it needs that ye know the occasion of these three knights severall adventures. For the Methode of a Poet historical is not such, as of an Historiographer. For an Historiographer discourseth of affayres orderly as they were donne, accounting as well the times as the actions, but a Poet thrusteth into the middest, even where it most concerneth him, and there recoursing to the thinges forepaste, and divining of thinges to come, maketh a pleasing Analysis of all. The beginning therefore of my history, if it were to be told by an Historiographer should be the twelfth booke, which is the last, where I devise that the Faery Queene kept her Annuall feast xii. dayes, uppon which xii. severall knights, are in these xii books severally handled and discoursed. The first was this. In the beginning of the feast, there presented him selfe a tall clownishe[5] younge man, who falling before the Queen of Faeries desired a boone (as the manner then was) which during that feaste should happen, that being graunted, he rested him on the floore, unfitte through his rusticity for a better place. Soone after entred a faire Ladye in mourning weedes, riding on a white Asse, with a dwarfe behind her leading a warlike steed, that bore the Armes of a knight, and his speare in the dwarfes hand. Shee falling before the Queene of Faeries, complayned[6] that

[1] Xenophon Greek philosopher (c. 428/27-c. 354 BCE), who left Athens in 401 to enter the service of Cyrus in Asia Minor, later serving in Sparta after his exile from Athens. In fictional form, his Cyropaedia responds to Plato's concern with the problem of finding and educating leaders.

[2] Commune welth Plato's Republic presents his theory of the government of an ideal nation from which he famously expels poets.

[3] Cynthia Ralegh's thinly allegorical fragment, The Ocean to Cynthia, alludes to his own name ("Walter" pronounced "water") in extolling the virtues of Elizabeth I, the Virgin Queen, who is identified with Cynthia, one of the names for the virginal moon goddess.

[4] magnificence Based on Aristotle's idea of magnanimity, magnificence "was frequently defined as the doing of great deeds for the sake of glory" (Spenser Encycl., p. 448b). As the perfection of the other virtues, it seems to indicate their combination in action.

[5] clownishe rustic.

[6] complayned lamented.

her father and mother an ancient King and Queene, had bene by an huge dragon many years shut up in a brasen Castle, who thence suffred them not to yssew: and therefore besought the Faery Queene to assygne her some one of her knights to take on him that exployt. Presently that clownish person upstarting, desired that adventure: whereat the Queene much wondering, and the Lady much gainesaying, yet he earnestly importuned his desire. In the end the Lady told him that unlesse that armour which she brought, would serve him (that is the armour of a Christian man[1] specified by Saint Paul v. Ephes.) that he could not succeed in that enterprise, which being forthwith put upon him with dewe furnitures[2] thereunto, he seemed the goodliest man in al that company, and was well liked of the Lady. And eftsoones[3] taking on him knighthood, and mounting on that straunge Courser,[4] he went forth with her on that adventure: where beginneth the first booke, vz.

A gentle knight was pricking on the playne. &c.

The second day there came in a Palmer bearing an Infant with bloody hands, whose Parents he complained to have bene slayn by an Enchaunteresse called Acrasia: and therfore craved of the Faery Queene, to appoint him some knight, to performe that adventure, which being assigned to Sir Guyon, he presently went forth with that same Palmer: which is the beginning of the second booke and the whole subject thereof. The third day there came in, a Groome who complained before the Faery Queene, that a vile Enchaunter called Busirane had in hand a most faire Lady called Amoretta, whom he kept in most grievous torment, because she would not yield him the pleasure of her body. Whereupon Sir Scudamore the lover of that Lady presently tooke on him that adventure. But being unable to performe it by reason of the hard Enchauntments, after long sorrow, in the end met with Britomartis, who succoured[5] him, and reskewed his love.

But by occasion hereof, many other adventures are intermedled, but rather as Accidents, then intendments. As the love of Britomart, the overthrow of Marinell, the misery of Florimell, the vertuousnes of Belphœbe, the lasciviousnes of Hellenora, and many the like.

Thus much Sir, I have briefly overrone to direct your understanding to the wel-head of the History, that from thence gathering the whole intention of the conceit, ye may as in a handfull gripe al the discourse, which otherwise may happily[6] seeme tedious and confused. So humbly craving the continuaunce of your honorable favour towards me, and th'eternall establishment of your happines, I humbly take leave.

23. January. 1589.
Yours most humbly affectionate.
Ed. Spenser.

[1] armour of a Christian man "Put on the whole armor of God, that you may be able to stand against the wiles of the devil. For we are not contending against flesh and blood, but against the principalities, against the powers, against the world rulers of this present darkness, against the spiritual hosts of wickedness in the heavenly places" (Ephesians 5:11-12). This idea is essential to reformist theology and its sense of Christian action in the world.

[2] furnitures equipment, preparation.

[3] eftsoones soon after.

[4] Courser swift horse.

[5] succoured aided, assisted.

[6] happily by chance.

THE FIRST BOOKE OF THE FAERIE QUEENE

Containing the Legende of the Knight of the Red Crosse, or Of Holinesse.[1]

1

Lo I the man,[2] whose Muse whilome[3] did maske,
As time her taught, in lowly Shepheards weeds,[4]
Am now enforst a far unfitter taske,
For trumpets sterne to chaunge mine Oaten reeds,[5]
And sing of Knights and Ladies gentle deeds;[6]
Whose prayses having slept in silence long,
Me, all too meane, the sacred Muse areeds[7]
To blazon[8] broad emongst her learned throng:
Fierce warres and faithfull loves shall moralize my song.

2

Helpe then, O holy Virgin chiefe of nine,[9]
Thy weaker Novice to performe thy will,
Lay forth out of thine everlasting scryne[10]
The antique rolles, which there lye hidden still,
Of Faerie knights and fairest Tanaquill,[11]
Whom that most noble Briton Prince[12] so long Sought through the world, and suffered so much ill,
That I must rue his undeserved wrong:
O helpe thou my weake wit, and sharpen my dull tong.[13]

3

And thou most dreaded impe[14] of highest Ioue,
Faire Venus sonne,[15] that with thy cruell dart
At that good knight so cunningly didst rove,
That glorious fire it kindled in his hart,
Lay now thy deadly Heben[16] bow apart,
And with thy mother milde come to mine ayde:
Come both, and with you bring triumphant Mart,[17]
In loves and gentle jollities arrayd,[18]
After his murdrous spoiles and bloudy rage allayd.

4

And with them eke, O Goddesse heavenly bright,
Mirrour of grace and Majestie divine,
Great Lady of the greatest Isle, whose light
Like Phœbus lampe[19] throughout the world doth shine,
Shed thy faire beames into my feeble eyne,[20]
And raise my thoughts too humble and too vile,

---

[1] Holinesse This virtue finds a middle ground between the Roman Catholic doctrine of atonement for sin by good works and the reformed belief in justification by faith alone. For reformists, while salvation is achieved only through faith in Christ's sacrifice and the acceptance of God's grace, freely given, pride and a sense of self-sufficiency remain as spiritual dangers. Holiness then becomes the act of divining the will of God in the world and behaving in accordance with it, always mindful of the need to depend on God for guidance and strength (Spenser Encycl., pp. 372c-373c).

[2] Lo I the man This opening echoes the verses prefixed to Virgil's Aeneid.

[3] whilome some time ago.

[4] lowly Shepheards weeds refers to Spenser's eclogues, The Shepheardes Calender (1579).

[5] trumpets sterne … Oaten reeds Martial trumpets were associated with epic, while rustic pipes represented the pastoral tradition.

[6] And sing ……gentle deeds This line revises the opening line of Virgil's Aeneid, "I sing of arms and of a man," and yokes epic with romance.

[7] areeds counsels, advises.

[8] blazon proclaim.

[9] holy Virgin chiefe of nine one of the Muses, likely either Calliope, the Muse of epic poetry, or Clio, the Muse of history, who is the eldest of the nine (OCD).

[10] scryne box for safe-keeping of valuables, particularly relics of saints.

[11] Tanaquill one of the names for the Fairy Queen, also known as Gloriana. The name refers Caia Tanaquil, whose chastity, industry, and sadness are recounted by Livy, Cicero, and Ovid. Both names were applied to Queen Elizabeth by the late 1570s (Spenser Encycl., p. 333c).

[12] most noble Briton Prince Arthur, who will not be named until I.ix.6.

[13] tong tongue.

[14] impe child, offspring.

[15] Faire Venus sonne Cupid.

[16] Heben ebony.

[17] Mart Mars.

[18] arrayd attire, dress.

[19] Phœbus lampe i.e., the sun. Phoebus is god of the sun.

[20] eyne eyes.

To thinke of that true glorious type of thine,
The argument of mine afflicted stile:
The which to heare, vouchsafe, O dearest dred a-while.

Canto I

The Patron of true Holinesse,
Foule Errour doth defeate:
Hypocrisie him to entrapp;
Doth to his home entreate.

1

A Gentle[1] Knight was pricking[2] on the plaine,
Ycladd[3] in mightie armes and silver shielde,[4]
Wherein old dints of deepe wounds did remaine,
The cruell markes of many' a bloudy fielde;
Yet armes till that time did he never wield:
His angry steede did chide[5] his foming bitt,
As much disdayning to the curbe to yield:
Full jolly[6] knight he seemd, and faire did sitt,
As one for knightly giusts[7] and fierce encounters fitt.

2

But on his brest a bloudie Crosse[8] he bore,
The deare remembrance of his dying Lord,
For whose sweete sake that glorious badge he wore
And dead as living ever[9] him ador'd:
Upon his shield the like was also scor'd,[10]
For soveraine hope, which in his helpe he had:
Right faithfull true[11] he was in deede and word,
But of his cheere[12] did seeme too solemne sad;
Yet nothing did he dread, but ever was ydrad.[13]

3

Upon a great adventure he was bond,
That greatest Gloriana[14] to him gave,
That greatest Glorious Queene of Faerie lond,
To winne him worship,[15] and her grace to have,
Which of all earthly things he most did crave;
And ever as he rode, his hart did earne[16]
To prove his puissance[17] in battell brave
Upon his foe, and his new force to learne;
Upon his foe, a Dragon horrible and stearne.

4

A lovely Ladie rode him faire beside,
Upon a lowly Asse more white then snow,[18]
Yet she much whiter, but the same did hide
Under a vele, that wimpled[19] was full low,
And over all a blacke stole she did throw,
As one that inly mournd: so was she sad,
And heavie sat upon her palfrey[20] slow:
Seemed in heart some hidden care she had,
And by her in a line a milke white lambe she lad.[21]

---

1 Gentle noble, both in rank and character.

2 pricking riding quickly.

3 Ycladd clothed.

4 mightie armes and silver shielde See Ephesians 5:11-17, particularly here the shield of faith (Ephesians 5:16).

5 chide scold, rebuke.

6 jolly gallant, brave.

7 giusts jousts.

8 bloudie Crosse both the cross of Christ and the red cross of St. George, patron saint of England.

9 dead as living ever allusion to Revelation 1:17-18: "Fear not, I am the first and the last, and the living one; I died, and behold I am alive for evermore."

10 scor'd marked by cutting or painting.

11 Right faithfull true See Revelation 19:11: "Then I saw heaven opened, and behold, a white horse! He who sat upon it is called Faithful and True, and in righteousness he judges and makes war."

12 cheere expression, countenance.

13 ydrad dreaded.

14 Gloriana the Fairy Queen who rules from her court at Cleopolis and a figure for Queen Elizabeth.

15 worship honour, fame, renown.

16 earne long, yearn.

17 puissance power, strength.

18 a lowly Asse more white then snow echoes Christ's entry into Jerusalem on Palm Sunday in Matthew 21:5-7.

19 wimpled fell in folds.

20 palfrey saddle horse for ordinary riding.

21 a milke white lambe she lad John 1:29 refers to Christ as the Lamb of God. In English legend, St. George rescues a princess who leads a lamb on a leash (Spenser Encycl., p. 705c).

5

So pure an innocent, as that same lambe,
She was in life and every vertuous lore,
And by descent from Royall lynage came
Of ancient Kings and Queenes, that had of yore
Their scepters stretcht from East to Westerne shore,
And all the world in their subjection held;
Till that infernall feend[1] with foule uprore
Forwasted[2] all their land, and them expeld:
Whom to avenge, she had this Knight from far compeld.[3]

6

Behind her farre away a Dwarfe[4] did lag,
That lasie seemd in being ever last,
Or wearied with bearing of her bag
Of needments at his backe. Thus as they past,
The day with cloudes was suddeine overcast,
And angry Ioue an hideous storme of raine
Did poure into his Lemans[5] lap so fast,
That every wight[6] to shrowd[7] it did constrain,
And this faire couple eke[8] to shroud themselves were fain.[9]

7

Enforst to seeke some covert[10] nigh at hand,
A shadie grove not far away they spide,
That promist ayde the tempest to withstand:
Whose loftie trees yclad with sommers pride,
Did spred so broad, that heavens light did hide,
Not perceable with power of any starre:
And all within were pathes and alleies[11] wide,
With footing worne, and leading inward farre:
Faire harbour that them seemes;[12] so in they entred arre.

8

And foorth they passe, with pleasure forward led,
Joying to heare the birdes sweete harmony,
Which therein shrouded from the tempest dred,
Seemd in their song to scorne the cruell sky.
Much can they prayse the trees[13] so straight and hy,
The sayling Pine, the Cedar proud and tall,
The vine-prop Elme, the Poplar never dry,
The builder Oake, sole king of forrests all,
The Aspine good for staves, the Cypresse funerall.

9

The Laurell, meed of mightie Conquerours
And Poets sage, the Firre that weepeth still,
The Willow worne of forlorne Paramours,
The Eugh obedient to the benders will,
The Birch for shaftes, the Sallow for the mill,
The Mirrhe sweete bleeding in the bitter wound,
The warlike Beech, the Ash for nothing ill,
The fruitfull Olive, and the Platane round,
The carver Holme, the Maple seeldom inward sound.

10

Led with delight, they thus beguile the way,
Untill the blustring storme is overblowne;
When weening[14] to returne, whence they did stray,
They cannot finde that path, which first was showne,
But wander too and fro in wayes unknowne,
Furthest from end then, when they neerest weene,

---

1 infernall feend Satan.
2 Forwasted laid waste to.
3 compeld drawn, forced to come.
4 Dwarfe This figure represents common sense (Variorum).
5 Lemans beloved's.
6 wight person.
7 shrowd take shelter.
8 eke also.
9 fain obliged.
10 covert shelter, concealment.
11 alleies alleys.
12 Faire harbour that them seemes It appears to them a good harbour.
13 trees The catalogue of trees that follows is a feature found in Virgil, Ovid, Boccaccio, and, more immediately, Chaucer. Spenser combines classical, biblical, and literary symbolism in his choices.
14 weening expecting, hoping.

That makes them doubt, their wits be not their owne:
So many pathes, so many turnings seene,
That which of them to take, in diverse[1] doubt they been.

11

At last resolving forward still to fare,
Till that some end they finde or in or out,
That path they take, that beaten seemd most bare,
And like to lead the labyrinth[2] about;
Which when by tract[3] they hunted had throughout,
At length it brought them to a hollow cave,
Amid the thickest woods. The Champion stout[4]
Eftsoones dismounted from his courser brave,[5]
And to the Dwarfe a while his needlesse[6] spere he gave.

12

Be well aware,[7] quoth then that Ladie milde,
Least suddaine mischiefe[8] ye too rash provoke:
The danger hid, the place unknowne and wilde,
Breedes dreadfull doubts: Oft fire is without smoke,
And perill without show: therefore your stroke
Sir knight with-hold, till further triall made.
Ah Ladie (said he) shame were to revoke
The forward footing for an hidden shade:
Vertue gives her selfe light, through darkenesse for to wade.

13

"Yea but," quoth she, "the perill of this place
I better wot[9] then[10] you, though now too late
To wish you backe returne with foule disgrace,
Yet wisedome warnes, whilest foot is in the gate,
To stay the steppe, ere[11] forced to retreate.
This is the wandring wood, this Errours den,
A monster vile, whom God and man does hate:
Therefore I read[12] beware." "Fly fly," quoth then
The fearefull Dwarfe, "this is no place for living men."

14

But full of fire and greedy hardiment,[13]
The youthfull knight could not for ought be staide,[14]
But forth unto darksome hole he went,
And looked in: his glistring[15] armor made
A litle glooming light, much like a shade,
By which he saw the ugly monster plaine,
Halfe like a serpent[16] horribly displaide,
But th'other halfe did womans shape retaine,
Most lothsom, filthie, foule, and full of vile disdaine.

15

And as she lay upon the durtie ground,
Her huge long taile her den all overspred,
Yet was in knots and many boughtes[17] upwound,
Pointed with mortall sting. Of her there bred
A thousand yong ones, which she dayly fed,

---

1 diverse diverting, distracting (in a usage peculiar to Spenser).
2 labyrinth the maze constructed by Daedalus for King Minos to imprison the part-human/part-bull Minotaur (Ovid, Metamorphoses, Book 8).
3 tract path, route.
4 stout brave, firm in resolve.
5 brave splendid, fine.
6 needlesse unnecessary.
7 aware watchful, on guard.
8 mischiefe trouble, calamity.
9 wot know.
10 then than.
11 ere before.
12 read counsel, advise.
13 hardiment daring, boldness.
14 could not … staide could not be held back for anything.
15 glistring shining, glittering.
16 Halfe like a serpent Error resembles the serpent-woman Echidna in Hesiod's Theogony and other classical monsters who are human-snake amalgams (Spenser Encycl., p. 253a).
17 boughtes coils.

Sucking upon her poisonous dugs, each one
Of sundry shapes, yet all ill favored:
Soone as that uncouth light upon them shone,
Into her mouth they crept, and suddain all were gone.

16

Their dam upstart, out of her den effraide,[1]
And rushed forth, hurling her hideous taile
About her cursed head, whose folds displaid
Were stretcht now forth at length without entraile.[2]
She lookt about, and seeing one in mayle
Armed to point, sought backe to turne againe;
For light she hated as the deadly bale,[3]
Ay wont[4] in desert darknesse to remaine,
Where plaine none might her see, nor she see any plaine.

17

Which when the valiant Elfe[5] perceiv'd, he lept
As Lyon fierce upon the flying pray,
And with his trenchard[6] blade her boldly kept
From turning backe, and forced her to stay:
Therewith enrag'd she loudly gan to bray,
And turning fierce, her speckled taile advaunst,
Threatning her angry sting,[7] him to dismay:
Who nought aghast, his mightie hand enhaunst:[8]
The stroke down from her head unto her shoulder glaunst.

18

Much daunted[9] with that dint,[10] her sence was dazd,
Yet kindling rage, her selfe she gathered round,
And all attonce[11] her beastly body raizd
With doubled forces high above the ground:
Tho wrapping up her wrethed sterne[12] arownd,
Lept fierce upon his shield, and her huge traine
All suddenly about his body wound,
That hand or foot to stirre he strove in vaine:
God helpe the man so wrapt in Errours endlesse traine.[13]

19

His Lady sad to see his sore constraint,
Cride out, "Now now Sir knight, shew what ye bee,
Add faith unto your force, and be not faint:
Strangle her, else she sure will strangle thee."
That when he heard, in great perplexitie,[14]
His gall[15] did grate[16] for griefe and high disdaine,[17]
And knitting all his force got one hand free,
Wherewith he grypt her gorge[18] with so great paine,
That soone to loose her wicked bands did her constraine.[19]

20

Therewith she spewd out of her filthy maw[20]
A floud of poyson horrible and blacke,
Full of great lumpes of flesh and gobbets raw,[21]
Which stunck so vildly,[22] that it forst him slacke
His grasping hold, and from her turne him backe:

---

1 effraide startled, frightened.
2 entraile coil.
3 bale injury, harm.
4 Ay wont always in the habit of.
5 Elfe a knight in fairyland.
6 trenchard sharp.
7 angry sting The locusts in Revelation 9:7-10 have the hair of a woman and the tail of a scorpion (Hamilton).
8 enhaunst lifted, raised.
9 daunted subdued.
10 dint stroke, blow.
11 attonce at once.
12 wrapping up her wrethed sterne i.e., she wraps her coiled tail around herself.
13 traine both, tail and treachery, deceit.
14 perplexitie trouble or bewilderment, also entanglement.
15 gall the gall-bladder, in medieval medicine the seat of anger.
16 grate rub harshly.
17 disdaine indignation, anger.
18 gorge neck.
19 constraine force, compel.
20 maw mouth.
21 gobbets raw lumps of half-digested food.
22 vildly vilely.

Her vomit full of bookes and papers[1] was,
With loathly frogs and toades, which eyes did lacke,[2]
And creeping sought way in the weedy gras:
Her filthy parbreake[3] all the place defiled has.

21

As when old father Nilus[4] gins to swell
With timely pride above the Aegyptian vale,
His fattie waves do fertile slime outwell,
And overflow each plaine and lowly dale:
But when his later spring gins to avale,
Huge heapes of mudd he leaves, wherein there breed
Ten thousand kindes of creatures, partly male
And partly female of his fruitfull seed;
Such ugly monstrous shapes elswhere may no man reed.

22

The same so sore annoyed has the knight,
That welnigh[5] choked with the deadly stinke,
His forces faile, ne can no longer fight.
Whose corage when the feend perceiv'd to shrinke,
She poured forth out of her hellish sinke
Her fruitfull cursed spawne of serpents small,
Deformed monsters, fowle, and blacke as inke,
Which swarming all about his legs did crall,
And him encombred sore, but could not hurt at all.

23

As gentle Shepheard in sweete even-tide,
When ruddy Phœbus gins to welke[6] in west,
High on an hill, his flocke to vewen wide,
Markes which do byte their hasty supper best;
A cloud of combrous[7] gnattes do him molest,
All striving to infixe their feeble stings,
That from their noyance he no where can rest,
But with his clownish hands their tender wings
He brusheth oft, and oft doth mar their murmurings.

24

Thus ill bestedd,[8] and fearefull more of shame,
Then of the certaine perill he stood in,
Halfe furious unto his foe he came,
Resolv'd in minde all suddenly to win,
Or soone to lose, before he once would lin;[9]
And strooke[10] at her with more then manly force,
That from her body full of filthie sin
He raft[11] her hatefull head without remorse;
A streame of cole black bloud forth gushed from her corse.[12]

25

Her scattred brood, soone as their Parent deare
They saw so rudely[13] falling to the ground,
Groning full deadly, all with troublous feare,
Gathred themselves about her body round,
Weening their wonted entrance to have found
At her wide mouth: but being there withstood
They flocked all about her bleeding wound,
And sucked up their dying mothers blood,
Making her death their life, and eke her hurt their good.

26

That detestable sight him much amazde,
To see th'unkindly Impes[14] of heaven accurst, Devoure their dam;[15] on whom while so he gazd,

---

1 bookes and papers Roman Catholic propaganda.

2 loathly frogs and toades … eyes did lacke See Revelation 16:13: "And I saw, issuing from the mouth of the dragon and from the mouth of the beast and from the mouth of the false prophet, three foul spirits like frogs."

3 parbreake vomit.

4 Nilus The annual flood of the Nile, which created fertile ground, was reputed also to breed strange creatures.

5 welnigh nearly.

6 welke diminish.

7 combrous troublesome, harrassing.

8 ill bestedd in a bad situtation.

9 lin cease, leave off.

10 strooke i.e., struck.

11 raft removed.

12 corse body.

13 rudely violent.

14 unkindly Impes unnatural offspring.

15 dam mother.

Having all satisfide their bloudy thurst,
Their bellies swolne he saw with fulness burst,
And bowels gushing forth: well worthy end
Of such as drunke her life, the which them nurst;
Now needeth him no lenger labour spend,
His foes have slaine themselves, with whom he should contend.

27

His Ladie seeing all, that chaunst,[1] from farre
Approcht in hast to greet his victorie,
And said, "Faire knight, borne under happy starre,
Who see your vanquisht[2] foes before you lye:
Well worthy be you of that Armorie,[3]
Wherein ye have great glory wonne this day,
And proov'd your strength on a strong enimie,
Your first adventure: many such I pray,
And henceforth ever wish, that like succeed it may."

28

Then mounted he upon his Steede againe,
And with the Lady backward sought to wend;[4]
That path he kept, which beaten was most plaine,
Ne[5] ever would to any by-way[6] bend,
But still did follow one unto the end,
The which at last out of the wood them brought.
So forward on his way (with God to frend)
He passed forth, and new adventure sought;
Long way he travelled, before he heard of ought.[7]

29

At length they chaunst to meet upon the way
An aged Sire, in long blacke weedes[8] yclad,
His feete all bare, his beard all hoarie[9] gray,
And by his belt his booke he hanging had;
Sober he seemde, and very sagely sad,[10]
And to the ground his eyes were lowly bent,
Simple in shew,[11] and voyde of malice bad,
And all the way he prayed, as he went,
And often knockt his brest, as one that did repent.

30

He faire the knight saluted, louting[12] low,
Who faire him quited,[13] as that courteous was:
And after asked him, if he did know
Of straunge adventures, which abroad did pas.
"Ah my deare Sonne," quoth he, "how should, alas,
Silly old man, that lives in hidden cell,
Bidding his beades[14] all day for his trespas,
Tydings of warre and worldly trouble tell?
With holy father sits not with such things to mell.

31

But if of daunger which hereby doth dwell,
And homebred evill ye desire to heare,
Of a straunge man I can you tidings tell,
That wasteth all this countrey farre and neare."
"Of such," said he, "I chiefly do inquere,
And shall you well reward to shew the place,
In which that wicked wight his dayes doth weare:
For to all knighthood it is foule disgrace,
That such a cursed creature lives so long a space."

---

1 chaunst happened.
2 vanquisht overcome.
3 Armorie armour, in this case of Christ.
4 wend turn.
5 Ne nor.
6 by-way side road, secluded way.
7 ought anything.
8 weedes clothes.
9 hoarie grey or white.
10 sad grave, serious.
11 shew show, appearance.
12 louting bending, bowing.
13 quited behaved.
14 Bidding his beades saying his prayers, specifically the Rosary.

32

"Far hence," quoth he, "in wastfull wildernesse
His dwelling is, by which no living wight
May ever passe, but thorough great distresse."
"Now," sayd the Lady, "draweth toward night,
And well I wote,[1] that of your later fight
Ye all forwearied be: for what so strong,
But wanting rest will also want of might?
The Sunne that measures heaven all day long,
At night doth baite his steedes the Ocean waves emong.

33

Then with the Sunne take Sir, your timely rest,
And with new day new worke at once begin:
Untroubled night they say gives counsell best."
"Right well Sir knight ye have advised bin," Quoth then that aged man, "the way to win
Is wisely to advise:[2] now day is spent;
Therefore with me ye may take up your In[3]
For this same night." The knight was well content:
So with that godly father to his home they went.

34

A little lowly Hermitage it was,
Downe in a dale,[4] hard by a forests side,
Far from resort of people, that did pas
In travell to and froe: a little wyde
There was an holy Chappell edifyde,[5]
Wherein the Hermite dewly wont to say
His holy things[6] each morne and eventyde:
Thereby a Christall streame did gently play,
Which from a sacred fountaine welled forth alway.

35

Arrived there, the little house they fill,
Ne looke for entertainement, where none was:
Rest is their feast, and all things at their will;
The noblest mind the best contentment has.
With faire discourse[7] the evening so they pas:
For that old man of pleasing wordes had store,
And well could file his tongue as smooth as glas;
He told of Saintes and Popes, and evermore
He strowd an Ave-Mary[8] after and before.

36

The drouping[9] Night thus creepeth on them fast,
And the sad humour loading their eye liddes,
As messenger of Morpheus[10] on them cast
Sweet slombring deaw, the which to sleepe them biddes.
Unto their lodgings then his guestes he riddes:
Where when all drownd in deadly sleepe he findes,
He to his study goes, and there amides
His Magick bookes and artes of sundry kindes,
He seekes out mighty charmes, to trouble sleepy mindes.

37

Then choosing out few wordes most horrible,
(Let none them read) thereof did verses frame,
With which and other spelles like terrible,
He bad[11] awake blacke Plutoes griesly Dame,[12]
And cursed heaven, and spake reprochfull shame

---

1 wote know.
2 wisely to advise carefully to consider.
3 In abode, lodgings.
4 dale valley.
5 edifyde built.
6 holy things prayers, offices.
7 discourse conversation.
8 Ave-Mary Hail Mary (the name of a Roman Catholic prayer).
9 drouping descending.
10 Morpheus son of Hypnos, the god of sleep, who makes human shapes appear to dreamers (OCD).
11 bad ordered.
12 Plutoes griesly Dame Proserpina, his wife and goddess of the Underworld. She was the daughter of the grain goddess Demeter and was abducted by Pluto, god of the Underworld. Demeter arranged for her return on the condition that Proserpina ate nothing during her sojourn in Pluto's house. Unfortunately, during her captivity she had consumed some pomegranate seeds, but Pluto compromised by returning her to the upper world for half of each year. The rest of the time she rules with him as queen of the Underworld (Dict. Gods and Mortals).

Of highest God, the Lord of life and light;
A bold bad man, that dar'd to call by name
Great Gorgon,[1] Prince of darknesse and dead night,
At which Cocytus[2] quakes, and Styx is put to flight.

38

And forth he cald out of deepe darknesse dred
Legions of Sprights, the which like little flyes
Fluttring about his ever damned hed,
A-waite whereto their service he applyes,
To aide his friends, or fray[3] his enimies:
Of those he chose out two, the falsest twoo,
And fittest for to forge true-seeming lyes;
The one of them he gave a message too,
The other by him selfe staide other worke to doo.

39

He making speedy way through spersed[4] ayre,
And through the world of waters wide and deepe,
To Morpheus house doth hastily repaire.
Amid the bowels of the earth full steepe,
And low, where dawning day doth never peepe,
His dwelling is; there Tethys[5] his wet bed
Doth ever wash, and Cynthia[6] still doth steepe
In silver deaw his ever-drouping hed,
Whiles sad Night over him her mantle black doth spred.

40

Whose double gates he findeth locked fast,
The one faire fram'd of burnisht Yvory,
The other all with silver[7] overcast;
And wakefull dogges before them farre do lye,
Watching to banish Care their enimy,
Who oft is wont to trouble gentle Sleepe.
By them the Sprite doth passe in quietly,
And unto Morpheus comes, whom drowned deepe
In drowsie fit he findes: of nothing he takes keepe.[8]

41

And more, to lulle him in his slumber soft,
A trickling streame from high rocke tumbling downe
And ever-drizling raine upon the loft,
Mixt with a murmuring winde, much like the sowne
Of swarming Bees, did cast him in a swowne:[9]
No other noyse, nor peoples troublous cryes
As still are wont t'annoy the walled towne,
Might there be heard: but careless Quiet lyes,
Wrapt in eternall silence farre from enemyes.

42

The messenger approching him spake,
But his wast wordes returned to him in vaine:
So sound he slept, that nought mought[10] him awake.
Then rudely he him thrust, and pusht with paine,
Whereat he gan to stretch: but he againe
Shooke him so hard, that forced him to speake.
As one then in a dreame, whose dryer[11] braine
Is tost with troubled sights and fancies weake,
He mumbled soft, but would not all his silence breake.

43

The Sprite then gan more boldly him to wake,
And threatned unto him the dreaded name
Of Hecate:[12] whereat he gan to quake,

---

[1] Gorgon Demogorgon, progenitor of all the gods (Variorum).

[2] Cocytus river of lamentation, one of the five rivers of Hades. Styx is the river of death (i.e., death flees Gorgon).

[3] fray frighten, drive off.

[4] spersed scattered (i.e., empty).

[5] Tethys wife of Neptune, god of the sea (i.e., the sea itself).

[6] Cynthia the moon.

[7] Yvory … silver In Aeneid 6, gates of ivory and horn distinguish true dreams from false, respectively. Spenser adapts that tradition here (Spenser Encycl., p. 227a).

[8] keepe heed.

[9] swowne swoon.

[10] mought might.

[11] dryer too dry.

[12] Hecate queen of Hades.

And lifting up his lumpish[1] head, with blame
Halfe angry asked him, for what he came.
"Hither," quoth he, "me Archimago[2] sent,
He that the stubborne Sprites can wisely tame,
He bids thee to him send for his intent
A fit false dreame, that can delude the sleepers sent."[3]

44

The God obayde, and calling forth straight way
A diverse dreame out of his prison darke,
Delivered it to him, and downe did lay
His heavie head, devoide of carefull carke,[4]
Whose sences all were straight benumbed and starke.[5]
He backe returning by the Yuorie dore,
Remounted up as light as chearefull Larke,
And on his litle winges the dreame he bore
In hast unto his Lord, where he him left afore.

45

Who all this while with charmes and hidden artes,
Had made a Lady of that other Spright,
And fram'd of liquid ayre her tender partes
So lively, and so like in all mens sight,
That weaker sence it could have ravisht[6] quight:
The maker selfe for all his wondrous witt,
Was nigh[7] beguiled[8] with so goodly sight:
Her all in white he clad, and over it
Cast a blacke stole, most like to seeme for Vna[9] fit.

46

Now when that ydle[10] dreame was to him brought,
Unto that Elfin knight he bad him fly,
Where he slept soundly void of evill thought,
And with false shewes abuse his fantasy,[11]
In sort as[12] he him schooled privily:
And that new creature borne without her dew,
Full of the makers guile, with usage sly
He taught to imitate that Lady trew,
Whose semblance she did carrie under feigned hew.[13]

47

Thus well instructed, to their worke they hast,
And comming where the knight in slomber lay,
The one upon his hardy head him plast,
And made him dreame of loves and lustfull play,
That nigh his manly hart did melt away,
Bathed in wanton blis and wicked joy:
Then seemed him his Lady by him lay,
And to him playnd,[14] how that false winged boy
Her chast hart had subdewd, to learne Dame pleasures toy.

48

And she her selfe of beautie soveraigne Queene,
Faire Venus seemde unto his bed to bring
Her, whom he waking evermore did weene[15]
To be the chastest flowre, that ay did spring
On earthly braunch, the daughter of a king,
Now a loose Leman to vile service bound:
And eke the Graces[16] seemed all to sing,
Hymen io Hymen,[17] dauncing all around,
Whilst freshest Flora[18] her with Yuie[19] girlond crownd.

---

1 lumpish dull, heavy.
2 Archimago "Arch magician" or creator of images.
3 sent senses.
4 carke toil, troubled state of mind.
5 starke stiff, rigid.
6 ravisht enraptured.
7 nigh nearly.
8 beguiled deluded, deceived.
9 Vna one.
10 ydle groundless.
11 fantasy faculty of perception, imagination.
12 In sort as in the way that.
13 hew form.
14 playnd complained.
15 weene think.
16 Graces three minor goddesses, embodying beauty, gentleness, and friendship, who attend Venus.
17 Hymen io Hymen ritual cry to the god of marriage at weddings.
18 Flora flower goddess.
19 Yuie linked to Bacchus, the god of wine, and signifying wantonness (Hamilton).

49

In this great passion of unwonted lust,
Or wonted feare of doing ought amis,
He started up, as seeming to mistrust
Some secret ill, or hidden foe of his:
Lo there before his face his Lady is,
Under blake[1] stole hyding her bayted hooke,
And as halfe blushing offred him to kis,
With gentle blandishment and lovely looke,
Most like that virgin true, which for her knight him took.

50

All clean dismayd to see so uncouth[2] sight,
And halfe enraged at her shameless guise,
He thought have slaine her in his fierce despight:
But hasty heat tempring with sufferance wise,
He stayde his hand, and gan himselfe advise
To prove his sense, and tempt her faigned truth.
Wringing her hands in wemens pitteous wise,[3]
Tho can she weepe, to stirre up gentle ruth,[4]
Both for her noble bloud, and for her tender youth.

51

And said, "Ah Sir, my liege Lord and my love,
Shall I accuse the hidden cruell fate,
And mightie causes wrought[5] in heaven above,
Or the blind God, that doth me thus amate,[6]
For hoped love to winne me certaine hate?
Yet thus perforce[7] he bids me do, or die.
Die is my dew: yet rew my wretched state
You, whom my hard avenging destinie
Hath made judge of my life or death indifferently.

52

Your owne deare sake forst me at first to leave
My Fathers kingdome." There she stopt with teares;
Her swollen hart her speach seemd to bereave,
And then againe begun, "My weaker yeares
Captiv'd to fortune and frayle worldly feares,
Fly to your faith for succour[8] and sure ayde:
Let me not dye in languor[9] and long teares."
"Why Dame," quoth he, "what hath ye thus dismayd?
What frayes ye, that were wont to comfort me affrayd?"

53

"Love of your selfe," she said, "and deare constraint[10]
Lets me not sleepe, but wast the wearie night
In secret anguish and unpittied plaint,
Whiles you in carelesse sleepe are drowned quight."[11]
Her doubtfull words made that redoubted[12] knight
Suspect her truth: yet since no untruth he knew,
Her fawning love with foule disdainefull spight
He would not shend, but said, "Deare dame I rew,
That for my sake unknowne such griefe unto you grew.

54

Assure your selfe, it fell not all to ground;
For all so deare as life is to my hart,
I deeme your love, and hold me to you bound;
Ne let vaine feares procure your needlesse smart,
Where cause is none, but to your rest depart."
Not all content, yet seemd she to appease[13]

---

1 blake black.
2 uncouth strange and distasteful.
3 wise way.
4 ruth pity, compassion.
5 wrought formed, created.
6 amate dismay.
7 perforce by force.
8 succour aid, assistance.
9 languor distress.
10 deare constraint dire distress.
11 quight quite.
12 redoubted dreaded.
13 appease quiet.

Her mournefull plaintes, beguiled of her art,[1]
And fed with words, that could not chuse but please,
So slyding softly forth, she turnd as to her ease.

55

Long after lay he musing at her mood,
Much griev'd to thinke that gentle Dame so light,
For whose defence he was to shed his blood.
At last dull wearinesse of former fight
Having yrockt a sleepe his irkesome[2] spright,
That troublous dreame gan freshly tosse his braine,
With bowres, and beds, and Ladies deare delight:
But when he saw his labour all was vaine,
With that misformed spright he backe returnd againe.

Canto II

The guilefull great Enchaunter parts
The Redcrosse Knight from Truth:
Into whose stead faire falshood steps,
And workes him wofull ruth.[3]

1

By this the Northerne wagoner[4] had set
His sevenfold teme[5] behind the stedfast starre[6]
That was in Ocean waves yet never wet,
But firme is fixt, and sendeth light from farre
To all, that in the wide deepe wandring arre:
And chearefull Chaunticlere[7] with his note shrill
Had warned once, that Phœbus fiery carre
In hast was climbing up the Easterne hill,
Full envious that night so long his roome did fill.

2

When those accursed messengers of hell,
That feigning dreame, and that faire-forged Spright
Came to their wicked maister, and gan tell
Their bootlesse[8] paines, and ill succeeding night:
Who all in rage to see his skilfull might
Deluded so, gan threaten hellish paine
And sad Proserpines wrath, them to affright.
But when he saw his threatning was but vaine,
He cast about, and searcht his balefull bookes againe.

3

Eftsoones he tooke that miscreated faire,
And that false other Spright, on whom he spred
A seeming body of the subtile[9] aire,
Like a young Squire, in loves and lusty-hed[10]
His wanton dayes that ever loosely led,
Without regard of armes and dreaded fight:
Those two he tooke, and in a secret bed,
Covered with darknesse and misdeeming[11] night,
Them both together laid, to joy in vaine delight.

4

Forthwith he runnes with feigned faithfull hast
Unto his guest, who after troublous sights
And dreames, gan now to take more sound repast,[12]
Whom suddenly he wakes with fearefull frights,
As one aghast with feends or damned sprights,
And to him cals, "Rise rise unhappy Swaine,
That here wex old in sleepe, whiles wicked wights
Have knit themselves in Venus shamefull chaine;
Come see, where your false Lady doth her honour staine."

---

1 beguiled of her art deprived of her cunning.
2 irkesome tired, troublesome.
3 ruth distress.
4 Northerne wagoner the northern constellation, Boötes, situated at the tail of the Great Bear (Variorum).
5 sevenfold teme the seven stars in the tail of the Great Bear.
6 stedfast starre the Pole-star (Variorum).
7 Chaunticlere rooster; a rooster by this name is featured in Chaucer's "Nun's Priest's Tale."
8 bootlesse useless, unavailing.
9 subtile thin.
10 lusty-hed vigour, lustfulness.
11 misdeeming misjudging, mistaken.
12 repast repose, refreshment.

5

All in amaze[1] he suddenly up start
With sword in hand, and with the old man went;
Who soone him brought into a secret part,
Where that false couple were full closely ment[2]
In wanton lust and lewd embracement:
Which when he saw, he burnt with gealous fire,
The eye of reason was with rage yblent,[3]
And would have slaine them in his furious ire,
But hardly was restreined of that aged sire.

6

Returning to his bed in torment great,
And bitter anguish of his guiltie sight,
He could not rest, but did his stout heart eat,
And wast his inward gall with deepe despight,[4]
Yrksome of life, and too long lingring night.
At last faire Hesperus[5] in highest skie
Had spent his lampe, and brought forth dawning light,
Then up he rose, and clad him hastily;
The Dwarfe him brought his steed: so both away do fly.

7

Now when the rosy-fingred Morning faire,
Weary of aged Tithones[6] saffron bed,
Had spred her purple robe through deawy aire,
And the high hils Titan discovered,
The royall virgin[7] shooke off drowsy-hed,
And rising forth out of her baser bowre,
Lookt for her knight, who far away was fled,
And for her Dwarfe, that wont to wait each houre;
Then gan she waile and weepe, to see that woefull stowre.[8]

8

And after him she rode with so much speede
As her slow beast could make; but all in vaine:
For him so far had borne his light-foot steede,
Pricked with wrath and fiery fierce disdaine,
That him to follow was but fruitlesse paine;
Yet she her weary limbes would never rest,
But every hill and dale, each wood and plaine
Did search, sore grieved in her gentle brest,
He so ungently left her, whom she loved best.

9

But subtill Archimago, when his guests
He saw divided into double parts,[9]
And Una wandring in woods and forrests,
Th'end of his drift, he praisd his divelish arts,
That had such might over true meaning harts;
Yet rests not so, but other meanes doth make,
How he may workd unto her further smarts:
For her he hated as the hissing snake,
And in her many troubles did most pleasure take.

10

He then devisde himselfe how to disguise;
For by his mightie science he could take
As many formes and shapes in seeming wise,
As ever Proteus[10] to himselfe could make:
Sometime a fowle, sometime a fish in lake,
Now like a foxe, now like a dragon fell,
That of himselfe he oft for feare would quake,
And oft would flie away. O who can tell
The hidden power of herbes, and might of Magicke spell?

11

But now seemde best, the person to put on
Of that good knight, his late beguiled guest:
In mighty armes he was yclad anon,
And silver shield: upon his coward brest
A bloudy crosse, and on his craven crest[11]

---

1 amaze bewilderment, confusion.
2 ment mingled, blended.
3 yblent blinded.
4 despight malice.
5 Hesperus both the morning and evening star (Variorum).
6 Tithones Tithonus married Aurora, the goddess of the dawn, who asked Zeus to grant her husband immortality. However, she failed to request eternal youth, with the result that Tithonus continued to age and gradually withered into a dessicated shell (Dict. Gods and Mortals).
7 royall virgin Una.
8 stowre time of turmoil and stress.
9 divided into double parts Redcrosse and Una are not only separated from each other, but each is divided through their false doubles.
10 Proteus a sea god, known for his ability to change shapes, noted in Odyssey 4 (Variorum).
11 craven crest cowardly helmet.

A bounch of haires discolourd diversly:
Full jolly[1] knight he seemde, and well addrest,[2]
And when he sate upon his courser free,
Saint George[3] himself ye would have deemed him to be.

12

But he the knight, whose semblaunt[4] he did beare,
The true Saint George was wandred far away,
Still flying from his thoughts and gealous feare;
Will was his guide, and griefe led him astray.
At last him chaunst to meete upon the way
A faithlesse Sarazin[5] all arm'd to point,
In whose great shield was writ with letters gay
Sans foy:[6] full large of limbe and every joint
He was, and cared not for God or man a point.

13

He had a faire companion of his way,
A goodly Lady clad in scarlot red,
Purfled[7] with gold and pearle of rich assay,
And like a Persian mitre[8] on her hed
She wore, with crownes and owches[9] garnished,
The which her lavish lovers to her gave;
Her wanton palfrey all was overspred
With tinsell trappings, woven like a wave,
Whose bridle rung with golden bels and bosses[10] brave.

14

With faire disport[11] and courting dalliaunce
She intertainde her lover all the way:
But when she saw the knight his speare advaunce,
She soone left off her mirth and wanton play,
And bad her knight addresse him to the fray:
His foe was nigh at hand. He prickt with pride
And hope to winne his Ladies heart that day,
Forth spurred fast: adowne his coursers side
The red bloud trickling staind the way, as he did ride.

15

The knight of the Redcrosse when him he spide,
Spurring so hote with rage dispiteous,[12]
Gan fairely couch his speare, and towards ride:
Soone meete they both, both fell[13] and furious,
That daunted with their forces hideous,[14]
Their steeds do stagger, and amazed stand,
And eke themselves too rudely rigorous,
Astonied[15] with the stroke of their owne hand,
Do backe rebut,[16] and each to other yeeldeth land.

16

As when two rams stird with ambitious pride,
Fight for the rule of the rich fleeced flocke,
Their horned fronts so fierce on either side
Do meete, that with the terrour of the shocke
Astonied both, stand senceless as a blocke,
Forgetfull of the hanging victory:
So stood these twaine, unmoved as a rocke,
Both staring fierce, and holding idely
The broken reliques of their former cruelty.

17

The Sarazin sore daunted with the buffe[17]
Snatcheth his sword, and fiercely to him flies;
Who well it wards, and quyteth cuff[18] with cuff:
Each others equall puissance envies,
And through their iron sides with cruell spies
Does seeke to perce: repining[19] courage yields

---

1 jolly gallant, brave.
2 addrest well-ordered, accomplished.
3 Saint George patron saint of England.
4 semblaunt appearance.
5 Sarazin infidel.
6 Sans foy French, "without faith" (i.e., faithlessness or false faith).
7 Purfled embroidered.
8 Persian mitre papal triple crown. The mitre was also a sign of lasciviousness and effeminacy (Variorum).
9 owches jewels.
10 bosses studs.
11 disport merriment.
12 dispiteous spiteful, cruel.
13 fell fierce.
14 hideous huge, immense.
15 Astonied stunned, dazed.
16 rebut repel, drive back.
17 buffe blow.
18 cuff stroke.
19 repining discontented.

No foote to foe. The flashing fier flies
As from a forge out of their burning shields,
And streames of purple bloud new dies the verdant[1] fields.

18

"Curse on that Crosse," quoth then the Sarazin,
"That keepes thy body from the bitter fit;
Dead long ygoe I wote thou haddest bin,
Had not that charme from thee forwarned it:
But yet I warne thee now assured sitt,
And hide thy head." Therewith upon his crest
With rigour so outrageous he smitt,[2]
That a large share it hewd out of the rest,
And glauncing downe his shield, from blame him fairely blest.

19

Who thereat wondrous wroth, the sleeping spark
Of native vertue[3] gan eftsoones revive,
And at his haughtie helmet making mark,
So hugely stroke, that it the steele did rive,
And cleft his head. He tumbling downe alive,
With bloody mouth his mother earth did kis,
Greeting his grave: his grudging ghost did strive
With the fraile flesh; at last it flitted is,
Whither the soules do fly of men, that live amis.

20

The Lady when she saw her champion fall,
Like the old ruines of a broken towre,
Staid not to waile his woefull funerall,
But from him fled away with all her powre;
Who after her as hastily gan scowre,
Bidding the Dwarfe with him to bring away
The Sarazins shield, signe of the conqueroure.
Her soone he overtooke, and bad to stay,
For present cause was none of dread her to dismay.

21

She turning backe with ruefull countenance,
Cride, "Mercy mercy Sir vouchsafe[4] to show
On silly Dame, subject to hard mischaunce,
And to your mighty will." Her humblesse low
In so ritch weedes and seeming glorious show,
Did much emmoue his stout heroïcke heart,
And said, "Deare dame, your suddein overthrow
Much rueth me; but now put feare apart,
And tell, both who ye be, and who that tooke your part."

22

Melting in teares, then gan she thus lament;
"The wretched woman, whom unhappy howre
Hath now made thrall[5] to your commandment,
Before that angry heavens list to lowre,
And fortune false betraide me to your powre,
Was, (O what now availeth that I was!)
Borne the sole daughter of an Emperour,
He that the wide West under his rule has,
And high hath set his throne, where Tiberis[6] doth pas.

23

He in the first flowre of my freshest age,
Betrothed me unto the onely haire[7]
Of a most mighty king, most rich and sage;
Was never Prince so faithfull and so faire,
Was never Prince so meeke and debonaire;
But ere my hoped day of spousall shone,
My dearest Lord fell from high honours staire,
Into the hands of his accursed fone,[8]
And cruelly was slaine, that shall I ever mone.

---

1 verdant green.
2 smitt struck.
3 vertue power.
4 vouchsafe grant.
5 thrall slave.
6 Tiberis The Tiber runs through Rome, linking the Western Empire of the lady's father to Roman Catholicism.
7 haire heir.
8 fone foes.

24

His blessed body spoild of lively breath,
Was afterward, I know not how, convaid
And fro me hid: of whose most innocent death
When tidings came to me unhappy maid,
O how great sorrow my sad soule assaid.
Then forth I went his woefull[1] corse[2] to find,
And many yeares throughout the world I straid,
A virgin widow, whose deepe wounded mind
With love, long time did languish as the striken hind.

25

At last it chaunced this proud Sarazin
To meete me wandring, who perforce me led
With him away, but yet could never win
The Fort, that Ladies hold in soveraigne dread.
There lies he now with foule dishonour dead,
Who whiles he liv'de, was called proud Sans foy,
The eldest of three brethren, all three bred
Of one bad sire, whose youngest is Sans joy,
And twixt them both was borne the bloudy bold Sans loy.[3]

26

In this sad plight, friendlesse, unfortunate,
Now miserable I Fidessa[4] dwell,
Craving of you in pitty of my state,
To do none ill, if please ye not do well."
He in great passion all this while did dwell,
More busying his quicke eyes, her face to view,
Then his dull eares, to heare what she did tell;
And said, "Faire Lady hart of flint would rew
The undeserved woes and sorrowes, which ye shew.

27

Henceforth in safe assuraunce may ye rest,
Having both found a new friend you to aid,
And lost an old foe, that did you molest:
Better new friend then an old foe is said."
With chaunge of cheare the seeming simple maid
Let fall her eyen, as shamefast to the earth,
And yeelding soft, in that she nought gain-said,
So forth they rode, he feining seemely merth,
And she coy lookes: so dainty they say maketh derth.

28

Long time they thus together traveiled,
Till weary of their way, they came at last,
Where grew two goodly trees, that faire did spred
Their armes abroad, with gray mosse overcast,
And their greene leaves trembling with every blast,
Made a calme shadow far in compasse round:
The fearefull Shepheard often there aghast[5]
Under them never sat, ne wont there sound
His mery oaten pipe, but shund th'unlucky ground.

29

But this good knight soone as he them can spie,
For the coole shade him thither hastly got:
For golden Phœbus now ymounted hie,
From fiery wheeles of his faire chariot
Hurled his beame so scorching cruell hot,
That living creature mote it not abide;
And his new Lady it endured not.
There they alight, in hope themselves to hide
From the fierce heat, and rest their weary limbs a tide.[6]

---

[1] woefull afflicted.

[2] corse body.

[3] Sans joy … Sans loy meaning, respectively, "Joylessness" and "Lawlessness." See Galatians 5:22-23: "But the fruit of the spirit is love, joy, peace, patience, kindness, goodness, faithfulness, gentleness, self-control; against such there is no law."

[4] Fidessa Faithful, from the Latin "fides" (faith) combined with "esse" (to be); thus, "being faithful," which implies appearance rather than substance.

[5] aghast frightened.

[6] a tide a while.

30

Faire seemely pleasaunce each to other makes,
With goodly purposes there as they sit:
And in his falsed fancy[1] he her takes
To be the fairest wight, that lived yit;[2]
Which to expresse, he bends his gentle wit,
And thinking of those braunches greene to frame
A girlond for her dainty forehead fit,
He pluckt a bough; out of whose rift there came
Small drops of gory bloud, that trickled downe the same.

31

Therewith a piteous yelling voyce was heard,
Crying, "O spare with guilty hands to teare
My tender sides in this rough rynd embard,[3]
But fly, ah fly far hence away, for feare
Least[4] to you hap, that happened to me heare,
And to this wretched Lady, my deare love,
O too deare love, love brought with death too deare."
Astond[5] he stood, and up his haire did hove,[6]
And with that suddein horror could no member[7] move.

32

At last whenas the dreadfull passion
Was overpast, and manhood well awake,
Yet musing at the straunge occasion,
And doubting much his sence, he thus bespake;
"What voyce of damned Ghost from Limbo[8] lake,
Or guilefull spright[9] wandring in empty aire,
Both which fraile men do oftentimes mistake,
Sends to my doubtfull[10] eares these speaches rare,
And ruefull plaints,[11] me bidding guiltlesse bloud to spare?"

33

Then groning deepe, "Nor damned Ghost," quoth he,
"Nor guilefull sprite to thee these wordes doth speake,
But once a man Fradubio,[12] now a tree,
Wretched man, wretched tree; whose nature weake,
A cruell witch her cursed will to wreake,
Hath thus transformed, and plast in open plaines,
Where Boreas[13] doth blow full bitter bleake,
And scorching Sunne does dry my secret vaines:
For though a tree I seeme, yet cold and heat me paines."

34

"Say on Fradubio then, or man, or[14] tree," Quoth then the knight, "by whose mischievous[15] arts
Art thou misshaped thus, as now I see?
He oft finds med'cine, who his griefe imparts;
But double griefs afflict concealing harts,
As raging flames who striveth to suppresse."
"The author then," said he, "of all my smarts,
Is one Duessa[16] a false sorceresse,
That many errant[17] knights hath brought to wretchedness.

---

1 fancy delusive imagination.
2 yit yet.
3 embard imprisoned.
4 Least lest.
5 Astond stunned.
6 hove rise.
7 member limb.
8 Limbo place of punishment for lost or unbaptized souls.
9 spright supernatural being.
10 doubtfull uncertain.
11 plaints lamentations.
12 Fradubio meaning "amid doubt," because Fidessa's appearance causes him to doubt Fraelissa's beauty (Spenser Encycl., p. 318a).
13 Boreas god of the north wind.
14 or … or either ... or.
15 mischievous harmful.
16 Duessa doubleness or duplicity, from the Latin "duo" + "esse" (i.e., "being two").
17 errant wandering.

35

In prime of youthly yeares, when corage hot
The fire of love and joy of chevalree
First kindled in my brest, it was my lot
To love this gentle Lady, whom ye see,
Now not a Lady, but a seeming tree;
With whom as once I rode accompanyde,
Me chaunced of a knight encountred bee,
That had a like faire Lady by his syde,
Like a faire Lady, but did fowle Duessa hyde.

36

Whose forged beauty he did take in hand,
All other Dames to have exceeded farre;
I in defence of mine did likewise stand,
Mine, that did then shine as the Morning starre:
So both to battell fierce arraunged arre,
In which his harder fortune was to fall
Under my speare: such is the dye[1] of warre:
His Lady left as a prise martiall,
Did yield her comely person, to be at my call.

37

So doubly lov'd of Ladies unlike faire,
Th'one seeming such, the other such indeede,
One day in doubt I cast for to compare,
Whether in beauties glorie did exceede;
A Rosy girlond was the victors meede:[2]
Both seemde to win, and both seemde won to bee,
So hard the discord was to be agreede.
Frælissa[3] was as faire, as faire mote bee,
And ever false Duessa seemde as faire as shee.

38

The wicked witch now seeing all this while
The doubtfull ballaunce equally to sway,
What not by right, she cast to win by guile,
And by her hellish science[4] raisd streight way
A foggy mist, that overcast the day,
And a dull blast, that breathing on her face,
Dimmed her former beauties shining ray,
And with foule ugly forme did her disgrace:
Then was she faire alone, when none was faire in place.

39

Then cride she out, 'Fye, fye, deformed wight,
Whose borrowed beautie now appeareth plaine
To have before bewitched all mens sight;
O leave her soone, or let her soone be slaine.'
Her loathly visage viewing with disdaine,
Eftsoones I thought her such, as she me told,
And would have kild her; but with faigned paine,
The false witch did my wrathfull hand withhold;
So left her, where she now is turnd to treen mould.

40

Thens forth I tooke Duessa for my Dame,
And in the witch unweeting joyd long time,
Ne ever wist, but that she was the same,
Till on a day (that day is every Prime,[5]
When Witches wont do penance for their crime)
I chaunst to see her in her proper hew,
Bathing her selfe in origane and thyme:[6]
A filthy foule old woman I did vew,
That ever to have toucht her, I did deadly rew.

41

Her neather partes misshapen, monstruous,
Were hidd in water, that I could not see,
But they did seeme more foule hideous,
Then womans shape man would beleeve to bee.
Thens forth[7] from her most beastly companie
I gan refraine, in minde to slip away,

---

1 dye die (i.e., dice).
2 meede reward.
3 Frælissa meaning, "frailty."
4 science knowledge.
5 Prime the new moon in spring, also known as the "witches' Sabbath."
6 origane and thyme Oregano and thyme were used to heal skin disorders.
7 Thens forth thenceforth.

Soone as appeard safe opportunitie:
For danger great, if not assur'd decay
I saw before mine eyes, if I were knowne to stray.

42

The divelish hag by chaunges of my cheare[1]
Perceiv'd my thought, and drownd in sleepie night,
With wicked herbes and ointments did besmeare
My bodie all, through charmes and magicke might,
That all my senses were bereaved quight:
Then brought she me into this desert waste,
And by my wretched lovers side me pight,[2]
Where now enclosd in wooden wals full faste,
Banisht from living wights, our wearie dayes we waste."

43

"But how long time," said then the Elfin knight,
"Are you in this misformed house to dwell?"
"We may not chaunge," quoth he, "this evil plight,
Till we be bathed in a living well;[3]
That is the terme prescribed by the spell."
"O how," said he, "mote I that well out find,
That may restore you to your wonted well?"
"Time and suffised[4] fates to former kynd[5]
Shall us restore, none else from hence may us unbynd."

44

The false Duessa, now Fidessa hight,[6]
Heard how in vaine Fradubio did lament,
And knew well all was true. But the good knight
Full of sad feare and ghastly dreriment,
When all this speech the living tree had spent,
The bleeding bough did thrust into the ground,
That from the bloud he might be innocent,
And with fresh clay did close the wooden wound:
Then turning to his Lady, dead with feare her found.

45

Her seeming dead he found with feigned feare,
As all unweeting[7] of that well she knew,
And payned himselfe with busie care to reare
Her out of carelesse[8] swowne. Her eylids blew
And dimmed sight with pale and deadly hew[9]
At last she up gan lift: with trembling cheare
Her up he tooke, too simple[10] and too trew,
And oft her kist. At length all passed feare,
He set her on her steede, and forward forth did beare.

Canto III

Forsaken Truth long seekes her love,
And makes the Lyon mylde,
Marres blind Devotions mart,[11] and fals
In hand of leachour vylde.[12]

1

Nought is there under heav'ns wide hollownesse,
That moves more deare compassion of mind,
Then beautie brought t'unworthy wretchednesse
Through envies snares or fortunes freakes[13] unkind:
I, whether lately through her brightnesse blind,
Or through alleageance and fast fealtie,[14]

---

1 cheare expression, countenance.
2 pight placed.
3 living well a spring of constantly flowing water (OED), with allusion to biblical healing waters. Yahweh refers to himself as "the fountain of living waters" (Jeremiah 2:13), while Jesus calls his gift "living water" (John 4:10), and John is shown "the river of the water of life, bright as crystal, flowing from the throne of God and of the Lamb" (Revelation 22:1).
4 suffised satisfied.
5 kynd nature.
6 hight called.
7 unweeting unknowing.
8 carelesse unconcerned, free from care.
9 deadly hew appearance of death.
10 simple innocent.
11 mart traffic, trade.
12 vylde vile.
13 freakes sudden causeless changes.
14 fealtie obligation of fidelity to lord or ruler.

Which I do owe unto all woman kind,
Feele my heart perst[1] with so great agonie,
When such I see, that all for pittie I could die.

2

And now it is empassioned[2] so deepe,
For fairest Unaes sake, of whom I sing,
That my fraile eyes these lines with teares do steepe,
To thinke how she through guilefull handeling,
Though true as touch, though daughter of a king,
Though faire as ever living wight was faire,
Though nor in word nor deede ill meriting,
Is from her knight divorced in despaire
And her due loves deriv'd to that vile witches share.

3

Yet she most faithfull Ladie all this while Forsaken, wofull, solitarie mayd
Farre from all peoples prease,[3] as in exile,
In wildernesse and wastfull deserts strayd,
To seeke her knight; who subtilly betrayd
Through that late vision, which th'Enchaunter wrought,
Had her abandoned. She of nought affrayd,
Through woods and wastnesse[4] wide him daily sought;
Yet wished tydings none of him unto her brought.

4

One day nigh wearie of the yrkesome way,
From her unhastie beast she did alight,
And on the grasse her daintie limbes did lay
In secret shadow, farre from all mens sight:
From her faire head her fillet[5] she undight,[6]
And laid her stole aside. Her angels face
As the great eye of heaven shyned bright,
And made a sunshine in the shadie place;
Did never mortall eye behold such heavenly grace.[7]

5

It fortuned out of the thickest wood
A ramping[8] Lyon[9] rushed suddainly,
Hunting full greedie after salvage blood;
Soone as the royall virgin he did spy,
With gaping mouth at her ran greedily,
To have attonce devour'd her tender corse:
But to the pray when as he drew more ny,[10]
His bloudie rage asswaged[11] with remorse,
And with the sight amazd, forgat his furious forse.

6

In stead thereof he kist her wearie feet,
And lickt her lilly hands with fawning tong,
As he her wronged innocence did weet.
O how can beautie maister the most strong,
And simple truth subdue avenging wrong?
Whose yeelded pride and proud submission,
Still dreading death, when she had marked[12] long,
Her hart gan melt in great compassion,
And drizling teares did shed for pure affection.

7

"The Lyon Lord of everie beast in field," Quoth she, "his princely puissance doth abate,
And mightie proud to humble weake does yield,
Forgetfull of the hungry rage, which late
Him prickt, in pittie of my sad estate:
But he my Lyon, and my noble Lord,

---

1 perst pierced.
2 empassioned filled with feeling.
3 prease press.
4 wastnesse uninhabited or unfrequented region.
5 fillet head-band.
6 undight unfastened.

7 Her angels face … heavenly grace The comparison of Una's face to the sun, "the great eye of heaven," alludes to the "woman clothed with the sun": "And a great portent appeared in heaven, a woman clothed with the sun, with the moon under her feet, and on her head a crown of twelve stars" (Revelation 12:1).
8 ramping rearing, fierce.
9 Lyon In romance tradition, a lion does no injury to a true virgin.
10 ny near.
11 asswaged allayed, appeased.
12 marked observed.

How does he find in cruell hart to hate
Her that him lov'd, and ever most adord,
As the God of my life? why hath he me abhord?"

8

Redounding[1] teares did choke th'end of her plaint,
Which softly ecchoed from the neighbour wood;
And sad to see her sorrowfull constraint
The kingly beast upon her gazing stood;
With pittie calmd, downe fell his angry mood.
At last in close hart shutting up her paine,
Arose the virgin borne of heavenly brood,
And to her snowy Palfrey got againe,
To seeke her strayed Champion, if she might attaine.

9

The Lyon would not leave her desolate,
But with her went along, as a strong gard
Of her chast person, and a faithfull mate
Of her sad troubles and misfortunes hard:
Still when she slept, he kept both watch and ward,[2]
And when she wakt, he waited diligent,
With humble service to her will prepard:
From her faire eyes he tooke commaundement,
And ever by her lookes conceived her intent.

10

Long she thus traveiled deserts wyde,
By which she thought her wandring knight shold pas,
Yet never shew of living wight espyde;
Till that at length she found the troden gras,
In which the tract of peoples footing was,
Under the steepe foot of a mountaine hore;[3]
The same she followes, till at last she has
A damzell spyde slow footing her before,
That on her shoulders sad a pot of water bore.

11

To whom approching she to her gan call,
To weet,[4] if dwelling place were nigh at hand;
But the rude[5] wench her answer'd nought at all,
She could not heare, nor speake, nor understand;
Till seeing by her side the Lyon stand,
With suddaine feare her pitcher downe she threw,
And fled away: for never in that land
Face of faire Ladie she before did vew,
And that dread Lyons looke her cast in deadly hew.

12

Full fast she fled, ne ever lookt behynd,
As if her life upon the wager lay,
And home she came, whereas her mother blynd
Sate in eternall night: nought could she say,
But suddaine catching hold, did her dismay
With quaking hands, and other signes of feare:
Who full of ghastly fright and cold affray,[6]
Gan shut the dore. By this arrived there
Dame Una, wearie Dame, and entrance did requere.[7]

13

Which when none yeelded, her unruly Page
With his rude clawes the wicket[8] open rent,
And let her in; where of his cruell rage
Nigh dead with feare, and faint astonishment,
She found them both in darkesome corner pent;[9]
Where that old woman day and night did pray
Upon her beades[10] devoutly penitent;
Nine hundred Pater nosters every day,
And thrise nine hundred Aves she was wont to say.

---

1 Redounding overflowing.
2 watch and ward guard.
3 mountaine hore snow-capped mountain.
4 To weet to know.
5 rude both ignorant and impolite.
6 affray terror.
7 requere request, entreat.
8 wicket small door, gate.
9 pent confined.
10 beades the rosary with which the woman recites vast numbers of Our Fathers and Hail Marys, a rote devotional performance highly suspect to Protestant reformers.

14

And to augment her painefull pennance more,
Thrise every weeke in ashes she did sit,
And next her wrinkled skin rough sackcloth[1] wore,
And thrise three times did fast from any bit:
But now for feare her beads she did forget.
Whose needlesse dread for to remove away,
Faire Una framed words and count'nance fit:
Which hardly doen, at length she gan them pray,
That in their cotage small, that night she rest her may.

15

The day is spent, and commeth drowsie night,
When every creature shrowded is in sleepe;
Sad Una downe her laies in wearie plight,
And at her feet the Lyon watch doth keepe:
In stead of rest, she does lament, and weepe
For the late losse of her deare loved knight,
And sighes, and grones, and evermore does steepe
Her tender brest in bitter teares all night,
All night she thinks too long, and often lookes for light.

16

Now when Aldeboran was mounted hie
Above the shynie Cassiopeias chaire,[2]
And all in deadly sleepe did drowned lie,
One knocked at the dore, and in would fare;
He knocked fast, and often curst, and sware,
That readie entrance was not at his call:
For on his backe a heavy load he bare
Of nightly stelths and pillage[3] severall,
Which he had got abroad by purchase[4] criminall.

17

He was to weete a stout and sturdie[5] thiefe,
Wont to robbe Churches of their ornaments,
And poore mens boxes of their due reliefe,
Which given was to them for good intents;
The holy Saints of their rich vestiments
He did disrobe, when all men carelesse slept,
And spoild the Priests of their habiliments
Whiles none the holy things in safety kept;
Then he by cunning sleights in at the window crept.[6]

18

And all that he by right or wrong could find,
Unto this house he brought, and did bestow
Upon the daughter of this woman blind,
Abessa[7] daughter of Corceca[8] slow,
With whom he whoredome usd, that few did know,
And fed her fat with feast of offerings,
And plentie, which in all the land did grow;
Ne spared he to give her gold and rings:
And now he to her brought part of his stolen things.

19

Thus long the dore with rage and threats he bet,[9]
Yet of those fearefull women none durst rize,
The Lyon frayed them, him in to let:
He would no longer stay him to advize,
But open breakes the dore in furious wize,
And entring is; when that disdainfull beast
Encountring fierce, him suddaine doth surprize,
And seizing cruell clawes on trembling brest,
Under his Lordly foot him proudly hath supprest.

---

1 ashes … sackcloth forms of penance.

2 Aldeboran … Cassiopeias chaire constellations that in this position indicate midnight (Hamilton).

3 pillage plunder.

4 purchase procuring, seizing.

5 stout and sturdie fierce and ruthless.

6 in at the window crept allusion to John 10:1: "He who does not enter the sheepfold by the door but climbs in by another way, that man is a thief and a robber."

7 Abessa both "abbess," which suggests the convents and monasteries sacked by Henry VIII, and the Latin "ab" + "esse" (literally, "out of being") (i.e., separate from the truth that is spiritual life).

8 Corceca meaning, "blind heart," with an allusion to Ephesians 4:18: "They are darkened in their understanding, alienated from the life of God because of the ignorance that is in them, due to their hardness of heart."

9 bet beat.

20

Him booteth[1] not resist, nor succour call,
His bleeding hart is in the vengers hand,
Who streight him rent in thousand peeces small,
And quite dismembred hath: the thirstie land
Drunke up his life; his corse left on the strand.[2]
His fearefull friends weare out the wofull night,
Ne dare to weepe, nor seeme to understand
The heavie hap, which on them is alight,
Affraid, least to themselves the like mishappen might.

21

Now when broad day the world discovered has,
Up Una rose, up rose the Lyon eke,
And on their former journey forward pas,
In wayes unknowne, her wandring knight to seeke,
With paines farre passing that long wandring Greeke,[3]
That for his love refused deitie;
Such were the labours of the Lady meeke,
Still seeking him, that from her still did flie,
Then furthest from her hope, when most she weened[4] nie.

22

Soone as she parted thence, the fearefull twaine,
That blind old woman and her daughter deare
Came forth, and finding Kirkrapine[5] there slaine,
For anguish great they gan to rend their heare,
And beat their brests, and naked flesh to teare.
And when they both had wept and wayld their fill,
Then forth they ranne like two amazed[6] deare,
Halfe mad through malice, and revenging will,
To follow her, that was the causer of their ill.

23

Whom overtaking, they gan loudly bray,
With hollow howling, and lamenting cry,
Shamefully at her rayling all the way,
And her accusing of dishonesty,
That was the flowre of faith and chastity;
And still amidst her rayling, she did pray,
That plagues, and mischiefs, and long misery
Might fall on her, and follow all the way,
And that in endlesse error she might ever stray.

24

But when she saw her prayers nought prevaile,
She backe returned with some labour lost;
And in the way as she did weepe and waile,
A knight her met in mighty armes embost,
Yet knight was not for all his bragging bost,
But subtill Archimag, that Una sought
By traynes[7] into new troubles to have tost:
Of that old woman tydings he besought,
If that of such a Ladie she could tellen ought.

25

Therewith she gan her passion to renew,
And cry, and curse, and raile, and rend her heare,
Saying, that harlot she too lately knew,
That causd her shed so many a bitter teare,
And so forth told the story of her feare:
Much seemed he to mone her haplesse chaunce,
And after for that Ladie did inquere;
Which being taught, he forward gan[8] advaunce
His fair enchaunted steed, and eke his charmed launce.

26

Ere long he came, where Una traveiled slow,
And that wilde Champion wayting her besyde:
Whom seeing such, for dread he durst not show
Himselfe too nigh at hand, but turned wyde
Unto an hill; from whence when she him spyde,

---

1 booteth helped.

2 strand shore, in the sense of foreign land.

3 long wandring Greeke Odysseus, who refused the immortality offered him by Calypso because of his love for his wife, Penelope (Odyssey 5) (Variorum).

4 weened wish, hope.

5 Kirkrapine meaning, "church robber."

6 amazed stunned.

7 traynes tricks, stratagems.

8 gan began.

By his like seeming shield, her knight by name
She weend it was, and towards him gan ryde:
Approching nigh, she wist[1] it was the same,
And with faire fearefull humblesse towards him shee came.

27

And weeping said, "Ah my long lacked Lord,
Where have ye bene thus long out of my sight?
Much feared I to have bene quite abhord,
Or ought have done, that ye displeasen might,
That should as death unto my deare hart light:
For since mine eye your joyous sight did mis,
My chearefull day is turnd to cheareless night,
And eke my night of death the shadow is;
But welcome now my light, and shining lampe of blis."

28

He thereto meeting said, "My dearest Dame,
Farre be it from your thought, and fro my will,
To thinke that knighthood I so much should shame,
As you to leave, that have me loved still,
And chose in Faery court of meere goodwill,
Where noblest knights were to be found on earth:
The earth shall sooner leave her kindly skill
To bring forth fruit, and make eternall derth,[2]
Then I leave you, my liefe,[3] yborne of heavenly berth.

29

And sooth to say, why I left you so long,
Was for to seeke adventure in strange place,
Where Archimago said a felon strong
To many knights did daily worke disgrace;
But knight he now shall never more deface:
Good cause of mine excuse; that mote ye please
Well to accept, and evermore embrace
My faithfull service, that by land and seas
Have vowd you to defend, now then your plaint appease."

30

His lovely words her seemd due recompence
Of all her passed paines: one loving howre
For many yeares of sorrow can dispence:
A dram[4] of sweet is worth a pound of sowre:
She has forgot, how many a wofull stowre
For him she late endur'd; she speakes no more
Of past: true is, that true love hath no power
To looken backe; his eyes be fixt before.
Before her stands her knight, for whom she toyld so sore.

31

Much like, as when the beaten marinere,
That long hath wandred in the Ocean wide,
Oft soust in swelling Tethys[5] saltish teare,
And long time having tand his tawney[6] hide
With blustring breath of heaven, that none can bide,
And scorching flames of fierce Orions hound,[7]
Soone as the port from farre he has espide,
His chearefull whistle merrily doth sound,
And Nereus[8] crownes with cups; his mates him pledg around.

32

Such joy made Una, when her knight she found;
And eke th'enchaunter joyous seemd no lesse,
Then the glad marchant, that does vew from ground
His ship farre come from watrie wildernesse,
He hurles out vowes, and Neptune[9] oft doth blesse:

---

1 wist knew.
2 derth famine.
3 liefe beloved.
4 dram 1/8 ounce (i.e., a very small amount).
5 Tethys sea goddess, whose tears are the salt spray of the sea.
6 tawney golden brown.
7 Orions hound Sirius, the Dog-Star, which appears in the hottest months of the year.
8 Nereus marine deity and eldest child of Pontus and Gaia (Dict. Gods and Mortals), whom the mariner toasts when the sight of the port indicates that the journey is safely completed.
9 Neptune god of the sea.

So forth they past, and all the way they spent
Discoursing of her dreadfull late distresse,
In which he askt her, what the Lyon ment:
Who told her all that fell in journey as she went.

33

They had not ridden farre, when they might see
One pricking towards them with hastie heat,
Full strongly armd, and on a courser free,
That through his fiercenesse fomed all with sweat,
And the sharpe yron did for anger eat,
When his hot ryder spurd his chauffed side;
His looke was sterne, and seemed still to threat
Cruell revenge, which he in hart did hyde,
And on his shield Sans loy in bloudie lines was dyde.

34

When nigh he drew unto this gentle payre
And saw the Red-crosse, which the knight did beare,
He burnt in fire, and gan eftsoones prepare
Himselfe to battell with his couched[1] speare.
Loth[2] was that other, and did faint through feare,
To taste th'untryed dint of deadly steele;
But yet his Lady did so well him cheare,
That hope of new good hap he gan to feele;
So bent his speare, and spurnd[3] his horse with yron heele.

35

But that proud Paynim[4] forward came so fierce,
And full of wrath, that with his sharp-head speare,
Through vainely crossed shield he quite did pierce,
And had his staggering steede not shrunke for feare,
Through shield and bodie eke he should him beare:
Yet so great was the puissance of his push,
That from his saddle quite he did him beare:
He tombling rudely downe to ground did rush,
And from his gored wound a well of bloud did gush.

36

Dismounting lightly from his loftie steed,
He to him lept, in mind to reave[5] his life,
And proudly said, "Lo there the worthie meed[6]
Of him, that slew Sans foy with bloudie knife;
Henceforth his ghost freed from repining strife,
In peace may passen over Lethe[7] lake,
When morning[8] altars purgd with enemies life,
The blacke infernall Furies[9] doen aslake:[10]
Life from Sans foy thou tookst, Sans loy shall from thee take."

37

Therewith in haste his helmet gan unlace,
Till Una cride, "O hold that heavie hand,
Deare Sir, what ever that thou be in place:
Enough is, that thy foe doth vanquisht stand
Now at thy mercy: Mercie not withstand:
For he is one the truest knight alive,
Though conquered now he lie on lowly land,
And whilest him fortune favourd, faire did thrive
In bloudie field: therefore of life him not deprive."

---

1 couched lowered.
2 Loth reluctant.
3 spurnd spurred.
4 Paynim heathen, pagan (i.e., Saracen).
5 reave take away.
6 meed reward.
7 Lethe a river in Hades, whose water, when drunk by the dead, caused them to forget the lives they had just left.
8 morning mourning.
9 Furies female spirits of justice and vengeance born of Night. In Virgil there are three: Alecto ("unceasing"), Megaera ("grudging"), and Tisiphone ("avenging murder"). They persecute people who transgress natural laws (e.g., against fratricide, parricide, etc.) (Dict. Gods and Mortals).
10 aslake appease.

38

Her piteous words might not abate his rage,
But rudely rending[1] up his helmet, would
Have slaine him straight: but when he sees his age,
And hoarie head of Archimago old,
His hastie hand he doth amazed hold,
And halfe ashamed, wondred at the sight:
For the old man well knew he, though untold,
In charmes and magicke to have wondrous might,
Ne ever wont in field, ne in round lists to fight.

39

And said, "Why Archimago, lucklesse syre,
What doe I see? what hard mishap is this,
That hath thee hither brought to taste mine yre?[2]
Or thine the fault, or mine the error is,
In stead of foe to wound my friend amis?"
He answered nought, but in a traunce still lay,
And on those guilefull dazed eyes of his
The cloud of death did sit. Which doen away,
He left him lying so, ne would no lenger stay.

40

But to the virgin comes, who all this while
Amased stands, her selfe so mockt to see
By him, who has the guerdon[3] of his guile,
For so misfeigning her true knight to bee:
Yet is she now in more perplexitie,
Left in the hand of that same Paynim bold,
From whom her booteth not at all to flie;
Who by her cleanly garment catching hold,
Her from her Palfrey pluckt, her visage[4] to behold.

41

But her fierce servant full of kingly awe
And high disdaine, wheneas his soveraine Dame
So rudely handled by her foe he sawe,
With gaping jawes full greedy at him came,
And ramping on his shield, did weene the same
Have reft away with his sharpe rending clawes:
But he was stout, and lust did now inflame
His corage[5] more, that from his griping pawes
He hath his shield redeem'd, and foorth his swerd he drawes.

42

O then too weake and feeble was the forse
Of salvage beast, his puissance to withstand:
For he was strong, and of so mightie corse,
As ever wielded speare in warlike hand,
And feates of armes did wisely understand.
Eftsoones he perced through his chaufed[6] chest
With thrilling[7] point of deadly yron brand,
And launcht[8] his Lordly hart: with death opprest
He roar'd aloud, whiles life forsooke his stubborne brest.

43

Who now is left to keepe the forlorne maid
From raging spoile of lawlesse victors will?
Her faithfull gard remov'd, her hope dismaid,
Her selfe a yeelded pray to save or spill.
He now Lord of the field, his pride to fill,
With foule reproches, and disdainfull spight
Her vildly entertaines, and will or nill,
Beares her away upon his courser light:
Her prayers nought prevaile, his rage is more of might.

44

And all the way, with great lamenting paine,
And piteous plaints she filleth his dull eares,
That stony hart could riven have in twaine,[9]
And all the way she wets with flowing teares:
But he enrag'd with rancour,[10] nothing heares.
Her servile beast yet would not leave her so,

---

1 rending tearing.
2 yre ire.
3 guerdon reward, recompense.
4 visage face.
5 corage mind, nature.
6 chaufed chafed, enraged.
7 thrilling penetrating.
8 launcht pierced, transfixed.
9 riven ... in twaine i.e., split ... in two.
10 rancour hatred.

But followes her farre off, ne ought he feares,
To be partaker of her wandring woe,
More mild in beastly kind, then that her beastly foe.

Canto IIII

To sinfull house of Pride, Duessa guides the faithfull knight,
Where brothers death to wreak Sans joy doth chalenge him to fight.

1

Young knight, what ever that dost armes professe,
And through long labours huntest after fame,
Beware of fraud, beware of ficklenesse,
In choice, and change of thy deare loved Dame,
Least thou of her beleeve too lightly blame,
And rash misweening[1] doe thy hart remove:
For unto knight there is no greater shame,
Then lightnesse and inconstancie in love;
That doth this Redcrosse knights ensample plainly prove.

2

Who after that he had faire Una lorne,
Through light misdeeming[2] of her loialtie,
And false Duessa in her sted had borne,
Called Fidess', and so supposd to bee;
Long with her traveiled, till at last they see
A goodly building, bravely garnished,
The house of mightie Prince it seemd to bee:
And towards it a broad high way[3] that led,
All bare through peoples feet, which thither traveiled.

3

Great troupes of people traveild thitherward
Both day and night, of each degree and place,
But few returned, having scaped hard,
With balefull[4] beggerie, or foule disgrace,
Which ever after in most wretched case,
Like loathsome lazars,[5] by the hedges lay.
Thither Duessa bad him bend his pace:
For she is wearie of the toilesome way,
And also nigh consumed is the lingring day.

4

A stately Pallace built of squared bricke,
Which cunningly[6] was without morter laid,
Whose wals were high, but nothing strong, nor thick,
And golden foile[7] all over them displaid,
That purest skye with brightnesse they dismaid:
High lifted up were many loftie towres,
And goodly galleries farre over laid,
Full of faire windowes, and delightfull bowres;
And on the top a Diall told the timely howres.

5

It was a goodly heape for to behould,
And spake the praises of the workmans wit;
But full great pittie, that so faire a mould[8]
Did on so weake foundation ever sit:
For on a sandie hill,[9] that still did flit,[10]
And fall away, it mounted was full hie,
That every breath of heaven shaked it:
And all the hinder parts, that few could spie,
Were ruinous and old, but painted cunningly.

6

Arrived there they passed in forth right;
For still to all the gates stood open wide,
Yet charge of them was to a Porter hight
Cald Malvenù,[11] who entrance none denide:

---

1 misweening misjudgement.
2 misdeeming supposing mistakenly.
3 broad high way See Matthew 7:13: "Enter by the narrow gate; for the gate is wide and the way is easy that leads to destruction, and those who enter by it are many."
4 balefull miserable.
5 lazars poor and diseased people (i.e., lepers).
6 cunningly craftily, cleverly.
7 golden foile thin layer of gold.
8 mould structure.
9 sandie hill allusion to Matthew 7:26: "And every one who hears these words of mine and does not do them will be like a foolish man who built his house upon the sand."
10 flit shift, give way.
11 Malvenù meaning, "unwelcome."

Thence to the hall, which was on every side
With rich array and costly arras[1] dight:
Infinite sorts of people did abide
There waiting long, to win the wished sight
Of her, that was the Lady of that Pallace bright.

7

By them they passe, all gazing on them round,
And to the Presence mount; whose glorious vew
Their frayle amazed senses did confound:
In living Princes court none ever knew
Such endlesse richesse, and so sumptuous shew;
Ne Persia selfe, the nourse of pompous pride
Like ever saw. And there a noble crew
Of Lordes and Ladies stood on every side,
Which with their presence faire, the place much beautifide.

8

High above all a cloth of State[2] was spred,
And a rich throne, as bright as sunny day,
On which there sate most brave embellished
With royall robes and gorgeous array,
A mayden Queene,[3] that shone as Titans[4] ray,
In glistring gold, and peerelesse pretious stone:
Yet her bright blazing beautie did assay
To dim the brightnesse of her glorious throne,
As envying her selfe, that too exceeding shone.

9

Exceeding shone, like Phœbus fairest childe,[5]
That did presume his fathers firie wayne,[6]
And flaming mouthes of steedes unwonted wilde
Through highest heaven with weaker hand to rayne;
Proud of such glory and advancement vaine,
While flashing beames do daze his feeble eyen,
He leaves the welkin[7] way most beaten plaine,
And rapt with whirling wheeles, inflames the skyen,
With fire not made to burne, but fairely for to shyne.

10

So proud she shyned in her Princely state,
Looking to heaven; for earth she did disdayne,
And sitting high; for lowly she did hate:
Lo underneath her scornefull feete, was layne
A dreadfull Dragon with an hideous trayne,[8]
And in her hand she held a mirrhour[9] bright,
Wherein her face she often vewed fayne,[10]
And in her selfe-lov'd semblance tooke delight;
For she was wondrous faire, as any living wight.

11

Of griesly Pluto[11] she the daughter was,
And sad Proserpina the Queene of hell;
Yet did she thinke her pearelesse worth to pas
That parentage, with pride so did she swell,
And thundring Ioue, that high in heaven doth dwell,
And wield the world, she claymed for her syre,
Or if that any else did Ioue excell:
For to the highest she did still aspyre,
Or if ought higher were then that, did it desyre.

12

And proud Lucifera[12] men did her call,
That made her selfe a Queene, and crownd to be,
Yet rightfull kingdome she had none at all,

---

1 arras hanging tapestry.

2 cloth of State canopy.

3 mayden Queene See the description of Una at I.iii.5.

4 Titan the sun.

5 Phœbus fairest childe Phaeton, who tried to drive Apollo's chariot to pull the sun across the sky, but could not control the horses and burned to death when he set sky and earth on fire (Ovid, Metamorphoses, Book 2).

6 wayne chariot.

7 welkin upper atmosphere.

8 Dragon ... trayne See Revelation, where the dragon is a symbol of Satan.

9 mirrhour In Renaissance emblems, the mirror was associated with Vanitas, or self-love, one of the characteristics of pride.

10 fayne with pleasure.

11 Pluto god of the Underworld.

12 Lucifera meaning,"light"; embodying worldly pride, Lucifera bears a feminized version of one of the names for Satan.

Ne heritage of native soveraintie,
But did usurpe with wrong and tyrannie
Upon the scepter, which she now did hold:
Ne ruld her Realmes with lawes, but pollicie,[1]
And strong advizement of six wisards old,
That with their counsels bad her kingdome did uphold.

13

Soone as the Elfin knight in presence came,
And false Duessa seeming Lady faire,
A gentle Husher,[2] Vanitie by name
Made rowme, and passage for them did prepaire:
So goodly brought them to the lowest staire
Of her high throne, where they on humble knee
Making obeyssance,[3] did the cause declare,
Why they were come, her royall state to see,
To prove the wide report of her great Majestee.

14

With loftie eyes, halfe loth to looke so low,
She thanked them in her disdainefull wise,
Ne other grace vouchsafed them to show
Of Princesse worthy, scarse them bad arise.
Her Lordes and Ladies all this while devise Themselves to setten forth to straungers sight:
Some frounce[4] their curled haire in courtly guise,
Some prancke[5] their ruffes,[6] and others trimly dight
Their gay attire: each others greater pride does spight.

15

Goodly they all that knight do entertaine,
Right glad with him to have increast their crew:
But to Duess' each one himselfe did paine
All kindnesse and faire courtesie to shew;
For in that court whylome her well they knew:
Yet the stout Faerie mongst the middest crowd
Thought all their glorie vaine in knightly vew,
And that great Princesse too exceeding prowd,
That to strange knight no better countenance allowd.

16

Suddein upriseth from her stately place
The royall Dame, and for her coche doth call:
All hurtlen forth, and she with Princely pace,
As faire Aurora in her purple pall,
Out of the East the dawning day doth call:
So forth she comes: her brightnesse brode[7] doth blaze;
The heapes of people thronging in the hall,
Do ride each other, upon her to gaze:
Her glorious glitter and light doth all mens eyes amaze.

17

So forth she comes, and to her coche does clyme,
Adorned all with gold, and girlond gay,
That seemd as fresh as Flora[8] in her prime,
And strove to match, in royall rich array,
Great Iunoes golden chaire,[9] the which they say
The Gods stand gazing on, when she does ride
To Ioues high house through heavens bras-paved way
Drawne of faire Pecocks, that excell in pride,
And full of Argus eyes[10] their tailes dispredden[11] wide.

---

1 pollicie stratagem, cunning.
2 Husher usher.
3 obeyssance act of submission or respect.
4 frounce frizz, curl.
5 prancke fold, pleat.
6 ruffes neckwear during the reigns of Elizabeth I and James I.
7 brode broad.
8 Flora goddess of flowers.
9 Iunoes golden chaire Juno, the wife of Jove, drives a chariot drawn by peacocks (Spenser Encycl., p. 413c).
10 Argus eyes Argos was a monster with an eye in the back of his head. He was killed by Mercury and turned into a peacock or Juno took his eyes and used them to decorate the peacock's tail (OCD).
11 dispredden spread.

18

But this was drawne of six unequall beasts,
On which her six sage Counsellors did ryde,
Taught to obay their bestiall beheasts,
With like conditions to their kinds applyde:
Of which the first, that all the rest did guyde,
Was sluggish Idlenesse the nourse of sin;
Upon a slouthfull Asse he chose to ryde,
Arayd in habit blacke, and amis[1] thin,
Like to an holy Monck, the service to begin.

19

And in his hand his Portesse still he bare,
That much was worne, but therein little red,
For of devotion he had little care,
Still drownd in sleepe, and most of his dayes ded;
Scarse could he once uphold his heavie hed,
To looken, whether it were night or day:
May seeme the wayne was very evill led,
When such an one had guiding of the way,
That knew not, whether right he went, or else astray.

20

From worldly cares himselfe he did esloyne,[2]
And greatly shunned manly exercise,
From every worke he chalenged essoyne,[3]
For contemplation sake: yet otherwise,
His life he led in lawlesse riotise;
By which he grew to grievous malady;
For in his lustlesse limbs through evill guise
A shaking fever raignd continually:
Such one was Idlenesse, first of this company.

21

And by his side rode loathsome Gluttony,
Deformed creature, on a filthie swyne,
His belly was up-blowne with luxury,
And eke with fatnesse swollen were his eyne,
And like a Crane[4] his necke was long and fyne,
With which he swallowed up excessive feast,
For want whereof poore people oft did pyne;
And all the way, most like a brutish beast,
He spued up his gorge, that all did him deteast.

22

In greene vine leaves he was right fitly clad;
For other clothes he could not weare for heat,
And on his head an yuie girland had,
From under which fast trickled downe the sweat:
Still as he rode, he somewhat still did eat,
And in his hand did beare a bouzing can,
Of which he supt so oft, that on his seat
His dronken corse he scarse upholden can,
In shape and life more like a monster, then a man.

23

Unfit he was for any worldly thing,
And eke unhable once to stirre or go,
Not meet to be of counsell to a king,
Whose mind in meat and drinke was drowned so,
That from his friend he seldome knew his fo:
Full of diseases was his carcas blew,
And a dry dropsie[5] through his flesh did flow:
Which by misdiet daily greater grew:
Such one was Gluttony, the second of that crew.

24

And next to him rode lustfull Lechery,
Upon a bearded Goat,[6] whose rugged haire,
And whally eyes[7] (the signe of gelosy,)[8]
Was like the person selfe, whom he did beare:
Who rough, and blacke, and filthy did appeare,
Unseemely man to please faire Ladies eye;

---

1 amis oblong piece of white linen worn over a priest's shoulders to symbolize the helmet of salvation.

2 esloyne retire to a distance.

3 chalenged essoyne claimed exemption.

4 Crane The crane's long neck prolongs the pleasure of swallowing, which makes it an emblem of Gluttony.

5 dry dropsie thirst, as dropsy is a watery swelling of the body that in turn causes excessive thirst.

6 Goat Goats were considered especially lusty.

7 whally eyes glaring or showing their whites.

8 gelosy jealousy.

Yet he of Ladies oft was loved deare,
When fairer faces were bid standen by:
O who does know the bent of womens fantasy?

25

In a greene gowne he clothed was full faire,
Which underneath did hide his filthinesse,
And in his hand a burning hart he bare,
Full of vaine follies, and new fanglenesse:[1]
For he was false, and fraught with ficklenesse,
And learned had to love with secret lookes,
And well could daunce, and sing with ruefulnesse,
And fortunes tell, and read in loving bookes,
And thousand other wayes, to bait his fleshly hookes.

26

Inconstant man, that loved all he saw,
And lusted after all, that he did love,
Ne would his looser life be tide to law,
But joyd weake wemens hearts to tempt and prove,
If from their loyall loves he might them move;
Which lewdnesse fild him with reprochfull paine
Of that fowle evill, which all men reprove,
That rots the marrow, and consumes the braine:
Such one was Lecherie, the third of all this traine.

27

And greedy Avarice[2] by him did ride,
Upon a Camell[3] loaden all with gold;
Two iron coffers hong on either side,
With precious mettall full, as they might hold,
And in his lap an heape of coine he told;
For of his wicked pelfe[4] his God he made,
And unto hell him selfe for money sold;
Accursed usurie[5] was all his trade,
And right and wrong ylike in equall ballaunce waide.

28

His life was nigh unto deaths doore yplast,
And thred-bare cote, and cobled shoes he ware,
Ne scarse good morsell all his life did tast,
But both from backe and belly still did spare,
To fill his bags, and richesse to compare;
Yet chylde ne kinsman living had he none
To leave them to; but thorough[6] daily care
To get, and nightly feare to lose his owne,
He led a wretched life unto him selfe unknowne.

29

Most wretched wight, whom nothing might suffise,
Whose greedy lust did lacke in greatest store,
Whose need had end, but no end covetise,[7]
Whose wealth was want, whose plenty made him pore,
Who had enough, yet wished ever more;
A vile disease, and eke in foote and hand
A grievous gout tormented him full sore,
That well he could not touch, nor go, nor stand:
Such one was Avarice, the fourth of this faire band.

30

And next to him malicious Envie rode,
Upon a ravenous wolfe, and still did chaw
Betweene his cankred[8] teeth a venomous tode,[9]
That all the poison ran about his chaw;
But inwardly he chawed his owne maw

[1] new fanglenesse being easily carried away by whatever is new.
[2] Avarice inordinate desire to acquire and hoard wealth.
[3] Camell See Matthew 19:24: "It is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle than for a rich man to enter the kingdom of God."
[4] pelfe wealth, riches.
[5] usurie the practice of lending money at excessive rates of interest, a practice illegal in sixteenth-century England.
[6] thorough through.
[7] covetise excessive desire for the acquisition and possession of what belongs to another, often wealth.
[8] cankred infected.
[9] venomous tode Toads were widely believed to secrete poison.

At neighbours wealth, that made him ever sad;
For death it was, when any good he saw,
And wept, that cause of weeping none he had,
But when he heard of harme, he wexed[1] wondrous glad.

31

All in a kirtle[2] of discolourd say[3]
He clothed was, ypainted full of eyes;
And in his bosome secretly there lay
An hatefull Snake, the which his taile uptyes
In many folds, and mortall sting implyes.
Still as he rode, he gnasht his teeth, to see
Those heapes of gold with griple[4] Covetyse,
And grudged at the great felicitie
Of proud Lucifera, and his owne companie.

32

He hated all good workes and vertuous deeds,
And him no lesse, that any like did use,
And who with gracious bread the hungry feeds,
His almes for want of faith he doth accuse;
So every good to bad he doth abuse:
And eke the verse of famous Poets witt
He does backebite, and spightfull poison spues
From leprous mouth on all, that ever writt:
Such one vile Envie was, that fifte in row did sitt.

33

And him beside rides fierce revenging Wrath,
Upon a Lion, loth[5] for to be led;
And in his hand a burning brond he hath,
The which he brandisheth about his hed;
His eyes did hurle forth sparkles fiery red,
And stared sterne on all, that him beheld,
As ashes pale of hew and seeming ded;
And on his dagger still his hand he held,
Trembling through hasty rage, when choler in him sweld.

34

His ruffin[6] raiment all was staind with blood,
Which he had spilt, and all to rags yrent,
Through unadvized rashnesse woxen wood;[7]
For of his hands he had no governement,
Ne car'd for bloud in his avengement:
But when the furious fit was overpast,
His cruell facts he often would repent;
Yet willfull man he never would forecast,
How many mischieves should ensue his heedlesse hast.

35

Full many mischiefes follow cruell Wrath;
Abhorred bloudshed, and tumultuous strife,
Unmanly murder, and unthrifty scath,
Bitter despight, with rancours rusty knife,
And fretting griefe the enemy of life;
All these, and many evils moe haunt ire,
The swelling Splene,[8] and Frenzy raging rife,
The shaking Palsey, and Saint Fraunces fire:[9]
Such one was Wrath, the last of this ungodly tire.

36

And after all, upon the wagon beame
Rode Sathan, with a smarting whip in hand,
With which he forward lasht the laesie teme,
So oft as Slowth[10] still in the mire did stand.
Huge routs of people did about them band,
Showting for joy, and still before their way
A foggy mist had covered all the land;
And underneath their feet, all scattred lay Dead sculs and bones of men, whose life had gone astray.

37

So forth they marchen in this goodly sort,
To take the solace of the open aire,

---

1 wexed grew, increased.
2 kirtle tunic, coat.
3 say woolen cloth.
4 griple griping, niggardly.
5 loth unwilling.
6 ruffin ruffian.
7 wood mad, insane.
8 swelling Splene outburst of temper, as the spleen was seen as the seat of ill-humour or peevishness.
9 Saint Fraunces fire St. Anthony's fire, a disease that leads to violent inflammation of the skin (Hamilton).
10 Slowth sloth.

And in fresh flowring fields themselves to sport;
Emongst the rest rode that false Lady faire,
The fowle Duessa, next unto the chaire
Of proud Lucifera, as one of the traine:
But that good knight would not so nigh repaire,
Him selfe estraunging from their joyaunce vaine,
Whose fellowship seemd far unfit for warlike swaine.

38

So having solaced themselves a space
With pleasaunce of the breathing fields yfed,[1]
They backe returned to the Princely Place;
Whereas an errant knight in armes ycled,
And heathnish shield, wherein with letters red
Was writ Sans joy, they new arrived find:
Enflam'd with fury and fiers hardy-hed,
He seemd in hart to harbour thoughts unkind,
And nourish bloudy vengeaunce in his bitter mind.

39

Who when the shamed shield of slaine Sans foy
He spide with that same Faery champions page,
Bewraying[2] him, that did of late destroy
His eldest brother, burning all with rage
He to him leapt, and that same envious gage[3]
Of victors glory from him snatcht away:
But th'Elfin knight, which ought[4] that warlike wage,[5]
Disdaind to loose the meed he wonne in fray,
And him rencountring fierce, reskewd the noble pray.

40

Therewith they gan to hurtlen greedily,
Redoubted battaile ready to darrayne,[6]
And clash their shields, and shake their swords on hy,
That with their sturre they troubled all the traine;
Till that great Queene upon eternall paine
Of high displeasure, that ensewen might,
Commaunded them their fury to refraine,
And if that either to that shield had right,
In equall lists they should the morrow next it fight.

41

"Ah dearest Dame," quoth then the Paynim bold,
"Pardon the errour of enraged wight,
Whom great griefe made forget the raines to hold
Of reasons rule, to see this recreant knight,
No knight, but treachour full of false despight[7]
And shamefull treason, who through guile hath slayn
The prowest knight, that ever field did fight,
Even stout Sans foy (O who can then refrayn?)
Whose shield he beares renuerst,[8] the more to heape disdayn.

42

And to augment the glorie of his guile,
His dearest love the faire Fidessa loe
Is there possessed of the traytour vile,
Who reapes the harvest sowen by his foe,
Sowen in bloudy field, and bought with woe:
That brothers hand shall dearely well requight
So be, O Queene, you equall favour showe."
Him litle answerd th'angry Elfin knight;
He never meant with words, but swords to plead his right.

---

1 yfed fed.
2 Bewraying exposing, betraying.
3 gage pledge, prize.
4 ought owned.
5 warlike wage reward for battle.
6 darrayne do battle.
7 despight scorn, disdain.
8 renuerst upside down.

43

But threw his gauntlet[1] as a sacred pledge,
His cause in combat the next day to try:
So been they parted both, with harts on edge,
To be aveng'd each on his enimy.
That night they pas in joy and jollity,
Feasting and courting both in bowre and hall;
For Steward[2] was excessive Gluttonie,
That of his plenty poured forth to all;
Which doen, the Chamberlain[3] Slowth did to rest them call.

44

Now whenas darkesome night had all displayd
Her coleblacke curtein over brightest skye,
The warlike youthes on dayntie couches layd,
Did chace away sweet sleepe from sluggish eye,
To muse on meanes of hoped victory.
But whenas Morpheus had with leaden mace
Arrested all that courtly company,
Up-rose Duessa from her resting place,
And to the Paynims lodging comes with silent pace.

45

Whom broad awake she finds, in troublous fit,
Forecasting, how his foe he might annoy,
And him amoves with speaches seeming fit:
"Ah deare Sans joy, next dearest to Sans foy,
Cause of my new griefe, cause of my new joy,
Joyous, to see his ymage in mine eye,
And greev'd, to thinke how foe did him destroy,
That was the flowre of grace and chevalrye;
Lo his Fidessa to thy secret faith I flye."

46

With gentle wordes he can her fairely greet,
And bad say on the secret of her hart.
Then sighing soft, "I learne that litle sweet
Oft tempred is," quoth she, "with muchell smart:
For since my brest was launcht with lovely dart
Of deare Sans foy, I never joyed howre,
But in eternall woes my weaker hart
Have wasted, loving him with all my powre,
And for his sake have felt full many an heavie stowre.

47

At last when perils all I weened past,
And hop'd to reape the crop of all my care,
Into new woes unweeting I was cast,
By this false faytor,[4] who unworthy ware
His worthy shield, whom he with guilefull snare
Entrapped slew, and brought to shamefull grave.
Me silly maid away with him he bare,
And ever since hath kept in darksome cave,
For that I would not yeeld, that to Sans foy I gave.

48

But since faire Sunne hath sperst[5] that lowring clowd,
And to my loathed life now shewes some light,
Under your beames I will me safely shrowd,
From dreaded storme of his disdainfull spight:
To you th'inheritance belongs by right
Of brothers prayse, to you eke longs his love.
Let not his love, let not his restlesse spright
Be unreveng'd, that calles to you above
From wandring Stygian shores, where it doth endlesse move."

49

"Thereto," said he, "Faire Dame be nought dismaid
For sorrowes past; their griefe is with them gone:
Ne yet of present perill be affraid;
For needlesse feare did never vantage none,
And helplesse hap it booteth not to mone.
Dead is Sans-foy, his vitall paines are past,
Though greeved ghost for vengeance deepe do grone:
He lives, that shall him pay his dewties last,
And guiltie Elfin bloud shall sacrifice in hast."

[1] gauntlet glove.
[2] Steward official who controls the domestic affairs of a household.
[3] Chamberlain chamber attendant.
[4] faytor deceiver.
[5] sperst dispersed.

50

"O but I feare the fickle freakes,"[1] quoth shee,
"Of fortune false, and oddes of armes in field."
"Why dame," quoth he, "what oddes can ever bee,
Where both do fight alike, to win or yield?"
"Yea but," quoth she, "he beares a charmed shield,
And eke enchaunted armes, that none can perce,
Ne none can wound the man, that does them wield."
"Charmd or enchaunted," answerd he then ferce,
"I no whit reck, ne you the like need to reherce.

51

But faire Fidessa, sithens fortunes guile,
Or enimies powre hath now captived you,
Returne from whence ye came, and rest a while
Till morrow next, that I the Elfe subdew,
And with Sans-foyes dead dowry you endew."[2]
"Ay me, that is a double death," she said,
"With proud foes sight my sorrow to renew:
Where ever yet I be, my secrete aid
Shall follow you." So passing forth she him obaid.

Canto V

The faithfull knight in equall field[3]
subdewes his faithlesse foe,
Whom false Duessa saves, and for his cure to hell does goe.

1

The noble hart, that harbours vertuous thought,
And is with child of glorious great intent,
Can never rest, untill it forth have brought Th'eternall brood of glorie excellent:
Such restlesse passion did all night torment
The flaming corage of that Faery knight,
Devizing, how that doughtie[4] tournament
With greatest honour he atchieven might;
Still did he wake, and still did watch for dawning light.

2

At last the golden Orientall[5] gate
Of greatest heaven gan to open faire,
And Phœbus fresh, as bridegrome to his mate,[6]
Came dauncing forth, shaking his deawie haire:
And hurld his glistring beames through gloomie aire.
Which when the wakeful Elfe perceiv'd, streight way
He started up, and did him selfe prepaire,
In sun-bright armes, and battailous array:
For with the Pagan proud he combat will that day.

3

And forth he comes into the commune hall,
Where earely waite him many a gazing eye,
To weet[7] what end to straunger knights may fall.
There many Minstrales maken melody,
To drive away the dull melancholy,
And many Bardes, that to the trembling chord
Can tune their timely[8] voyces cunningly,
And many Chroniclers, that can record
Old loves, and warres for Ladies doen by many a Lord.

4

Soone after comes the cruell Sarazin,
In woven maile all armed warily,
And sternly lookes at him, who not a pin
Does care for looke of living creatures eye.
They bring them wines of Greece and Araby,[9]

---

1 fickle freakes sudden changes of mind.
2 endew bestow.
3 equall field equal combat.
4 doughtie formidable, brave.
5 Orientall easterly.
6 as bridgrome to his mate allusion to Psalm 19:4-5: "In them he has set a tent for the sun, which comes forth like a bridegroom leaving his chamber, and like a strong man runs its course with joy."
7 weet know.
8 timely measured, rhythmic.
9 wines of Greece and Araby exotic spiced wines.

And daintie spices fetcht from furthest Ynd,[1]
To kindle heat of corage privily:
And in the wine a solemne oth they bynd
T'observe the sacred lawes of armes, that are assynd.

5

At last forth comes that far renowmed Queene,
With royall pomp and Princely majestie;
She is ybrought unto a paled[2] greene,
And placed under stately canapee,
The warlike feates of both those knights to see.
On th'other side in all mens open vew
Duessa placed is, and on a tree
Sans-foy his shield is hangd with bloudy hew:
Both those the lawrell[3] girlonds to the victor dew.

6

A shrilling trompet sownded from on hye,
And unto battaill bad them selves addresse:
Their shining shieldes about their wrestes they tye,
And burning blades about their heads do blesse,
The instruments of wrath and heavinesse:
With greedy force each other doth assayle,
And strike so fiercely, that they do impresse
Deepe dinted furrowes in the battred mayle;
The yron walles to ward their blowes are weake and fraile.

7

The Sarazin was stout, and wondrous strong,
And heaped blowes like yron hammers great:
For after bloud and vengeance he did long.
The knight was fiers and full of youthly heat:
And doubled strokes, like dreaded thunders threat:
For all for prayse and honour he did fight.
Both stricken strike, and beaten both do beat,
That from their shields forth flyeth firie light,
And helmets hewen deepe, shew marks of eithers might.

8

So th'one for wrong, the other strives for right:
As when a Gryfon[4] seized of his pray,
A Dragon fiers encountreth in his flight,
Through widest ayre making his ydle way,
That would his rightfull ravine[5] rend away:
With hideous horrour both together smight,
And souce so sore, that they the heavens affray:
The wise Southsayer[6] seeing so sad sight,
Th'amazed vulgar[7] tels of warres and mortall fight.

9

So th'one for wrong, the other strives for right,
And each to deadly shame would drive his foe:
The cruell steele so greedily doth bight
In tender flesh, that streames of bloud down flow,
With which the armes, that earst so bright did show,
Into a pure vermillion[8] now are dyde:
Great ruth in all the gazers harts did grow,
Seeing the gored woundes to gape so wyde,
That victory they dare not wish to either side.

10

At last the Paynim chaunst to cast his eye,
His suddein[9] eye, flaming with wrathfull fyre,
Upon his brothers shield, which hong thereby:
Therewith redoubled was his raging yre,
And said, "Ah wretched sonne of wofull syre,
Doest thou sit wayling by black Stygian lake,
Whilest here thy shield is hangd for victors hyre,
And sluggish german[10] doest thy forces slake,[11]
To after-send his foe, that him may overtake?"[12]

---

1 Ynd India.
2 paled enclosed.
3 lawrell an emblem of victory or of distinction.
4 Gryfon a fabulous animal usually represented as having the head and wings of an eagle and the body and hind quarters of a lion.
5 ravine prey, spoil.
6 Southsayer soothsayer.
7 vulgar common person.
8 vermillion bright red.
9 suddein darting.
10 german brother.
11 slake diminish, weaken.
12 At last … him may overtake allusion to Virgil, Aeneid 12 (Variorum).

11

Goe caytive[1] Elfe, him quickly overtake,
And soone redeeme from his long wandring woe;
Goe guiltie ghost,[2] to him my message make,
That I his shield have quit from dying foe."
Therewith upon his crest he stroke him so,
That twise he reeled, readie twise to fall;
End of the doubtfull battell deemed tho
The lookers on, and lowd to him gan call
The false Duessa, "Thine the shield, and I, and all."

12

Soone as the Faerie heard his Ladie speake,
Out of his swowning dreame he gan awake,
And quickning[3] faith, that earst was woxen weake,
The creeping deadly cold away did shake:
Tho mov'd with wrath, and shame, and Ladies sake,
Of all attonce he cast avengd to bee,
And with so'exceeding furie at him strake,
That forced him to stoupe upon his knee;
Had he not stouped so, he should have cloven[4] bee.

13

And to him said, "Goe now proud Miscreant,[5]
Thy selfe thy message doe to german deare,
Alone he wandring thee too long doth want:
Goe say, his foe thy shield with his doth beare."
Therewith his heavie hand he high gan reare,
Him to have slaine; when loe a darksome clowd
Upon him fell: he no where doth appeare,
But vanisht is.[6] The Elfe him cals alowd,
But answer none receives: the darknes him does shrowd.

14

In haste Duessa from her place arose,
And to him running said, "O prowest[7] knight,
That ever Ladie to her love did chose,
Let now abate[8] the terror of your might,
And quench the flame of furious despight,
And bloudie vengeance; lo th'infernall powres
Covering your foe with cloud of deadly night,
Have borne him hence to Plutoes balefull bowres.
The conquest yours, I yours, the shield, and glory yours."

15

Not all so satisfide, with greedie eye
He sought all round about, his thirstie blade
To bath in bloud of faithlesse enemy;
Who all that while lay hid in secret shade:
He standes amazed, how he thence should fade.
At last the trumpets Triumph sound on hie,
And running Heralds humble homage made,
Greeting him goodly with new victorie,
And to him brought the shield, the cause of enmitie.

16

Wherewith he goeth to that soveraine Queene,
And falling her before on lowly knee,
To her makes present of his service seene:
Which she accepts, with thankes, and goodly gree,[9]
Greatly advauncing[10] his gay chevalree.
So marcheth home, and by her takes the knight,
Whom all the people follow with great glee,
Shouting, and clapping all their hands on hight,
That all the aire it fils, and flyes to heaven bright.

---

1 caytive base, mean.
2 Goe guiltie ghost This line echoes Virgil, Aeneid 2.547-48 (Variorum).
3 quickning reviving.
4 cloven split.
5 Miscreant infidel.
6 darksome clowd … vanisht is In both the Iliad, Books 3 and 5 and the Aeneid, Book 5, the gods rescue their favourites by throwing a cloud around them (Variorum).
7 prowest bravest, worthiest.
8 abate diminish.
9 gree favour, good will.
10 advauncing extolling.

17

Home is he brought, and laid in sumptuous bed:
Where many skilfull leaches[1] him abide,[2]
To salve his hurts, that yet still freshly bled.
In wine and oyle[3] they wash his woundes wide,
And softly can embalme[4] on every side.
And all the while, most heavenly melody
About the bed sweet musicke did divide,[5]
Him to beguile of griefe and agony:
And all the while Duessa wept full bitterly.

18

As when a wearie traveller that strayes
By muddy shore of broad seven-mouthed Nile,
Unweeting[6] of the perillous wandring wayes,
Doth meet a cruell craftie Crocodile,[7]
Which in false griefe hyding his harmefull guile,
Doth weepe full sore, and sheddeth tender teares:
The foolish man, that pitties all this while
His mournefull plight, is swallowd up unwares,
Forgetfull of his owne, that mindes anothers cares.

19

So wept Duessa untill eventide,
That shyning lampes in Ioues high house were light:
Then forth she rose, ne lenger would abide,
But comes unto the place, where th'Hethen knight
In slombring swownd nigh voyd of vitall spright,
Lay cover'd with inchaunted cloud all day:
Whom when she found, as she left in plight,
To wayle his woefull case she would not stay,
But to the easterne coast of heaven makes speedy way.

20

Where griesly[8] Night, with visage deadly sad,
That Phœbus chearefull face durst never vew,
And in a foule blacke pitchie mantle clad,
She findes forth comming from her darkesome mew,[9]
Where she all day did hide her hated hew.
Before the dore her yron charet[10] stood,
Alreadie harnessed for journey new;
And coleblacke steedes yborne of hellish brood,
That on their rustie bits did champ, as they were wood.

21

Who when she saw Duessa sunny bright,
Adornd with gold and jewels shining cleare,
She greatly grew amazed[11] at the sight,
And th'unacquainted light began to feare:
For never did such brightnesse there appeare,
And would have backe retyred to her cave,
Untill the witches speech she gan to heare,
Saying, "Yet O thou dreaded Dame, I crave Abide, till I have told the message, which I have."

22

She stayd, and foorth Duessa gan proceede,
"O thou most auncient Grandmother[12] of all,
More old than Ioue,[13] whom thou at first didst breede,
Or that great house of Gods cælestiall,
Which wast begot in Dæmogorgons hall,
And sawst the secrets of the world unmade,
Why suffredst thou thy Nephewes deare to fall
With Elfin sword, most shamefully betrade?
Lo where the stout Sans joy doth sleepe in deadly shade.

---

1 leaches physicians.

2 him abide stay with him.

3 wine and oyle See Luke 10:33-34: "But a Samaritan, as he journeyed, came to where he was; and when he saw him, he had compassion, and went to him and bound up his wounds, pouring on oil and wine."

4 embalme salve.

5 divide descant.

6 Unweeting unknowing.

7 cruell craftie Crocodile fabulously said to weep, either to allure a man for the purpose of devouring him, or while (or after) devouring him (Variorum).

8 griesly grim, ghastly.

9 mew den, secret place.

10 yron charet Night is traditionally represented driving a black chariot with black horses.

11 amazed stunned.

12 Grandmother Night was born of Demogorgon, father of all the gods, and Eternity and has many progeny, including Duessa and Sans foy, Sans joy, and Sans loy (Variorum).

13 Ioue Jupiter.

23

And him before, I saw with bitter eyes
The bold Sans foy shrinke underneath his speare;
And now the pray of fowles in field he lyes,
Nor wayld of friends, nor laid on groning beare,
That whylome[1] was to me too dearely deare.
O what of Gods then boots it[2] to be borne,
If old Aveugles sonnes[3] so evill heare?
Or who shall not great Nightes children scorne,
When two of three her Nephews are so fowle forlorne?

24

Up then, up dreary Dame, of darknesse Queene,
Go gather up the reliques of thy race,
Or else goe them avenge, and let be seene,
That dreaded Night in brightest day hath place,
And can the children of faire light deface."[4]
Her feeling speeches some compassion moved
In hart, and chaunge in that great mothers face:
Yet pittie in her hart was never proved[5]
Till then: for evermore she hated, never loved.

25

And said, "Deare daughter rightly may I rew
The fall of famous children borne of mee,
And good successes, which their foes ensew:
But who can turne the streame of destinee,
Or breake the chayne of strong necessitee,[6]
Which fast is tyde to Ioues eternall seat?
The sonnes of Day he favoureth, I see,
And by my ruines thinkes to make them great:
To make one great by others losse, is bad excheat.[7]

26

Yet shall they not escape so freely all;
For some shall pay the price of others guilt:
And he the man that made Sans foy to fall,
Shall with his owne bloud price that he hath spilt.
But what art thou, that telst of Nephews kilt?"
"I that do seeme not I, Duessa am," (Quoth she) "how ever now in garments gilt,
And gorgeous gold arayd I to thee came;
Duessa I, the daughter of Deceipt and Shame."

27

Then bowing downe her aged backe, she kist
The wicked witch, saying; "In that faire face
The false resemblance of Deceipt, I wist
Did closely lurke; yet so true-seeming grace
It carried, that I scarse in darkesome place
Could it discerne, though I the mother bee
Of falshood, and root of Duessaes race.
O welcome child, whom I have longd to see,
And now have seene unwares. Lo now I go with thee."

28

Then to her yron wagon she betakes,
And with her beares the fowle welfavourd witch:
Through mirkesome[8] aire her readie way she makes.
Her twyfold[9] Teme, of which two blacke as pitch,
And two were browne, yet each to each unlich,[10]
Did softly swim away, ne ever stampe,
Unlesse she chaunst their stubborne mouths to twitch;
Then foming tarre, their bridles they would champe,
And trampling the fine element, would fiercely rampe.

---

1 whylome for some time.

2 boots it what good is it, what does it matter.

3 Aveugles sonnes Sans foy, Sans joy, and Sans loy are the sons of Darkness.

4 deface destroy, demolish.

5 proved demonstrated.

6 chayne of strong necessitee Zeus' golden chain, which binds the universe together (Homer, Iliad 8) (Variorum).

7 excheat inheritance, gain.

8 mirkesome dark, dense, heavy.

9 twyfold twofold.

10 unlich unlike.

29

So well they sped, that they be come at length
Unto the place, whereas the Paynim lay,
Devoid of outward sense, and native strength,
Coverd with charmed cloud from vew of day,
And sight of men, since his late luckelesse fray.
His cruell wounds with cruddy[1] bloud congealed,
They binden up so wisely, as they may,
And handle softly, till they can be healed:
So lay him in her charet, close in night concealed.

30

And all the while she stood upon the ground,
The wakefull dogs did never cease to bay,
As giving warning of th'unwonted sound,
With which her yron wheeles did them affray,
And her darke griesly looke them much dismay;
The messenger of death, the ghastly Owle[2]
With drearie shriekes did also her bewray;
And hungry Wolves continually did howle,
At her abhorred face, so filthy and so fowle.

31

Thence turning backe in silence soft they stole,
And brought the heavie corse with easie pace
To yawning gulfe of deepe Avernus[3] hole.
By that same hole an entrance darke and bace
With smoake and sulphure hiding all the place,
Descends to hell: there creature never past,
That backe returned without heavenly grace;
But dreadfull Furies, which their chaines have brast,
And damned sprights sent forth to make ill men aghast.

32

By the same way the direfull[4] dames doe drive
Their mournefull charet, fild with rusty blood,
And downe to Plutoes house are come bilive:[5]
Which passing through, on every side them stood
The trembling ghosts with sad amazed mood,
Chattring their yron teeth, and staring wide
With stonie eyes; and all the hellish brood
Of feends infernall flockt on every side,
To gaze on earthly wight, that with the Night durst ride.

33

They pas the bitter waves of Acheron,
Where many soules sit wailing woefully,
And come to fiery flood of Phlegeton,
Whereas the damned ghosts in torments fry,
And with sharpe shrilling shriekes doe bootlesse cry,
Cursing high Ioue, the which them thither sent.
The house of endlesse paine is built thereby,
In which ten thousand sorts of punishment
The cursed creatures doe eternally torment.

34

Before the threshold dreadfull Cerberus[6]
His three deformed heads did lay along,
Curled with thousand adders venemous,
And lilled[7] forth his bloudie flaming tong:
At them he gan to reare his bristles strong,
And felly gnarre,[8] untill dayes enemy
Did him appease; then downe his taile he hong
And suffered them to passen quietly:
For she in hell and heaven had power equally.

35

There was Ixion[9] turned on a wheele,
For daring tempt the Queene of heaven to sin;
And Sisyphus[10] an huge round stone did reele

---

1 cruddy clotted.

2 Owle traditionally a bird of ill-omen (Hamilton).

3 Avernus A deep lake amid gloomy woods believed to be an entrance to the Underworld (OCD).

4 direfull dreadful, terrible.

5 bilive quickly.

6 Cerberus three-headed watchdog who guards the Underworld.

7 lilled lolled.

8 felly gnarre fiercely snarl.

9 Ixion mythical king of Thessaly, who was punished in the Underworld by being fastened to an eternally revolving wheel (Dict. Gods and Mortals).

10 Sisyphus master of cunning who tricked death and was punished by being forced to roll a great stone up a hill for eternity (Dict. Gods and Mortals).

Against an hill, ne might from labour lin;[1]
There thirstie Tantalus[2] hong by the chin;
And Tityus[3] fed a vulture on his maw;
Typhœus[4] joynts were stretched on a gin,[5]
Theseus[6] condemned to endlesse slouth by law,
And fifty sisters[7] water in leake vessels draw.

36

They all beholding worldly wights in place,
Leave off their worke, unmindfull of their smart,
To gaze on them; who forth by them doe pace,
Till they be come unto the furthest part:
Where was a Cave ywrought by wondrous art,
Deepe, darke, uneasie, dolefull, comfortlesse,
In which sad Æsculapius[8] farre a part
Emprisond was in chaines remedilesse,
For that Hippolytus rent corse[9] he did redresse.

37

Hippolytus a jolly huntsman was,
That wont in charet chace the foming Bore;[10]
He all his Peeres in beautie did surpas,
But Ladies love as losse of time forbore:
His wanton stepdame loved him the more,
But when she saw her offred sweets refused
Her love she turnd to hate, and him before
His father fierce of treason false accused,
And with her gealous termes his open eares abused.

38

Who all in rage his Sea-god syre[11] besought,
Some cursed vengeance on his sonne to cast:
From surging gulf two monsters straight were brought,
With dread whereof his chasing steedes aghast,
Both charet swift and huntsman overcast.
His goodly corps on ragged cliffs yrent,
Was quite dismembred, and his members chast
Scattered on every mountaine, as he went,
That of Hippolytus was left no moniment.[12]

39

His cruell stepdame seeing what was donne,
Her wicked dayes with wretched knife did end,
In death avowing th'innocence of her sonne.
Which hearing his rash Syre, began to rend
His haire, and hastie tongue, that did offend:
Tho gathering up the relicks of his smart
By Dianes[13] meanes, who was Hippolyts frend,
Them brought to Æsculape, that by his art
Did heale them all againe, and joyned every part.

40

Such wondrous science in mans wit to raine
When Ioue avized,[14] that could the dead revive,
And fates expired could renew againe,
Of endlesse life he might him not deprive,
But unto hell did thrust him downe alive,
With flashing thunderbolt ywounded sore:

---

[1] lin cease, desist.

[2] Tantalus king of Phrygia condemned, for revealing the secrets of the gods, to stand in Tartarus up to his chin in water, which constantly receded as he stooped to drink, and with branches of fruit hanging above him which ever fled his grasp.

[3] Tityus a giant who attempted to rape Leto, the mother of Apollo, and was punished by being bound to the ground with a pair of vultures pecking at his liver (OCD).

[4] Typhœus a monster with a hundred heads with as many voices who stole Zeus' thunderbolts. Zeus chased him into the sea and threw an island on top of him, which became Sicily (OCD). Typhœus' fiery breath became Mount Aetna. Spenser invented this particular punishment for him (Hamilton).

[5] gin rack.

[6] Theseus hero of Athens who attempted to steal Proserpina to marry a friend. After a respectful reception, the two found themselves locked into their seats, the Chairs of Forgetfulness, where they lost all memory of their identities (Dict. Gods and Mortals).

[7] fifty sisters the daughters of Danaus who were promised in marriage to the fifty sons of Ægyptus and killed their bridegrooms at the request of their father. In punishment, after death they were condemned to fill a leaky bucket with water (Dict. Gods and Mortals).

[8] Æsculapius god of healing and son of Apollo (Dict. Gods and Mortals).

[9] rent corse torn body.

[10] Hippolytus … Bore Hippolytus, son of Theseus and favourite of Artemis/Diana, was killed by an animal while out in his chariot after confessing to an affair with his stepmother, Phædra. Artemis bribed Æsculapius to bring him back from the dead (Dict. Gods and Mortals).

[11] Sea-god syre Poseidon, reputed to be Theseus' father (Dict. Gods and Mortals).

[12] moniment mark, indication.

[13] Dianes Diana, the virgin huntress, used a bow and arrows.

[14] avized observed.

Where long remaining, he did alwaies strive
Himselfe with salves to health for to restore,
And slake the heavenly fire, that raged evermore.

41

There auncient Night arriving, did alight
From her nigh wearie waine, and in her armes
To Æsculapius brought the wounded knight:
Whom having softly disarayd of armes,
Tho gan to him discover all his harmes,
Beseeching him with prayer, and with praise,
If either salves, or oyles, or herbes, or charmes
A fordonne[1] wight from dore of death mote raise,
He would at her request prolong her nephews daies.

42

"Ah Dame" (quoth he) "thou temptest me in vaine,
To dare the thing, which daily yet I rew,
And the old cause of my continued paine
With like attempt to like end to renew.
Is not enough, that thrust from heaven dew
Here endlesse penance for one fault I pay,
But that redoubled crime with vengeance new Thou biddest me to eeke? Can Night defray
The wrath of thundring Ioue, that rules both night and day?"

43

"Not so" (quoth she) "but sith that heavens king
From hope of heaven hath thee excluded quight,
Why fearest thou, that canst not hope for thing,
And fearest not, that more thee hurten might,
Now in the powre of everlasting Night?
Goe to then, O thou farre renowmed sonne
Of great Apollo,[2] shew thy famous might
In medicine, that else hath to thee wonne
Great paines, and greater praise, both never to be donne."

44

Her words prevaild: And then the learned leach
His cunning hand gan to his wounds to lay,
And all things else, the which his art did teach:
Which having seene, from thence arose away
The mother of dread darknesse, and let stay
Aueugles sonne there in the leaches cure,
And backe returning tooke her wonted way,
To runne her timely race, whilst Phœbus pure
In westerne waves his wearie wagon did recure.

45

The false Duessa leaving noyous[3] Night,
Returnd to stately pallace of dame Pride;
Where when she came, she found the Faery knight
Departed thence, albe his woundes wide
Not throughly heald, unreadie were to ride.
Good cause he had to hasten thence away;
For on a day his wary Dwarfe had spide,
Where in a dongeon deepe huge numbers lay
Of caytive wretched thrals, that wayled night and day.

46

A ruefull sight, as could be seene with eie;
Of whom he learned had in secret wise
The hidden cause of their captivitie,
How mortgaging their lives to Covetise,
Through wastfull Pride, and wanton Riotise,
They were by law of that proud Tyrannesse
Provokt with Wrath, and Envies false surmise,[4]
Condemned to that Dongeon mercilesse,
Where they should live in woe, and die in wretchednesse.

47

There was that great proud king of Babylon,[5]
That would compell all nations to adore,
And him as onely God to call upon,
Till through celestiall doome throwne out of dore,

---

[1] fordonne exhausted, overcome.

[2] sonne / Of great Apollo Æsculapius.

[3] noyous troublesome.

[4] surmise charge, surmise.

[5] king of Babylon Nebuchadnezzar had an image of gold made and commanded that all should worship it (Daniel 3:1-6).

Into an Oxe he was transform'd of yore:
There also was king Crœsus,[1] that enhaunst
His heart too high through his great riches store;
And proud Antiochus,[2] the which advaunst
His cursed hand gainst God, and on his altar daunst.

48

And them long time before, great Nimrod[3] was,
That first the world with sword and fire warrayd:
And after him old Ninus[4] farre did pas
In princely pompe, of all the world obayd;
There also was that mightie Monarch layd
Low under all, yet above all in pride,
That name of native syre did fowle upbrayd,
And would as Ammons sonne[5] be magnifide,
Till scornd of God and man a shamefull death he dide.

49

All these together in one heape were throwne,
Like carkases of beasts in butchers stall.
And in another corner wide were strowne
The antique ruines of the Romaines fall:
Great Romulus[6] the Grandsyre of them all,
Proud Tarquin,[7] and too lordly Lentulus,[8]
Stout Scipio,[9] and stubborne Hanniball,[10]
Ambitious Sylla, and sterne Marius,[11]
High Cæsar,[12] great Pompey,[13] and fierce Antonius.[14]

50

Amongst these mighty men were wemen mixt,
Proud wemen, vaine, forgetfull of their yoke:
The bold Semiramis,[15] whose sides transfixt
With sonnes owne blade, her fowle reproches spoke;
Faire Sthenobœa,[16] that her selfe did choke
With wilfull cord, for wanting of her will;
High minded Cleopatra,[17] that with stroke
Of Aspes sting her selfe did stoutly kill:
And thousands moe the like, that did that dongeon fill.

51

Besides the endlesse routs of wretched thralles,
Which thither were assembled day by day,
From all the world after their wofull falles,

[1] Crœsus the last king of Lydia (560-546 BCE) ruled all of the Greek cities on the coast of Asia Minor until he was overthrown by Cyrus (OCD).

[2] Antiochus ruler of Judæa (175-163 BCE) who attempted to hellenize the Jews (OCD) and is represented as defiling the Temple in 1 Maccabees 1.

[3] Nimrod the first tyrant after the Flood, who founded Babel (Genesis 10).

[4] Ninus ancient king of Assyria and founder of Ninevah.

[5] Ammons sonne Alexander the Great (356-323 BCE), reputed to be the son of Jupiter Ammon, the Egyptian version of the chief god in Greek and Roman mythology (OCD).

[6] Romulus legendary founder of Rome.

[7] Tarquin last king of Rome (534-510 BCE), who was expelled from the city (OCD).

[8] Lentulus In 39 CE, Lentulus led a conspiracy to murder the Roman emperor Gaius, who was forewarned of the plot and had Lentulus executed (OCD).

[9] Scipio Known as Scipio Africanus, he extended the arm of Rome into Africa and ultimately defeated Hannibal at the battle of Zama in 202 BCE (OCD).

[10] Hanniball Carthaginian general (247-c. 183 BCE) and one of the world's greatest soldiers, who challenged Rome in both Africa and Italy (OCD).

[11] Sylla Sulla (b. 138 BCE) took Rome by force to become dictator after a civil war with Marius (b. 157 BCE) (OCD).

[12] Cæsar Julius Caesar (100-44 BCE), general and statesman, consolidated Rome's hold on the known world (OCD).

[13] Pompey known as the Great (106-48 BCE); general and politician, he was at first an ally of Cæsar's, but later fought an intense, and unsuccessful, civil war against him (OCD).

[14] Antonius With Octavius Cæsar and Lepidus, Mark Antony (c. 83-32 BCE) made up the triumvirate that governed Rome and its possessions from 43 to 33 BCE. He was famous as a general and, after his legendary affair with Cleopatra, a lover (OCD).

[15] Semiramis legendary wife of Ninus, king of Assyria, who ruled after his death and founded Babylon (OCD).

[16] Sthenobœa Zenobia, likely responsible for the death of her husband and stepson, ruled Palmyra and conquered Syria, Egypt, and most of Asia Minor, but was defeated by Aurelianus in 274 CE (OCD).

[17] Cleopatra Renowned for her affair with Mark Antony, she (69-30 BCE) was joint ruler of Egypt with Ptolemy XIII, who had her expelled in 48. Cæsar helped her regain the throne, but her alliance with Rome collapsed when it appeared that she had consolidated too much power and posed a threat to the Empire. Her famous suicide followed Antony's (OCD).

Through wicked pride, and wasted wealthes decay.
But most of all, which in that Dongeon lay
Fell from high Princes courts, or Ladies bowres,
Where they in idle pompe, or wanton play,
Consumed had their goods, and thriftlesse howres,
And lastly throwne themselves into these heavy stowres.

52

Whose case when as the carefull Dwarfe had tould,
And made ensample of their mournefull sight
Unto his maister, he no lenger would
There dwell in perill of like painefull plight,
But early rose, and ere that dawning light
Discovered had the world to heaven wyde,
He by a privie Posterne[1] tooke his flight,
That of no envious eyes he mote be spyde:
For doubtless death ensewd, if any him descryde.[2]

53

Scarse could he footing find in that fowle way,
For many corses, like a great Lay-stall[3]
Of murdred men which therein strowed lay,
Without remorse, or decent funerall:
Which all through that great Princesse pride did fall
And came to shamefull end. And them beside Forth ryding underneath the castell wall,
A donghill of dead carkases he spide,
The dreadfull spectacle of that sad house of Pride.

[1] privie Posterne secret back door.
[2] descryde saw, discovered.
[3] Lay-stall burial place; also, a place where refuse and dung are laid (i.e., another kind of "privy").

Canto VI

From lawlesse lust by wondrous grace
fayre Una is releast:
Whom salvage nation does adore,
and learnes her wise beheast.

1

As when a ship, that flyes faire under saile,
An hidden rocke escaped hath unwares,
That lay in waite her wrack[4] for to bewaile,
The Marriner yet halfe amazed stares
At perill past, and yet in doubt ne dares
To joy at his foole-happie[5] oversight:
So doubly is distrest twixt joy and cares
The dreadlesse[6] courage of the Elfin knight,
Having escapt so sad ensamples[7] in his sight.

2

Yet sad he was that his too hastie speed
The faire Duess' had forst him leave behind;
And yet more sad, that Una his deare dreed[8]
Her truth had staind with treason so unkind;
Yet crime in her could never creature find,
But for his love, and for her owne selfe sake,
She wandred had from one to other Ynd,[9]
Him for to seeke, ne ever would forsake,
Till her unwares the fierce Sans loy did overtake.

3

Who after Archimagoes fowle defeat,
Led her away into a forrest wilde,
And turning wrathfull fire to lustfull heat,
With beastly sin thought her to have defilde,
And made the vassall of his pleasures vilde.
Yet first he cast by treatie,[10] and by traynes,[11]
Her to perswade, that stubborne fort to yilde:[12]

[4] wrack destruction.
[5] foole-happie lucky.
[6] dreadlesse fearless.
[7] sad ensamples distressing warnings.
[8] dreed object of awe or reverence.
[9] one to other Ynd East to West Indies.
[10] treatie entreaty, persuasion.
[11] traynes guile, tricks.
[12] yilde yield.

For greater conquest of hard love he gaynes,
That workes it to his will, then he that it constraines.

4

With fawning wordes he courted her a while,
And looking lovely, and oft sighing sore,
Her constant hart did tempt with diverse guile:
But wordes, and lookes, and sighes she did abhore,
As rocke of Diamond stedfast evermore.
Yet for to feed his fyrie lustfull eye,
He snatcht the vele, that hong her face before;
Then gan her beautie shine, as brightest skye,
And burnt his beastly hart t'efforce[1] her chastitye.

5

So when he saw his flatt'ring arts to fayle,
And subtile engines[2] bet from batteree,[3]
With greedy force he gan the fort assayle,
Whereof he weend possessed soone to bee,
And win rich spoile of ransackt chastetee.
Ah heavens, that do this hideous act behold,
And heavenly virgin thus outraged see,
How can ye vengeance just so long withhold,
And hurle not flashing flames upon that Paynim bold?

6

The pitteous maiden carefull comfortlesse,
Does throw out thrilling[4] shriekes, and shrieking cryes,
The last vaine helpe of womens great distresse,
And with loud plaints importuneth the skyes,
That molten starres do drop like weeping eyes;
And Phœbus flying so most shamefull sight,
His blushing face in foggy cloud implyes,[5]
And hides for shame. What wit of mortall wight
Can now devise to quit[6] a thrall from such a plight?

7

Eternall providence exceeding thought,
Where none appeares can make her selfe a way:
A wondrous way it for this Lady wrought,
From Lyons clawes to pluck the griped pray.
Her shrill outcryes and shriekes so loud did bray,
That all the woodes and forestes did resownd;
A troupe of Faunes[7] and Satyres[8] far away
Within the wood were dauncing in a rownd,
Whiles old Sylvanus[9] slept in shady arber sownd.

8

Who when they heard that pitteous strained voice,
In hast forsooke their rurall meriment,
And ran towards the far rebownded noyce,
To weet, what wight so loudly did lament.
Unto the place they come incontinent:[10]
Whom when the raging Sarazin espide,
A rude, misshapen, monstrous rablement,
Whose like he never saw, he durst not bide,
But got his ready steed, and fast away gan ride.

9

The wyld woodgods[11] arrived in the place,
There find the virgin dolefull desolate,
With ruffled rayments, and faire blubbred[12] face,

---

1 efforce force open, gain by force.

2 subtile engines ingenious instruments of warfare (i.e., cunning, tricks).

3 bet from batteree beaten from their own beating.

4 thrilling piercing.

5 implyes enfolds, enwraps.

6 quit release, free.

7 Faunes one of a class of rural deities; at first represented like men with horns and the tail of a goat, afterwards with goats' legs like the satyrs, to whom they were assimilated because each had a reputation for unrestrained lust.

8 Satyres one of a class of woodland gods or demons, in form partly human and partly bestial, supposed to be the companions of Bacchus. They appear in Isaiah 13:21 as part of a prophecy about the the future of Babylon: "Wild beasts will lie down there, and its houses will be full of howling creatures; there ostriches will dwell, and there satyrs will dance."

9 Sylvanus ancient wood god.

10 incontinent unchaste, lacking (sexual) self-restraint.

11 woodgods satyrs and fauns.

12 blubbred disfigured from weeping.

As her outrageous foe had left her late,
And trembling yet through feare of former hate;
All stand amazed at so uncouth[1] sight,
And gin to pittie her unhappie state,
All stand astonied at her beautie bright,
In their rude eyes unworthie of so wofull plight.

10

She more amaz'd, in double dread doth dwell;
And every tender part for feare does shake:
As when a greedie Wolfe through hunger fell
A seely Lambe farre from the flocke does take,
Of whom he meanes his bloudie feast to make,
A Lyon spyes fast running towards him,
The innocent pray in hast he does forsake,
Which quit from death yet quakes in every lim
With chaunge of feare, to see the Lyon looke so grim.

11

Such fearefull fit assaid[2] her trembling hart,
Ne word to speake, ne joynt to move she had:
The salvage nation feele her secret smart,
And read her sorrow in her count'nance sad;
Their frowning forheads with rough hornes yclad,
And rusticke horror all a side doe lay,
And gently grenning,[3] shew a semblance glad
To comfort her, and feare to put away,
Their backward bent knees teach her humbly to obay.

12

The doubtfull Damzell dare not yet commit
Her single[4] person to their barbarous truth,
But still twixt feare and hope amazd does sit,
Late learnd what harme to hastie trust ensu'th,
They in compassion of her tender youth,
And wonder of her beautie soveraine,
Are wonne with pitty and unwonted ruth,
And all prostrate upon the lowly plaine,
Do kisse her feete, and fawne on her with count'nance faine.[5]

13

Their harts she ghesseth by their humble guise,
And yieldes her to extremitie of time;[6]
So from the ground she fearelesse doth arise,
And walketh forth without suspect of crime:
They all as glad, as birdes of joyous Prime,
Thence lead her forth, about her dauncing round,
Shouting, and singing all a shepheards ryme,
And with greene braunches strowing all the ground,
Do worship her, as Queene, with olive girlond[7] cround.

14

And all the way their merry pipes they sound,
That all the woods with doubled Eccho ring,
And with their horned feet do weare the ground,
Leaping like wanton kids in pleasant Spring.
So towards old Sylvanus they her bring;
Who with the noyse awaked, commeth out,
To weet the cause, his weake steps governing,
And aged limbs on Cypresse stadle[8] stout,
And with an yvie[9] twyne his wast is girt about.

15

Far off he wonders, what them makes so glad,
Or Bacchus merry fruit[10] they did invent,
Or Cybeles franticke rites[11] have made them mad;
They drawing nigh, unto their God present
That flowre of faith and beautie excellent.
The God himselfe vewing that mirrhour rare,
Stood long amazd, and burnt in his intent;

---

1 uncouth unfamiliar, strange.
2 assaid assaulted, assailed.
3 grenning smiling.
4 single used here in many senses, since Una or Truth is one, also alone and unmarried (i.e., chaste).
5 faine glad.
6 extremitie of time stress of the moment.
7 olive girlond The olive branch signifies peace.
8 stadle staff.
9 yvie plant sacred to Bacchus.
10 Bacchus merry fruit grapes (i.e., wine).
11 Cybeles franticke rites Asiatic fertility goddess associated with orgiastic rites (Spenser Encycl., p. 202c).

His owne faire Dryope[1] now he thinkes not faire,
And Pholoe[2] fowle, when her to this he doth compare.

16

The woodborne people fall before her flat,
And worship her as Goddesse of the wood;
And old Sylvanus selfe bethinkes not, what
To thinke of wight so faire, but gazing stood,
In doubt to deeme her borne of earthly brood;
Sometimes Dame Venus[3] selfe he seemes to see,
But Venus never had so sober mood;
Sometimes Diana[4] he her takes to bee,
But misseth bow, and shaftes, and buskins[5] to her knee.

17

By vew of her he ginneth to revive
His ancient love, and dearest Cyparisse,[6]
And calles to mind his pourtraiture alive,
How faire he was, and yet not faire to this,
And how he slew with glauncing dart amisse
A gentle Hynd, the which the lovely boy
Did love as life, above all worldy blisse;
For griefe whereof the lad n'ould after joy,
But pynd away in anguish and selfe-wild annoy.

18

The wooddy Nymphes, faire Hamadryades,[7]
Her to behold do thither runne apace,
And all the troupe of light-foot Naiades,[8]
Flocke all about to see her lovely face:
But when they vewed have her heavenly grace,
They envie her in their malitious mind,
And fly away for feare of fowle disgrace:
But all the Satyres scorne their woody kind,
And henceforth nothing faire, but her on earth they find.

19

Glad of such lucke, the luckelesse lucky maid,
Did her content to please their feeble eyes,
And long time with that salvage people staid,
To gather breath in many miseries.
During which time her gentle wit she plyes,
To teach them truth, which worshipt her in vaine,
And made her th'Image of Idolatryes;[9]
But when their bootlesse zeale she did restraine
From her own worship, they her Asse would worship fayn.

20

It fortuned a noble warlike knight
By just occasion to the forrest came,
To seeke his kindred, and the lignage[10] right,
From whence he tooke his well deserved name:
He had in armes abroad wonne muchell fame,
And fild far landes with glorie of his might,
Plaine, faithfull, true, and enimy of shame,
And ever lov'd to fight for Ladies right,
But in vaine glorious frayes he litle did delight.

21

A Satyres sonne yborne in forrest wyld,
By straunge adventure as it did betyde,
And there begotten of a Lady myld,
Faire Thyamis the daughter of Labryde,
That was in sacred bands of wedlocke tyde

---

[1] Dryope Apollo's infatuation with, and impregnation of, the nymph led to her transformation into a poplar tree (Dict. Gods and Mortals).

[2] Pholoe Nymph loved by Pan (Hamilton).

[3] Venus goddess of love.

[4] Diana goddess of chastity.

[5] buskins coverings for the feet and legs reaching to the calf, or to the knee.

[6] Cyparisse a boy who grieved so much at accidentally killing a pet stag that the gods turned him into the tree of mourning, the cypress (OCD).

[7] Hamadryades wood-nymphs fabled to live and die with the trees they inhabited.

[8] Naiades river nymphs.

[9] Image of Idolatryes The satyrs worship the physical Una as an idol, which shows their lack of awareness of both the Old Testament commandment against worshipping other gods (Exodus 20:5) and the Old and New Testament warnings that the invention of idols is the beginning of whoredom or adultery (Wisdom of Solomon 14:11, Ephesians 5:5, Romans 2:22, Colossians 3:5).

[10] lignage lineage.

To Therion,[1] a loose unruly swayne;
Who had more joy to raunge the forrest wyde,
And chase the salvage beast with busie payne,
Then serve his Ladies love, and wast in pleasures vayne.

22

The forlorne mayd did with loves longing burne,
And coulde not lacke her lovers company,
But to the wood she goes, to serve her turne,
And seeke her spouse, that from her still does fly,
And followes other game and venery:[2]
A Satyre chaunst her wandring for to find,
And kindling coles of lust in brutish eye,
The loyall links of wedlocke did unbind,
And made her person thrall unto his beastly kind.

23

So long in secret cabin there he held
Her captive to his sensuall desire,
Till that with timely fruit her belly sweld,
And bore a boy unto that salvage sire:
Then home he suffred her for to retire,
For ransome leaving him the late borne childe;
Whom till to ryper yeares he gan aspire,
He noursled[3] up in life and manners wilde,
Emongst wild beasts and woods, from lawes of men exilde.

24

For all he taught the tender ymp,[4] was but
To banish cowardize and bastard feare;
His trembling hand he would force him to put
Upon the Lyon and the rugged Beare,
And from the she Beares teats her whelps[5] to teare;
And eke wyld roring Buls he would him make
To tame, and ryde their backes not made to beare;
And the Robuckes in flight to overtake,
That every beast for feare of him did fly and quake.

25

Thereby so fearlesse, and so fell[6] he grew,
That his owne sire and maister[7] of his guise[8]
Did often tremble at his horrid vew,[9]
And oft for dread of hurt would him advise,
The angry beasts not rashly to despise,
Not too much to provoke; for he would learne
The Lyon stoup to him in lowly wise,
(A lesson hard) and make the Libbard[10] sterne
Leave roaring, when in rage he for revenge did earne.[11]

26

And for to make his powre approved more,
Wyld beasts in yron yokes he would compell;
The spotted Panther, and the tusked Bore,
The Pardale[12] swift, and the Tigre cruell;
The Antelope, and Wolfe both fierce and fell;
And them constraine in equall teme to draw.
Such joy he had, their stubborne harts to quell,
And sturdie courage tame with dreadfull aw,
That his beheast they feared, as a tyrans law.

27

His loving mother came upon a day
Unto the woods, to see her little sonne;
And chaunst unwares to meet him in the way,
After his sportes, and cruell pastime donne,
When after him a Lyonesse did runne,
That roaring all with rage, did lowd require
Her children deare, whom he away had wonne:

---

1 Thyamis … Labryde …Therion Thyamis Greek, "passion"; Labryde Greek, "turbulent/greedy"; Therion Greek, "wild beast" (Hamilton).
2 venery wild animals.
3 noursled brought up.
4 ymp child, offspring.
5 whelps cubs.
6 fell fierce, ruthless.
7 maister instructor, tutor.
8 guise behaviour.
9 horrid vew rough appearance.
10 Libbard leopard.
11 earne yearn.
12 Pardale female leopard.

The Lyon whelpes she saw how he did beare,
And lull in rugged armes, withouten childish feare.

28

The fearefull Dame all quaked at the sight,
And turning backe, gan fast to fly away,
Untill with love revokt from vaine affright,
She hardly yet perswaded was to stay,
And then to him these womanish words gan say;
"Ah Satyrane, my dearling, and my joy,
For love of me leave off this dreadfull play;
To dally thus with death, is no fit toy,
Go find some other play-fellowes, mine own sweet boy."

29

In these and like delights of bloudy game
He trayned was, till ryper yeares he raught,[1]
And there abode, whilst any beast of name
Walkt in that forest, whom he had not taught
To feare his force: and then his courage haught[2]
Desird of forreine foemen to be knowne,
And far abroad for straunge adventures sought:
In which his might was never overthrowne,
But through all Faery lond his famous worth was blown.

30

Yet evermore it was his manner faire,
After long labours and adventures spent,
Unto those native woods for to repaire,
To see his sire and ofspring auncient.
And now he thither come for like intent;
Where he unwares the fairest Una found,
Straunge Lady, in so straunge habiliment,[3]
Teaching the Satyres, which her sat around,
Trew sacred lore, which from her sweet lips did redound.[4]

31

He wondred at her wisedome heavenly rare,
Whose like in womens wit he never knew;
And when her curteous deeds he did compare,
Gan her admire, and her sad sorrowes rew,
Blaming of Fortune, which such troubles threw,
And joyd to make proofe of her crueltie
On gentle Dame, so hurtlesse, and so trew:
Thenceforth he kept her goodly company,
And learnd her discipline of faith and veritie.[5]

32

But she all vowd unto the Redcrosse knight,
His wandring perill closely[6] did lament,
Ne in this new acquaintaunce could delight,
But her deare heart with anguish did torment,
And all her wit in secret counsels spent,
How to escape. At last in privie wise
To Satyrane she shewed her intent;
Who glad to gain such favour, gan devise,
How with that pensive[7] Maid he best might thence arise.

33

So on a day when Satyres all were gone,
To do their service to Sylvanus old,
The gentle virgin left behind alone
He led away with courage stout and bold.
Too late it was, to Satyres to be told,
Or ever hope recover her againe:
In vaine he seekes that having cannot hold.
So fast he carried her with carefull paine,
That they the woods are past, and come now to the plaine.

34

The better part now of the lingring day,
They traveild had, when as they farre espide
A wearie wight forwandring by the way,
And towards him they gan in hast to ride,

[1] raught reached.
[2] haught noble, lofty.
[3] habiliment attire.
[4] redound proceed, issue.
[5] veritie truth.
[6] closely secretly, privately.
[7] pensive sorrowful.

To weet of newes, that did abroad betide,
Or tydings of her knight of the Redcrosse.
But he them spying, gan to turne aside,
For feare as seemd, or for some feigned losse;
More greedy they of newes, fast towards him do crosse.

35

A silly[1] man, in simple weedes forworne,[2]
And soild with dust of the long dried way;
His sandales were with toilesome travelle torne,
And face all tand with scorching sunny ray,
As he had traveild many a sommers day,
Through boyling sands of Arabie and Ynde;
And in his hand a Jacobs staffe,[3] to stay
His wearie limbes upon: and eke behind,
His scrip[4] did hang, in which his needments he did bind.

36

The knight approching nigh, of him inquerd
Tydings of warre, and of adventures new;
But warres, nor new adventures none he herd.
Then Una gan to aske, if ought he knew,
Or heard abroad of that her champion trew,
That in his armour bare a croslet[5] red.
"Aye me, Deare dame," quoth he, "well may I rew
To tell the sad sight, which mine eies have red:
These eyes did see that knight both living and eke ded."

37

That cruell word her tender hart so thrild,[6]
That suddein cold did runne through every vaine,
And stony horrour all her sences fild
With dying fit, that downe she fell for paine.
The knight her lightly reared up againe,
And comforted with curteous kind reliefe:
Then wonne from death, she bad him tellen plaine
The further processe of her hidden griefe;
The lesser pangs can beare, who hath endur'd the chiefe.

38

Then gan the Pilgrim thus, "I chaunst this day,
This fatall day, that shall I ever rew,
To see two knights in travell on my way
(A sory sight) arraung'd in battell new,
Both breathing vengeance, both of wrathfull hew:
My fearefull flesh did tremble at their strife,
To see their blades so greedily imbrew,[7]
That drunke with bloud, yet thirsted after life:
What more? the Redcrosse knight was slaine with Paynim knife."

39

"Ah dearest Lord," quoth she, "how might that bee,
And he the stoutest knight, that ever wonne?"
"Ah dearest dame," quoth he, "how might I see
The thing, that might not be, and yet was donne?"
"Where is," said Satyrane, "that Paynims sonne,
That him of life, and us of joy hath reft?"
"Not far away," quoth he, "he hence doth wonne
Foreby[8] a fountaine, where I late him left Washing his bloudy wounds, that through the steele were cleft."[9]

40

Therewith the knight thence marched forth in hast,
Whiles Una with huge heavinesse opprest,
Could not for sorrow follow him so fast;
And soone he came, as he the place had ghest,

---

1 silly simple, humble.
2 forworne worn out.
3 Jacobs staffe pilgrim's staff (Hamilton).
4 scrip small bag, satchel.
5 croslet small cross.
6 thrild pierced.
7 imbrew soak or stain with blood.
8 Foreby near.
9 through the steele were cleft were split by the sword.

Whereas that Pagan proud him selfe did rest,
In secret shadow by a fountaine side:
Even he it was, that earst would have suppress
Faire Una: whom when Satyrane espide,
With fowle reprochfull words he boldly him defide.

41

And said, "Arise thou cursed Miscreaunt,
That hast with knightlesse guile and treacherous train
Faire knighthood fowly shamed, and doest vaunt
That good knight of the Redcrosse to have slain:
Arise, and with like treason now maintain
Thy guilty wrong, or else thee guilty yield."
The Sarazin this hearing, rose amain,
And catching up in hast his three square shield,[1]
And shining helmet, soone him buckled to the field.

42

And drawing nigh him said, "Ah misborne[2] Elfe,
In evill houre thy foes thee hither sent,
Anothers wrongs to wreake upon thy selfe:
Yet ill thou blamest me, for having blent
My name with guile and traiterous intent;
That Redcrosse knight, perdie,[3] I never slew,
But had he beene, where earst his armes were lent,
Th'enchaunter vaine his errour should not rew:
But thou his errour shalt, I hope now proven trew."

43

Therewith they gan, both furious and fell,
To thunder blowes, and fiersly to assaile
Each other bent his enimy to quell,
That with their force they perst both plate and maile,
And made wide furrowes in their fleshes fraile,
That it would pitty any living eie.
Large floods of bloud adowne their sides did raile;[4]
But floods of bloud could not them satisfie:
Both hungred after death: both chose to win, or die.

44

So long they fight, and fell revenge pursue,
That fainting each, themselves to breathen let,
And oft refreshed, battell oft renue:
As when two Bores with rancling malice met,
Their gory[5] sides fresh bleeding fiercely fret,
Til breathlesse both them selves aside retire,
Where foming wrath, their cruell tuskes they whet,[6]
And trample th'earth, the whiles they may respire;[7]
Then backe to fight againe, new breathed and entire.[8]

45

So fiersly, when these knights had breathed once,
They gan to fight returne, increasing more
Their puissant force, and cruell rage attonce,
With heaped strokes more hugely, then before,
That with their drerie[9] wounds and bloudy gore
They both deformed, scarsely could be known.
By this sad Una fraught with anguish sore,
Led with their noise, which through the aire was thrown,
Arriv'd, where they in erth their fruitles bloud had sown.

46

Whom all so soone as that proud Sarazin
Espide, he gan revive the memory
Of his lewd lusts, and late attempted sin,

---

1 three square shield shield with three equal sides (Variorum).
2 misborne base-born (i.e., of unlawful union).
3 perdie by God (i.e., indeed).
4 raile gush.
5 gory both gored and bloody.
6 whet sharpen.
7 respire breathe.
8 entire fresh.
9 drerie bloody, gory.

And left the doubtfull battell hastily,
To catch her, newly offred to his eie:
But Satyrane with strokes him turning, staid
And sternely bad him other businesse plie,[1]
Then hunt the steps of pure unspotted Maid:
Wherewith he all enrag'd, these bitter speaches said.

47

"O foolish faeries sonne, what furie mad
Hath thee incenst, to hast thy dolefull fate?
Were it not better, I that Lady had,
Then that thou hadst repented it too late?
Most sencelesse man he, that himselfe doth hate,
To love another. Lo then for thine ayd
Here take thy lovers token on thy pate."[2]
So they to fight; the whiles the royall Mayd
Fled farre away, of that proud Paynim sore afrayd.

48

But that false Pilgrim, which that leasing[3] told,
Being in deed old Archimage, did stay
In secret shadow, all this to behold,
And much rejoyced in their bloudy fray:
But when he saw the Damsell passe away
He left his stond, and her pursewd apace,[4]
In hope to bring her to her last decay.
But for to tell her lamentable cace,
And eke this battels end, will need another place.

Canto VII

The Redcrosse knight is captive made
By Gyaunt proud opprest,
Prince Arthur meets with Una greatly with those newes distress.

1

What man so wise, what earthly wit so ware,[5]
As to descry the crafty cunning traine,
By which deceipt doth maske in visour[6] faire,
And cast her colours dyed deepe in graine,
To seeme like Truth, whose shape she well can faine,
And fitting gestures to her purpose frame,
The guiltlesse man with guile to entertaine?
Great maistress of her art was that false Dame,
The false Duessa, cloked with Fidessaes name.

2

Who when returning from the drery Night,
She fownd not it that perilous house of Pryde,
Where she had left, the noble Redcrosse knight,
Her hoped pray, she would no lenger bide,
But forth she went, to seeke him far and wide.
Ere long she fownd, whereas he wearie sate,
To rest him selfe, foreby a fountaine side,
Disarmed all of yron-coted Plate,
And by his side his steed the grassy forage[7] ate.

3

He feedes upon the cooling shade, and bayes
His sweatie forehead in the breathing wind,
Which through the trembling leaves full gently playes
Wherein the cherefull birds of sundry kind
Do chaunt sweet musick, to delight his mind:
The Witch approching gan him fairely greet,
And with reproch of carelesnesse unkind

[1] plie practice, apply himself to.
[2] pate head.
[3] leasing lie, falsehood.
[4] apace at once.
[5] ware alert.
[6] visour outward appearance.
[7] forage fodder.

Upbrayd,[1] for leaving her in place unmeet,
With fowle words tempring faire, soure gall with hony sweet.

4

Unkindnesse past, they gan of solace[2] treat,[3]
And bathe in pleasaunce of the joyous shade,
Which shielded them against the boyling heat,
And with greene boughes decking a gloomy glade,
About the fountaine like a girlond made;
Whose bubbling wave did ever freshly well,
Ne ever would through fervent sommer fade:
The sacred Nymph,[4] which therein wont to dwell,
Was out of Dianes favour, as it then befell.

5

The cause was this: one day when Phœbe fayre
With all her band was following the chace,
This Nymph, quite tyr'd with heat of scorching ayre
Sat downe to rest in middest of the race:
The goddesse wroth gan fowly her disgrace,
And bad the waters, which from her did flow,
Be such as she her selfe was then in place.
Thenceforth her waters waxed dull and slow,
And all that drunke thereof, did faint and feeble grow.

6

Hereof this gentle knight unweeting was,
And lying downe upon the sandie graile,[5]
Drunke of the streame, as cleare as cristall glas;
Eftsoones his manly forces gan to faile,
And mightie strong was turnd to feeble fraile.
His chaunged powres at first them selves not felt,
Til crudled cold his corage gan assaile,
And chearefull bloud in faintnesse chill did melt,
Which like a fever fit through all his body swelt.[6]

7

Yet goodly court he made still to his Dame,
Pourd out in loosnesse on the grassy grownd,
Both carelesse of his health, and of his fame:
Till at the last he heard a dreadfull sownd,
Which through the wood loud bellowing, did rebownd,
That all the earth for terrour seemd to shake,[7]
And trees did tremble. Th'Elfe therewith astownd,
Upstarted lightly from his looser make,[8]
And his unready weapons gan in hand to take.

8

But ere he could his armour on him dight,
Or get his shield, his monstrous enemy
With sturdie[9] steps came stalking in his sight,
An hideous Geant horrible and hye,
That with his talnesse seemd to threat the skye,
The ground eke groned under him for dreed;
His living like saw never living eye,
Ne durst behold: his stature did exceed
The hight of three the tallest sonnes of mortall seed.

9

The greatest Earth his uncouth mother was,
And blustring Æolus[10] his boasted sire,
Who with his breath, which through the world doth pas,
Her hollow womb did secretly inspire,[11]

---

1 Upbrayd reprove, censure.

2 solace pleasure.

3 treat speak.

4 sacred Nymph Salmacis was a water nymph in Artemis' train who preferred to admire her own beauty, rather than engage in the hunt. Hermaphroditus, the lovely son of Hermes and Aphrodite and equally entranced by beauty, appeared by her pool and Salmacis fell passionately in love. As he attempted to flee, Salmacis wrapped her arms around him and begged that they never be separated. As the two tumbled into the water, their bodies became one and formed a figure simultaneously male and female (Ovid, Metamorphoses, Book 4).

5 graile gravel.

6 swelt burned.

7 all the earth for terrour seemd to shake See Revelation 6:12, 11:19, and 16:18 for the earthquakes that accompany the apocalypse.

8 make companion.

9 sturdie violent, furious.

10 Æolus god of the wind.

11 inspire blow into, breathe life into.

And fild her hidden caves with stormie yre,
That she conceiv'd; and trebling the dew time,
In which the wombes of women do expire,[1]
Brought forth this monstrous masse of earthly slime,
Puft up with emptie wind, and fild with sinfull crime.

10

So growen great through arrogant delight
Of th'high descent, whereof he was yborne,
And through presumption of his matchlesse might,
All other powres and knighthood he did scorne.
Such now he marcheth to this man forlorne,
And left to losse: his stalking steps are stayde[2]
Upon a snaggy[3] Oke, which he had torne
Out of his mothers bowelles, and it made
His mortall mace, wherewith his foemen he dismayde.

11

That when the knight he spide, he gan advance
With huge force and insupportable mayne,[4]
And towardes him with dreadfull fury praunce;
Who haplesse, and eke hopelesse, all in vaine
Did to him pace, sad battaile to darrayne,[5]
Disarmd, disgrast, and inwardly dismayde,
And eke so faint in every joynt and vaine,
Through that fraile fountaine, which him feeble made,
That scarsely could he weeld his bootlesse single blade.

12

The Geaunt strooke so maynly mercilesse,
That could have overthrowne a stony towre,
And were not heavenly grace, that him did blesse,
He had been pouldred[6] all, as thin as flowre:
But he was wary of that deadly stowre,[7]
And lightly lept from underneath the blow:
Yet so exceeding was the villeins powre,
That with the wind it did him overthrow,
And all his sences stound, that still he lay full low.

13

As when that divelish yron Engin[8] wrought
In deepest Hell, and framd by Furies skill,
With windy Nitre[9] and quick Sulphur[10] fraught,
And ramd with bullet round, ordaind to kill,
Conceiveth fire, the heavens it doth fill
With thundring noyse, and all the ayre doth choke,
That none can breath, nor see, nor heare at will,
Through smouldry cloud of duskish stincking smoke,
That th'onely breath him daunts, who hath escapt the stroke.

14

So daunted when the Geaunt saw the knight,
His heavie hand he heaved up on hye,
And him to dust thought to have battred quight,
Untill Duessa loud to him gan crye;
"O great Orgoglio,[11] greatest under skye,
O hold thy mortall hand for Ladies sake,
Hold for my sake, and do him not to dye,
But vanquisht thine eternall bondslave make,
And me thy worthy meed unto thy Leman[12] take."

15

He hearkned,[13] and did stay from further harmes,
To gayne so goodly guerdon,[14] as she spake:
So willingly she came into his armes,
Who her as willingly to grace did take,

---

1 expire come to an end (i.e., reach full term and give birth; also, exhale).
2 stayde supported, sustained.
3 snaggy knotty, jagged.
4 mayne force, power.
5 darrayne engage in.
6 pouldred powdered, pulverized.
7 stowre pole; also, assault.
8 yron Engin cannon.
9 Nitre saltpetre, a constituent of gunpowder.
10 quick Sulphur brimstone.
11 Orgoglio Italian, "pride."
12 Leman lover.
13 hearkned listened.
14 guerdon reward.

And was possessed of his new found make.[1]
Then up he tooke the slombred senceless corse,
And ere he could out of his swowne awake,
Him to his castle brought with hastie forse,
And in a Dongeon deepe him threw without remorse.

16

From that day forth Duessa was his deare,
And highly honourd in his haughtie eye,
He gave her gold and purple pall to weare,
And triple crowne set on her head full hye,
And her endowd with royall majestye:
Then for to make her dreaded more of men,
And peoples harts with awfull terrour tye,
A monstrous beast[2] ybred in filthy fen[3]
He chose, which he had kept long time in darksome den.

17

Such one it was, as that renowmed Snake
Which great Alcides[4] in Stremona slew,
Long fostred in the filth of Lerna lake,
Whose many heads out budding ever new,
Did breed him endlesse labour to subdew:
But this same Monster much more ugly was;
For seven great heads out of his body grew,
An yron brest, and backe of scaly bras,
And all embrewd in bloud, his eyes did shine as glas.

18

His tayle was stretched out in wondrous length,
That to the house of heavenly gods it raught,
And with extorted[5] powre, and borrow'd strength,
The ever-burning lamps from thence it brought,
And prowdly threw to ground, as things of nought;
And underneath his filthy feet did tread
The sacred things,[6] and holy heasts foretaught.
Upon this dreadfull Beast with sevenfold head[7]
He set the false Duessa, for more aw and dread.

19

The wofull Dwarfe, which saw his maisters fall,
Whiles he had keeping of his grasing steed,
And valiant knight become a caytive thrall,
When all was past, tooke up his forlorne weed,
His mightie armour, missing most at need;
His silver shield, now idle maisterlesse;
His poynant[8] speare, that many made to bleed,
The ruefull moniments of heavinesse,
And with them all departes, to tell his great distresse.

20

He had not travaild long, when on the way
He wofull Ladie, wofull Una met,
Fast flying from the Paynims greedy pray,
Whilest Satyrane him from pursuit did let:
Who when her eyes she on the Dwarfe had set,
And saw the signes, that deadly tydings spake,
She fell to ground for sorrowfull regret,
And lively breath her sad brest did forsake,
Yet might her pitteous hart be seene to pant and quake.

---

1 make mate.

2 gold and purple pall … triple crowne … monstrous beast allusion to Revelation 17:3-5: "And I saw a woman sitting on a scarlet beast which was full of blasphemous names, and it had seven heads and ten horns. The woman was arrayed in purple and scarlet, and bedecked with gold and jewels and pearls, holding in her hand a golden cup full of abominations and the impurities of her fornication; and on her forehead was written a name of mystery: 'Babylon the great mother of harlots and of earth's abominations.'"

3 fen marsh.

4 Alcides Heracles or Hercules, whose second labour was the slaying of the Hydra of Lerna, a multi-headed water-serpent with the body of a hound (OCD).

5 extorted wrongfully obtained.

6 underneath … sacred things allusion to Daniel 7:23: "Thus he said: 'As for the fourth beast, there shall be a fourth kingdom on the earth, which shall be different from all the kingdoms, and it shall devour the whole earth, and trample it down, and break it to pieces.'" See also Daniel 8:10: "It grew great, even to the host of heaven; and some of the host of the stars it cast down to the ground and trampled upon them."

7 Beast with sevenfold head See Revelation 17:3.

8 poynant sharp-pointed.

21

The messenger of so unhappie newes
Would faine have dyde: dead was his hart within,
Yet outwardly some little comfort shewes:
At last recovering hart, he does begin
To rub her temples, and to chaufe[1] her chin,
And every tender part does tosse and turne:
So hardly he the flitted[2] life does win,
Unto her native prison to retourne:
Then gins her grieved ghost thus to lament and mourne.

22

"Ye dreary instruments of dolefull sight,
That doe this deadly spectacle behold,
Why do ye lenger feed on loathed light,
Or liking find to gaze on earthly mould,
Sith cruell fates the carefull threeds unfould,
The which my life and love together tyde?
Now let the stony dart of senselesse cold
Perce to my hart, and pas through every side,
And let eternall night so sad sight fro me hide.

23

O lightsome day, the lampe of highest Ioue,
First made by him,[3] mens wandring wayes to guyde,
When darknesse he in deepest dongeon drove,
Henceforth thy hated face for ever hyde,
And shut up heavens windowes shyning wyde:
For earthly sight can nought but sorrow breed,
And late repentance, which shall long abyde.
Mine eyes no more on vanitie shall feed,
But seeled up with death, shall have their deadly meed."

24

Then downe againe she fell unto the ground;
But he her quickly reared up againe:
Thrise did she sinke adowne in deadly swownd,
And thrise he her reviv'd with busie paine:
At last when life recover'd had the raine,
And over-wrestled his strong enemie,
With foltring[4] tong, and trembling every vaine,
"Tell on," quoth she, "the wofull Tragedie,
The which these reliques sad present unto mine eie.

25

Tempestuous fortune hath spent all her spight,
And thrilling sorrow throwne his utmost dart;
The sad tongue cannot tell more heavy plight,
Then that I feele, and harbour in mine hart:
Who hath endur'd the whole, can beare each part.
If death it be, it is not the first wound,
That launched hath my brest with bleeding smart.
Begin, and end the bitter balefull stound;[5]
If lesse, then that I feare, more favour I have found."

26

Then gan the Dwarfe the whole discourse declare,
The subtill traines of Archimago old;
The wanton loves of false Fidessa faire,
Bought with the bloud of vanquisht Paynim bold:
The wretched payre transform'd to treen mould;[6]
The house of Pride, and perils round about;
The combat, which he with Sans joy did hould;
The lucklesse conflict with the Gyant stout,
Wherein captiv'd, of life or death he stood in doubt.

27

She heard with patience all unto the end,
And strove to maister sorrowfull assay,
Which greater grew, the more she did contend,
And almost rent her tender hart in tway;
And love fresh coles unto her fire did lay:

---

[1] chaufe chafe.

[2] flitted slipping away.

[3] O lightsome day … First made by him i.e., God in Genesis 1:3-4.

[4] foltring faltering.

[5] stound time.

[6] treen mould the shape of trees.

For greater love, the greater is the losse.
Was never Ladie loved dearer day,
Then she did love the knight of the Redcrosse;
For whose deare sake so many troubles her did tosse.

28

At last when fervent sorrow slaked was,
She up arose, resolving him to find
A live or dead: and forward forth doth pas,
All as the Dwarfe the way to her assynd:
And evermore in constant carefull mind
She fed her wound with fresh renewed bale;
Long tost with stormes, and bet with bitter wind,
High over hils, and low adowne the dale,
She wandred many a wood, and measurd many a vale.

29

At last she chaunced by good hap to meet
A goodly knight, faire marching by the way
Together with his Squire, arayed meet:
His glitterand armour shined farre away,
Like glauncing light of Phœbus brightest ray;
From top to toe no place appeared bare,
That deadly dint of steele endanger may:
Athwart[1] his brest a bauldrick[2] brave he ware,
That shynd, like twinkling stars, with stons most pretious rare.

30

And in the midst thereof one pretious stone
Of wondrous worth, and eke of wondrous mights,
Shapt like a Ladies head, exceeding shone,
Like Hesperus emongst the lesser lights,
And strove for to amaze the weaker sights;
Thereby his mortall blade full comely[3] hong
In yvory sheath, ycarv'd with curious slights;
Whose hilts were burnisht gold, and handle strong
Of mother pearle, and buckled with a golden tong.

31

His haughtie[4] helmet, horrid[5] all with gold,
Both glorious brightnesse, and great terrour bred;
For all the crest a Dragon[6] did enfold
With greedie pawes, and over all did spred
His golden wings: his dreadfull hideous hed
Close couched[7] on the bever,[8] seem'd to throw
From flaming mouth bright sparkles fierie red,
That suddeine horror to faint harts did show;
And scaly tayle was stretcht adowne his backe full low.

32

Upon the top of all his loftie crest,
A bunch of haires discolourd diversly,[9]
With sprincled pearle, and gold full richly drest,
Did shake, and seem'd to daunce for jollity,
Like to an Almond tree[10] ymounted hye
On top of greene Selinis[11] all alone,
With blossomes brave bedecked daintily;
Whose tender locks do tremble every one
At every little breath, that under heaven is blowne.

33

His warlike shield all closely cover'd was,
Ne might of mortall eye be ever seene;
Not made of steele, nor of enduring bras,
Such earthly mettals soone consumed bene:
But all of Diamond[12] perfect pure and cleene

---

1 Athwart across.
2 bauldrick a belt worn to support a sword.
3 comely properly.
4 haughtie high.
5 horrid bristling.
6 Dragon referring to Arthur's father, Uther Pendragon.
7 couched a heraldic term meaning "lying down."
8 bever lower portion of the face-guard of a helmet.
9 discolourd diversly See the description of Redcrosse above at I.ii.11.6.
10 Almond tree allusion to Numbers 17:8: "And on the morrow Moses went into the tent of the testimony; and behold, the rod of Aaron for the house of Levi had sprouted and put forth buds, and produced blossoms, and it bore ripe almonds."
11 Selinis Selinus, a city on the SW coast of Sicily.
12 Diamond Renaissance lapidaries associated it with invincibility and magical power. Thus, Arthur's shield cannot be pierced or broken, reveals falsity, and repels pagan horses and soldiers. Its light also overcomes Duessa and Orgoglio (Spenser Encycl., p. 673c).

It framed was, one massive entire mould,
Hewen out of Adamant[1] rocke with engines keene,
That pointe of speare it never percen could,
Ne dint of direfull sword divide the substance would.

34

The same to wight he never wont disclose,
But when as monsters huge he would dismay,
Or daunt unequall armies of his foes,
Or when the flying heavens he would affray;
For so exceeding shone his glistring ray,
That Phœbus golden face it did attaint,
As when a cloud his beames doth over-lay;
And silver Cynthia wexed pale and faint,
As when her face is staynd with magicke arts constraint.

35

No magicke arts hereof had any might,
Nor bloudie wordes of bold Enchaunters call,
But all that was not such, as seemd in sight,
Before that shield did fade, and suddeine fall:
And when him list the raskall routes appall,[2]
Men into stones therewith he could transmew,[3]
And stones to dust, and dust to nought at all;
And when him list the prouder lookes subdew,
He would them gazing blind, or turne to other hew.

36

Ne let it seeme, that credence this exceedes,
For he that made the same, was knowne right well
To have done much more admirable deedes.
It Merlin[4] was, which whylome did excell
All living wightes in might of magicke spell:
Both shield, and sword, and armour all he wrought
For this young Prince, when first to armes he fell:
But when he dyde, the Faerie Queene it brought
To Faerie lond, where yet it may be seene, if sought.

37

A gentle youth, his dearely loved Squire
His speare of heben wood[5] behind him bare,
Whose harmefull head, thrice heated in the fire,
Had riven many a brest with pikehead[6] square;
A goodly person, and could menage[7] faire
His stubborne steed with curbed canon bit,[8]
Who under him did trample as the aire,
And chauft, that any on his backe should sit;
The yron rowels[9] into frothy fome he bit.

38

When as this knight nigh to the Ladie drew,
With lovely court he gan her entertaine;
But when he heard her answeres loth, he knew
Some secret sorrow did her heart distraine:[10]
Which to allay, and calme her storming paine,
Faire feeling words he wisely gan display,
And for her humour fitting purpose faine,
To tempt the cause it selfe for to bewray;[11]
Wherewith emmov'd, these bleeding words she gan to say.

39

"What worlds delight, or joy of living speech
Can heart, so plung'd in sea of sorrowes deepe,
And heaped with so huge misfortunes, reach?
The carefull cold beginneth for to creepe,
And in my heart his yron arrow steepe,
Soone as I thinke upon my bitter bale:
Such helplesse harmes yts better hidden keepe,

---

1 Adamant rock in which diamond is found.
2 raskall routes appall quell rabble mobs.
3 transmew convert.
4 Merlin the magician who makes Arthur's arms and armour, not in this case his tutor or teacher (Spenser Encycl., p. 470c).
5 heben wood ebony, known to be extremely hard.
6 pikehead metal tip of a spear.
7 menage handle.
8 curbed canon bit smooth round bit fastened at the ends with a chain (Hamilton).
9 rowels knobs on the bit.
10 distraine oppress, tear apart.
11 bewray divulge, reveal.

Then rip up griefe, where it may not availe,
My last comfort is, my woes to weepe and waile."

40

"Ah Ladie deare," quoth then the gentle knight,
"Well may I weene, your griefe is wondrous great;
For wondrous great griefe groneth in my spright,
Whiles this I heare you of your sorrowes treat.
But wofull Ladie let me you intrete,[1]
For to unfold the anguish of your hart:
Mishaps are maistred by advice discrete,
And counsell mittigates[2] the greatest smart;
Found never helpe, who never would his hurts impart."

41

"O but," quoth she, "great griefe will not be tould,
And can more easily be thought, then said."
"Right so," quoth he, "but he, that never would,
Could never: will to might gives greatest aid."
"But griefe," quoth she, "does greater grow displaid,
If then it find not helpe, and breedes despaire."
"Despaire breedes not," quoth he, "where faith is staid."
"No faith so fast," quoth she, "but flesh does paire."
"Flesh may empaire," quoth he, "but reason can repaire."[3]

42

His goodly reason, and well guided speech
So deepe did settle in her gratious thought,
That her perswaded to disclose the breach,[4]
Which love and fortune in her heart had wrought
And said; "Faire Sir, I hope good hap hath brought
You to inquire the secrets of my griefe,
Or that your wisedome will direct my thought,
Or that your prowesse can me yield reliefe:
Then heare the storie sad, which I shall tell you briefe.

43

The forlorne Maiden, whom your eyes have seene
The laughing stocke of fortunes mockeries,
Am th'only daughter of a King and Queene,
Whose parents deare, whilest equall destinies
Did runne about, and their felicities
The favourable heavens did not envy,
Did spread their rule through all the territories,
Which Phison and Euphrates floweth by,
And Gehons[5] golden waves doe wash continually.

44

Till that their cruell cursed enemy,
An huge great Dragon horrible in sight,
Bred in the loathly lakes of Tartary,[6]
With murdrous ravine, and devouring might
Their kingdome spoild, and countrey wasted quight:
Themselves, for feare into his jawes to fall,
He forst to castle strong to take their flight,
Where fast embard in mightie brasen wall,
He has them now foure yeres besiegd to make them thrall.

45

Full many knights adventurous and stout
Have enterprizd that Monster to subdew;
From every coast that heaven walks about,
Have thither come the noble Martiall crew,
That famous hard atchievements still pursew,
Yet never any could that girlond win,
But all still shronke, and still he greater grew:
All they for want of faith, or guilt of sin,
The pitteous pray of his fierce crueltie have bin.

---

1 intrete entreat.

2 mittigates alleviates.

3 paire … empaire … repaire Wordplay shows the psychology of despair and recovery. The flesh undermines faith (pair, empaire), but it can be remedied (repaired) through its opposite, reason, which is not just intellectual but also spiritual.

4 breach injury.

5 Phison … Euphrates … Gehon three of the rivers in Eden, indicating that Una's parents are Adam and Eve.

6 Tartary the Greek hell (Dict. Gods and Mortals).

46

At last yledd with farre reported praise,
Which flying fame throughout the world had spred,
Of doughtie knights, whom Faery land did raise,
That noble order hight of Maidenhed,
Forthwith to court of Gloriane I sped,
Of Gloriane great Queene of glory bright,
Whose kingdomes seat Cleopolis[1] is red,
There to obtaine some such redoubted knight,
That Parents deare from tyrants powre deliver might.

47

It was my chance (my chance was faire and good)
There for to find a fresh unproved knight
Whose manly hands imbrew'd[2] in guiltie blood
Had never bene, ne ever by his might
Had throwne to ground the unregarded right:
Yet of his prowesse proofe he since hath made
(I witnesse am) in many a cruell fight;
The groning ghosts of many one dismaide
Have felt the bitter dint of his avenging blade.

48

And ye the forlorne[3] reliques of his powre,
His byting sword, and his devouring speare,
Which have endured many a dreadfull stowre,
Can speake his prowesse, that did earst you beare,
And well could rule: now he hath left you heare,
To be the record of his ruefull losse,
And of my dolefull disaventurous[4] deare:
O heavie record of the good Redcrosse,
Where have you left your Lord, that could so well you tosse?

49

Well hoped I, and faire beginnings had,
That he my captive languor[5] should redeeme,
Till all unweeting, and Enchaunter bad
His sence abusd, and made him to misdeeme[6]
My loyalty, not such as it did seeme;
That rather death desire, then such despight.
Be judge ye heavens, that all things right esteeme,
How I him lov'd, and love with all my might,
So thought I eke of him, and thinke I thought aright.

50

Thenceforth me desolate he quite forsooke,
To wander, where wilde fortune would me lead,
And other bywaies he himselfe betooke,
Where never foot of living wight did tread,
That brought not backe the balefull body dead;
In which him chaunced false Duessa meete,
Mine onely foe, mine onely deadly dread,
Who with her witchcraft and misseeming sweete,
Inveigled[7] him to follow her desires unmeete.

51

At last by subtill sleights she him betraid
Unto his foe, a Gyant huge and tall,
Who him disarmed, dissolute,[8] dismaid,[9]
Unwares surprised, and with mightie mall[10]
The monster mercilesse him made to fall,
Whose fall did never foe before behold;
And now in darkesome dungeon, wretched thrall,
Remedilesse, for aie he doth him hold;
This is my cause of griefe, more great, then may be told."

52

Ere she had ended all, she gan to faint:
But he her comforted and faire bespake,
"Certes, Madame, ye have great cause of plaint,

---

1 Cleopolis Greek, meaning "City of fame"; the capital of Fairyland where Gloriana resides (Spenser Encycl., pp. 168c-169a).

2 imbrew'd stained.

3 forlorne abandoned.

4 disadventurous unfortunate.

5 languor distress.

6 misdeeme misjudge, mistake.

7 Inveigled enticed, beguiled.

8 dissolute infeebled, weakened.

9 dismaid faint-hearted, also "un-made" (i.e., undone).

10 mall club.

That stoutest heart, I weene, could cause to quake.
But be of cheare, and comfort to you take:
For till I have acquit[1] your captive knight,
Assure your selfe, I will not you forsake."
His chearefull words reviv'd her chearelesse spright,
So forth they went, the Dwarfe them guiding ever right.

Canto VIII

Faire virgin to redeeme[2] her deare brings Arthur to the fight:
Who slayes the Gyant, wounds the beast,
and strips Duessa quight.

1

Ay me, how many perils doe enfold
The righteous man, to make him daily fall?[3]
Were not, that heavenly grace[4] doth him uphold,
And stedfast truth[5] acquite[6] him out of all.
Her love is firme, her care continuall,
So oft as he through his owne foolish pride,
Or weaknesse is to sinfull bands[7] made thrall:
Else should this Redcrosse knight in bands have dyde,
For whose deliverance she this Prince doth thither guide.

2

They sadly traveild thus, untill they came
Nigh to a castle builded strong and hie:
Then cryde the Dwarfe, "lo yonder is the same,
In which my Lord my liege doth lucklesse lie,
Thrall to that Gyants hatefull tyrannie:
Therefore, deare Sir, your mightie powres assay."
The noble knight alighted by and by
From loftie steed, and bad the Ladie stay,
To see what end of fight should him befall that day.

3

So with the Squire, th'admirer of his might,
He marched forth towards that castle wall;
Whose gates he found fast shut, ne living wight
To ward the same, nor answere commers call.
Then tooke that Squire an horne of bugle small,[8]
Which hong adowne his side in twisted gold,
And tassels gay. Wyde wonders over all
Of that same hornes great vertues weren told,
Which had approved bene in uses manifold.[9]

4

Was never wight, that heard that shrilling sound,
But trembling feare did feele in every vaine;
Three miles[10] it might be easie heard around,
And Ecchoes three answerd it selfe againe:
No false enchauntment, nor deceiptfull traine
Might once abide the terror of that blast,
But presently was voide and wholly vaine:
No gate so strong, no locke so firme and fast,
But with that percing noise flew open quite, or brast.[11]

5

The same before the Geants gate he blew,
That all the castle quaked from the ground,
And every dore of freewill open flew.
The Gyant selfe dismaied with that sownd,
Where he with his Duessa dalliance fownd,

---

[1] acquit delivered.

[2] redeeme save or rescue; also in a religious sense, "to deliver from sin."

[3] perils … daily fall In a fallen world, sin is inevitable, but can be redeemed by grace.

[4] heavenly grace both Arthur and divine grace.

[5] stedfast truth Una.

[6] acquite absolve of blame. See John 8:32: "And you will know the truth, and the truth will make you free."

[7] sinfull bands bondage to sin.

[8] horne of bugle small small hunting-horn, originally made of the horn of a "bugle" or wild ox.

[9] manifold varied, many.

[10] Three miles A number of Biblical horns are heard over great distances: the horn of salvation (Luke 1:69); the horn that brings down the walls of Jericho (Joshua 6:3-20); the trumpets of the apocalypse (Revelation 8:2, 6-13).

[11] brast burst.

In hast came rushing forth from inner bowre,
With staring countenance sterne, as one astownd,
And staggering steps, to weet, what suddein stowre
Had wrought that horror strange, and dar'd his dreaded powre.

6

And after him the proud Duessa came,
High mounted on her manyheaded beast,
And every head with fyrie tongue did flame,
And every head was crowned on his creast,
And bloudie mouthed with late cruell feast.
That when the knight beheld, his mightie shild
Upon his manly arme he soone addrest,
And at him fiercely flew, with courage fild,
And eger greedinesse through every member thrild.

7

Therewith the Gyant buckled him to fight,
Inflam'd with scornefull wrath and high disdaine,
And lifting up his dreadfull club on hight,
All arm'd with ragged snubbes[1] and knottie graine,
Him thought at first encounter to have slaine.
But wise and warie was that noble Pere,
And lightly leaping from so monstrous maine,[2]
Did faire avoide the violence him nere;
It booted nought, to thinke, such thunderbolts to beare.

8

Ne shame he thought to shunne so hideous might:
The idle stroke, enforcing furious way,
Missing the marke of his misaymed sight
Did fall to ground, and with his heavie sway
So deepely dinted in the driven clay,
That three yardes deepe a furrow up did throw:
The sad earth wounded with so sore assay,[3]
Did grone full grievous underneath the blow,
And trembling with strange feare, did like an earthquake show.

9

As when almightie Ioue in wrathfull mood,
To wreake the guilt of mortall sins is bent,
Hurles forth his thundring dart with deadly food,[4]
Enrold in flames, and smouldring[5] dreriment,[6]
Through riven cloudes and molten firmament;[7]
The fierce threeforked engin[8] making way,
Both loftie towres and highest trees hath rent,
And all that might his angrie passage stay,
And shooting in the earth, casts up a mount of clay.

10

His boystrous[9] club, so buried in the ground,
He could not rearen up againe so light,
But that the knight him at avantage found,
And whiles he strove his combred clubbe to quight
Out of the earth, with blade all burning bright
He smote off his left arme, which like a blocke
Did fall to ground, depriv'd of native might;
Large streames of bloud out of the truncked[10] stocke
Forth gushed, like fresh water streame from riven rocke.[11]

11

Dismaied with so desperate deadly wound,
And eke impatient of unwonted paine,
He loudly brayd with beastly yelling sound,

---

1 snubbes snag or stub.
2 maine force, power.
3 assay attack, assault.
4 food feud (i.e., hostility).
5 smouldring smothering, suffocating.
6 dreriment gloom or darkness (Hamilton).
7 firmament sky.
8 threeforked engin machine or instrument used in warfare; from what follows, apparently a battering ram.
9 boystrous massive.
10 truncked truncated.
11 fresh water … riven rocke allusion to Numbers 20:11: "And Moses lifted up his hand and struck the rock with his rod twice; and water came forth abundantly, and the congregation drank, and their cattle."

That all the fields rebellowed againe;
As great a noyse, as when in Cymbrian plaine[1]
An heard of Bulles, whom kindly rage doth sting,
Do for the milkie mothers want complaine,
And fill the fields with troublous bellowing,
The neighbour woods around with hollow murmur ring.

12

That when his deare Duessa heard, and saw
The evill stownd,[2] that daungerd her estate,
Unto his aide she hastily did draw
Her dreadfull beast, who swolne with bloud of late
Came ramping forth with proud presumpteous gate,
And threatned all his heads like flaming brands.
But him the Squire made quickly to retrate,
Encountring fierce with single sword in hand,
And twixt him and his Lord did like a bulwarke stand.

13

The proud Duessa full of wrathfull spight,
And fierce disdaine, to be affronted so,
Enforst her purple beast with all her might
That stop out of the way to overthroe,
Scorning the let of so unequall foe:
But nathemore[3] would that courageous Swayne
To her yeeld passage, gainst his Lord to goe,
But with outrageous[4] strokes did him restraine,
And with his bodie the bard the way atwixt them twaine.

14

Then tooke the angrie witch her golden cup,[5]
Which still she bore, replete with magick artes;
Death and despeyre did many thereof sup,
And secret poyson through their inner parts,
Th'eternall bale[6] of heavie wounded harts;
Which after charmes and some enchauntments said,
She lightly sprinkled on his weaker parts;
Therewith his sturdie courage soone was quayd,[7]
And all his senses were with suddeine dread dismayd.

15

So downe he fell before the cruell beast,
Who on his necke his bloudie clawes did seize,
That life nigh crusht out of his panting brest:
No powre he had to stirre, nor will to rize.
That when the carefull knight gan well avize,[8]
He lightly left the foe, with whom he fought,
And to the beast gan turne his enterprise;
For wondrous anguish in his hart it wrought,
To see his loved Squire into such thraldome[9] brought.

16

And high advauncing his bloud-thirstie blade,
Stroke one of those deformed heads so sore,
That of his puissance proud ensample made;
His monstrous scalpe downe to his teeth it tore,
And that misformed shape mis-shaped more:
A sea of bloud gusht from the gaping wound,
That her gay garments staynd with filthy gore,
And overflowed all the field around;
That over shoes in bloud he waded on the ground.

17

Thereat he roared for exceeding paine,
That to have heard, great horror would have bred,
And scourging[10] th'emptie ayre with his long traine,

---

1 Cymbrian plaine Jutland, the NW peninsula of Denmark, formerly known as Cimbria.

2 stownd time of trial.

3 nathemore never the more.

4 outrageous violent, furious.

5 golden cup allusion to the whore of Babylon in Revelation 17:3: "holding in her hand a golden cup full of abominations and the impurityies of her fornications."

6 bale torment.

7 quayd subdued.

8 avize observe.

9 thraldome bondage, captivity.

10 scourging whipping, flailing.

Through great impatience of his grieved hed,
His gorgeous ryder from her loftie sted
Would have cast downe, and trod in durtie myre,
Had not the Gyant soone her succourd;
Who all enrag'd with smart and franticke yre,
Came hurtling in full fierce, and forst the knight retyre.

18

The force, which wont in two to be disperst,
In one alone left hand he now unites,
Which is through rage more strong then both were erst;
With which his hideous club aloft he dites,[1]
And at his foe with furious rigour smites,
That strongest Oake might seeme to overthrow:
The stroke upon his shield so heavie lites,
That to the ground it doubleth him full low:
What mortall wight could ever beare so monstrous blow?

19

And in his fall his shield, that covered was,
Did loose his vele[2] by chaunce, and open flew:
The light whereof, that heavens light did pas,
Such blazing brightnesse through the aier threw,
That eye mote not the same endure to vew.
Which when the Gyaunt spyde with staring eye,
He downe let fall his arme, and soft withdrew
His weapon huge, that heaved was on hye
For to have slaine the man, that on the ground did lye.

20

And eke the fruitfull-headed[3] beast, amaz'd
At flashing beames of that sunshiny shield,
Became starke blind, and all his senses daz'd,
That downe he tumbled on the durtie field,
And seem'd himselfe as conquered to yield.
Whom when his maistresse proud perceiv'd to fall,
Whiles yet his feeble feet for faintnesse reeld,
Unto the Gyant loudly she gan call,
"O helpe Orgoglio, helpe, or else we perish all."

21

At her so pitteous cry was much amoov'd
Her champion stout, and for to ayde his frend,
Againe his wonted angry weapon proov'd:
But all in vaine: for he has read his end
In that bright shield, and all their forces spend
Themselves in vaine: for since that glauncing sight,
He hath no powre to hurt, nor to defend;
As where th'Almighties lightning brond[4] does light,
It dimmes the dazed eyen, and daunts the senses quight.

22

Whom when the Prince, to battell new addrest,
And threatning high his dreadfull stroke did see,
His sparkling blade about his head he blest,
And smote off quite his right leg by the knee,
That downe he tombled; as an aged tree,[5]
High growing on the top of rocky clift,
Whose hartstrings with keene steele nigh hewen[6] be,
The mightie trunck halfe rent, with ragged rift
Doth roll adowne the rocks, and fall with fearefull drift.[7]

23

Or as a Castle reared high and round,
By subtile engins and malitious slight
Is undermined from the lowest ground,
And her foundation forst, and feebled quight,
At last downe falles, and with her heaped hight
Her hastie ruine does; more heavie make,
And yields it selfe unto the victours might;

---

1 dites lifts, raises.

2 vele covering, veil.

3 fruitfull-headed abundantly headed (i.e., multi-headed).

4 lightning brond lightening bolt.

5 as an aged tree See Aeneid, Book 2, in which the fall of Troy is compared to the felling of a tree (Hamilton).

6 hewen cut.

7 drift impetus.

Such was this Gyaunts fall, that seemd to shake
The stedfast globe of earth, as it for feare did quake.

24

The knight then lightly leaping to the pray,
With mortall steele him smot againe so sore,
That headlesse his unweldy bodie lay,
All wallowd in his owne fowle bloudy gore,
Which flowed from his wounds in wondrous store.
But soone as breath out of his breast did pas,
That huge great body, which the Gyaunt bore,
Was vanisht quite, and of that monstrous mas
Was nothing left, but like an emptie bladder was.

25

Whose grievous fall, when false Duessa spide,
Her golden cup she cast unto the ground,
And crowned mitre rudely threw aside;
Such percing griefe her stubborne hart did wound,
That she could not endure that dolefull stound,
But leaving all behind her, fled away:
The light-foot Squire her quickly turnd around,
And by hard meanes enforcing her to stay,
So brought unto his Lord, as his deserved pray.

26

The royall Virgin, which beheld from farre,
In pensive plight,[1] and sad perplexitie,[2]
The whole atchievement of this doubtfull warre,
Came running fast to greet his victorie,
With sober gladnesse, and myld[3] modestie,
And with sweet joyous cheare him thus bespake;
"Faire braunch of noblesse, flowre of chevalrie,
That with your worth the world amazed make,
How shall I quite the paines, ye suffer for my sake?

27

And you fresh bud of vertue springing fast,
Whom these sad eyes saw nigh unto deaths dore,
What hath poore Virgin for such perill past,
Wherewith you to reward? Accept therefore
My simple selfe, and service evermore;
And he that high does sit, and all things see
With equall[4] eyes, their merites to restore,
Behold what ye this day have done for mee,
And what I cannot quite, requite with usuree.

28

But sith the heavens, and your faire hándeling
Have made you maister of the field this day,
Your fortune maister eke with governing,
And well begun end all so well, I pray,
Ne let that wicked woman scape away;
For she it is, that did my Lord bethrall,
My dearest Lord, and deepe in dongeon lay,
Where he his better dayes hath wasted all.
O heare, how piteous he to you for ayd does call."

29

Forthwith he gave in charge unto his Squire,
That scarlot whore[5] to keepen carefully;
Whiles he himselfe with greedie great desire
Into the Castle entred forcibly,
Where living creature none he did espye;
Then gan he lowdly through the house to call:
But no man car'd to answere to his crye.
There raignd a solemne silence over all,
Nor voice was heard, nor wight was seene in bowre[6] or hall.

30

At last with creeping crooked pace forth came
An old old man, with beard as white as snow,
That on a staffe his feeble steps did frame,

[1] pensive plight anxious state.
[2] perplexitie distress.
[3] myld gracious.
[4] equall impartial, just.
[5] scarlot whore Duessa is again compared to the whore of Babylon (Revelation 17:4-5).
[6] bowre chamber.

And guide his wearie gate[1] both too and fro:
For his eye sight him failed long ygo,
And on his arme a bounch of keyes[2] he bore,
The which unused rust did overgrow:
Those were the keyes of every inner dore,
But he could not them use, but kept them still in store.

31

But very uncouth sight was to behold,
How he did fashion his untoward[3] pace,
For as he forward moov'd his footing old,
So backward still was turnd his wrincled face,
Unlike to men, who ever as they trace,
Both feet and face one way are wont to lead.
This was the auncient keeper of that place,
And foster father of the Gyant dead;
His name Ignaro[4] did his nature right aread.

32

His reverend haires and holy gravitie
The knight much honord, as beseemed well,
And gently askt, where all the people bee,
Which in that stately building wont to dwell.
Who answerd him full soft, he could not tell.
Againe he askt, where that same knight was layd,
Whom great Orgoglio with his puissaunce fell
Had made his caytive thrall; againe he sayde,
He could not tell: ne ever other answere made.

33

Then asked he, which way he in might pas:
He could not tell, againe he answered.
Thereat the curteous knight displeased was,
And said, "Old sire, it seemes thou hast not red[5]
How ill it sits with that same silver hed
In vaine to mocke, or mockt in vaine to bee:
But if thou be, as thou art pourtrahed
With natures pen, in ages grave degree,
Aread in graver wise, what I demaund of thee."

34

His answere likewise was, he could not tell.
Whose senceless speach, and doted[6] ignorance
When as the noble Prince had marked well,
He ghest his nature by his countenance,
And calmd his wrath with goodly temperance.
Then to him stepping, from his arme did reach
Those keyes, and made himselfe free enterance.
Each dore he opened without any breach;
There was no barre to stop, nor foe him to empeach.[7]

35

There all within full rich arayd he found,
With royall arras and resplendent gold.
And did with store of every thing abound,
That greatest Princes presence might behold.
But all the floore (too filthy to be told)
With bloud of guiltlesse babes, and innocents trew,
Which there were slaine, as sheepe out of the fold,
Defiled was, that dreadfull was to vew,
And sacred ashes over it was strowed new.

36

And there beside of marble stone was built
An Altare, carv'd with cunning imagery,
On which true Christians bloud was often spilt,
And holy Martyrs often doen to dye,
With cruell malice and strong tyranny:
Whose blessed sprites from underneath the stone
To God for vengeance cryde continually,

---

1 gate gait.

2 keyes allusion to Revelation 9:1-2: "And the fifth angel blew his trumpet, and I saw a star fallen from heaven to earth, and he was given the key of the shaft of the bottomless pit; he opened the shaft of the bottomless pit, and from the shaft rose smoke like the smoke of a great furnace, and the sun and the air were darkened with the smoke from the shaft." See also Revelation 20:1: "Then I saw an angel coming down from heaven, holding in his hand the key of the bottomless pit and a great chain."

3 untoward awkward, clumsy.

4 Ignaro meaning, "ignorance"; his backward look alludes to Isaiah 44:25, where God "turns wise men back, and makes their knowledge foolish."

5 red discerned, understood.

6 doted stupid.

7 empeach hinder.

And with great griefe were often heard to grone,[1]
That hardest heart would bleede, to heare their piteous mone.

37

Through every rowme he sought, and every bowr,
But no where could he find that wofull thrall:
At last he came unto an yron doore,
That fast was lockt, but key found not at all
Emongst that bounch, to open it withall;
But in the same a little grate was pight,[2]
Through which he sent his voyce, and lowd did call
With all his powre, to weet, if living wight
Were housed therewithin, whom he enlargen[3] might.

38

Therewith an hollow, dreary, murmuring voyce
These piteous plaints and dolours[4] did resound;
"O who is that, which brings me happy choice
Of death, that here lye dying every stound,
Yet live perforce[5] in balefull darkenesse bound?
For now three Moones have changed thrice[6] their hew,
And have beene thrice hid underneath the ground,
Since I the heavens chearefull face did vew,
O welcome thou, that doest of death bring tidings trew."

39

Which when that Champion heard, with percing point
Of pitty deare his hart was thrilled sore,
And trembling horrour ran through every joynt,
For ruth of gentle knight so fowle forlore:
Which shaking off, he rent that yron dore,
With furious force, and indignation fell;
Where entred in, his foot could find no flore,
But all a deepe descent, as darke as hell,
That breathed ever forth a filthie banefull smell.

40

But neither darkenesse fowle, nor filthy bands,
Nor noyous smell his purpose could withhold,
(Entire affection hateth nicer hands)
But that with constant zeale, and courage bold,
After long paines and labours manifold,
He found the meanes that Prisoner up to reare;
Whose feeble thighes, unhable to uphold
His pined[7] corse, him scarse to light could beare,
A ruefull spectacle of death and ghastly drere.

41

His sad dull eyes deepe sunck in hollow pits,
Could not endure th'unwonted sunne to view;
His bare thin cheekes for want of better bits,[8]
And empty sides deceived of their dew,
Could make a stony hart his hap to rew;
His rawbone armes, whose mighty brawned bowrs[9]
Were wont to rive steele plates, and helmets hew,
Were cleane consum'd, and all his vitall powres
Decayd, and all his flesh shronk up like withered flowres.

42

Whom when his Lady saw, to him she ran
With hasty joy: to see him made her glad,
And sad to view his visage pale and wan,

---

1 Altare … heard to grone See Revelation 6:9-10: "I saw under the altar the souls of those who had been slain for the word of God and for the witness they had borne; they cried out with a loud voice, 'O Sovereign Lord, holy and true, how long before thou wilt judge and avenge our blood on those who dwell upon the earth?'"

2 pight placed.

3 enlargen release, free.

4 dolours lamentations.

5 perforce by necessity.

6 three Moones … thrice i.e., nine months or the period of human gestation.

7 pined wasted, exhausted.

8 better bits proper bites of food.

9 bowrs muscles.

Who earst in flowres of freshest youth was clad.
Tho when her well of teares she wasted had,
She said, "Ah dearest Lord, what evill starre
On you hath fround, and pourd his influence bad,
That of your selfe ye thus berobbed arre,
And this misseeming hew your manly looks doth marre?

43

But welcome now my Lord, in wele[1] or woe,
Whose presence I have lackt too long a day;
And fie on Fortune mine avowed foe,
Whose wrathfull wreakes them selves do now alay.
And for these wrongs shall treble penaunce pay
Of treble good: good growes of evils priefe."[2]
The chearelesse man, whom sorrow did dismay,
Had no delight to treaten of his griefe;
His long endured famine needed more reliefe.

44

"Faire Lady," then said that victorious knight,
"The things, that grievous were to do, or beare,
Them to renew, I wote, breeds no delight;
Best musicke breeds delight in loathing eare:
But th'onely good, that growes of passed feare,
Is to be wise, and ware of like agein.
This dayes ensample hath this lesson deare[3]
Deepe written in my heart with yron pen,[4]
That blisse may not abide in state of mortall men."

45

"Henceforth sir knight, take to you wonted strength,
And maister these mishaps with patient might;
Loe where your foe lyes stretcht in monstrous length,
And loe that wicked woman in your sight,
The roote of all your care, and wretched plight,
Now in your powre, to let her live, or dye.
To do her dye," quoth Una, "were despight,[5]
And shame t'avenge so weake an enimy;
But spoile her of her scarlot robe, and let her fly."

46

So as she bad, that witch they disaraid,[6]
And robd of royall robes, and purple pall,
And ornaments that richly were displaid;[7]
Ne spared they to strip her naked all.
Then when they had despoiled[8] her tire and call,[9]
Such as she was, their eyes might her behold,
That her misshaped parts did them appall,
A loathly, wrinckled hag, ill favoured, old,
Whose secret filth good manners biddeth not be told.

47

Her craftie head was altogether bald,
And as in hate of honourable eld,[10]
Was overgrowne with scurfe and filthy scald;[11]
Her teeth out of her rotten gummes were feld,[12]
And her sowre breath abhominably smeld;
Her dried dugs,[13] like bladders lacking wind,
Hong downe, and filthy matter from them weld;
Her wrizled[14] skin as rough, as maple rind,[15]
So scabby was, that would have loathd all womankind.

---

1 wele prosperity.

2 priefe test.

3 deare dire.

4 yron pen See Job 19:23-24: "Oh that my words were written! Oh that they were inscribed in a book! Oh that with an iron pen and lead they were graven in the rock for ever!"

5 despight malicious.

6 that witch they disaraid See Revelation 17:16: "They and the beast will hate the harlot; they will make her desolate and naked, and devour her flesh and burn her up with fire."

7 royall robes … richly were displaid See Revelation 18:16-17: "Alas, alas, for the great city that was clothed in fine linen, in purple and scarlet, bedecked with gold, with jewels, and with pearls! In one hour all this wealth has been laid waste."

8 despoiled stripped.

9 tire and call apparel and headdress.

10 in hate of honourable eld in contempt of honourable age (Hamilton).

11 scurfe … scald scabby ... scaly.

12 feld fallen.

13 dugs breasts.

14 wrizled wrinkled.

15 maple rind bark of a maple tree.

48

Her neather[1] parts, the shame of all her kind,[2]
My chaster Muse for shame doth blush to write;
But at her rompe[3] she growing had behind
A foxes taile,[4] with dong all fowly dight;
And eke her feete most monstrous were in sight;
For one of them was like an Eagles claw,
With griping talaunts[5] armd to greedy fight,
The other like a Beares uneven paw:[6]
More ugly shape yet never living creature saw.

49

Which when the knights beheld, amazd they were,
And wondred at so fowle deformed wight.
"Such then," said Una, "as she seemeth here,
Such is the face of falshood, such the sight
Of fowle Duessa, when her borrowed light
Is laid away, and counterfesaunce[7] knowne."
Thus when they had the witch disrobed quight,
And all her filthy feature open showne,
They let her goe at will, and wander wayes unknowne.

50

She flying fast from heavens hated face,
And from the world that her discovered wide,
Fled to the wastfull wildernesse apace,
From living eyes her open shame to hide,
And lurkt in rocks and caves long unespide.
But that faire crew of knights, and Una faire
Did in that castle afterwards abide,
To rest them selves, and weary powres repaire,
Where store they found of all, that dainty was and rare.

[1] neather nether.

[2] Then … shame of all her kind Much of the description here alludes to Isaiah 3:17-24, where the Lord promises to punish the pride of the daughters of Zion by stripping them and revealing their truth.

[3] rompe rump.

[4] foxes taile alluding to Duessa's craftiness and cowardice (Variorum).

[5] talaunts talons.

[6] Beares uneven paw See Revelation 13:2: "And the beast that I saw was like a leopard, its feet were like a bear's, and its mouth was like a lion's mouth. And to it the dragon gave his power and his throne and great authority."

[7] counterfesaunce deceit, fraud.

Canto IX

His loves and lignage Arthur tells:
The knights knit friendly bands:
Sir Trevisan flies from Despayre,
Whom Redcrosse knight withstands.

1

O Goodly golden chaine,[8] wherewith yfere
The vertues linked are in lovely wize:
And noble minds of yore[9] allyed were,
In brave poursuit of chevalrous emprize,
That none did others safety despize,
Nor aid envy to him, in need that stands,
But friendly each did others prayse devize
How to advaunce with favourable hands,
As this good Prince redeemed the Redcrosse knight from bands.

2

Who when their powres, empaird through labour long,
With dew repast they had recured well,
And that weake captive wight now wexed strong,
Them list no lenger there at leasure dwell,
But forward fare, as their adventures fell,
But ere they parted, Una faire besought
That straunger knight his name and nation tell;
Least so great good, as he for her had wrought,
Should die unknown, and buried be in thanklesse thought.

3

"Faire virgin," said the Prince, "ye me require
A thing without the compas[10] of my wit:
For both the lignage and the certain Sire,
From which I sprong, from me are hidden yit.
For all so soone as life did me admit
Into this world, and shewed heavens light,

[8] Goodly golden chaine the chain that joins heaven and earth in Homer, also in Boethius' Comsolation of Philosophy (Variorum).

[9] yore a long time ago.

[10] compas bounds.

From mothers pap[1] I taken was unfit:
And streight delivered to a Faery knight,
To be upbrought in gentle thewes[2] and martiall might.

4

Unto old Timon[3] he me brought bylive,[4]
Old Timon, who in youthly yeares hath beene
In warlike feates th'expertest man alive,
And is the wisest now on earth I weene;
His dwelling is low in a valley greene,
Under the foot of Rauran[5] mossy hore,[6]
From whence the river Dee[7] as silver cleene
His tombling billowes rolls with gentle rore:
There all my dayes he traind me up in vertuous lore.

5

Thither the great Magicien Merlin came,
As was his use, ofttimes to visit me:
For he had charge my discipline to frame,[8]
And Tutours nouriture[9] to oversee.
Him oft and oft I askt in privitie,[10]
Of what loines and what lignage I did spring:
Whose aunswere bad me still assured bee,
That I was sonne and heire unto a king,
As time in her just terme the truth to light should bring."

6

"Well worthy impe," said then the Lady gent,
"And Pupill fit for such a Tutours hand.
But what adventure, or what high intent
Hath brought you hither into Faery land,
Aread Prince Arthur, crowne of Martiall band?"
"Full hard it is," quoth he, "to read aright
The corse of heavenly cause,[11] or understand
The secret meaning of th'eternall might,
That rules mens wayes, and rules the thoughts of living wight.

7

For whither he through fatall deepe foresight[12]
Me hither sent, for cause to me unghest,
Or that fresh bleeding wound,[13] which day and Night
Whilome doth rancle[14] in my riven brest,
With forced fury following his behest,[15]
Me hither brought by wayes yet never found,
You to have helpt I hold my selfe yet blest."
"Ah curteous knight," quoth she, "what secret wound
Could ever find, to grieve the gentlest hart on ground?"

8

"Deare Dame," quoth he, "you sleeping sparkes awake,
Which troubled once, into huge flames will grow,
Ne ever will their fervent fury slake,
Till living moysture into smoke do flow,
And wasted life do lye in ashes low.
Yet sithens silence lesseneth not my fire,
But told it flames, and hidden it does glow,
I will revele, what ye so much desire:
Ah Love, lay downe thy bow, the whiles I may respire.[16]

9

It was the freshest flowre of youthly yeares,
When courage first does creepe in manly chest,
Then first the coale of kindly heat appears
To kindle love in every living brest;

---

[1] pap breast.
[2] thewes habits, customs.
[3] Timon honour (Variorum).
[4] bylive immediately.
[5] Rauran Rauran-Vaur hill in Merioneth (Hamilton), where Mount Snowdon, the spiritual heart of Wales, is located.
[6] mossy hore moss-covered.
[7] Dee The river Dee is on the border between Wales and England.
[8] frame direct, shape.
[9] nouriture nurture, upbringing (i.e., Arthur's upbringing by his tutor).
[10] privitie private.
[11] corse of heavenly cause divine providence.
[12] fatall deepe foresight insight into what is fated or destined.
[13] fresh bleeding wound i.e., the one made by Cupid's arrow.
[14] rancle fester.
[15] behest command.
[16] respire breathe.

But me had warnd old Timons wise behest,
Those creeping flames by reason to subdew,
Before their rage grew to so great unrest,
As miserable lovers use to rew,
Which still wex[1] old in woe, whiles woe still wexeth new.

10

That idle name of love, and lovers life,
As losse of time, and vertues enemy
I ever scornd, and joyd to stirre up strife,
In middest of their mournfull Tragedy,
Ay wont to laugh, when them I heard to cry,
And blow the fire, which them to ashes brent:
Their God himselfe, griev'd at my libertie,
Shot many a dart at me with fiers intent,
But I them warded[2] all with wary government.[3]

11

But all in vaine: no fort can be so strong,
Ne fleshly brest can armed be so sound,
But will at last be wonne with battrie long,
Or unawares at disavantage found;
Nothing is sure, that growes on earthly ground:
And who most trustes in arme of fleshly might,
And boasts, in beauties chaine not to be bound,
Doth soonest fall in disaventrous[4] fight,
And yeeldes his caytive neck to victours most despight.

12

Ensample make of him your haplesse joy,
And of my selfe now mated, as ye see;
Whose prouder vaunt[5] that proud avenging boy
Did soone pluck downe, and curbed my libertie.
For on a day prickt forth with jollitie[6]
Of looser life, and heat of hardiment,[7]
Raunging the forest wide on courser free,
The fields, the floods, the heavens with one consent
Did seeme to laugh on me, and favour mine intent.

13

For-wearied with my sports, I did alight
From loftie steed, and downe to sleepe my layd;
The verdant gras my couch did goodly dight,[8]
And pillow was my helmet faire displayd:[9]
Whiles every sence the humour sweet embayd,[10]
And slombring soft my hart did steale away,
Me seemed, by my side a royall Mayd
Her daintie limbes full softly down did lay:
So faire a creature yet saw never sunny day.

14

Most goodly glee and lovely blandishment[11]
She to me made, and bad me love her deare,
For dearely sure her love was to me bent,
As when just time expired should appeare.
But whether dreames delude, or true it were,
Was never hart so ravisht with delight,
Ne living man like words did ever heare,
As she to me delivered all that night;
And at her parting said, she Queene of Faeries[12] hight.

15

When I awoke, and found her place devoyd,
And nought but pressed gras, where she had lyen,
I sorrowed all so much, as earst I joyd,
And washed all her place with watry eyen.
From that day forth I lov'd that face divine;
From that day forth I cast in carefull mind,
To seeke her out with labour, and long tyne,[13]

---

1 wex grow.
2 warded fended off.
3 wary government cautious conduct.
4 disaventrous disastrous.
5 vaunt boasting, bragging.
6 jollitie pleasure.
7 hardiment boldness, daring.
8 dight fit out, equip.
9 displayd spread out.
10 embayd enveloped, surrounded.
11 blandishment gently flattering speech.
12 Queene of Faeries Gloriana (i.e., Elizabeth I).
13 tyne suffering.

And never vow to rest, till her I find,
Nine monethes[1] I seeke in vaine yet ni'll that vow unbind."

16

Thus as he spake, his visage wexed pale,
And chaunge of hew great passion did bewray;
Yet still he strove to cloke his inward bale,
And hide the smoke, that did his fire display,
Till gentle Una thus to him gan say;
"O happy Queene of Faeries, that hast found
Mongst many, one that with his prowesse may
Defend thine honour, and thy foes confound:[2]
True Loves are often sown, but seldom grow on ground."

17

"Thine, O then," said the gentle Redcrosse knight,
"Next to that Ladies love, shalbe the place,
O fairest virgin, full of heavenly light,
Whose wondrous faith, exceeding earthly race,
Was firmest fixt in mine extremest case.
And you, my Lord, the Patrone of my life,
Of that great Queene may well gaine worthy grace:
For onely worthy you through prowes priefe[3]
Yf living man mote worthy be, to be her liefe."[4]

18

So diversly discoursing of their loves,
The golden Sunne his glistring head gan shew,
And sad remembraunce now the Prince amoves,
With fresh desire his voyage to pursew:
Als Una earnd her traveill to renew.
Then those two knights, fast friendship for to bynd,
And love establish each to other trew,
Gave goodly gifts, the signes of gratefull mynd,
And eke as pledges firme, right hands together joynd.

19

Prince Arthur gave a boxe of Diamond sure,[5]
Embowd[6] with gold and gorgeous ornament,
Wherein were closd few drops of liquor pure,[7]
Of wondrous worth, and vertue excellent,
That any wound could heale incontinent:[8]
Which to requite, the Redcrosse knight him gave
A booke,[9] wherein his Saveours testament
Was writ with golden letters rich and brave;
A worke of wondrous grace,[10] and able soules to save.

20

Thus beene they parted, Arthur on his way
To seeke his love, and th'other for to fight
With Unaes foe, that all her realme did pray.
But she now weighing the decayed plight,[11]
And shrunken synewes of her chosen knight,
Would not a while her forward course pursew,
Ne bring him forth in face of dreadfull fight,
Till he recovered had his former hew:
For him to be yet weake and wearie well she knew.

21

So as they traveild, lo they gan espy
An armed knight towards them gallop fast,
That seemed from some feared foe to fly,
Or other griesly thing, that him agast,
Still as he fled, his eye was backward cast,
As if his feare still followed him behind;
Als flew his steed, as he his bands had brast,
And with his winged heeles did tread the wind,
As he had beene a fole of Pegasus[12] his kind.

---

[1] Nine monethes period of gestation.
[2] confound defeat, destroy.
[3] prowes priefe demonstrated valour.
[4] liefe beloved.
[5] sure either, with reference to the material, "sound"; or, in the case of the box, "secure."
[6] Embowd encircled.
[7] liquor pure Christ's blood which "cleanses us from all sin" (1 John 1:7).
[8] incontinent straightaway.
[9] booke New Testament.
[10] wondrous grace allusion to the twin Protestant doctrines that Scripture provides all things necessary for salvation and that salvation comes through faith alone.
[11] decayed plight impaired condition.
[12] Pegasus the winged horse who carries the thunderbolt of Zeus. Pegasus helped his rider, Bellerophon, fight a number of enemies, but when he attempted to fly to Heaven, Pegasus threw him off (Dict. Gods and Mortals).

22

Nigh as he drew, they might perceive his head
To be unarmed,[1] and curld uncombed heares
Upstaring[2] stiffe, dismayd with uncouth dread;
Nor drop of bloud in all his face appears
Nor life in limbe: and to increase his feares,
In fowle reproch of knighthoods faire degree,
About his neck an hempen rope[3] he weares,
That with his glistring armes does ill agree;
But he of rope or armes has now no memoree.

23

The Redcrosse knight toward him crossed fast,
To weet, what mister wight[4] was so dismayd:
There him he finds all senceless and aghast,
That of him selfe he seemd to be afrayd;
Whom hardly he from flying forward stayd,
Till he these wordes to him deliver might;
"Sir knight, aread who hath ye thus arayd,
And eke from whom make ye this hasty flight:
For never knight I saw in such misseeming[5] plight."

24

He answerd nought at all, but adding new
Feare to his first amazment, staring wide
With stony[6] eyes, and hartlesse[7] hollow hew,
Astonisht stood, as one that had aspide
Infernall furies, with their chaines untide.[8]
Him yet againe, and yet againe bespake
The gentle knight; who nought to him replide,
But trembling every joynt did inly quake,
And foltring tongue at last these words seemd forth to shake.

25

"For Gods deare love, Sir knight, do me not stay;
For loe he comes, he comes fast after mee."
Eft[9] looking backe would faine have runne
away;
But he him forst to stay, and tellen free
The secret cause of his perplexitie:
Yet nathemore by his bold hartie speach,
Could his bloud-frosen hart emboldned bee,
But through his boldnesse rather feare did reach,
Yet forst, at last he made through silence suddein breach.

26

"And am I now in safetie sure," quoth he,
"From him, that would have forced me to dye?
And is the point of death now turnd fro mee,
That I may tell this haplesse history?"
"Feare nought": quoth he, "no daunger now is nye."[10]
"Then shall I you recount a ruefull cace,"
Said he, "the which with this unlucky eye
I late beheld, and had not greater grace
Me reft from it, had bene partaker of the place.

27

I lately chaunst (Would I had never chaunst)
With a faire knight to keepen companee,
Sir Terwin hight, that well himselfe advaunst
In all affaires, and was both bold and free,
But not so happie as mote happie bee:
He lov'd, as was his lot, a Ladie gent,[11]
That him againe lov'd in the least degree:
For she was proud, and of too high intent,
And joyd to see her lover languish and lament.

28

From whom returning sad and comfortlesse,
As on the way together we did fare,
We met that villen (God from him me blesse)

---

[1] his head / To be unarmed allusion to 1 Thessalonians 5:8: "But since we belong to the day, let us be sober, and put on the breastplate of faith and love, and for a helmet the hope of salvation."

[2] Upstaring standing on end.

[3] hempen rope hangman's noose.

[4] what mister wight what kind of person.

[5] misseeming misbecoming, unseemly.

[6] stony fixed, petrified.

[7] hartlesse without heart or courage.

[8] furies … untide female spirits of vengeance whose effect on their victims is madness and who make their home in the Underworld (Dict. Gods and Mortals).

[9] Eft again.

[10] nye near.

[11] gent gentle.

That cursed wight, from whom I scapt whyleare,[1]
A man of hell, that cals himselfe Despaire:[2]
Who first us greets, and after faire areedes[3]
Of tydings strange, and of adventures rare:
So creeping close, as Snake in hidden weedes,[4]
Inquireth of our states, and of our knightly deedes.

29

Which when he knew, and felt our feeble harts
Embost with bale, and bitter byting griefe,
Which love had launched[5] with his deadly darts,
With wounding words and termes of foule repriefe
He pluckt from us all hope of due reliefe,
That earst[6] us held in love of lingring life;
Then hopelesse hartlesse, gan the cunning thiefe
Perswade us die, to stint[7] all further strife:
To me he lent this rope, to him a rustie knife.

30

With which sad instrument of hastie death,
That wofull lover, loathing lenger light,
A wide way made to let forth living breath.
But I more fearefull, or more luckie wight,
Dismayd with that deformed[8] dismall[9] sight,
Fled fast away, halfe dead with dying feare:
Ne yet assur'd of life by you, Sir knight,
Whose like infirmitie like chaunce may beare:
But God you never let his charmed speeches heare."

31

"How may a man," said he, "with idle speech
Be wonne, to spoyle the Castle of his health?"
"I wote,"[10] quoth he, "whom triall late did teach,
That like would not for all this worldes wealth:
His subtill tongue, like dropping honny, mealt'th
Into the hart, and searcheth every vaine,
That ere one be aware, by secret stealth
His powre is reft, and weaknesse doth remaine.
O never Sir desire to try his guilefull traine."

32

"Certes," said he, "hence shall I never rest,
Till I that treachours[11] art have heard and tride;
And you Sir knight, whose name mote I request,
Of grace[12] do me unto his cabin guide."
"I that hight Trevisan," quoth he, "will ride
Against my liking backe, to doe you grace:
But nor for gold nor glee will I abide
By you, when ye arrive in that same place;
For lever had I die,[13] then see his deadly face."

33

Ere long they come, where that same wicked wight
His dwelling has, low in an hollow cave,
Farre underneath a craggie clift ypight,
Darke, dolefull, drearie, like a greedie grave,
That still for carrion[14] carcases doth crave:
On top whereof aye dwelt the ghastly Owle,[15]
Shrieking his balefull note, which ever drave
Farre from that haunt all other chearefull fowle;
And all about it wandring ghostes did waile and howle.

---

1 whyleare a while before.
2 Despaire figure for the chief problem that plagues Redcrosse.
3 areedes tells.
4 in hidden weedes hidden in the weeds.
5 launched pierced, wounded.
6 earst earlier.
7 stint cease, stop.
8 deformed hateful.
9 dismall dreadful.
10 wote know.
11 treachours traitor's.
12 grace favour or good will, rather than the divine grace needed to dispel despair.
13 lever had I die I would more gladly die.
14 carrion dead or putrefying; also used to refer to the fleshly nature of humanity by St. Paul.
15 ghastly Owle bird of ill-omen, commonly associated with death (Spenser Encycl., p. 94a).

34

And all about old stockes and stubs of trees,
Whereon nor fruit, nor leafe was ever seene,
Did hang upon the ragged rocky knees;
On which had many wretched hanged beene,
Whose carcases were scattered on the greene,
And throwne about the cliffs. Arrived there,
That bare-head[1] knight for dread and dolefull teene,
Would faine have fled, ne durst approchen neare,
But th'other forst him stay, and comforted in feare.

35

That darkesome cave they enter, where they find
That cursed man, low sitting on the ground,
Musing full sadly in his sullein[2] mind;
His griesie lockes, long growen, and unbound,
Disordred hong about his shoulders round,
And hid his face; through which his hollow eyne
Lookt deadly dull, and stared as astound;
His raw-bone cheekes through penurie[3] and pine,[4]
Were shronke into his jawes, as he did never dine.[5]

36

His garment nought but many ragged clouts,[6]
With thornes together pind and patched was,
The which his naked sides he wrapt abouts;[7]
And him beside there lay upon the gras
A drearie corse, whose life away did pas,
All wallowed in his owne yet luke-warme blood,
That from his wound yet welled fresh alas;
In which a rustie knife fast fixed stood,
And made an open passage for the gushing flood.

37

Which piteous spectacle, approving trew
The wofull tale that Trevisan had told,
When as the gentle Redcrosse knight did vew,
With firie zeale[8] he burnt in courage bold,
Him to avenge, before his bloud were cold,
And to the villein said, "Thou damned wight,
The author of this fact, we here behold,
What justice can but judge against thee right,
With thine owne bloud to price his bloud, here shed in sight?"

38

"What franticke[9] fit," quoth he, "hath thus distraught[10]
Thee, foolish man, so rash a doome to give?
What justice ever other judgement taught,
But he should die, who merites not to live?
None else to death this man despayring drive,
But his owne guiltie mind deserving death.
Is then unjust to each his due to give?
Or let him die, that loatheth living breath?
Or let him die at ease, that liveth here uneath?[11]

---

[1] bare-head See Trevisan at 22:2.

[2] sullein stubborn and gloomy.

[3] penurie poverty.

[4] pine pain, distress.

[5] hollow eyne … did never dine See the description of Redcrosse at I.viii.41.1-3.

[6] clouts cloths.

[7] His garment … wrapt abouts These lines are highly allusive. When the prophet Jeremiah is lifted out of the well he wears "old rags and worn-out clothes" (Jeremiah 38:11). In the Aeneid, Achaemenides, abandoned and in despair, has a garment pinned with thorns (Aeneid 3), while in the Old Testament God's curse on Adam after the Fall refers to thorns: "Cursed is the ground because of you; in toil you shall eat of it all the days of your life; thorns and thistles it shall bring forth to you; and you shall eat the plants of the field" (Genesis 3:17-18) (Hamilton).

[8] zeale fervour, ardour. In predicting the coming of the messiah, Isaiah says, "Of the increase of his government and of peace there will be no end, upon the throne of David, and over his kingdom, to establish it, and to uphold it with justice and with righteousness from this time forth and for evermore. The zeal of the Lord of hosts will do this" (Isaiah 9:7); and St. Paul instructs: "Never flag in zeal, be aglow with the Spirit, serve the Lord" (Romans 12:11). Here Redcrosse's zeal addresses itself to vengeance and earthly justice, rather than to the spirit.

[9] franticke mad.

[10] distraught confused.

[11] uneath uneasily.

39

Who trauels by the wearie wandring way,
To come unto his wished home in haste,
And meetes a flood, that doth his passage stay,
Is not great grace[1] to helpe him over past,
Or free his feet, that in the myre sticke fast?[2]
Most envious man, that grieves at neighbours good,
And fond, that joyest in the woe thou hast,
Why wilt not let him passe, that long hath stood
Upon the banke, yet wilt thy selfe not passe the flood?

40

He there does now enjoy eternall rest
And happie ease, which thou doest want and crave,
And further from it daily wanderest:
What if some litle paine the passage have,
That makes fraile flesh to feare the bitter wave?
Is not short paine well borne, that brings long ease,
And layes the soule to sleepe in quiet grave?
Sleepe after toyle, port after stormie seas,
Ease after warre, death after life does greatly please."

41

The knight much wondred at his suddeine wit,[3]
And said, "The terme of life is limited,
Ne may a man prolong, nor shorten it;
The souldier may not move from watchfull sted,
Nor leave his stand, untill his Captaine bed."
"Who life did limit by almightie doome," Quoth he, "knowes best the termes established;
And he, that points[4] the Centonell his roome,[5]
Doth license him depart at sound of morning droome.[6]

42

Is not his deed, what ever thing is donne,
In heaven and earth? did not he all create
To die againe? all ends that was begonne.
Their times in his eternall booke of fate
Are written sure, and have their certaine date.
Who then can strive with strong necessitie,
That holds the world in his still chaunging state,
Or shunne the death ordaynd by destinie?
When houre of death is come, let none aske whence, nor why.

43

The lenger life, I wote the greater sin,
The greater sin, the greater punishment:
All those great battels, which thou boasts to win,
Through strife, and bloud-shed, and avengement,[7]
Now praysd, hereafter deare thou shalt repent:
For life must life, and bloud must bloud repay.
Is not enough thy evill life forespent?
For he, that once hath missed the right way,
The further he doth goe, the further he doth stray.

44

Then do no further goe, no further stray,
But here lie downe, and to thy rest betake,
Th'ill to prevent, that life ensewen may.[8]
For what hath life, that may it loved make,
And gives not rather cause it to forsake?
Feare, sicknesse, age, losse, labour, sorrow, strife,
Paine, hunger, cold, that makes the hart to quake;
And ever fickle fortune rageth rife,
All which, and thousands mo[9] do make a loathsome life.

---

1 grace again, "favour" rather than "divine grace."

2 flood … myre sticke fast See Psalm 69:1-2: "Save me O God! For the waters have come up to my neck. I sink in deep mire, where there is no foothold."

3 suddeine wit sharp mind.

4 points appoints.

5 roome office, station.

6 droome drum.

7 avengement vengeance.

8 that … may that will follow or result from living.

9 mo more

45

Thou wretched man, of death hast greatest need,
If in true ballance thou wilt weigh thy state;
For never knight, that dared warlike deede,
More lucklesse disaventures did amate:[1]
Witnesse the dongeon deepe, wherein of late
Thy life shut up, for death so oft did call;
And though good lucke prolonged hath thy date,
Yet death then, would the like mishaps forestall,
Into the which hereafter thou maiest happen fall.

46

Why then doest thou, O man of sin, desire
To draw thy dayes forth to their last degree?
Is not the measure of thy sinfull hire[2]
High heaped up with huge iniquitie,[3]
Against the day of wrath, to burden thee?
Is not enough, that to this Ladie milde
Thou falsed hast thy faith with periurie,[4]
And sold thy selfe to serve Duessa vilde,[5]
With whom in all abuse thou hast thy selfe defilde?

47

Is not he just, that all this doth behold
From highest heaven, and beares an equall eye?
Shall he thy sins up in his knowledge fold,
And guiltie be of thine impietie?
Is not his law, Let every sinner die:
Die shall all flesh? what then must needs be donne,
Is it not better to doe willinglie,
Then linger, till the glasse[6] be all out ronne?
Death is the end of woes: die soone, O faeries sonne."

48

The knight was much enmoved with his speach,
That as a swords point through his hart did perse,
And in his conscience[7] made a secret breach,
Well knowing true all, that he did reherse,
And to his fresh remembrance did reverse
The ugly vew of his deformed crimes,
That all his manly powres it did disperse,
As he were charmed with inchaunted rimes,
That oftentimes he quakt, and fainted oftentimes.

49

In which amazement, when the Miscreant[8]
Perceived him to waver weake and fraile,
Whiles trembling horror did his conscience dant,[9]
And hellish anguish did his soule assaile,
To drive him to despaire, and quite to quaile,
He shew'd him painted in a table plaine,
The damned ghosts, that doe in torments waile,
And thousand feends that doe them endlesse paine
With fire and brimstone, which for ever shall remaine.

50

The sight whereof so throughly him dismaid,
That nought but death before his eyes he saw,
And ever burning wrath before him laid,
By righteous sentence of th'Almighties law:
Then gan the villein him to overcraw,[10]
And brought unto him swords, ropes, poison, fire,
And all that might him to perdition draw;
And bad him choose, what death he would desire:
For death was due to him, that had provokt Gods ire.

---

1 amate daunt and/or match.

2 sinfull hire recompense for sin. Romans 6:23 notes: "For the wages of sin is death." However, Despair cuts the allusion off before its conclusion: "but the free gift of God is eternal life in Christ Jesus our Lord."

3 iniquitie wickedness.

4 periurie deliberately false statement.

5 vilde i.e., vile.

6 glasse hourglass.

7 conscience consciousness, mind.

8 Miscreant unbeliever, heretic.

9 dant daunt.

10 overcraw overpower, exult over.

51

But when as none of them he saw him take,
He to him raught[1] a dagger sharpe and keene,
And gave it him in hand: his hand did quake,
And tremble like a leafe of Aspin greene,
And troubled bloud through his pale face was seene,
To come, and goe with tydings from the hart,
As it a running messenger had beene.
At last resolv'd to worke his finall smart,
He lifted up his hand, that backe againe did start.

52

Which when as Una saw, through every vaine
The crudled cold ran to her well of life,[2]
As in a swowne: but soone reliv'd againe,
Out of his hand she snatcht the cursed knife,
And threw it to the ground, enragd rife,
And to him said, "Fie, fie, faint harted knight,
What meanest thou by this reprochfull strife?
Is this the battell, which thou vauntst[3] to fight
With that fire-mouthed Dragon, horrible and bright?

53

Come, come away, fraile, feeble, fleshly wight,[4]
Ne let vaine words bewitch thy manly hart,
Ne divelish thoughts dismay thy constant spright.
In heavenly mercies hast thou not a part?
Why shouldst thou then despeire, that chosen art?[5]
Where justice growes, there grows eke greater grace,
The which doth quench the brond of hellish smart,
And that accurst hand-writing doth deface.
Arise, Sir knight arise, and leave this cursed place."

54

So up he rose, and thence amounted streight.
Which when the carle[6] beheld, and saw his guest
Would safe depart, for all his subtill sleight,
He chose an halter from among the rest,
And with it hung himselfe, unbid unblest.
But death he could not worke himselfe thereby;
For thousand times he so himselfe had drest,
Yet nathelesse it could not doe him die,
Till he should die his last, that is eternally.

Canto X

Her faithfull knight faire Una brings to house of Holinesse,
Where he is taught repentance, and the way to heavenly blesse.

1

What man is he, that boasts of fleshly might,
And vaine assurance of mortality,
Which all so soone, as it doth come to fight,
Against spirituall foes, yeelds by and by,
Or from the field most cowardly doth fly?
Ne let the man ascribe it to his skill,
That thorough grace[7] hath gained victory.
If any strength we have, it is to ill,
But all the good is Gods, both power and eke[8] will.

---

[1] raught reached.

[2] well of life heart, but also the well of salvation: "With joy you will draw water from the wells of salvation" (Isaiah 12:3).

[3] vauntst brag, boast.

[4] fraile, feeble, fleshly wight allusion to several biblical passages, including, "Watch and pray that you may not enter into temptation; the spirit indeed is willing, but the flesh is weak" (Matthew 26:41) and Romans 8:6: "To set the mind on the flesh is death, but to set the mind on the Spirit is life and peace."

[5] that chosen art allusion to "but we are bound to give thanks to God always for you, brethren beloved by the Lord, because God chose you from the beginning to be saved through sanctification by the spirit and belief in the truth" (2 Thessalonians 2:13).

[6] carle villain.

[7] grace See Ephesians 2:8-10: "For by grace you have been saved through faith; and this is not your own doing, it is the gift of God—not because of works, lest any man should boast. For we are his workmanship, created in Christ Jesus for good works, which God prepared beforehand that we should walk in them."

[8] eke also.

2

By that, which lately hapned, Una saw,
That this her knight was feeble, and too faint;
And all his sinews woxen weake and raw,
Through long enprisonment, and hard constraint,
Which he endured in his late restraint,
That yet he was unfit for bloudie fight:
Therefore to cherish him with diets daint,[1]
She cast to bring him, where he chearen might,
Till he recovered had his late decayed plight.

3

There was an auntient[2] house not farre away,
Renowmd throughout the world for sacred lore,
And pure unspotted life: so well they say
It governd was, and guided evermore,
Through wisedome of a matrone grave and hore;
Whose onely joy was to relieve the needes
Of wretched soules, and helpe the helpelesse pore:
All night she spent in bidding of her bedes,
And all the day in doing good and godly deedes.[3]

4

Dame Cælia[4] men did her call, as thought
From heaven to come, or thither to arise,
The mother of three daughters, well upbrought
In goodly thewes,[5] and godly exercise:
The eldest two most sober, chast, and wise,
Fidelia and Speranza virgins were,
Through spousd, yet wanting wedlocks solemnize;
But faire Charissa[6] to a lovely fere
Was lincked, and by him had many pledges dere.

5

Arrived there, the dore they find fast lockt;
For it was warely watched night and day,
For feare of many foes: but when they knockt,
The Porter opened unto them streight way:
He was an aged syre, all hory gray,
With lookes full lowly cast, and gate full slow,
Wont on a staffe his feeble steps to stay,
Hight Humiltá.[7] They passe in stouping low;
For streight[8] and narrow was the way, which he did show.

6

Each goodly thing is hardest to begin,
But entred in a spacious court they see,
Both plaine, and pleasant to be walked in,
Where them does meete a francklin[9] faire and free,
And entertaines with comely courteous glee,[10]
His name was Zele, that him right well became,
For in his speeches and behaviour hee
Did labour lively to expresse the same,
And gladly did them guide, till to the Hall they came.

7

There fairely them receives a gentle Squire,
Of milde demeanure, and rare courtesie,
Right cleanly clad in comely attire;
In word and deede that shew'd great modestie,
And knew his good to all of each degree,
Hight Reverence. He them with speeches meet
Does faire entreat; no courting nicetie,[11]
But simple true, and eke unfained sweet,
As might become a Squire so great persons to greet.

---

1 daint dainty, delicate.

2 auntient venerable, long-established.

3 bidding of her bedes … good and godly deedes She balances prayer and good works. Compare this figure to Corceca at I.iii.13.6.

4 Cælia meaning, "heavenly one," from the Latin, "caeles" (heavenly).

5 thewes customs, habits.

6 Fidelia … Speranza …Charissa i.e., faith, hope, and charity. See 1 Corinthians 13:13: "So faith, hope, love abide, these three; but the greatest of these is love."

7 Humiltá humility (i.e., "Blessed are the poor in spirit, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven" [Matthew 5:3]).

8 streight confined.

9 francklin landowner (i.e., host).

10 glee joy, delight.

11 courting nicetie affected attention.

8

And afterwards them to his Dame he leades,
That aged Dame, the Ladie of the place:
Who all this while was busie at her beades:
Which doen, she up arose with seemely grace,
And toward them full matronely[1] did pace.
Where when that fairest Una she beheld,
Whom well she knew to spring from heavenly race,
Her hart with joy unwonted inly sweld,
As feeling wondrous comfort in her weaker eld.

9

And her embracing said, "O happie earth,
Whereon thy innocent feet doe ever tread,
Most vertuous virgin borne of heavenly berth,
That to redeeme thy woefull parents head,
From tyrans rage, and ever-dying dread,
Hast wandred through the world now long a day;
Yet ceasest not thy wearie soles to lead,
What grace hath thee now hither brought this way?
Or doen thy feeble feet unweeting hither stray?

10

Strange thing it is an errant knight to see
Here in this place, or any other wight,
That hither turnes his steps. So few there bee,
That chose the narrow path,[2] or seeke the right:
All keepe the broad high way, and take delight
With many rather for to go astray,
And be partakers of their evill plight,
Then with a few to walke the rightest way;[3]
O foolish men, why haste ye to your owne decay?"

11

"Thy selfe to see, and tyred limbs to rest,
O matrone sage," quoth she, "I hither came,
And this good knight his way with me addrest,
Led with thy prayses and broad-blazed fame,
That up to heaven is blowne." The auncient Dame
Him goodly greeted in her modest guise,
And entertaynd them both, as best became,
With all court'sies, that she could devise,
Ne wanted ought, to shew her bounteous or wise.

12

Thus as they gan of sundry things devise,
Loe two most goodly virgins came in place,
Ylinked arme in arme in lovely wise,
With countenance demure, and modest grace,
They numbred even steps and equall pace:
Of which the eldest, that Fidelia hight,
Like sunny beames threw from her Christall face,
That could have dazd the rash[4] beholders sight,
And round about her head did shine like heavens light.

13

She was araied all in lilly white,[5]
And in her right hand bore a cup of gold,
With wine and water fild up to the hight,
In which a Serpent did himselfe enfold,
That horrour made to all, that did behold;
But she no whit did chaunge her constant mood:
And in her other hand she fast did hold
A booke,[6] that was both signd and seald with blood,
Wherein darke things were writ, hard to be understood.

14

Her younger sister, that Speranza hight,
Was clad in blew,[7] that her beseemed well;
Not all so chearefull seemed she of sight,

[1] full matronely with dignity.

[2] chose the narrow path See Matthew 7:14: "for the gate is narrow and the way is hard, that leads to life, and those who find it are few."

[3] rightest way the path of righteousness (Psalm 23:3).

[4] rash hasty, careless.

[5] lilly white colour of purity.

[6] cup of gold … Serpent … booke The cup with the serpent in it in one hand with the book in the other is typical of representations of St. John the Evangelist. The snake in the cup alludes to an attempt to kill him with poisoned wine, to the brazen serpent held aloft by Moses in the wilderness as a cure for the plague of fiery serpents (Numbers 21:8-9), and to the pagan physician Æsculapius. Combined, these symbolize Christ the Physician. As the first and eldest of the sisters, Fidelia establishes the priority of faith as the basis for good works (Spenser Encycl., p. 126a-b).

[7] blew the colour representing the hope "laid up for you in heaven" (Colossians 1:5).

As was her sister; whether dread did dwell,
Or anguish in her hart, is hard to tell:
Upon her arme a silver anchor[1] lay,
Whereon she leaned ever, as befell:
And ever up to heaven, as she did pray,
Her stedfast[2] eyes were bent, ne swarved[3] other way.

15

They seeing Una, towards her gan wend,
Who them encounters with like courtesie;
Many kind speeches they betwene them spend,
And greatly joy each other well to see:
Then to the knight with shamefast[4] modestie
They turne themselves, at Unaes meeke request,
And him salute with well beseeming[5] glee;
Who faire them quites, as him beseemed best,
And goodly gan discourse of many a noble gest.

16

Then Una thus; "But she your sister deare,
The deare Charissa where is she become?
Or wants she health, or[6] busie is elsewhere?"
"Ah no," said they, "but forth she may not come:
For she of late is lightned of her wombe,
And hath encreast the world with one sonne more,
That her to see should be but troublesome."
"Indeede," quoth she, "that should her trouble sore,
But thankt be God, and her encrease so evermore."

17

Then said the aged Cœlia, "Deare dame,
And you good Sir, I wote that of your toyle,
And labours long, through which ye hither came,
Ye both forwearied be: therefore a whyle
I read you rest, and to your bowres recoyle."[7]
Then called she a Groome,[8] that forth him led
Into a goodly lodge, and gan despoile[9]
Of puissant armes, and laid in easie bed;
His name was meeke Obedience rightfully ared.

18

Now when their wearie limbes with kindly rest,
And bodies were refresht with due repast,
Faire Una gan Fidelia faire request,
To have her knight into her schoolehouse plaste,
That of her heavenly learning he might taste,
And heare the wisedome of her words divine.
She graunted, and that knight so much agraste,[10]
That she him taught celestiall discipline,
And opened his dull eyes, that light mote in them shine.

19

And that her sacred Booke, with bloud ywrit,
That none could read, except she did them teach,
She unto him disclosed every whit,[11]
And heavenly documents thereout did preach,
That weaker wit of man could never reach,
Of God, of grace, of justice, of free will,[12]
That wonder was to heare her goodly speach:
For she was able, with her words to kill,
And raise againe[13] to life the hart, that she did thrill.

20

And when she list poure out her larger spright,
She would commaund the hastie Sunne to stay,

---

1 silver anchor See Hebrews 6:18-19: "we who have fled for refuge might have strong encouragement to seize the hope set before us. We have this as a sure and steadfast anchor of the soul, a hope that enters into the inner shrine behind the curtain."

2 stedfast firmly fixed.

3 swarved deviated.

4 shamefast virtuous.

5 beseeming seemly, becoming.

6 Or … or either … or.

7 recoyle retire.

8 Groome man-servant.

9 despoile strip.

10 agraste favoured.

11 whit bit.

12 grace … justice … free will doctrines accessible only through divine revelation in Scripture (Spenser Encycl., p. 126b).

13 kill, And raise againe echoing the death and resurrection of Christ.

Or backward turne his course from heauens hight;[1]
Sometimes great hostes of men she could dismay,[2]
Dry-shod to passe, she parts the flouds[3] in tway;
And eke huge mountaines from their native seat
She would commaund, themselves to beare
away,[4]
And throw in raging sea with roaring threat.
Almightie God her gave such powre, and puissance great.

21

The faithfull knight now grew in litle space,[5]
By hearing her, and by her sisters lore,
To such perfection of all heavenly grace,
That wretched world he gan for to abhore,
And mortall life gan loath, as thing forlore,[6]
Greev'd with remembrance of his wicked wayes,
And prick't with anguish of his sinnes so sore,
That he desirde to end his wretched dayes:
So much the dart of sinfull guilt the soule
dismayes.

22

But wise Speranza gave him comfort sweet,
And taught him how to take assured hold
Upon her silver anchor, as was meet;[7]
Else had his sinnes so great, and manifold
Made him forget all that Fidelia told.
In this distressed doubtfull agonie,
When him his dearest Una did behold,
Disdeining life, desiring leave to die,
She found her selfe assayld with great perplexitie.

23

And came to Cœlia to declare her smart,
Who well acquainted with that commune[8] plight,
Which sinfull horror workes in wounded hart,
Her wisely comforted all that she might,
With goodly counsell and advisement right;
And streightway sent with carefull diligence,
To fetch a Leach, the which had great insight
In that disease of grieved conscience,
And well could cure the same; His name was Patience.

24

Who comming to that soule-diseased knight,
Could hardly him intreat, to tell his griefe:
Which knowne, and all that noyd[9] his heavie
spright
Well searcht, eftsoones he gan apply reliefe
Of salves and med'cines, which had passing
priefe,
And thereto added words of wondrous might:
By which to ease he him recured[10] briefe,
And much asswag'd the passion of his plight,
That he his paine endur'd, as seeming now more light.

25

But yet the cause and root of all his ill,
Inward corruption, and infected sin,
Not purg'd nor heald, behind remained still,
And festring sore did rankle yet within,
Close creeping twixt the marrow and the skin.
Which to extirpe,[11] he laid him privily

---

1 commaund the hastie Sunne … heauens hight as Joshua commanded the sun to stand still and Isaiah made it go backward (Joshua 10:12-13; 2 Kings 20:9-11).

2 great hostes of men she could dismay as Gideon did with his army of three hundred against the Midianites (Judges 7).

3 she parts the flouds as Moses led the Israelites through the Red Sea to escape Egypt (Exodus 14:21-28).

4 huge mountaines … themselves to beare away See Matthew 17:20-21: "For truly, I say to you, if you have faith as a grain of mustard seed, you will say to this mountain, 'Move from here to there,' and it will move; and nothing will be impossible to you."

5 now grew in litle space allusion to a medieval English Advent carol: "There is no rose of such vertu / As is the rose that bare Jesu, / Alleluia. / For in this rose contained was / Heaven and earth in lytle space, / Res miranda." The carol describes the gestation of Jesus, just as Spenser gives an account of Redcrosse's growth in spirit through his education in faith.

6 forlore morally lost, depraved, doomed.

7 meet suitable, proper.

8 commune common.

9 noyd troubled.

10 recured remedied.

11 extirpe root out.

Downe in a darkesome lowly place farre in,
Whereas he meant his corrosives[1] to apply,
And with streight diet tame his stubborne malady.

26

In ashes and sackcloth he did array
His daintie corse, proud humors to abate,
And dieted with fasting every day,
The swelling of his wounds to mitigate,
And made him pray both earely and eke late:
And ever as superfluous flesh did rot
Amendment[2] readie still at hand did wayt,
To pluck it out with pincers firie whot,
That soone in him was left no one corrupted iot.[3]

27

And bitter Penance with an yron whip,
Was wont him once to disple every day:
And sharpe Remorse his hart did pricke and nip,
That drops of bloud thence like a well did play;
And sad Repentance[4] used to embay[5]
His bodie in salt water smarting sore,
The filthy blots of sinne to wash away.[6]
So in short space they did to health restore
The man that would not live, but earst lay at deathes dore.

28

In which his torment often was so great,
That like a Lyon he would cry and rore,
And rend his flesh, and his owne synewes eat.
His owne deare Una hearing evermore
His ruefull shriekes and gronings, often tore
Her guiltlesse garments, and her golden heare,
For pitty of his paine and anguish sore;
Yet all with patience wisely she did beare;
For well she wist, his crime could else be never cleare.

29

Whom thus recover'd by wise Patience,
And trew Repentance they to Una brought:
Who joyous of his cured conscience,
Him dearely kist,[7] and fairely eke besought
Himselfe to chearish,[8] and consuming thought
To put away out of his carefull brest.
By this Charissa,[9] late in child-bed brought,
Was woxen strong, and left her fruitfull nest;
To her faire Una brought this unacquainted guest.

30

She was a woman in her freshest age,
Of wondrous beauty, and of bountie rare,
With goodly grace and comely personage,
That was on earth not easie to compare;
Full of great love, but Cupids wanton snare
As hell she hated, chast in worke and will;
Her necke and breasts were ever open bare,
That ay thereof her babes might sucke their fill;
The rest was all in yellow robes[10] arayed still.

31

A multitude of babes about her hong,
Playing their sports that joyd her to behold,
Whom still she fed, whiles they were weake and young,
But thrust them forth still, as they wexed old:
And on her head she wore a tyre[11] of gold,

---

1 corrosives caustic remedies.

2 Amendment correction, reformation.

3 iot i.e., jot or point, very little bit.

4 Penance … Remorse … Repentance the three stages of addressing sin: punishment for the present state of sin, sorrow for sins past, and determination to sin no more (Hamilton).

5 embay bathe, envelop.

6 His bodie … wash away See, for example, Psalm 51:2-3: "Wash me thoroughly from my iniquity, and cleanse me from my sin! For I know my transgressions, and my sin is ever before me." See also Isaiah 1:16.

7 him dearely kist allusion to the injunction to "greet one another with the kiss of love" (1 Peter 5.14).

8 chearish cheer, encourage.

9 Charissa meaning, "love," the virtue most essential to Christian life, for "if I have prophetic powers, and understand all mysteries and all knowledge, and if I have all faith, so as to remove mountains, but have not love, I am nothing" (1 Corinthians 13:2).

10 yellow robes Hymen, the god of marriage, was traditionally garbed in yellow (Ovid, Metamorphoses, Book 10).

11 tyre head-dress (i.e., "when the Chief Shepherd is manifested you will obtain the unfading crown of glory" [1 Peter 5:4]).

Adornd with gemmes and owches[1] wondrous faire,
Whose passing price uneath was to be told;
And by her side there sate a gentle paire
Of turtle doves,[2] she sitting in an yvorie chaire.

32

The knight and Una entring, faire her greet,
And bid her joy of that her happie brood;
Who them requites with court'sies seeming meet,
And entertaines with friendly chearefull mood.
Then Una her besought, to be so good,
As in her vertuous rules to schoole her knight,
Now after all his torment well withstood,
In that sad house of Penaunce, where his spright
Had past the paines of hell, and long enduring night.

33

She was right joyous of her just request,
And taking by the hand that Faeries sonne,
Gan him instruct in every good behest,
Of love, and righteousnesse, and well to donne,
And wrath, and hatred warely to shonne,[3]
That drew on men Gods hatred, and his wrath,
And many soules in dolours[4] had fordonne:
In which when him she well instructed hath,
From thence to heaven she teacheth him the ready path.

34

Wherein his weaker wandring steps to guide,
An auncient matrone she to her does call,
Whose sober lookes her wisedome well descride:
Her name was Mercie,[5] well knowne over all,
To be both gratious, and eke liberall:
To whom the carefull charge of him she gave,
To lead aright, that he should never fall
In all his wayes through this wide worldes wave,
That Mercy in the end his righteous soule might save.

35

The godly Matrone[6] by the hand him beares
Forth from her presence, by a narrow way,
Scattred with bushy thornes, and ragged breares,[7]
Which still before him she remov'd away,
That nothing might his ready passage stay:
And ever when his feet encombred[8] were,
Or gan to shrinke, or from the right to stray,
She held him fast, and firmely did upbeare,
As carefull Nourse her child from falling oft does reare.

36

Eftsoones unto an holy Hospitall,[9]
That was fore by the way, she did him bring,
In which seven Bead-men[10] that had vowed all
Their life to service of high heavens king
Did spend their dayes in doing godly thing:
Their gates to all were open evermore,
That by the wearie way were traveiling,
And one sate wayting ever them before,
To call in commers-by, that needy were and pore.

---

[1] owches jewels.

[2] turtle doves symbols of chaste Venus (i.e., of true love).

[3] shonne shun.

[4] dolours grief, distress.

[5] Mercie See Psalm 145:9: "The Lord is good to all, and his tender mercies are over all his works."

[6] Matrone married woman considered as having expert knowledge in matters of pregnancy and childbirth.

[7] breares briars.

[8] encombred tangled, hampered.

[9] Hospitall a hostel for the reception of pilgrims, travellers, and strangers; also, a charitable institution for the housing and maintenance of the needy.

[10] seven Bead-men pensioners paid to pray for the welfare of others. Spenser transforms mechanical prayer into action as the list of good works here originates in the Sermon on the Mount (Matthew 25:34-46): welcoming strangers, feeding the hungry, clothing the naked, healing the sick, freeing prisoners. While good works alone cannot ensure salvation, it is necessary for faith to act in the world (Spenser Encycl., pp. 80c-81a).

37

The first of them that eldest was, and best,
Of all the house had charge and governement,
As Guardian and Steward of the rest:
His office was to give entertainement
And lodging, unto all that came, and went:
Not unto such, as could him feast againe,
And double quite, for that he on them spent,
But such, as want of harbour did constraine:
Those for Gods sake his dewty was to entertaine.

38

The second was as Almner[1] of the place,
His office was, the hungry for to feed,
And thirsty give to drinke, a worke of grace:
He feard not once him selfe to be in need,
Ne car'd to hoord for those, whom he did breede:
The grace of God he layd up still in store,
Which as a stocke he left onto his seede;
He had enough, what need him care for more?
And had he lesse, yet some he would give to the pore.

39

The third had of their wardrobe custodie,
In which were not rich tyres, nor garments gay,
The plumes of pride, and wings of vanitie,
But clothes meet to keepe keene could away,
And naked nature seemely to aray;
With which bare wretched wights he dayly clad,
The images of God in earthly clay;[2]
And if that no spare cloths to give he had,
His owne coate he would cut, and it distribute glad.

40

The fourth appointed by his office was,
Poore prisoners to relieve with gratious ayd,
And captives to redeeme with price of bras,[3]
From Turkes and Sarazins, which them had stayd;
And though they faultie were, yet well he wayd,
That God to us forgiveth every howre
Much more then that, why they in bands were layd,
And he that harrowd hell[4] with heavie stowre,
The faultie[5] soules from thence brought to his heavenly bowre.

41

The fift had charge sicke persons to attend,
And comfort those, in point of death which lay;
For them most needeth comfort in the end,
When sin, and hell, and death do most dismay
The feeble soule departing hence away.
All is but lost, that living we bestow,
If not well ended at our dying day.
O man have mind of that last bitter throw;
For as the tree does fall, so lyes it ever low.

42

The sixt had charge of them now being dead,
In seemely sort[6] their corses to engrave,[7]
And deck with dainty flowres their bridall bed,
That to their heavenly spouse both sweet and brave
They might appeare, when he their soules shall save.[8]
The wondrous workemanship of Gods owne mould,
Whose face he made, all beasts to feare, and gave
All in his hand, even dead we honour should.
Ah dearest God me graunt, I dead be not defould.[9]

---

1 Almner distributor of alms.

2 images of God in earthly clay a reference to God's creation of humanity: "So God created man in his own image, in the image of God he created him; male and female he created them" (Genesis 1:27).

3 captives to redeeme with price of bras ransoming prisoners with money.

4 he that harrowd hell The popular story of Christ descending to hell and rescuing its inhabitants is found in the apocryphal Gospel of Nicodemus (Variorum).

5 faultie imperfect.

6 sort manner.

7 engrave bury, entomb.

8 And deck … soules shall save See Revelation 21:2: "And I saw the holy city, new Jerusalem, coming down out of heaven from God, prepared as a bride adorned for her husband."

9 defould defiled, profaned.

43

The seventh now after death and buriall done,
Had charge the tender Orphans of the dead
And widowes ayd,[1] least they should be undone:[2]
In face of judgement he their right would plead,
Ne ought the powre of mighty men did dread
In their defence, nor would for gold or fee
Be wonne their rightfull causes downe to tread:
And when they stood in most necessitee,
He did supply their want, and gave them ever free.

44

There when the Elfin knight arrived was,
The first and chiefest of the seven, whose care
Was guests to welcome, towardes him did pas:
Where seeing Mercie, that his steps up bare,
And alwayes led, to her with reverence rare
He humbly louted[3] in meeke lowlinesse,
And seemely welcome for her did prepare:
For of their order she was Patronesse,
Albe Charissa were their chiefest founderesse.

45

There she awhile him stayes, him selfe to rest,
That to the rest more able he might bee:
During which time, in every good behest
And godly worke of Almes and charitee
She him instructed with great industree;
Shortly therein so perfect he became,
That from the first unto the last degree,
His mortall life he learned had to frame
In holy righteousnesse, without rebuke or blame.

46

Thence forward by that painfull way they pas,
Forth to an hill, that was both steepe and hy;
On top whereof a sacred chappell was,
And eke a litle Hermitage[4] thereby,
Wherein an aged holy man did lye,
That day and night said his devotion,
Ne other worldly busines did apply;
His name was heavenly Contemplation;[5]
Of God and goodnesse was his meditation.

47

Great grace that old man to him given had;
For God he often saw from heavens hight,
All were his earthly eyen both blunt and bad,
And through great age had lost their kindly sight,
Yet wondrous quick and persant was his spright,
As Eagles eye,[6] that can behold the Sunne:
That hill they scale with all their powre and might,
That his frayle thighes nigh wearie and fordonne
Gan faile, but by her helpe the top at last he wonne.

48

There they do finde that godly aged Sire,
With snowy lockes adowne his shoulders shed,
As hoarie frost with spangles doth attire
The mossy braunches of an Oke halfe ded.
Each bone might through his body well be red,[7]
And every sinew seene through his long fast:
For nought he car'd his carcas long unfed;
His mind was full of spirituall repast,
And pyn'd his flesh, to keepe his body low and chast.[8]

49

Who when these two approching he aspide,
At their first presence grew agrieved sore,
That forst him lay his heavenly thoughts aside;
And had he not that Dame repected more,

---

1 tender Orphans … widowes ayd allusion to James 1:27: "Religion that is pure and undefiled before God and the Father is this: to visit orphans and widows in their affliction and to keep oneself unstained from the world."

2 undone brought to ruin.

3 louted bowed.

4 Hermitage Compare Archimago's hermitage at I.i.34.

5 Contemplation state of vision (from the Latin "contemplare" or "to see") (Hamilton).

6 Eagles eye Eagles were thought to strengthen their vision by staring at the sun.

7 red read (i.e., seen).

8 pyn'd his flesh, to keepe his body low and chast See Romans 8:13: "for if you live according to the flesh you will die, but if by the spirit you put to death the deeds of the body you will live."

Whom highly he did reverence and adore,
He would not once have moved for the knight.
They him saluted standing far afore;
Who well them greeting, humbly did requight,[1]
And asked, to what end they clomb that tedious[2] height.

50

"What end," quoth she, "should cause us take such paine,
But that same end, which every living wight
Should make his marke,[3] high heaven to attaine?
Is not from hence the way, that leadeth right
To that most glorious house, that glistreth bright
With burning starres, and everliving fire,
Whereof the keyes[4] are to thy hand behight[5]
By wise Fidelia? she doth thee require,
To shew it to this knight, according his desire."

51

"Thrise happy man," said then the father grave,
"Whose staggering steps thy steady hand doth lead,
And shewes the way, his sinfull soule to save.
Who better can the way to heaven aread,
Then thou thy selfe, that was both borne and bred
In heavenly throne, where thousand Angels shine?[6]
Thou doest the prayers of the righteous sead[7]
Present before the majestie divine,
And his avenging wrath to clemencie incline.

52

Yet since thou bidst, thy pleasure shalbe donne.
Then come thou man of earth,[8] and see the way,
That never yet was seene of Faeries sonne,
That never leads the traveiler astray,
But after labours long, and sad delay,
Brings them to joyous rest and endlesse blis.
But first thou must a season fast and pray,
Till from her bands the spright assoiled[9] is,
And have her strength recur'd from fraile infirmitis."

53

That done, he leads him to the highest Mount;[10]
Such one, as that same mighty man of God,[11]
That bloud-red billowes like a walled front
On either side disparted with his rod,
Till that his army dry-foot through them yod,[12]
Dwelt fortie dayes upon; where writ in stone
With bloudy letters by the hand of God,
The bitter doome of death and balefull mone
He did receive, whiles flashing fire about him shone.

54

Or like that sacred hill,[13] whose head full hie,
Adornd with fruitfull Olives all arownd,
Is, as it were for endlesse memory
Of that deare Lord, who oft thereon was fownd,

---

1 requight salute them in return.

2 tedious tiring.

3 marke goal, target.

4 keyes See Matthew 16:19: "I will give you the keys of the kingdom of heaven, and whatever you bind on earth shall be bound in heaven, and whatever you loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven."

5 behight granted, delivered.

6 heavenly throne … Angels shine See Revelation 5:11: "Then I looked, and I heard around the throne and the living creatures and the elders the voice of many angels, numbering myriads of myriads and thousands of thousands."

7 righteous sead the saved.

8 thou man of earth meant literally, as Redcrosse will be revealed to be St. George, from "ge" (Greek, "earth") and "ergon" (Greek, "labour") (Spenser Encycl., p. 329c), and with reference to Genesis 2:7: "Then the Lord God formed man of dust from the ground, and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life; and man became a living being." A further allusion indicates Redcrosse's transformation: "The first man was from the earth, a man of dust; the second man is from heaven" (1 Corinthians 15:47).

9 assoiled absolved, set free.

10 Mount introduces a list of a number of mountains linked to vision and revelation.

11 mighty man of God Mount Sinai, where Moses spent 40 days and received the tablets of the law containing the ten commandments (Exodus 14:21-2, 24:18).

12 yod went.

13 sacred hill the Mount of Olives where Jesus retreated and preached the Sermon on the Mount (Matthew 24).

For ever with a flowring girlond crownd:
Or like that pleasaunt Mount,[1] that is for ay
Through famous Poets verse each where renownd,
On which the thrise three learned Ladies play
Their heavenly notes, and make full many a lovely lay.[2]

55

From thence, far off he unto him did shew
A litle path, that was both steepe and long,
Which to a goodly Citie led his vew;
Whose wals and towres were builded high and strong
Of perle and precious stone, that earthly tong
Cannot describe, nor wit of man can tell;
Too high a ditty for my simple song;
The Citie of the great king[3] hight it well,
Wherein eternall peace and happinesse doth dwell.

56

As he thereon stood gazing, he might see
The blessed Angels to and fro descend[4]
From highest heaven, in gladsome companee,
And with great joy into that Citie wend,
As commonly as friend does with his frend.
Whereat he wondred much, and gan enquere,
What stately building durst so high extend
Her loftie towres unto the starry sphere,
And what unknowen nation there empeopled were.

57

"Faire knight," quoth he, "Hierusalem that is,
The new Hierusalem,[5] that God has built
For those to dwell in, that are chosen his,
His chosen people purg'd from sinfull guilt,
With pretious bloud, which cruelly was spilt
On cursed tree, of that unspotted lam,
That for the sinnes of all the world was kilt:[6]
Now are they Saints all in that Citie sam,[7]
More deare unto their God, then younglings to their dam."

58

"Till now," said then the knight, "I weened well,
That great Cleopolis,[8] where I have beene,
In which that fairest Faerie Queene doth dwell,
The fairest Citie was, that might be seene;
And that bright towre all built of christall cleene,
Panthea,[9] seemd the brightest thing, that was:
But now by proofe all otherwise I weene;
For this great Citie that does far surpas,
And this bright Angels towre quite dims that towre of glas."[10]

59

"Most trew," then said the holy aged man;
"Yet is Cleopolis for earthly frame,
The fairest peece, that eye beholden can:
And well beseemes all knights of noble name,
That covet in th'immortall booke of fame
To be eternized, that same to haunt,
And doen their service to that soveraigne Dame,[11]

---

[1] pleasaunt Mount Parnassus, the home of the nine Muses who govern the arts and learning.

[2] lay song.

[3] Citie of the great king Mount Zion.

[4] blessed Angels to and fro descend Jacob's vision in which "he dreamed that there was a ladder set up on the earth, and the top of it reached to heaven; and behold, the angels of God were ascending and descending on it!" (Genesis 28:12-13).

[5] new Hierusalem See Revelation 21:10-21.

[6] His chosen people … was kilt See 1 John 2:2: "and he is the expiation for our sins, and not for ours only but also for the sins of the whole world."

[7] Now are they Saints all in that Citie sam allusion to Ephesians 2:19: "So then you are no longer strangers and sojourners, but you are fellow citizens with the saints and members of the household of God."

[8] Cleopolis city of glory or earthly fame, identified with London (Variorum).

[9] Panthea meaning, "All the gods" (i.e., the Greek Pantheon), identified with Westminster Abbey (Variorum).

[10] towre of glas possibly Windsor Castle, but more likely Elizabeth I's palace at Richmond whose old name was the Palace of Shene (Variorum).

[11] that soveraigne Dame Gloriana.

That glorie does to them for guerdon[1] graunt:
For she is heavenly borne, and heaven may justly vaunt.[2]

60

And thou faire ymp, sprong out from English race,
How ever now accompted[3] Elfins sonne,
Well worthy doest thy service for her grace,
To aide a virgin desolate foredonne.
But when thou famous victorie hast wonne,
And high emongst all knights hast hong thy shield,
Thenceforth the suit of earthly conquest shonne,
And wash thy hands from guilt of bloudy field:
For bloud can nought but sin, and wars but sorrowes yield.

61

Then seeke this path, that I to thee presage,[4]
Which after all to heaven shall thee send;
Then peaceably thy painefull pilgrimage
To yonder same Hierusalem do bend,
Where is for thee ordaind a blessed end:
For thou emongst those Saints, whom thou doest see,
Shalt be a Saint, and thine owne nations frend
And Patrone: thou Saint George[5] shalt called bee,
Saint George of mery England, the signe of victoree."

62

"Unworthy wretch," quoth he, "of so great grace,
How dare I thinke such glory to attaine?"
"These that have it attaind, were in like cace," Quoth he, "as wretched, and liv'd in like paine."
"But deeds of armes must I at last be faine,[6]
And Ladies love to leave so dearely bought?"
"What need of armes, where peace doth ay remaine,"
Said he, "and battailes none are to be fought?
As for loose loves are vaine, and vanish into nought."

63

"O let me not," quoth he, "then turne againe
Backe to the world, whose joyes so fruitlesse are;
But let me here for aye in peace remaine,
Or streight way on that last long voyage fare,
That nothing may my present hope empare."[7]
"That may not be," said he, "ne maist thou yit
Forgo that royall maides bequeathed care,
Who did her cause into thy hand commit,
Till from her cursed foe thou have her freely quit."

64

"Then shall I soone," quoth he, "so God me grace,
Abet[8] that virgins cause disconsolate,
And shortly backe returne unto this place,
To walke this way in Pilgrims poore estate.
But now aread, old father, why of late
Didst thou behight me borne of English blood,

---

1 guerdon reward, recompense.

2 vaunt boast.

3 accompted accounted.

4 presage point out, make known.

5 Saint George patron saint of England, whose story can be found in Jacopus Voragine's Golden Legend. While he became a popular figure like King Arthur or Robin Hood, he was originally an eastern saint who killed a dragon threatening the citizens of Silene, Libya. However, he did so after the citizens indicated their willingness to be baptized by him. Thus he represents a type of Christ as soldier/victor (Spenser Encycl., p. 329c) and encapsulates Redcrosse's transformation from the earthly man to the spiritual man.

6 faine well-disposed, content.

7 empare impair.

8 Abet support, uphold.

Whom all a Faeries sonne doen nominate?"[1]
"That word shall I," said he, "auouchen[2] good,
Sith to thee is unknowne the cradle of thy brood.

65

For well I wote, thou springst from ancient race
Of Saxon kings, that have with mightie hand
And many bloudie battailes fought in place
High reard their royall throne in Britane land,
And vanquisht them, unable to withstand:
From thence a Faerie thee unweeting reft,[3]
There as thou slepst in tender swadling band,
And her base Elfin brood there for thee left.
Such men do Chaungelings call, so chaungd by Faeries theft.

66

Thence she thee brought into this Faerie lond,
And in an heaped furrow did thee hyde,
Where thee a Ploughman all unweeting fond,
As he his toylesome teme that way did guyde,
And brought thee up in ploughmans state to byde,
Whereof Georgos[4] he thee gave to name;
Till prickt with courage, and thy forces pryde,
To Faery court thou cam'st to seeke for fame,
And prove thy puissant armes, as seemes thee best became."

67

"O holy Sire," quoth he, "how shall I quight[5]
The many favours I with thee have found,
That hast my name and nation red aright,
And taught the way that does to heaven bound?"
This said, adowne he looked to the ground,
To have returnd, but dazed were his eyne,
Through passing brightnesse, which did quite confound
His feeble sence, and too exceeding shyne.
So darke are earthly things compard to things divine.

68

At last whenas himselfe he gan to find,
To Una back he cast him to retire;
Who him awaited still with pensive mind.
Great thankes and goodly meed to that good syre,
He thence departing gave for his paines hyre.
So came to Una, who him joyd to see,
And after litle rest, gan him desire,
Of her adventure mindfull for to bee.
So leave they take of Cœlia, and her daughters three.

Canto XI

The knight with that old Dragon[6] fights two dayes incessantly: The third him overthrowes, and gayns most glorious victory.

1

High time now gan it wex for Una faire,
To thinke of those her captive Parents[7] deare,
And their forwasted kingdome to repaire:
Whereto whenas they now approched neare,
With hartie[8] words her knight she gan to cheare,
And in her modest manner thus bespake;
"Deare knight, as deare, as ever knight was deare,
That all these sorrowes suffer for my sake,
High heaven behold the tedious toyle, ye for me take.

---

1 nominate designate.
2 auouchen confirm, vouch for.
3 reft taken.
4 Georgos For the name's etymology, see I.x.52, note 8. His identity as a labourer links St. George to the title figure of Langland's Piers Plowman, a very popular medieval allegory of the ideal Christian life.
5 quight repay, requite.
6 that old Dragon See Revelation 20:2: "And he seized the dragon, that ancient serpent, who is the Devil and Satan, and bound him for a thousand years."
7 Parents Una's parents, thrown out of their ideal kingdom by an invading serpent, are types for Adam and Eve.
8 hartie encouraging.

2

Now are we come unto my native soyle,
And to the place, where all our perils dwell;
Here haunts that feend, and does his dayly spoyle,
Therefore henceforth be at your keeping well,
And ever ready for your foeman fell.
The sparke of noble courage now awake,
And strive your excellent selfe to excell;
That shall ye evermore renowmed make,
Above all knights on earth, that batteill undertake.

3

And pointing forth, lo yonder is," said she,
"The brasen towre in which my parents deare
For dread of that huge feend emprisond be,
Whom I from far see on the walles appeare,
Whose sight my feeble soule doth greatly cheare:
And on the top of all I do espye
The watchman wayting tydings glad to heare,
That O my parents might I happily
Unto you bring, to ease you of your misery."

4

With that they heard a roaring hideous sound,
That all the ayre with terrour filled wide,
And seemd uneath to shake the stedfast ground.
Eftsoones that dreadfull Dragon they espide,
Where stretcht he lay upon the sunny side
Of a great hill,[1] himselfe like a great hill.
But all so soone, as he from far descried
Those glistring armes, that heaven with light did fill,
He rousd himselfe full blith,[2] and hastned them untill.[3]

5

Then bad the knight his Lady yede[4] aloofe,[5]
And to an hill her selfe with draw aside,
From whence she might behold that battailes proof
And eke be safe from daunger far descryde:[6]
She him obayd, and turnd a little wyde.
Now O thou sacred Muse,[7] most learned Dame,
Faire ympe of Phœbus, and his aged bride,
The Nourse of time, and everlasting fame,
That warlike hands ennoblest with immortall name;

6

O gently come into my feeble brest,
Come gently, but not with that mighty rage,
Wherewith the martiall troupes thou doest infest,[8]
And harts of great Heroës doest enrage,
That nought their kindled courage may aswage,
Soone as thy dreadfull trompe[9] begins to sownd;
The God of warre with his fiers equipage[10]
Thou doest awake, sleepe never he so sownd,
And scared nations doest with horrour sterne astownd.

7

Faire Goddesse lay that furious fit aside,
Till I of warres and bloudy Mars do sing,[11]
And Briton fields with Sarazin bloud bedyde,
Twixt that great faery Queene and Paynim king,[12]

---

1 great hill Traditionally, Eden is a great hill (Hamilton).

2 blith cheerful.

3 untill to (i.e., hastened to them).

4 yede go.

5 aloofe away, at a distance.

6 descryde observed, seen.

7 sacred Muse Clio, the Muse of history, here identified as the daughter of Apollo and Mnemonsyne, the goddess of memory. This new invocation heralds the Redcrosse Knight's most significant battle.

8 infest attack, assail.

9 trompe trumpet.

10 equipage equipment.

11 Till … sing adaptation of Virgil's "arma virumque cano" ("I sing of arms and a man") that opens the Aeneid.

12 great faery Queene and Paynim king Elizabeth I and the Roman Catholic Philip II of Spain (Hamilton).

That with their horrour heaven and earth did ring,
A worke of labour long, and endlesse prayse:
But now a while let downe that haughtie string,[1]
And to my tunes thy second tenor[2] rayse,
That I this man of God his godly armes may blaze.

8

By this the dreadfull Beast drew nigh to hand,
Halfe flying, and halfe footing in his hast,
That with his largenesse measured much land,
And made wide shadow under his huge wast;
As mountaine doth the valley overcast.
Approching nigh, he reared high afore
His body monstrous, horrible, and vast,
Which to increase his wondrous greatnesse more,
Was swolne, with wrath, and poyson, and with bloudy gore.

9

And over, all with brasen[3] scales was armd,
Like plated coate of steele, so couched neare,
That nought mote perce, ne might his corse be harmd
With dint of sword, nor push of pointed speare;[4]
Which as an Eagle, seeing pray appeare,
His aery plumes doth rouze, full rudely dight,
So shaked he, that horrour was to heare,
For as the clashing of an Armour bright,
Such noyse his rouzed scales did send unto the knight.

10

His flaggy[5] wings when forth he did display,
Were like two sayles, in which the hollow wynd
Is gathered full, and worketh speedy way:
And eke the pennes,[6] that did his pineons[7] bynd,
Were like mayne-yards,[8] with flying canvas lynd,
With which whenas him list the ayre to beat,
And there by force unwonted passage find,
The cloudes before him fled for terrour great,
And all the heavens stood still amazed with his threat.

11

His huge long tayle[9] wound up un hundred foldes,
Does overspred his long bras-scaly backe,
Whose wreathed boughts[10] when ever he unfoldes,
And thicke entangled knots adown does slacke,
Bespotted as with shields of red and blacke,
It sweepeth all the land behind him farre,
And of three furlongs[11] does but litle lacke;
And at the point two stings in-fixed arre,
Both deadly sharpe, that sharpest steele exceeden farre.

12

But stings and sharpest steele did far exceed
The sharpnesse of his cruell rending clawes;
Dead was it sure, as sure as death in deed,
What ever thing does touch his ravenous pawes,
Or what within his reach he ever drawes.
But his most hideous head my toung to tell
Does tremble: for his deepe devouring jawes

---

1 let downe that haughtie string loosen the high-pitched string to lower the pitch.

2 second tenor lower strain or pitch.

3 brasen brassy.

4 Like plated … pointed speare The dragon looks like Leviathan: "His back is made of rows of shields, shut up closely as with a seal. One is so near to another that no air can come between them. They are joined one to another; they clasp each other and cannot be separated" (Job 41:15-17).

5 flaggy drooping, pendulous.

6 pennes feathers.

7 pineons shafts of the feathers.

8 mayne-yards yard arms.

9 huge long tayle The "great red dragon" of Revelation has a tail that "swept down a third of the stars in heaven, and cast them to the earth" (12:3-4).

10 boughts coils, folds.

11 three furlongs three eighths of a mile.

Wide gaped, like the griesly mouth of hell,[1]
Through which into his darke abisse all ravin[2] fell.

13

And that more wondrous was, in either jaw
Three ranckes of yron teeth[3] enraunged were,
In which yet trickling bloud and gobbets raw
Of late devoured bodies did appeare,
That sight thereof bred cold congealed feare:
Which to increase, and all atonce to kill,
A cloud of smoothering smoke and sulphur seare
Out of his stinking gorge forth steemed still,
That all the ayre about with smoke and stench did fill.

14

His blazing eyes, like two bright shining shields,
Did burne with wrath, and sparkled living fyre;
As two broad Beacons, set in open fields,
Send forth their flames farre off to every shyre,[4]
And warning give, that enemies conspyre,
With fire and sword the region to invade;
So flam'd his eyne with rage and rancorous yre:
But farre within, as in a hollow glade,
Those glaring lampes were set, that made a dreadfull shade.

15

So dreadfully he towards him did pas,[5]
Forelifting up aloft his speckled brest,
And often bounding on the brused gras,
As for great joyance of his newcome guest.
Eftsoones he gan advaunce his haughtie crest,
As chauffed Bore[6] his bristles doth upreare,
And shoke his scales to battell readie drest;
That made the Redcrosse knight nigh quake for feare,
As bidding bold defiance to his foeman neare.

16

The knight gan fairely couch his steadie speare,
And fiercely ran at him with rigorous might:
The pointed steele arriving rudely theare,[7]
His harder hide would neither perce, nor bight,
But glauncing by forth passed forward right;
Yet sore amoved with so puissant push,
The wrathfull beast about him turned light,
And him so rudely passing by, did brush
With his long tayle, that horse and man to ground did rush.

17

Both horse and man up lightly rose againe,
And fresh encounter towards him addrest:
But th'idle stroke yet backe recoyld in vaine,
And found no place his deadly point to rest.
Exceeding rage enflam'd the furious beast,
To be avenged of so great despight;
For never felt his imperceable brest
So wondrous force, from hand of living wight;
Yet had he prov'd the powre of many a puissant knight.

18

Then with his waving wings displayed wyde,
Himselfe up high he lifted from the ground,
And with strong flight did forcibly divide[8]
The yielding aire, which nigh too feeble found
Her flitting partes, and element unsound,[9]
To beare so great a weight: he cutting way
With his broad sayles, about him soared round:
At last low stouping with unweldie sway,[10]
Snatcht up both horse and man, to beare them quite away.

---

[1] griesly mouth of hell Traditionally, in medieval mystery plays for example, hellmouth is represented as the gaping mouth of a fish or dragon (Variorum).

[2] ravin plunder, prey.

[3] Three ranckes of yron teeth See the description of Leviathan (Job 41:14) and the beast in Daniel's vision: "and it had great iron teeth" (Daniel 7:7).

[4] shyre region (county).

[5] pas pace.

[6] chauffed Bore When a wild boar is cornered, it mounts a last enraged charge at the hunters.

[7] theare there.

[8] divide pass through.

[9] unsound lacking solidity.

[10] unweldie sway massive force.

19

Long he them bore above the subject plaine,
So farre as Ewghen bow[1] a shaft may send,
Till struggling strong did him at last constraine,
To let them downe before his flightes end:
As hagard[2] hauke presuming to contend
With hardie fowle, above his hable might,[3]
His wearie pounces all in vaine doth spend,
To trusse[4] the pray too heavie for his flight;
Which comming downe to ground, does free it selfe by fight.

20

He so desseized[5] of his gryping grosse,[6]
The knight his thrillant[7] speare againe assayd
In his bras-plated body to embosse,
And three mens strength unto the stroke he layd;
Wherewith the stiffe beame quaked, as affrayd,
And glauncing from his scaly necke, did glyde
Close under his left wing, then broad displayd.
The percing steele there wrought a wound full wyde,
That with the uncouth smart the Monster lowdly cryde.

21

He cryde, as raging seas are wont to rore,
When wintry storme his wrathfull wreck does threat,
The rolling billowes beat the ragged shore,
As they the earth would shoulder from her seat,
And greedie gulfe does gape, as he would eat
His neighbour element[8] in his revenge:
Then gin the blustring brethen boldly threat,
To move the world from off his stedfast henge,[9]
And boystrous battell make, each other to avenge.

22

The steely head stucke fast still in his flesh,
Till with his cruell clawes he snatcht the wood,
And quite a sunder broke. Forth flowed fresh
A gushing river of blacke goarie blood,
That drowned all the land, whereon he stood;
The streame thereof would drive a water-mill.
Trebly augmented was his furious mood
With bitter sense of his deepe rooted ill,
That flames of fire he threw forth from his large nose thrill.[10]

23

His hideous tayle then hurled he about,
And therewith all enwrapt the nimble thyes
Of his froth-fomy steed, whose courage stout
Striving to loose the knot, that fast him tyes,
Himselfe in streighter[11] bandes too rash implyes,[12]
That to the ground he is perforce constraynd
To throw his rider: who can quickly ryse
From off the earth, with durty bloud distaynd,
For that reprochfull fall right fowly he disdaynd.

24

And fiercely tooke his trenchand[13] blade in hand,
With which he stroke so furious and so fell,
That nothing seemd the puissance could withstand:
Upon his crest the hardned yron fell,
But his more hardned crest was armd so well,
That deeper dint therein it would not make;
Yet so extremely did the buffe[14] him quell,
That from thenceforth he shund the like to take,
But when he saw them come, he did them still forsake.

---

1 Ewghen bow bow made of yew, a strong wood that is also a symbol of sadness.
2 hagard untamed hawk.
3 hable might proper power or strength.
4 trusse carry away.
5 desseized dispossessed, a legal term (Hamilton).
6 gryping grosse rough grasping.
7 thrillant piercing.
8 neighbour element i.e., the earth.
9 henge axis.
10 nose thrill nostril.
11 streighter narrower, tighter.
12 implyes entangles.
13 trenchand sharp.
14 buffe stroke, blow.

25

The knight was wrath to see his stroke beguyld,
And smote againe with more outrageous might;
But backe againe the sparckling steele recoyld,
And left not any marke, where it did light;
As if in Adamant rocke it had bene pight.[1]
The beast impatient of his smarting wound,
And of so fierce and forcible despight,[2]
Thought with his wings to stye[3] above the ground;
But his late wounded wing unserviceable found.

26

Then full of griefe and anguish vehement,
He lowdly brayd, that like was never heard,
And from his wide devouring oven sent
A flake of fire, that flashing in his beard,
Him all amazd, and almost made affeard:
The scorching flame sore swinged all his face,
And through his armour all his bodie seard,
That he could not endure so cruell cace,
But thought his armes to leave, and helmet to unlace.

27

Not that great Champion[4] of the antique world,
Whom famous Poetes verse so much doth vaunt,
And hath for twelve huge labours high extold,
So many furies and sharpe fits did haunt,
When him the poysoned garment did enchaunt
With Centaures bloud, and bloudie verses charm'd,
As did this knight twelve thousand dolours daunt,
Whom fyrie steele now burnt, that earst him arm'd,
That erst him goodly arm'd, now most of all him harm'd.

28

Faint, wearie, sore, emboyled, grieved, brent
With heat, toyle, wounds, armes, smart, and inward fire
That never man such mischiefes did torment;
Death better were, death did he oft desire,
But death will never come, when needes require.
Whom so dismayd when that his foe beheld,
He cast to suffer him no more respire,
But gan his sturdie sterne about to weld,
And him so strongly stroke, that to the ground him feld.

29

If fortuned (as faire it then befell)
Behind his backe unweeting, where he stood,
Of auncient time there was a springing well,
From which fast trickled forth a silver flood,
Full of great vertues, and for med'cine good.
Whylome,[5] before that cursed Dragon got
That happie land, and all with innocent blood
Defyld those sacred waves, it rightly hot
The well of life,[6] ne yet his vertues had forgot.

30

For unto life the dead it could restore,[7]
And guilt of sinfull crimes cleane wash away,
Those that with sicknesse were infected sore,
It could recure, and aged long decay
Renew, as one were borne that very day.
Both Silo[8] this, and Jordan[9] did excell,
And th'English Bath,[10] and eke the german Spau,[11]

---

1 pight thrust.

2 despight injury.

3 stye ascend.

4 great Champion Hercules, whose wife gave him a poisoned shirt, thinking the poison was a love potion, after he returned home with a second wife. It killed him and she later killed herself (Dict. Gods and Mortals).

5 Whylome at one time.

6 The well of life See John 4:14: "Whoever drinks of the water I shall give him will never thirst; the water that I shall give him will become in him a spring of water welling up to eternal life."

7 unto life the dead it could restore See John 3:5: "Unless one is born of water and the Spirit, he cannot enter the kingdom of God."

8 Silo Siloam, a pool of healing water.

9 Jordan the river in which Naaman's leprosy was cured (2 Kings 5:10) and in which Jesus was baptized by John (Matthew 3:16).

10 Bath a city in England with a number of natural hot springs, reputedly of therapeutic value.

11 Spau a curative mineral spring in Belgium.

Ne can Cephise,[1] nor Hebrus[2] match this well:
Into the same the knight backe overthrowen, fell.

31

Now gan the golden Phœbus for to steepe
His fierie face in billowes of the west,
And his faint steedes watred in Ocean deepe,
Whiles from their journall labours they did rest,
When that infernall Monster, having kest[3]
His wearie foe into that living well,
Can high advaunce his broad discoloured brest,
Above his wonted pitch,[4] with countenance fell,[5]
And clapt his yron wings, as victor he did dwell.

32

Which when his pensive Ladie saw from farre,
Great woe and sorrow did her soule assay,
As weening that the sad end of the warre,
And gan to highest God entirely pray,
That feared chance from her to turne away;
With folded hands and knees full lowly bent
All night she watcht, ne once adowne would lay
Her daintie limbs in her sad dreriment,
But praying still did wake,[6] and waking did lament.

33

The morrow next gan early to appeare,
That Titan[7] rose to runne his daily race;
But early ere the morrow next gan reare
Out of the sea faire Titans deawy face,
Up rose the gentle virgin from her place,
And looked all about, if she might spy
Her loved knight to move his manly pace:
For she had great doubt of his safety,
Since late she saw him fall before his enemy.

34

At last she saw, where he upstarted brave
Out of the well, wherein he drenched lay;
As Eagle[8] fresh out of the Ocean wave,
Where he hath left his plumes all hoary gray,
And deckt himselfe with feathers youthly gay,
Like Eyas hauke[9] up mounts unto the skies,
His newly budded pineons to assay,
And marveiles at himselfe, still as he flies:
So new the new-borne knight to battell new did rise.

35

Whom when the damned feend so fresh did spy,
No wonder if he wondred at the sight,
And doubted, whether his late enemy
It were, or other new supplied knight.
He, now to prove his late renewed might,
High brandishing his bright deaw-burning[10] blade,
Upon his crested scalpe so sore did smite,
That to the scull a yawning wound it made:
The deadly dint his dulled senses all dismaid.

36

I wote not, whether the revenging steele
Were hardned with that holy water dew,
Wherein he fell, or sharper edge did feele,
Or his baptized hands now greater grew;
Or other secret vertue did ensew;
Else never could the force of fleshly arme,
Ne molten mettall in his bloud embrew:
For till that stownd could never wight him harme,
By subtilty, nor slight, nor might, nor mighty charme.

---

[1] Cephise a river in Boetia, on whose banks stood the temple to Themis (OCD).

[2] Hebrus a river in Thrace, into which the head of Orpheus was thrown by the Bacchantes after they tore him to bits (OCD).

[3] kest cast.

[4] pitch height.

[5] fell fierce, savage.

[6] All night … did wake See Matthew 26:41: "Watch and pray that you may not enter into temptation; the spirit is indeed willing, but the flesh is weak."

[7] Titan the sun.

[8] Eagle See Psalm 103:5: "Your youth is renewed like an eagle." It was believed that every ten years the eagle soars into the sun and then plunges into the sea to moult the old feathers and acquire new ones (Variorum).

[9] Eyas hauke young, untamed hawk.

[10] deaw-burning shining with water.

37

The cruell wound enraged him so sore,
That loud he yelded for exceeding paine;
As hundred ramping Lyons seem'd to rore,
Whom ravenous hunger did thereto constraine:
Then gan he tosse aloft his stretched traine,
And therewith scourge the buxome[1] aire so sore,
That to his force to yeelden it was faine;
Ne ought his sturdie strokes might stand afore,
That high trees overthrew, and rocks in peeces tore.

38

The same advauncing high above his head,
With sharpe intended[2] sting so rude him smot,[3]
That to the earth him drove, as stricken dead,
Ne living wight would have him life behot:[4]
The mortall sting his angry needle shot
Quite through his shield, and in his shoulder seasd,[5]
Where fast it stucke, ne would there out be got:
The griefe thereof him wondrous sore diseasd,
Ne might his ranckling paine with patience be appeasd.

39

But yet more mindfull of his honour deare,
Then of the grievous smart, which him did wring,
From loathed soile he can him lightly reare,
And strove to loose the farre infixed sting:
Which when in vaine he tryde with struggeling,
Inflam'd with wrath, his raging blade he heft,
And strooke so strongly, that the knotty string
Of his huge taile he quite a sunder cleft,
Five joynts thereof he hewd, and but the stump him left.

40

Hart cannot thinke, what outrage, and what cryes,
With foule enfouldred[6] smoake and flashing fire,
The hell-bred beast threw forth into the skyes,
That all was covered with darknesse dire:
Then fraught with rancour, and engorgd ire,
He cast at once him to avenge for all,
And gathering up himselfe out of the mire,
With his uneven wings did fiercely fall
Upon his sunne-bright shield, and gript it fast withall.

41

Much was the man encombred with his hold,
In feare to lose his weapon in his paw,
Ne wist yet, how his talents to unfold;
Nor harder was from Cerberus greedie jaw
To plucke a bone, then from his cruell claw
To reave[7] by strength the griped gage[8] away:
Thrise he assayd it from his foot to draw,
And thrise in vaine to draw it did assay,
It booted nought to thinke, to robbe him of his pray.

42

Tho when he saw no power might prevaile,
His trustie sword he cald to his last aid,
Wherewith he fiercely did his foe assaile,
And double blowes about him stoutly laid,
That glauncing fire out of the yron plaid;
As sparckles from the Andvile[9] use to fly,
When heavie hammers on the wedge are swaid;
Therewith at last he forst him to unty
One of his grasping feete, him to defend thereby.

43

The other foot, fast fixed on his shield,
Whenas no strength, nor stroks mote him constraine

---

1 buxome unresisting.
2 intended outstretched, extended.
3 smot smote.
4 behot promised, warranted.
5 seasd fixed.
6 enfouldred black as a thundercloud.
7 reave steal, rob.
8 gage pawn, pledge over which they fight.
9 Andvile anvil.

To loose, ne yet the warlike pledge to yield,
He smot thereat with all his might and maine,
That nought so wondrous puissance might sustaine;
Upon the joynt the lucky steele did light,
And made such way, that hewd it quite in twaine;
The paw yet missed not his minisht might,
But hong still on the shield, as it first was pight.

44

For griefe thereof, and divelish despight,
From his infernall fournace forth he threw
Huge flames, that dimmed all the heavens light,
Enrold in duskish smoke and brimstone blew;
As burning Aetna[1] from his boyling stew
Doth belch out flames, and rockes in peeces broke,
And ragged ribs of mountaines molten new,
Enwrapt in coleblacke clouds and filthy smoke,
That all the land with stench, and heaven with horror choke.

45

The heate whereof, and harmefull pestilence
So sore him noyd, that forst him to retire
A little backward for his best defence,
To save his bodie from the scorching fire,
Which he from hellish entrailes did expire.
It chaunst (eternall God that chaunce did guide)
As he recoyled backward, in the mire
His nigh forwearied feeble feet did slide,
And downe he fell, with dread of shame sore terrifide.

46

There grew a goodly tree[2] him faire beside,
Loaden with fruit and apples rosie red,
As they in pure vermilion[3] had beene dide,
Whereof great vertues over all were red:
For happie life to all, which thereon fed,
And life eke everlasting did befall:
Great God it planted in that blessed sted
With his almightie hand, and did it call
The tree of life,[4] the crime of our first fathers fall.

47

In all the world like was not to be found,
Save in that soile, where all good things did grow,
And freely sprong out of the fruitfull ground,
As incorrupted Nature did them sow,
Till that dread Dragon all did overthrow.
Another like faire tree eke grew thereby,
Whereof who so did eat, eftsoones did kno
Both good and ill: O mornefull memory:
That tree through one mans fault hath doen us all to dy.

48

From that first tree forth flowd, as from a well,
A trickling streame of Balme,[5] most soveraine
And daintie deare, which on the ground still fell,
And overflowed all the fertill plaine,
As it had deawed bene with timely raine:
Life and long health that gratious ointment gave,
And deadly woundes could heale, and reare againe
The senselesse corse appointed for the grave.
Into that same he fell: which did from death him save.

49

For nigh thereto the ever damned beast
Durst not approch, for he was deadly made,
And all that life preservd, did detest:
Yet he it oft adventur'd to invade.
By this the drouping day-light gan to fade,
And yeeld his roome to sad succeeding night,

---

[1] Aetna volcano in Italy, allusion to Virgil, Aeneid 3.5716-17 (Variorum).

[2] a goodly tree allusion to Revelation 2:7: "To him who conquers I will grant to eat of the tree of life, which is in the paradise of God" (i.e., in Eden).

[3] vermilion bright red.

[4] tree of life Because Adam and Eve had already eaten from the Tree of Knowledge, God cast them out of the garden to keep them from also eating from the Tree of Life, which grants eternal life. See Genesis 3:22-23.

[5] Balme healing ointment.

Who with her sable mantle gan to shade
The face of earth, and wayes of living wight,
And high her burning torch set up in heaven bright.

50

When gentle Una saw the second fall[1]
Of her deare knight, who wearie of long fight,
And faint through losse of bloud, mov'd not at all,
But lay as in a dreame of deepe delight,
Besmeard with pretious Balme,[2] whose virtuous might
Did heale his wounds, and scorching heat alay,
Againe she stricken was with sore affright,
And for his safetie gan devoutly pray;
And watch the noyous night, and wait for joyous day.

51

The joyous day gan early to appeare,
And faire Aurora[3] from the deawy bed
Of aged Tithone gan her selfe to reare,
With rosie cheekes, for shame as blushing red;
Her golden lockes for haste were loosely shed
About her eares, when Una her did marke
Clymbe to her charet, all with flowers spred,
From heaven high to chase the chearelesse darke;
With merry note her loud salutes the mounting larke.

52

Then freshly up arose the doughtie[4] knight,
All healed of his hurts and woundes wide,
And did himselfe to battell readie dight;[5]
Whose early foe awaiting him beside
To have devourd, so soone as day he spyde,
When now he saw himselfe so freshly reare,
As if late fight had nought him damnifyde,[6]
He woxe dismayd, and gan his fate to feare;
Nathlesse with wonted rage he him advaunced neare.

53

And in his first encounter, gaping wide,
He thought attonce him to have swallowd quight,
And rusht upon him with outragious pride;
Who him r'encountring fierce, as hauke in flight,
Perforce rebutted backe. The weapon bright
Taking advantage of his open jaw,
Ran through his mouth with so importune[7] might,
That deepe emperst his darksome hollow maw,
And back retyrd, his life bloud forth with all did draw.

54

So downe he fell, and forth his life did breath,
That vanisht into smoke and cloudes swift;
So downe he fell,[8] that th'earth him underneath
Did grone, as feeble so great load to lift;
So downe he fell, as an huge rockie clift,
Whose false foundation waves have washt away,
With dreadfull poyse is from the mayneland rift,
And rolling downe, great Neptune doth dismay;
So downe he fell, and like an heaped mountaine lay.

55

The knight himselfe even trembled at his fall,
So huge and horrible a masse it seem'd;
And his deare Ladie, that beheld it all,
Durst not approch for dread, which she misdeem'd,

---

1 second fall See Revelation 2:11: "He who has an ear, let him hear what the Spirit says to the churches. He who conquers shall not be hurt by the second death."

2 pretious Balme See Revelation 22:2: "... the tree of life with its twelve kinds of fruit, yielding its fruit each month; and the leaves of the tree were for the healing of the nations."

3 Aurora dawn; see Odyssey, Book 5.

4 doughtie valiant, brave.

5 dight prepare, equip.

6 damnifyde injured.

7 importune grievous, heavy.

8 So downe he fell … So downe he fell See Revelation 14:8: "Fallen, fallen is Babylon the great, she who made all nations drink the wine of her impure passion."

But yet at last, when as the direfull feend
She saw not stirre, off-shaking vaine affright,
She nigher drew, and saw that joyous end:
Then God she praysd, and thankt her faithfull knight,
That had atchiev'd so great a conquest by his might.

Canto XII

Faire Una to the Redcrosse knight
betrouthed is with joy:
Though false Duessa it to barre her false sleights[1] doe imploy.

1

Behold I see the haven nigh at hand,
To which I meane my wearie course to bend;
Vere[2] the maine shete,[3] and beare up with the land,
The which afore is fairely to be kend,
And seemeth safe from stormes, that may offend;
There this faire virgin wearie of her way
Must landed be, now at her journeys end:
There eke my feeble barke[4] a while may stay,
Till merry wind and weather call her thence away.

2

Scarsely had Phœbus in the glooming East
Yet harnessed his firie-footed teeme,
Ne reard above the earth his flaming creast,
When the last deadly smoke aloft did steeme,
That signe of last outbreathed life did seeme,
Unto the watchman on the castle wall;
Who thereby dead that balefull Beast did deeme,
And to his Lord and Ladie lowd gan call,
To tell, how he had seene the Dragons fatall fall.

3

Uprose with hastie joy, and feeble speed
That aged Sire, the Lord of all that land,
And looked forth, to weet, if true indeede
Those tydings were, as he did understand,
Which whenas true by tryall he out fond,
He bad to open wyde his brazen gate,
Which long time had bene shut, and out of hond
Proclaymed joy and peace through all his state;
For dead now was their foe, which them forrayed[5] late.

4

Then gan triumphant Trompets sound on hie,
That sent to heaven the ecchoed report
Of their new joy, and happie victorie
Gainst him, that had them long opprest with tort,[6]
And fast imprisoned in sieged fort.
Then all the people, as in solemne feast,
To him assembled with one full consort,[7]
Rejoycing at the fall of that great beast,
From whose eternall bondage now they were releast.

5

Forth came that auncient Lord and aged Queene,
Arayd in antique robes downe to the ground,
And sad habiliments[8] right well beseene;
A noble crew about them waited round
Of sage and sober Peres, all gravely gownd;
Whom farre before did march a goodly band
Of tall young men, all hable armes to sownd,
But now they laurell[9] braunches bore in hand;
Glad signe of victorie and peace in all their land.

6

Unto that doughtie Conquerour they came,
And him before themselves prostrating low,
Their Lord and Patrone loud did him proclame,

---

1 sleights tricks, deceits.
2 Vere let out a sail so that it holds less wind (Hamilton).
3 maine shete main sail.
4 barke small ship.
5 forrayed raided, pillaged.
6 tort wrong, injury.
7 consort accord, with the musical connotation of "ensemble."
8 habiliments attire, clothes.
9 laurell emblem of victory.

And at his feet their laurell boughes did throw.[1]
Soone after them all dauncing on a row
The comely virgins came, with girlands dight,
As fresh as flowres in medow greene do grow,
When morning deaw upon their leaves doth light:
And in their hands sweet Timbrels[2] all upheld on hight.

7

And them before, the fry[3] of children young
Their wanton sports and childish mirth did play,
And to the Maydens sounding tymbrels sung
In well attuned notes, a joyous lay,
And made delightfull musicke all the way,
Untill they came, where that faire virgin[4] stood;
As faire Diana in fresh sommers day
Beholds her Nymphes, enraung'd in shadie wood,
Some wrestle, some do run, some bathe in christall flood.

8

So she beheld those maydens meriment
With chearefull vew; who when to her they came,
Themselves to ground with gratious humblesse bent,
And her ador'd by honorable name,
Lifting to heaven her everlasting fame:
Then on her head they set a girland[5] greene,
And crowned her twixt earnest and twixt game;
Who in her selfe-resemblance well beseene,
Did seeme such, as she was, a goodly maiden Queene.

9

And after, all the raskall many ran,
Heaped together in rude rablement,
To see the face of that victorious man:
Whom all admired, as from heaven sent,
And gazd upon with gaping wonderment.
But when they came, where that dead Dragon lay,
Stretcht on the ground in monstrous large extent,
The sight with idle feare did them dismay,
Ne durst approch him nigh, to touch, or once assay.[6]

10

Some feard, and fled; some feard and well it faynd;
One that would wiser seeme, then all the rest,
Warnd him not touch, for yet perhaps remaynd
Some lingring life within his hollow brest,
Or in his wombe might lurke some hidden nest
Of many Dragonets,[7] his fruitfull seed;
Another said, that in his eyes did rest
Yet sparckling fire, and bad thereof take heed;
Another said, he saw him move his eyes indeed.

11

One mother, when as her foolehardie child
Did come too neare, and with his talants play,
Halfe dead through feare, her litle babe revyld,
And to her gossips gan in counsell say;
How can I tell, but that his talants may
Yet scratch my sonne, or rend his tender hand?
So diversly themselves in vaine they fray;
Whiles some more bold, to measure him nigh stand,
To prove how many acres he did spread of land.

12

Thus flocked all the folke him round about,
The whiles that hoarie king, with all his traine,
Being arrived, where that champion stout

---

1 And him before … laurell boughes did throw allusion to John 12:12-13: "The next day a great crowd who had come to the feast heard that Jesus was coming to Jerusalem. So they took branches of palm trees and went out to meet him, crying, 'Hosanna! Blessed is he who comes in the name of the Lord, even the King of Israel!'"

2 Timbrels tambourines.

3 fry swarm, crowd (of the young).

4 that faire virgin Una.

5 girland garland.

6 But when they came … or once assay See Virgil, Aeneid Book 8, where a monster is killed by Hercules, also Ovid, Metamorphoses, Book 8 where a crowd avoids the slain Caledonian boar (Variorum).

7 Dragonets young dragons.

After his foes defeasance[1] did remaine,
His goodly greetes, and faire does entertaine,
With princely gifts of yvorie and gold,[2]
And thousand thankes him yeelds for all his paine.
Then when his daughter deare he does behold,
Her dearely doth imbrace, and kisseth manifold.

13

And after to his Pallace he them brings,
With shaumes,[3] and trompets, and with Clarions[4] sweet;
And all the way the joyous people sings,[5]
And with their garments strowes the paved street:[6]
Whence mounting up, they find purveyance[7] meet
Of all, that royall Princes court became,
And all the floore was underneath their feet
Bespred with costly scarlot of great name,
On which they lowly sit, and fitting purpose frame.

14

What needs me tell their feast and goodly guize,
In which was nothing riotous nor vaine?
What needs of daintie dishes to devize,
Of comely services, or courtly trayne?
My narrow leaves cannot in them containe
The large discourse of royall Princes state.
Yet was their manner then but bare and plaine:
For th'antique world excesse and pride did hate;
Such proud luxurious pompe is swollen up but late.

15

Then when with meates and drinkes of every kinde
Their fervent appetites they quenched had,
That auncient Lord gan fit occasion finde,
Of straunge adventures, and of perils sad,
Which in his travell him befallen had,
For to demound of his renowmed guest:
Who then with utt'rance grave, and count'nance sad,
From point to point, as is before exprest,
Discourst his voyage long, according his request.

16

Great pleasure mixt with pittifull regard,
That godly King and Queene did passionate,
Whiles they his pittifull adventures heard,
That oft they did lament his lucklesse state,
And often blame the too importune fate,
That heapd on him so many wrathfull wreakes:
For never gentle knight, as he of late,
So tossed was in fortunes cruell freakes;[8]
And all the while salt teares bedeawd the hearers cheaks.

17

Then said that royall Pere[9] in sober wise;
"Deare Sonne, great beene the evils, which ye bore
From first to last in your late enterprise,
That I note, whether prayse, or pitty more:
For never living man, I weene, so sore
In sea of deadly daungers was distrest;
But since now safe ye seised have the shore,
And well arrived are, (high God be blest)
Let us devize of ease and everlasting rest."

18

"Ah dearest Lord," said then that doughty knight,
"Of ease or rest I may not yet devize;[10]
For by the faith, which I to armes have plight,

---

1 defeasance defeat, overthrow.

2 gifts of yvorie and gold See Virgil, Aeneid, Book 3.

3 shaumes medieval double-reed instruments, like oboes.

4 Clarions brass instruments used as a signal in war.

5 With shaumes … people sings See Psalm 98:6: "With trumpets and the sound of the horn make a joyful noise before the King, the Lord!"

6 And with their garments strowes the paved street allusion to Christ entering Jerusalem: "And as he rode along, they spread their garments on the road" (Luke 19:36).

7 purveyance preparations.

8 freakes tricks.

9 Pere peer (i.e., noble).

10 devize conceive, think.

I bounden am streight after this emprize,
As that your daughter can ye well advize,
Backe to returne to that great Faerie Queene,
And her to serve six yeares[1] in warlike wize,
Gainst that proud Paynim king, that workes her teene:
Therefore I ought crave pardon, till I there have beene."

19

"Unhappie falles that hard necessitie," Quoth he, "the troubler of my happie peace,
And vowed foe of my felicitie;
Ne I against the same can justly preace:
But since that band ye cannot now release,
Nor doen undo; (for vowes may not be vaine)
Soone as the terme of those six yeares shall cease,
Ye then shall hither backe returne againe,
The marriage to accomplish vowd betwixt you twain.[2]

20

Which for my part I covet to performe,
In sort as through the world I did proclame,
That who so kild that monster most deforme,
And him in hardy battaile overcame,
Should have mine onely daughter to his Dame,
And of my kingdome heire apparaunt bee:
Therefore since now to thee perteines the same,
By dew desert of noble chevalree,
Both daughter and eke kingdome, lo I yield to thee."

21

Then forth he called that his daughter faire,
The fairest Un' his onely daughter deare,
His onely daughter, and his onely heyre;
Who forth proceeding with sad sober cheare,
As bright as doth the morning starre appeare
Out of the East, with flaming lockes bedight,
To tell that dawning day is drawing neare,
And to the world does bring long wished light;
So faire and fresh that Lady shewd her selfe in sight.

22

So faire and fresh, as freshest flowre in May;
For she had layd her mournefull stole aside,
And widow-like sad wimple throwne away,
Wherewith her heavenly beautie she did hide,
Whiles on her wearie journey she did ride;
And on her now a garment she did weare,
All lilly white, withoutten spot, or pride,[3]
That seemd like silke and silver woven neare,
But neither silke nor silver therein did appeare.

23

The blazing brightnesse of her beauties beame,
And glorious light of her sunshyny face
To tell, were as to strive against the streame.
My ragged rimes are all too rude and bace,
Her heavenly lineaments for to enchace.[4]
Ne wonder; for her owne deare loved knight,
All were she dayly with himselfe in place,
Did wonder much at her celestiall sight:
Oft had he seene her faire, but never so faire dight.

24

So fairely dight, when she in presence came,
She to her Sire made humble reverence,
And bowed low, that her right well became,
And added grace unto her excellence:
Who with great wisedome, and grave eloquence
Thus gan to say. But eare[5] he thus had said,
With flying speede, and seeming great pretence,

---

1 six yeares possibly an allusion to the six days of creation (Genesis 1), also to the six-year reign of the Roman Catholic Mary I and her Spanish husband Philip (1553-59) that preceded Elizabeth I (Hamilton).

2 marriage …betwixt you twain an allusion to Revelation 19:7 ("Let us rejoice and exult and give him the glory, for the marriage of the Lamb has come, and his Bride has made herself ready"), referring to the mystical union between Christ and the Church (Variorum).

3 All lilly white, withoutten spot, or pride an allusion to Song of Solomon 4:7: "You are all fair my love; there is no flaw in you." See also Revelation 19:7-8.

4 to enchace to serve as a setting for (her heavenly lineaments).

5 eare ere.

Came running in, much like a man dismaid,
A Messenger with letters, which his message said.

25

All in the open hall amazed stood,
At suddeinnesse of that unwarie[1] sight,
And wondred at his breathlesse hastie mood.
But he for nought would stay his passage right,
Till fast before the king he did alight;
Where falling flat, great humblesse[2] he did make,
And kist the ground, whereon his foot was pight;
Then to his hands that writ he did betake,
Which he disclosing, red thus, as the paper spake.

26

"To thee, most mighty king of Eden faire,
Her greeting sends in these sad lines addrest,
The wofull daughter, and forsaken heire
Of that great Emperour of all the West;
And bids thee be advized for the best,
Ere thou thy daughter linck in holy band
Of wedlocke to that new unknowen guest:
For he already plighted his right hand
Unto another love, and to another land.

27

To me sad mayd, or rather widow sad,
He was affiaunced long time before,
And sacred pledges he both gave, and had,
False erraunt knight, infamous, and forswore:[3]
Witnesse the burning Altars, which he swore,
And guiltie heavens of his bold perjury,
Which though he hath polluted oft of yore,
Yet I to them for judgement just do fly,
And them conjure t'avenge this shamefull injury.

28

Therefore since mine he is, or free or bond,
Or false or trew, or living or else dead,
Withhold, O soveraine Prince, your hasty hond
From knitting league with him, I you aread;
Ne weene my right with strength adowne to tread,
Through weakenesse of my widowhed, or woe:
For truth is strong, her rightfull cause to plead,
And shall find friends, if need requireth soe,
So bids thee well to fare, Thy neither friend, nor foe."

29

When he these bitter byting words had red,
The tydings straunge did him abashed make,
That still he sate long time astonished
As in great muse, ne word to creature spake.
At last his solemne silence thus he brake,
With doubtfull eyes fast fixed on his guest;
"Redoubted[4] knight, that for mine onely sake
Thy life and honour late adventurest,
Let nought be hid from me, that ought to be exprest.

30

What meane these bloudy vowes, and idle threats,
Throwne out from womanish impatient mind?
What heavens? what altars? what enraged heates
Here heaped up with termes of love unkind,[5]
My conscience cleare with guilty bands would bind?
High God be witnesse, that I guiltlesse ame.
But if your selfe, Sir knight, ye faultie find,
Or wrapped be in loves of former Dame,
With crime do not it cover, but disclose the same."

31

To whom the Redcrosse knight this answere sent,
"My Lord, my King, be nought hereat dismayd,
Till well ye wote by grave intendiment,[6]
What woman, and wherefore doth me upbrayd
With breach of love, and loyalty betrayd.
It was in my mishaps, as hitherward

[1] unwarie unexpected.
[2] humblesse humbleness, humility.
[3] forswore falsely sworn, perjured.
[4] Redoubted dread.
[5] unkind unsuitable, unnatural.
[6] intendiment attention, consideration.

I lately traveild, that unwares I strayd
Out of my way, through perils straunge and hard;
That day should faile me, ere I had them all declard.

32

There did I find, or rather I was found
Of this false woman, the Fidessa hight,
Fidessa hight the falsest Dame on ground,
Most false Duessa, royall richly dight,
That easie was t'invegle[1] weaker sight:
Who by her wicked arts, and wylie skill,
Too false and strong for earthly skill or might,
Unwares me wrought unto her wicked will,
And to my foe betrayd, when least I feared ill."

33

Then stepped forth the goodly royall Mayd,
And on the ground her selfe prostrating low,
With sober countenaunce thus to him sayd;
"O pardon me, my soveraigne Lord, to show
The secret treasons, which of late I know
To have bene wroght by that false sorceresse.
She onely she it is, that earst did throw
This gentle knight into so great distresse,
That death him did awaite in dayly wretchednesse.

34

And now it seemes, that she suborned hath
This craftie messenger with letters vaine,
To worke new woe and improvided scath,
By breaking of the band betwixt us twaine;
Wherein she used hath the practicke[2] paine
Of this false footman, clokt with simplenesse,
Whom if ye please for to discover plaine,
Ye shall him Archimago find, I ghesse,[3]
The falsest man alive; who tries shall find no lesse."

35

The king was greatly moved at her speach,
And all with suddein indignation fraight,
Bad on that Messenger rude hands to reach.
Eftsoones the Gard, which on his state did wait,
Attacht that faitor[4] false, and bound him strait:
Who seeming sorely chauffed at his band,
As chained Beare,[5] whom cruell dogs do bait,
With idle force did faine them to withstand,
And often semblaunce made to scape out of their hand.

36

But they him layd full low in dungeon deepe,
And bound him hand and foote with yron chains.
And with continuall watch did warely keepe;
Who then would thinke, that by his subtile trains[6]
He could escape fowle death or deadly paines?
Thus when that Princes wrath was pacifide,
He gan renew the late forbidden banes,[7]
And to the knight his daughter deare he tyde,
With sacred rites and vowes for ever to abyde.

37

His owne two hands the holy knots did knit,
That none but death for ever can devide;
His owne two hands, for such a turne most fit,
The housling fire did kindle and provide,
And holy water thereon sprinckled wide;
At which the bushy Teade[8] a groome did light,
And sacred lampe in secret chamber hide,
Where it should not be quenched day nor night,
For feare of evill fates, but burnen ever bright.

---

1 invegle deceive, trick.
2 practicke crafty, cunning.
3 ghesse i.e., guess.
4 faitor deceiver.
5 chained Beare Bear-baiting, in which a bear was chained in the centre of a ring to be attacked by dogs, with survival determining the winner, was a popular pastime.
6 trains treacheries.
7 banes banns: a proclamation of intention to marry, typically announced three times.
8 Teade torch.

38

Then gan they sprinckle all the posts with wine,[1]
And made great feast to solemnize that day;
They all perfumde with frankincense divine,
And precious odours fetcht from far away,
That all the house did sweat with great aray:
And all the while sweete Musicke did apply
Her curious[2] skill, the warbling notes to play,
To drive away the dull Melancholy;
The whiles one sung a song of love and jollity.[3]

39

During the which there was an heavenly noise
Heard sound through all the Pallace pleasantly,
Like as it had bene many an Angels voice,
Singing before th'eternall majesty,[4]
In their trinall triplicities[5] on hye;
Yet wist no creature, whence that heavenly sweet
Proceeded, yet eachone felt secretly
Himselfe thereby reft of his sences meet,
And ravished with rare impression in his sprite.

40

Great joy was made that day of young and old,
And solemne feast proclaimd throughout the land,
That their exceeding merth may not be told:
Suffice it heare by signes to understand
The usuall joyes at knitting of loves band.
Thrise happy man the knight himselfe did hold,
Possessed of his Ladies hart and hand,
And ever, when his eye did her behold,
His heart did seeme to melt in pleasures manifold.

41

Her joyous presence and sweet company
In full content he there did long enjoy,
Ne wicked envie, ne vile gealosy
His deare delights were able to annoy:
Yet swimming in that sea of blisfull joy,
He nought forgot, how he whilome had sworne,
In case he could that monstrous beast destroy,
Unto his Farie Queene backe to returne:
The which he shortly did, and Una left to mourne.

42

Now strike your sailes ye jolly Mariners,
For we be come unto a quiet rode,
Where we must land some of our passengers,
And light this wearie vessell of her lode.
Here she a while may make her safe abode,
Till she repaired have her tackles[6] spent,
And want supplide. And then againe abroad
On the long voyage whereto she is bent:
Well may she speede and fairely finish her intent.

—1590, 1596

---

[1] sprinckle all the posts with wine a Roman custom, in which the bride anoints the doorposts of her new home. See "Epithalamion," lines 253-54 (Hamilton).

[2] curious elaborate, skillful.

[3] song of love and jollity epithalamium (marriage song).

[4] heavenly noise … eternall majesty See Revelation 19:6-7: "Then I heard what seemed to be the voice of a great multitude, like the sound of many waters and like the sound of many thunderpeals, crying, 'Halleluja! For the Lord our God the Almighty reigns. Let us rejoice and exult and give him the glory, for the marriage of the Lamb has come.'"

[5] trinall triplicities the nine orders of angels, divided into three groups of three: seraphim, cherubim and thrones; dominations, virtues, and powers; princedoms, archangels, and angels (Variorum).

[6] tackles gear, rigging.

Thomas Nashe

1567-?1601

Thomas Nashe was educated at Cambridge and made his living as a writer in London. One of a circle of young writers which included Christopher Marlowe, Nashe was a clever satirist, and his writings occasionally brought him trouble. The play The Isle of Dogs resulted in Nashe fleeing London (and in Ben Jonson being briefly imprisoned). While some of his satires attacked specific individuals, many were more general in nature, pointing out the hypocrisy of his society. The Unfortunate Traveller (1594) tells the story of Jack Wilton, a sometime soldier and servant, as he travels around England and Europe from 1513 to the 1530s. Though the story is fictional, Nashe incorporates real historical situations and people, making many satirical comments on recent religious and political events and attitudes. Nashe also contributes to and parodies a number of literary genres, including the travel narrative, the romance, the courtly love tale, the sonnet, the revenge tale, the jest book and historical fiction. Nashe was a very popular writer, and many of his texts went into multiple editions during his lifetime.

EDITION: The unfortunate traveller. Or, The life of Jacke Wilton. Newly corrected and augmented. London: Imprinted by Thomas Scarlet for Cuthbert Burby, 1594. STC 18381.

from The Unfortunate Traveller

[...]

So it fell out that, it being a vehement hot summer when I was a sojourner there,[1] there entered such a hotspurred plague as hath not been heard of. Why, it was but a word and a blow, "Lord have mercy upon us," and he was gone. Within three quarters of a year in that one city there died of it a hundred thousand; look in Lanquet's chronicle[2] and you shall find it. To smell of a nosegay[3] that was poisoned, and turn your nose to a house that had the plague, it was all one. The clouds, like a number of cormorants that keep their corn till it stink and is musty, kept in their stinking exhalations till they had almost stifled all Rome's inhabitants. Physicians' greediness of gold made them greedy of their destiny. They would come to visit those with whose infirmity their art had no affinity, and even as a man with a fee should be hired to hang himself, so would they quietly go home and die presently after they had been with their patients. All day and all night long car-men[4] did nothing but go up and down the streets with their carts and cry, "Have you any dead bodies to bury?" and had many times out of one house their whole loading: one grave was the sepulchre of sevenscore;[5] one bed was the altar whereon whole families were offered.

The walls were hoared[6] and furred with the moist scorching steam of their desolation. Even as, before a gun is shot off, a stinking smoke funnels out and prepares the way for him, so before any gave up the ghost, Death, arrayed in a stinking smoke, stopped his nostrils and crammed itself full into his mouth that closed up his fellow's eyes, to give him warning to prepare for his funeral. Some died sitting at their meat, others as they were asking counsel of the physician for their friends. I saw at the house where I was hosted a maid bring her master warm broth for to comfort him, and she sink down dead herself ere he had half eat it up.

---

1 there Rome.

2 Lanquet's chronicle Thomas Lanquet's Chronicle of the World was continued by Bishop Thomas Cooper and published in 1549. The plague mentioned occurred in 1522.

3 nosegay a bouquet of sweet-smelling flowers.

4 car-men carters, men who drive wagons or carts.

5 sevenscore one hundred and forty.

6 hoared made grey or white; frosted over; moldy.

During this time of visitation, there was a Spaniard, one Esdras of Granado, a notable bandetto,[1] authorized by the Pope because he had assisted him in some murders. This villain, colleagued with one Bartol, a desperate Italian, practised to break into those rich men's houses in the night where the plague had most reigned, and if there were none but the mistress and maid left alive, to ravish them both and bring away all the wealth they could fasten on. In a hundred chief citizens' houses where the hand of God had been, they put this outrage in ure.[2] Though the women so ravished cried out, none durst come near them for fear of catching their deaths by them, and some thought they cried out only with the tyranny of the malady. Amongst the rest, the house where I lay he invaded, where all being snatched up by sickness but the good wife of the house, a noble and chaste matron called Heraclide, and her zany,[3] and I and my courtesan, he, knocking at the door late in the night, ran in to the matron and left me and my love to the mercy of his companion, who, finding me in bed (as the time required), ran at me full with his rapier, thinking I would resist him, but, as good luck was, I escaped him and betook me to my pistol in the window uncharged.[4] He, fearing it had been charged, threatened to run her through if I once offered but to aim at him. Forth the chamber he dragged her, holding his rapier at her heart, whilst I cried out, "Save her, kill me, and I'll ransom her with a thousand ducats." But lust prevailed; no prayers would be heard. Into my chamber I was locked, and watchmen charged (as he made semblance when there was none there) to knock me down with their halberds[5] if I stirred but a foot down the stairs. So threw I myself pensive again on my pallet,[6] and dared all the devils in hell, now I was alone, to come and fight with me one after another in defence of that detestable rape. I beat my head against the walls and called them bawds because they would see such a wrong committed and not fall upon him.

To return to Heraclide below, whom the ugliest of all bloodsuckers, Esdras of Granado, had under shrift.[7] First he assailed her with rough means, and slew her zany at her foot that stepped before her in rescue. Then when all armed resist[8] was put to flight, he assayed[9] her with honey speech and promised her more jewels and gifts than he was able to pilfer in a hundred years after. He discoursed unto her how he was countenanced and borne out by the Pope, and how many execrable murders with impunity he had executed on them that displeased him. "This is the eightscore[10] house," quoth he, "that has done homage unto me, and here I will prevail, or I will be torn in pieces." "Ah," quoth Heraclide (with a heartrending sigh), "art thou ordained to be a worse plague to me than the plague itself? Have I escaped the hands of God to fall into the hands of man? Hear me, Jehovah, and be merciful in ending my misery. Dispatch me incontinent, dissolute homicide, death's usurper. Here lies my husband stone-cold on the dewy floor.[11] If thou be of more power than God to strike me speedily, strike home, strike deep, send me to Heaven with my husband. Aye me, it is the spoil of my honour thou seekest in my soul's troubled departure; thou art some devil sent to tempt me. Avoid from me, Satan; my soul is my Saviour's; to him I have bequeathed it, from him can no man take it. Jesu, Jesu, spare me undefiled for thy spouse; Jesu, Jesu, never fail those that put their trust in thee."

With that she fell in a swoon, and her eyes in their closing seemed to spawn forth in their outward sharp corners new-created seed pearl, which the world before never set eye on. Soon he rigorously revived her and told her that he had a charter

---

1 bandetto bandit.

2 in ure into effect.

3 zany attendant, companion; perhaps, a fool or jester.

4 uncharged not loaded with powder and shot.

5 halberds A halberd is a type of combined spear and battle-axe.

6 pallet mattress or straw bed.

7 under shrift at his mercy (perhaps readying herself for death by confessing).

8 resist resistance.

9 assayed tempted, attacked.

10 eightscore one hundred and sixty.

11 I.e., he is dead of the plague.

above Scripture; she must yield, she should yield, see who durst remove her out of his hands. Twixt life and death thus she faintly replied, "How thinkest thou, is there a power above thy power? If there be, he is here present in punishment, and on thee will take present punishment if thou persist in thy enterprise. In the time of security every man sins, but when death substitutes one friend his special baily[1] to arrest another by infection, and disperses his quiver into ten thousand hands at once, who is it but looks[2] about him? A man that has an inevitable huge stone hanging only by a hair over his head, which he looks every paternoster[3] while to fall and pash[4] him in pieces, will not he be submissively sorrowful for his transgressions, refrain himself from the least thought of folly, and purify his spirit with contrition and penitence? God's hand like a huge stone hangs inevitably over thy head. What is the plague but death playing the provost marshal[5] to execute all those that will not be called home by any other means? This my dear knight's body is a quiver of his arrows, which already are shot into thee invisibly. Even as the age of goats is known by the knots on their horns, so think the anger of God apparently visioned or shown unto thee in the knitting of my brows. A hundred have I buried out of my house, at all whose departures I have been present. A hundred's infection is mixed with my breath; lo, now I breathe upon thee, a hundred deaths come upon thee. Repent betimes,[6] imagine there is a Hell though not a Heaven; that Hell thy conscience is thoroughly acquainted with, if thou hast murdered half so many as thou unabashedly braggest. As Maecenas in the latter end of his days was seven years without sleep,[7] so these seven weeks have I took no slumber; my eyes have kept continual watch against the Devil, my enemy. Death I deemed my friend (friends fly from us in adversity); death, the Devil, and all the ministering spirits of temptation are watching about thee to entrap thy soul (by my abuse) to eternal damnation. It is thy soul thou mayst save, only by saving mine honour. Death will have thy body infallibly for breaking into my house that he had selected for his private habitation. If thou ever camest of a woman, or hopest to be saved by the seed of a woman, pity a woman. Deers oppressed with dogs, when they cannot take soil,[8] run to men for succour. To whom should women in their disconsolate and desperate estate run but to men (like the deer) for succour and sanctuary? If thou be a man, thou wilt succour me, but if thou be a dog and a brute beast, thou wilt spoil me, defile me, and tear me. Either renounce God's image or renounce the wicked mind thou bearest."

These words might have moved a compound heart of iron and adamant, but in his heart they obtained no impression, for he, sitting in his chair of state against the door all the while that she pleaded, leaning his overhanging gloomy eyebrows on the pommel[9] of his unsheathed sword, he never looked up or gave her a word. But when he perceived she expected his answer of grace or utter perdition, he start[ed] up and took her currishly by the neck, asking how long he should stay for her ladyship. "Thou tells me," quoth he, "of the plague and the heavy hand of God, and thy hundred infected breaths in one. I tell thee I have cast the dice a hundred times for the galleys[10] in Spain, and yet still missed the ill chance. Our order of casting is this: if there be a general or captain new come home from the wars and hath some four or five hundred crowns[11] overplus of the King's in his hand, and his soldiers all paid, he makes proclamation that whatsoever two resolute men will go to dice for it and win the bridle or lose the saddle, to such a place let them repair and it

---

1 baily bailiff, officer of justice or chief magistrate.

2 but looks who does not look.

3 paternoster the "Our Father," the Lord's Prayer.

4 pash crush, smash.

5 provost marshal an officer whose duty it is to preserve order.

6 betimes before it is too late.

7 Maecenas ... without sleep Gaius Maecenas was a Roman knight, friend of Octavian Augustus and patron of Horace and Virgil; he is a symbol of a patron of the arts.

8 take soil find refuge.

9 pommel the ornamental knob on the end of the sword.

10 galleys ships, often filled with slaves and criminals.

11 crowns coins worth five shillings each.

shall be ready for them. Thither go I and find another such needy squire resident. The dice run, I win, he is undone. I winning have the crowns; he losing is carried to the galleys. This is our custom, which a hundred times and more hath paid me custom of crowns when the poor fellows have gone to gehenna,[1] had coarse bread and whipping cheer[2] all their life after. Now, thinkest thou that I, who so oft have escaped such a number of hellish dangers, only depending upon the turning of a few pricks,[3] can be scare-bugged with the plague? What plague canst thou name worse than I have had? Whether diseases, imprisonment, poverty, banishment, I have passed through them all. My own mother gave I a box of the ear to and broke her neck down a pair of stairs, because she would not go in to a gentleman when I bade her. My sister I sold to an old leno[4] to make his best of her. Any kinswoman that I have, knew I she were not a whore, myself would make her one. Thou art a whore, thou shalt be a whore, in spite of religion or precise ceremonies."

Therewith he flew upon her and threatened her with his sword, but it was not that he meant to wound her with. He grasped her by the ivory throat and shook her as a mastiff[5] would shake a young bear, swearing and staring he would tear out her weasand[6] if she refused. Not content with that savage constraint, he slipped his sacrilegious hand from her lily lawn-skinned neck, and enscarfed[7] it in her long silver locks, which with struggling were unrolled. Backward he dragged her, even as a man backward would pluck a tree down by the twigs, and then, like a traitor that is drawn to execution on a hurdle, he trailed her up and down the chamber by those tender untwisted braids and, setting his barbarous foot on her bare snowy breast, bade her yield or have her wind stamped out. She cried, "Stamp, stifle me in my hair, hang me up by it on a beam, and so let me die rather than I should go to Heaven with a beam in my eye."[8] "No," quoth he, "nor stamped, nor stifled, nor hanged, nor to Heaven shalt thou go till I have had my will of thee. Thy busy arms in these silken fetters I'll enfold." Dismissing her hair from his fingers and pinioning her elbows therewithal, she struggled, she wrested, but all was in vain. So struggling and so resisting, her jewels did sweat, signifying there was poison coming towards her. On the hard boards he threw her, and used his knee as an iron ram to beat ope the two-leaved gate of her chastity. Her husband's dead body he made a pillow to his abomination.

Conjecture the rest. My words stick fast in the mire and are clean tired. Would I had never undertook this tragical tale. Whatsoever is born is born to have an end. Thus ends my tale. His boorish lust was glutted, his beastly desire satisfied. What in the house of any worth was carriageable, he put up and went his way.

Let not your sorrow die, you that have read the proem and narration of this elegiacal[9] history. Show you have quick wits in sharp conceit of compassion. A woman that has viewed all her children sacrificed before her eyes and, after the first was slain, wiped the sword with her apron to prepare it for the cleanly murder of the second, and so on forward till it came to the empiercing of the seventeenth of her loins, will you not give her great allowance of anguish? This woman, this matron, this forsaken Heraclide, having buried fourteen children in five days, whose eyes she howlingly closed and caught many wrinkles with funeral kisses—besides having her husband within a day after laid forth as a comfortless corse,[10] a carrionly block that could neither eat with her, speak with her, nor weep with her—is she not to be borne withal though her body swells with a tympany[11] of tears, though her speech be as impa-

[1] gehenna a prison or place of torture.

[2] whipping cheer an ironic statement: an entertainment or reception of whipping.

[3] pricks i.e., the dots on the dice.

[4] leno from the Latin "to pander"; a pimp.

[5] mastiff a large, powerful dog.

[6] weasand the throat generally, the esophagus specifically.

[7] enscarfed wrapped.

[8] beam in my eye great sin; see Matthew 7:3.

[9] elegiacal lamentable.

[10] corse corpse, carrion.

[11] tympany an excess causing a swelling or tumour.

tient as unhappy Hecuba's,[1] though her head raves and her brain dotes? Devise with yourselves that you see a corse rising from his hearse after he is carried to church, and such another suppose Heraclide to be, rising from the couch of enforced adultery.

Her eyes were dim, her cheeks bloodless, her breath smelt earthy, her countenance was ghastly. Up she rose after she was deflowered, but loath she arose, as a reprobate soul rising to the Day of Judgement. Looking on the t'one side as she rose, she spied her husband's body lying under her head. Ah, then she bewailed, as Cephalus when he had killed Procris unwittingly, or Oedipus when ignorantly he had slain his father and known his mother incestuously.[2] This was her subdued reason's discourse: "Have I lived to make my husband's body the bier to carry me to Hell? Had filthy pleasure no other pillow to lean upon but his spreaded limbs? On thy flesh my fault shall be imprinted at the Day of Resurrection. O beauty, the bait ordained to ensnare the irreligious. Rich men are robbed for their wealth; women are dishonested[3] for being too fair. No blessing is beauty, but a curse: cursed be the time that ever I was begotten; cursed be the time that my mother brought me forth to tempt. The serpent in Paradise did no more; the serpent in Paradise is damned sempiternally.[4] Why should not I hold myself damned (if predestination's opinions be true) that am predestinate to this horrible abuse? The hog dies presently if he loses an eye; with the hog have I wallowed in the mire. I have lost my eye of honesty; it is clean plucked out with a strong hand of unchastity. What remains but I die? Die I will, though life be unwilling. No recompense is there for me to redeem my compelled offence but with a rigorous compelled death. Husband, I'll be thy wife in Heaven. Let not thy pure deceased spirit despise me when we meet because I am tyrannously polluted. The Devil, the belier[5] of our frailty and common accuser of mankind, cannot accuse me, though he would, of unconstrained submitting. If any guilt be mine, this is my fault: that I did not deform my face ere it should so impiously allure." Having passioned thus awhile, she hastily ran and looked herself in her glass to see if her sin were not written on her forehead. With looking she blushed, though none looked upon her but her own reflected image.

Then she began again: "Heu quam difficile est crimen non prodere vultu: 'how hard is it not to bewray a man's fault by his forehead.' Myself do but behold myself and yet I blush; then, God beholding me, shall not I be ten times more ashamed? The angels shall hiss at me, the saints and martyrs fly from me, yea, God himself shall add to the Devil's damnation because he suffered such a wicked creature to come before him. Agamemnon, thou wert an infidel, yet when thou went'st to the Trojan War, thou left'st a musician at home with thy wife who, by playing the foot spondaeus[6] till thy return, might keep her in chastity. My husband, going to war with the Devil and his enticements, when he surrendered left no musician with me but mourning and melancholy. Had he left any, as Aegisthus killed Agamemnon's musician ere he could be successful, so surely would he have been killed ere this Aegisthus surceased.[7] My distressed heart, as the hart when as he loses his horns is astonied[8] and sorrowfully runs to hide himself, so be thou afflicted and distressed. Hide thyself under the Almighty's wings of mercy. Sue, plead, entreat: grace is never denied to them that ask. It may be denied; I may be a vessel ordained to dishonour.

---

1 Hecuba Most of Hecuba's many children were slain.

2 as Cephalus … incestuously In Greek mythology, Procris, jealous of her husband Cephalus, hid in a bush to watch him as he hunted. Thinking he heard an animal in the bush, Cephalus killed his wife. Oedipus slew his father and married his mother, only later finding out who they were.

3 dishonested dishonoured, or made dishonest.

4 sempiternally everlastingly.

5 belier deceiver or misrepresenter.

6 spondaeus a metrical foot consisting of two long syllables.

7 Aegisthus surceased Aegisthus seduced Agamemnon's wife while Agamemnon led the Greek expedition to Troy.

8 astonied astonished, literally "turned to stone"; stunned and rendered powerless.

"The only repeal we have from God's undefinite[1] chastisement is to chastise ourselves in this world, and so I will. Nought but death be my penance; gracious and acceptable may it be. My hand and my knife shall manumit[2] me out of the horror of mind I endure. Farewell, life, that hast lent me nothing but sorrow. Farewell, sin-sowed flesh, that hast more weeds than flowers, more woes than joys. Point, pierce; edge, enwiden: I patiently afford thee a sheath. Spur forth my soul to mount post[3] to Heaven. Jesu, forgive me; Jesu, receive me."

So (throughly stabbed) fell she down and knocked her head against her husband's body, wherewith he, not having been aired his full four and twenty hours,[4] starts as out of a dream, whiles I, through a cranny[5] of my upper chamber unsealed, had beheld all this sad spectacle. Awaking, he rubbed his head to and fro and, wiping his eyes with his hand, began to look about him. Feeling something lie heavy on his breast, he turned it off and, getting upon his legs, lighted a candle.

Here begins my purgatory. For he, good man, coming into the hall with the candle and spying his wife with her hair about her ears, defiled and massacred, and his simple zany Capestrano run through, took a halberd in his hand and, running from chamber to chamber to search who in his house was likely to do it, at length found me lying on my bed, the door locked to me on the outside and my rapier unsheathed in the window. Wherewith he straight conjectured it was I and, calling the neighbours hard by, said I had caused myself to be locked into my chamber after that sort, sent away my courtesan whom I called my wife, and made clean my rapier because I would not be suspected.

Upon this was I laid in prison, should have been hanged, was brought to the ladder, had made a ballad for my farewell in a readiness called "Wilton's Wantonness," and yet for all that 'scaped dancing in a hempen circle. He that has gone through many perils and returned safe from them makes but a merriment to dilate them. I had the knot under my ear, there was fair play, the hangman had one halter, another about my neck was fastened to the gallows, the riding device was almost thrust home, and his foot on my shoulder to press me down, when I made my saint-like confession as you have heard before: that such and such men at such an hour broke into my house, slew the zany, took my courtesan, locked me into my chamber, ravished Heraclide, and finally how she slew herself.

Present at the execution was there a banished English earl who, hearing that a countryman of his was to suffer for such a notable murder, came to hear his confession and see if he knew him. He had not heard me tell half of that I have recited but he craved audience and desired the execution might be stayed.

"Not two days since it is, gentlemen and noble Romans," said he, "since, going to be let blood in a barber's shop against the infection, all on sudden in a great tumult and uproar was there brought in one Bartol, an Italian, grievously wounded and bloody. I, seeming to commiserate his harms, courteously questioned him with what ill debtors he had met, or how or by what casualty he came to be so arrayed. 'Oh,' quoth he, 'long have I lived sworn brothers in sensuality with one Esdras of Granado. Five hundred rapes and murders have we committed betwixt us. When our iniquities were grown to the height and God had determined to countercheck our amity, we came to the house of Johannes de Imola (whom this young gentleman has named); there did he justify all those rapes in manner and form as the prisoner here has confessed. But lo, an accident after, which neither he nor this audience is privy to: Esdras of Granado, not content to have ravished the matron Heraclide and robbed her, after he had betook him from thence to his heels, lighted on his companion Bartol with his courtesan, whose pleasing face he had scarce winkingly glanced on but he picked a quarrel with Bartol to have her

---

1 undefinite indefinite, unlimited.

2 manumit release from bondage, set free.

3 post quickly.

4 aired ... hours It was traditional to air a body for 24 hours before burying it.

5 cranny small hole.

from him. On this quarrel they fought; Bartol was wounded to the death, Esdras fled, and the fair dame left to go whither she would. This Bartol in the barber's shop freely acknowledged, as both the barber and his man and other here present can amply depose."'[1] Deposed they were; their oaths went for current; I was quit by proclamation.

[...]

[...] prepare your ears and your tears, for never till this thrust I any tragical matter upon you. Strange and wonderful are God's judgements; here shine they in their glory. Chaste Heraclide, thy blood is laid up in Heaven's treasury, not one drop of it was lost, but lent out to usury;[2] water poured forth sinks down quietly into the earth, but blood spilt on the ground sprinkles up to the firmament. Murder is wide-mouthed and will not let God rest till he grant revenge. Not only the blood of the slaughtered innocent but the soul ascends to his throne and there cries out and exclaims for justice and recompense. Guiltless souls that live every hour subject to violence, and with your despairing fears do much impair God's providence, fasten your eyes on this spectacle that will add to your faith. Refer all your oppressions, afflictions, and injuries to the even-balanced eye of the Almighty. He it is that, when your patience sleeps, will be most exceeding mindful of you.

This is but a gloze upon the text. Thus Cutwolf[3] begins his insulting oration: "Men and people that have made holiday to behold my pained flesh toil on the wheel,[4] expect not of me a whining penitent slave that shall do nothing but cry and say his prayers and so be crushed in pieces. My body is little, but my mind is as great as a giant's. The soul which is in me is the very soul of Julius Caesar by reversion.[5] My name is Cutwolf, neither better nor worse by occupation than a poor cobbler of Verona; cobblers are men, and kings are no more. The occasion of my coming hither at this present is to have a few of my bones broken (as we are all born to die) for being the death of the emperor of homicides, Esdras of Granado. About two years since in the streets of Rome he slew the only and eldest brother I had, named Bartol, in quarrelling about a courtesan. The news brought to me as I was sitting in my shop under a stall, knocking in of tacks, I think, I raised up my bristles, sold pritch-awl,[6] sponge, blacking tub, and punching iron, bought me rapier and pistol, and to go I went. Twenty months together I pursued him, from Rome to Naples, from Naples to Chieti passing over the river, from Chieti to Siena, from Siena to Florence, from Florence to Parma, from Parma to Pavia, from Pavia to Sion, from Sion to Geneva, from Geneva back again towards Rome, where in the way it was my chance to meet him in the nick[7] here at Bologna, as I will tell you how. I saw a great fray in the streets as I passed along and many swords[8] walking, whereupon drawing nearer and enquiring who they were, answer was returned me it was that notable bandetto, Esdras of Granado. Oh, so I was tickled in the spleen with that word. My heart hopped and danced, my elbows itched, my fingers frisked; I wist[9] not what should become of my feet, nor knew what I did for joy. The fray parted, I thought it not convenient to single him out (being a sturdy knave) in the street, but to stay till I had got him at more advantage. To his lodging I dogged him, lay at the door all night where he entered for fear he should give me the slip any way. Betimes in the morning I rung the bell and craved to speak with him. Now to his chamber door I was brought, where knocking, he rose in his shirt and let me in and, when I was entered, bade

[1] depose testify.

[2] usury i.e., make a profit.

[3] Cutwolf As explained previously in Nashe's text, Cutwolf is "a wearish dwarfish writhen-faced cobbler, brother to Bartol the Italian," and is about to be executed for murder; cobbler shoemaker.

[4] the wheel an instrument of torture.

[5] by reversion by right of succession or inheritance.

[6] pritch-awl pritchel, a sharp, pointed instrument especially used for punching the nail holes in horseshoes; the tools listed here are all associated with the cobbler's trade.

[7] in the nick at a critical moment.

[8] swords people carrying swords.

[9] wist knew.

me lock the door and declare my errand, and so he slipped to bed again.

"'Marry this,' quoth I, 'is my errand. Thy name is Esdras of Granado, is it not? Most treacherously thou slew'st my brother Bartol about two years ago in the streets of Rome. His death am I come to revenge. In quest of thee ever since, above three thousand miles have I travelled. I have begged to maintain me the better part of the way only because I would intermit no time from my pursuit in going back for money. Now have I got thee naked in my power; die thou shalt, though my mother and my grandmother dying did intreat for thee. I have promised the Devil thy soul within this hour; break my word I will not. In thy breast I intend to bury a bullet. Stir not, quinch[1] not, make no noise, for if thou dost it will be worse for thee.'

"Quoth Esdras, 'Whatever thou beest at whose mercy I lie, spare me and I will give thee as much gold as thou wilt ask. Put me to any pains, my life reserved, and I willingly will sustain them. Cut off my arms and legs and leave me as a lazar[2] to some loathsome spital,[3] where I may but live a year to pray and repent me. For thy brother's death, the despair of mind that has ever since haunted me, the guilty gnawing worm of conscience, I feel may be sufficient penance. Thou canst not send me to such a hell as already there is in my heart. To dispatch me presently is no revenge; it will soon be forgotten. Let me die a lingering death; it will be remembered a great deal longer. A lingering death may avail[4] my soul, but it is the illest of ills that can befortune my body. For my soul's health I beg my body's torment. Be not thou a devil to torment my soul and send me to eternal damnation. Thy overhanging sword hides Heaven from my sight. I dare not look up, lest I embrace my death's wound unawares. I cannot pray to God and plead to thee both at once. Aye me, already I see my life buried in the wrinkles of thy brows. Say but I shall live, though thou meanest to kill me. Nothing confounds like to sudden terror; it thrusts every sense out of office. Poison wrapped up in sugared pills is but half a poison; the fear of death's looks are more terrible than his stroke. The whilst I view death my faith is deaded;[5] where a man's fear is, there his heart is. Fear never engenders hope; how can I hope that Heaven's Father will save me from the Hell everlasting when he gives me over to the hell of thy fury?

"'Heraclide, now think I on thy tears sown in the dust (thy tears, that my bloody mind made barren). In revenge of thee, God hardens this man's heart against me. Yet I did not slaughter thee, though hundreds else my hand has brought to the shambles.[6] Gentle sir, learn of me what it is to clog your conscience with murder, to have your dreams, your sleeps, your solitary walks troubled and disquieted with murder. Your shadow by day will affright you; you will not see a weapon unsheathed, but immediately you will imagine it is predestinate for your destruction.

"'This murder is a house divided within itself; it suborns[7] a man's own soul to inform against him. His soul (being his accuser) brings forth his two eyes as witnesses against him, and the least eyewitness is irrefutable. Pluck out my eyes if thou wilt and deprive my traitorous soul of her two best witnesses. Dig out my blasphemous tongue with thy dagger; both tongue and eyes will I gladly forgo to have a little more time to think on my journey to Heaven.

"'Defer a while thy resolution. I am not at peace with the world, for even but yesterday I fought and in my fury threatened further vengeance. Had I a face to ask forgiveness, I should think half my sins were forgiven. A hundred devils haunt me daily for my horrible murders. The devils when I die will be loath to go to Hell with me, for they desired of Christ he

---

1 quinch move or make noise.

2 lazar diseased person, leper; an application of the name Lazarus (Luke 16:20).

3 spital hospital or shelter for the sick.

4 avail help.

5 deaded made dead.

6 shambles slaughterhouse, or more generally, a place of slaughter, destruction.

7 suborns bribes.

would not send them to Hell before their time. If they go not to Hell, into thee they will go, and hideously vex thee for turning them out of their habitation. Wounds I contemn, life I prize light; it is another world's tranquillity which makes me so timorous: everlasting damnation, everlasting howling and lamentation. It is not from death I request thee to deliver me, but from this terror of torment's eternity. Thy brother's body only I pierced unadvisedly; his soul meant I no harm to at all. My body and soul both shalt thou cast away quite if thou doest at this instant what thou mayst. Spare me, spare me, I beseech thee. By thy own soul's salvation I desire thee, seek not my soul's utter perdition. In destroying me, thou destroyest thyself and me.'

"Eagerly I replied after this long suppliant oration: 'Though I knew God would never have mercy upon me except I had mercy on thee, yet of thee no mercy would I have. Revenge in our tragedies is continually raised from Hell; of Hell do I esteem better than Heaven if it afford me revenge. There is no Heaven but revenge. I tell thee, I would not have undertook so much toil to gain Heaven as I have done in pursuing thee for revenge. Divine revenge, of which (as of the joys above) there is no fullness or satiety. Look how my feet are blistered with following thee from place to place. I have riven[1] my throat with overstraining it to curse thee. I have ground my teeth to powder with grating and grinding them together for anger when any has named thee. My tongue with vain threats is bollen[2] and waxen too big for my mouth. My eyes have broken their strings with staring and looking ghastly as I stood devising how to frame or set my countenance when I met thee. I have near spent my strength in imaginary acting on stone walls what I determined to execute on thee. Entreat not; a miracle may not reprieve thee. Villain, thus march I with my blade into thy bowels.'

"'Stay, stay,' exclaimed Esdras, 'and hear me but one word further. Though neither for God nor man thou carest, but placest thy whole felicity in murther, yet of thy felicity learn how to make a greater felicity. Respite me a little from thy sword's point and set me about some execrable enterprise that may subvert the whole state of Christendom and make all men's ears tingle that hear of it. Command me to cut all my kindred's throats, to burn men, women, and children in their beds in millions by firing their cities at midnight. Be it pope, emperor, or Turk that displeases thee, he shall not breathe on the earth. For thy sake will I swear and forswear, renounce my Baptism, and all the interest I have in any other sacrament. Only let me live how miserable soever, be it in a dungeon amongst toads, serpents, and adders, or set up to the neck in dung. No pains I will refuse, however prorogued,[3] to have a little respite to purify my spirit. Oh, hear me, hear me, and thou canst not be hardened against me!'

"At this his importunity I paused a little, not as retiring from my wreakful resolution, but going back to gather more forces of vengeance. With myself I devised how to plague him double for his base mind. My thoughts travelled in quest of some notable new Italianism, whose murderous platform[4] might not only extend on his body, but his soul also. The groundwork of it was this: that whereas he had promised for my sake to swear and forswear and commit Julian-like[5] violence on the highest seals of religion, if he would but this far satisfy me he should be dismissed from my fury. First and foremost, he should renounce God and his laws, and utterly disclaim the whole title or interest he had in any covenant of salvation. Next, he should curse him to his face, as Job was willed by his wife,[6] and write an absolute firm obligation of his soul to the Devil without condition or exception. Thirdly and lastly (having done this), he should pray to God fervently never to have mercy upon him or pardon him.

---

1 riven torn asunder, split.

2 bollen swollen.

3 prorogued extensive.

4 platform plan.

5 Julian-like Julian the apostate (331-363 CE), a Roman emperor who gave up Christianity for paganism.

6 as Job was willed by his wife Job 2:9; him God.

"Scarce had I propounded these articles unto him but he was beginning his blasphemous abjurations. I wonder the earth opened not and swallowed us both, hearing the bold terms he blasted forth in contempt of Christianity. Heaven has thundered when half less contumelies[1] against it have been uttered. Able they were to raise saints and martyrs from their graves and pluck Christ himself from the right hand of his Father. My joints trembled and quaked with attending them; my hair stood upright and my heart was turned wholly to fire. So affectionately and zealously did he give himself over to infidelity, as if Satan had gotten the upper hand of our High Maker. The vein in his left hand that is derived from the heart with no faint blow he pierced and with the full blood that flowed from it writ a full obligation of his soul to the Devil. Yea, he more earnestly prayed unto God never to forgive his soul than many Christians do to save their souls. These fearful ceremonies brought to an end, I bade him ope his mouth and gape wide. He did so (as what will not slaves do for fear?). Therewith made I no more ado, but shot him full into the throat with my pistol. No more spoke he after, so did I shoot him that he might never speak after or repent him. His body being dead looked as black as a toad; the Devil presently branded it for his own. This is the fault that has called me hither. No true Italian but will honour me for it. Revenge is the glory of arms and the highest performance of valour. Revenge is whatsoever we call law or justice. The farther we wade in revenge, the nearer come we to the throne of the Almighty. To his sceptre it is properly ascribed; his sceptre he lends unto man when he lets one man scourge another. All true Italians imitate me in revenging constantly and dying valiantly. Hangman, to thy task, for I am ready for the utmost of thy rigour."

Herewith all the people (outrageously incensed) with one conjoined outcry yelled mainly, "Away with him, away with him. Executioner, torture him, tear him, or we will tear thee in pieces if thou spare him."

The executioner needed no exhortation hereunto, for of his own nature was he hackster good enough; old excellent he was at a bone-ache. At the first chop with his wood-knife would he fish for a man's heart, and fetch it out as easily as a plum from the bottom of a porridge pot. He would crack necks as fast as a cook cracks eggs. A fiddler cannot turn his pin[2] so soon as he would turn a man off the ladder. Bravely did he drum on this Cutwolf's bones, not breaking them outright, but, like a saddler knocking in of tacks, jarring on them quaveringly with his hammer a great while together. No joint about him but with a hatchet he had for the nonce[3] he disjointed half, and then with boiling lead soldered up the wounds from bleeding. His tongue he pulled out, lest he should blaspheme in his torment. Venomous stinging worms he thrust into his ears to keep his head ravingly occupied. With cankers scruzed[4] to pieces he rubbed his mouth and his gums. No limb of his but was lingeringly splintered in shivers.[5] In his horror left they him on the wheel as in Hell, where, yet living, he might behold his flesh legacied amongst the fowls of the air.[6] Unsearchable is the book of our destinies. One murder begets another; was never yet bloodshed barren from the beginning of the world to this day. Mortifiedly abjected and daunted was I with this trunculent[7] tragedy of Cutwolf and Esdras. To such straight life did it thence-forward incite me that ere I went out of Bologna I married my courtesan, performed many alms-deeds, and hasted so fast out of the Sodom of Italy that within forty days I arrived at the King of England's camp twixt Ardes and Guines[8] in France, where he with great tri-

[1] contumelies abuses, insults.

[2] turn his pin the peg which, turned, tunes the string.

[3] for the nonce for that purpose.

[4] scruzed squeezed.

[5] shivers fragments.

[6] legacied amongst the fowls of the air i.e., carried off by the birds.

[7] trunculent possibly truculent or fierce; perhaps with an ironic sense of truncated, or shortened.

[8] Ardes and Guines The French King and English King met to discuss an alliance in the countryside between these two places for the Field of the Cloth of Gold meeting in 1520; the meeting was so-called to reflect the ostentatious display of both monarchs.

umphs met and entertained the Emperor and the French King and feasted many days. And so as my story began with the King at Turney and Turwin,[1] I think meet here to end it with the King at Ardes and Guines. All the conclusive epilogue I will make is this: that if herein I have pleased any, it shall animate me to more pains in this kind. Otherwise I will swear upon an English chronicle never to be outlandish chronicler more while I live. Farewell as many as wish me well.

FINIS.

—1594

[1] Turney and Turwin Henry VIII captured Thérouanne and Tournai in 1513.

Lady Margaret Hoby
1571-1633

The author of the earliest extant diary by an Englishwoman, Margaret Hoby was the sole heir of Thomasin and Arthur Dakins, a wealthy and well-connected Yorkshire landowner. Margaret spent some of her childhood in the countess of Huntingdon's Puritan household (it was common practice among the gentry and aristocracy for young adults to improve their education and social training by spending time among the upper classes). At the Huntingdon's household Margaret encountered two men whom she would later wed: Walter Devereux, brother of the earl of Essex, and Thomas Sidney, brother of Sir Philip Sidney.[1] The direction of Margaret's early life, however, was largely dictated by her position as a wealthy heiress, this status making her a valuable marital prize fought over by the members and allies of some of the most prominent families in England. In 1589, at the age of 18, Margaret married Walter Devereux, but this match was short-lived, with Walter dying at the siege of Rouen in 1591.[2] With the countess of Huntingdon enthusiastically promoting the match, Margaret found herself married again, having been a widow for a little more than three months.[3] Her second husband was the countess' nephew, Thomas Sidney, whose connections were powerful enough to defeat his main rival, Thomas Posthumous Hoby, son of the learned and forceful Lady Elizabeth Hoby, later Lady Russell.[4] When Lady Russell discovered that Margaret had been spirited away to London to marry Sidney, she urged her son Posthumous to call on the aid of his friends to stop the marriage, and failing that to "steal her away."[5] Although the match went ahead, Thomas Sidney's death in 1595 cleared the way for Thomas Hoby, who wed Margaret in 1596. Margaret's motives in this final match were clearly mixed: she had initially resisted it,[6] but relented under a combination of pressure from powerful friends, relatives, and acquaintances, and anxiety produced by a lawsuit that threatened to strip her of her estates at Hackness.[7] In 1633, after a life devoted to religious and domestic duties, Margaret Hoby died. Her memorial in the parish church of Hackness celebrates her religious piety and acts of charity.

Margaret Hoby's diary may puzzle modern readers, since it consistently refuses to engage in the self-revelation that is widely considered this genre's raison d'être. We learn nothing directly about Margaret's relationships with or her feelings about family, friends, and neighbours. Her inner life remains a mystery. The diary does reveal, however, the shaping influence of Puritanism's emphasis on the believer's self-examination and the search for providential signs in the world that spoke to the believer's spiritual development.

EDITION: The Private Life of an Elizabethan Lady: The Diary of Lady Margaret Hoby, 1599-1605. Ed. Joanna Moody (Phoenix Mill, Gloucestershire: Sutton, 1998). Text and selected notes are reproduced by kind permission of the editor.

---

1 J. Moody, "Introduction," The Private Life of an Elizabethan Lady: The Diary of Lady Margaret Hoby, 1599-1605, ed. J. Moody (Phoenix Mill, Gloucestershire, 1998), xvi-xviii.

2 D.M. Meads, "Introduction," The Diary of Lady Margaret Hoby, 1599-1605, ed. D.M. Meads (London, 1930), pp. 8-11.

3 Ibid., pp. 11-12.

4 Ibid., p. 12.

5 Quoted in Meads, p. 27.

6 Ibid., p. 29.

7 Ibid., pp. 30-31.

from The Diary of Lady Hoby

Friday [August 17, 1599]

After private prayers, I went about the house and read of the Bible and wrought[1] till dinner time;[2] and after dinner it pleased for a just punishment to correct my sins to send me feebleness of stomach and pain of my head that kept me upon my bed till 5 o'clock, at which time I arose, having release of my sickness according to the wonted kindness of the Lord, who, after he had let me see how I had offended that so I might take better heed to my body and soul hereafter, with a gentle correction let me feel he was reconciled to me; at which time I went to private prayer, and praises, examination, and so to work till supper time;[3] which done I heard the lector[4] and, after I had walked an hour with Master Hoby, I went to bed.[5]

[...]

Monday 20

After I was ready, I prayed privately. Then I walked with Master Hoby till 8 o'clock, at which time I broke my fast and so to work; and at 11 of the clock I took a lector of Master Rhodes[6] and went to dinner. After dinner I wound yarn till 3, and then walked with Master Hoby about the town[7] to spy out the best places where cottages might be built. After I came home, I wrought till 6, and gave order for supper, and then I betook me to private prayer and examination, in which I found myself a-lacking in performing my duty I soon perceived, and therefore besought [illegible: soiled] Lord for pardon; then I went to supper, after which I walked awhile, and because there [illegible: torn and soiled] not Master Rhodes to pray publicly, I prayed privately, and, after I had helped Master Hoby to look over some papers, I went to bed.

[...]

Wednesday 22

After I was ready, I prayed, and, after I had gone a little about the house, I wrote out notes in my Testament, and then broke my fast and walked abroad till dinner, before which I prayed, according to my wont; and after dinner I was busy dispacting[8] one away to Linton[9] till 3 o'clock; then I wrote notes out into my Bible, and after went a-walking with Master Hoby, and then returned into examination and prayer; after, I read of the Bible, and walked alone, and then went into the kitchen, where Master Rhodes and myself had some speech with

---

[1] wrought worked, here specifically, the work of sewing or embroidering. Apart from constituting a necessary household task, women's sewing and embroidering was an ideologically freighted activity in the period, often symbolizing a woman's ideal virtues: chastity, industry, enclosure within the domestic sphere, service to the family, etc.

[2] dinner time Dinner was the main meal of the day for noble, gentry, and middle-class households; it was usually eaten between eleven and noon, and, in a household like Lady Hoby's, would consist of several courses.

[3] supper time Supper, the final meal of the day, was generally eaten around 6 pm; it was a smaller and less formal meal than dinner.

[4] "Lector" here is clearly a form of "lecture," meaning a sermon, formal talk, or lecture. The OED defines "lecture" as the lection or lesson which is read aloud, or a sermon, but one less formal in style or delivered on occasions other than during church services.

[5] after priuate prairs I went about the house and read of the bible and wrought tell dinner time and after dinner it pleased for a Iust punishment to corricte my sinnes to send me febelnis of stomak and paine of my head that kept me vpon my bed tell 5: a clock at which time I arose haveinge release of my sickness according to the wonted kindnes of the Lord who after he had Let me se how I had offended that so I might take better heed to my body and soule hereafter with a gentle corriction Let me feele he was reconsiled To me at which time I went to priuat praier and praises examenation and so to work tell supper time which done I hard the Lector and after I had walked an Hower with Mr Hoby I wente to bed.

[6] Appearing many times in the diary, Rhodes seems to have been the Hoby household's chaplain, and he clearly performed the functions of this office, as well as spiritual guide and advisor to Margaret. Given that he is not available to pray with Margaret later this day, it is perhaps implied that he does not actually live in the Hoby household. For more on Rhodes and his position in Margaret's household and his relationship with her, see Moody, xxxvi-xxxvii.

[7] the town Hackness, the village near Hoby's estate.

[8] dispacting perhaps, "dispatching": getting someone ready to travel.

[9] Linton In Yorkshire, approximately 20 miles from Hackness, Linton was Margaret Hoby's birthplace.

the poor and ignorant of the sum[1] principles of religion; and I had walked a little after in the court, Master Hoby came, and so to supper and after to lector and then to bed.

[...]

Saturday 25

In the morning I prayed and then I wrote a letter to Doctor Brewer[2] and so to breakfast, after which I talked privately with Master Hoby, matters concerning conscience and our estates, which, being concluded of between us, I took my coach and came home to Hackness,[3] where, after I was welcomed, I praise God, I went to prayer and meditation; then I went about the house till supper time; after supper I talked with Master Rhodes in the garden, and then to public prayers,[4] and soon after to bed.

The Lord's Day 26

In the morning, after private prayers, I talked a little with Master Rhodes and then to breakfast, soon after which I went to church, and, when the sermon was ended, I meditated of that I heard and prayed till almost dinner. After dinner, I talked awhile with Mistress Brutnell,[5] and then heard a chapter whereof Master Rhodes spoke, and so to church, where at catechizing[6] and sermon I stayed till 4 o'clock. Then I came home and took order for supper, and wrote out notes in my Bible, and then went to walk. And after my coming home, prayed, after which I went to supper and soon after that to prayers and thence to bed. This day, as ever, the Devil laboureth to hinder my profitable hearing of the word and calling upon God, but the Lord, for his mercy's sake, strengthen his children to resist and overcome.

[...]

Tuesday 28

In the morning, after private prayer, I read of the Bible, and then wrought till 8 o'clock, and then I ate my breakfast, after which done, I walked into the fields till 10 o'clock; then I prayed, and not long after I went to dinner; and about one o'clock I gathered my apples till 4; then I came home, and wrought till almost 6, and then I went to private prayer and examination, in which it pleased the Lord to bless me; and beseech the Lord, for Christ his sake, to increase the power of this spirit in me daily, Amen. Amen. Till supper time I heard Master Rhodes read of Cartwright,[7] and soon after supper I went to prayers, after which I wrote to Master Hoby, and so to bed.

Wednesday 29

After private prayer, I read of the Bible and wrought till dinner time, before which I prayed; and, after dinner, I continued my ordinary course of working, reading, and disposing of business in the house, till after 5; at which time I prayed, read a sermon, and examined myself; and then, going to supper, it pleased God to send me ease of the toothache where with I was troubled. Soon after I went to prayers, and, after some talk with some of the servants of household matters, I went to bed.

---

[1] sum used adjectivally, meaning "the most important or significant."

[2] Doctor Brewer Clearly a local physician and Hoby's doctor. Brewer's death from an accidental "overdose" is discussed in the entry for the 31st of the month.

[3] In the entry for Thursday the 23rd, Hoby mentions that she has gone to Linton to visit her mother. See p. 939, note 9.

[4] public prayers i.e., prayers for which the entire household would gather.

[5] Brutnell Moody identifies her tentatively as one of Hoby's waiting gentlewomen.

[6] catechizing a method of religious instruction that involved the asking and answering of questions; there were several printed catechisms available for private use in the period.

[7] Thomas Cartwright (1534/35-1603), Puritan theologian, minister, and author of a number of works. Unlike the other Puritan writers that Hoby mentions, Cartwright's main output before 1599 consisted of works of religious controversy. There is also The Holy Exercise of a True Fast (1580), although Cartwright's authorship is uncertain.

Thursday 30

After private prayer in the morning, I took order for dinner, and then wrought till breakfast time; after that I walked, and then came home and wrote of my commonplace book;[1] then I prayed, and so to dinner. After dinner, I trifled the time about the house and in the town till 2 o'clock; then I came in, and wrought, and instructed some of my family;[2] at which time I found my mind much and altogether eased of some trouble it had before. Then I was busy and heard Master Rhodes read his catechism[3] till 5; then I went to private prayers, meditation, and ordering something in the house, and so to supper; after that to lector, and not long after to bed.

Friday 31

After private prayers, I wrote notes in my Testament after I had taken order in the house; then I ate my breakfast, and then wrought till and walked till dinner; then I prayed privately, and, when I had dined, wrought till 3 o'clock; then I went a little about the house and read of The Diet of the Soul[4] till 5, and then returned to private prayer and meditation, and so to reading of the Bible and walking till supper; after which I heard of the sudden death of Doctor Brewer,[5] procured by a medicine he ministered to himself to cause him to sleep. I was much grieved for it, because of the familiarity I had with him, and good I had received from, but, after better advice, I found the mercy and power of God showed in opening his eyes touching me, and shutting them against himself, by causing him to have great care of ministering unto me, and so little for his own safety. Therefore, I may truly conclude it is the Lord, and not the physician, who both ordains the medicine for our health and ordereth the ministering of it for the good of his children, closing and unclosing the judgments of men at his pleasure. Therefore, let everyone—physician and patient—call upon the Lord for a blessing. And then, after lector, I went to bed.

September 1599, 1 Saturday

After prayer in the morning, I, being not well, did hear Master Rhodes read of Gifford upon the Song of Solomon.[6] Soon after, I went to breakfast, and so walked almost till dinner time; then I came in, and prayed, and so to dinner, after which I walked about the house, barn, and fields, and, when I came home, I prayed private with Master Rhodes, wherein I had more comfort than ever I received in my life before, I praise God. Then I went to take[7] my bees, and, after that, I returned to private prayer myself and examination. Then I went to see my honey ordered,[8] and so to supper, after which I went to lector, and soon after to bed.

[...]

Thursday 6

After I had prayed, I did go about into the house, and then ate my breakfast, and after did see my

[1] commonplace book a book in which "commonplaces" or passages important for reference were collected, usually under general headings; hence, a book in which one records passages or matters to be especially remembered or referred to, with or without arrangement. In Hoby's case, these passages would probably have come largely from Scripture, sermons (heard or read), and religious treatises generally, although given her interest in medicine (she served, as did many mistresses of country estates, as the doctor for her family and tenants) and agriculture, there may have also been passages relevant to these pursuits as well. Hoby's commonplace book does not seem to have survived.

[2] family here, meaning her household.

[3] See p. 940, note 6 above.

[4] unidentified, although a book called A Diet for the Christian Soul, Constantly to Be Observed Every Day was published the following year (1600); there were also four editions between 1520 and 1527 of a treatise called The Dietary of Ghostly Health. A dietary is literally a book or treatise wherein a course of diet is prescribed or marked out.

[5] See p. 940, note 2 above.

[6] Gifford ... Solomon George Gifford (d. 1620), Puritan minister, preacher, and writer. In addition to Fifteen Sermons upon the Song of Solomon (1598; three more editions, 1600-20), he published other sermons, treatises on witchcraft, as well as works of religious controversy. He published 20 titles between 1581 and 1598.

[7] to take to assume responsibility for or take charge of.

[8] to see my honey ordered i.e., to see the preparation of my honey properly undertaken.

honey ordered, and then to dinner, after which I wrought, and walked about with Master Hoby, nothing reading nor profiting myself or any, the Lord pardon my omissions and commitions,[1] and give me his spirit to be watchful to redeem the time. Then I went to private prayer and examination, after to supper and lector, and so to bed.

Friday 7

After private prayers, I wrote my notes in my Testament, which I gathered out of the lector the night before. Then I did eat my breakfast; then I walked abroad and talked of good things, so that I found much comfort; after I came home, I wrote my sermon[2] that was preached the Sabbath day before; then I went to private prayer and so to dinner, after which I talked a little with some of my friends, and exercised my body at bowls[3] a while, of which I found good. Then I came home and wrought till 4; then I prayed with Master Rhodes, and after walked abroad; and when I came home, I prayed privately, and soon after went to supper, after which I went to the lector, and then to bed.

[...]

Monday 10

After private prayers, I went about the house, and then ate my breakfast. Then I walked to the church with Master Hoby; after that, I wrought a little, and neglected my custom of prayer, for which, as for many other sins, it pleased the Lord to punish me with an inward assault. But I know the Lord hath pardoned it, because he is true of his promise, and, if I had not taken this course of examination, I think I had forgotten it. After dinner, I walked with Master Hoby and, after he was gone, I went to get tithe apples;[4] after I came home, I prayed with Master Rhodes, and, after that, privately by myself, and took examination of myself, and so, after I walked awhile, I went to supper, after that to the lector, and so to bed.

[...]

Wednesday the 19

After prayer, I went to breakfast, and so took coach and came to York, to Master Skidmore's house[5] there, where, after much time spent there with some friends, I went to private prayer; and, having supped, I was at public prayers very sick; the Lord pardon the sin for which I was so punished, it being the will of God often to punish one sin with another, for I had little profit by that prayer, by reason of my sickness; yet presently I was well with means,[6] and so went to bed.

[...]

The Lord's Day 23

After private prayer, I walked and did eat my breakfast. Then I read a chapter of the Bible to my mother, and repeated the doctrines which from thence I had heard Master Rhodes collect.[7] Then I went to the church, where I heard Master Palmer[8] speak, but to small profit to any; thence I returned and privately prayed, lamenting the misery of God's visible Church, and praising his goodness to myself about others. Then soon after I went to dinner; after that, I talked with Master

[1] commitions things that one has committed or done.

[2] I wrote my sermon i.e., Hoby wrote down a summary of the sermon she had earlier heard.

[3] bowls a Renaissance version of lawn bowling.

[4] tithe apples i.e., part of the payment (here, a payment in kind) enjoined upon members of a parish for the support of the local minister.

[5] Master Skidmore's house Lady Hoby's lodging (Moody, p. 20, note 50).

[6] with means i.e., through the use of medicine.

[7] collect deduce, infer, gather.

[8] Master Palmer "William Palmer, Chancellor of York Minster (1571-1605)" (Moody, p. 21, note 55).

Hoby, and so went to my Cousin Bouser's[1] child christening, and heard a sermon something better than that in the morning; which ended, with all ceremonies, I returned to my lodging, and examined myself and prayed; then I went to supper to Master Nevell's;[2] after, I went to my lodging, and so went to bed.

[...]

Monday the 1st of October, 1599

After private prayer I wrought awhile and heard Master Rhodes read; then I broke my fast; then I walked. When I came in, I took a lector, prayed, and went to dinner; after that, I walked abroad. Then I came in and wrought, heard Master Rhodes read; then I prayed with Master Rhodes; then I went about the house and examined myself, prayed, and studied my lector, then to supper. After the lector, I heard Helurn[3] read of the Book of Martyrs,[4] and talked with Master Rhodes, and so went to bed.

[...]

Tuesday the 9th day

After private prayers, I did eat my breakfast with Master Hoby; then I walked abroad, and took a lector; after, I came in and prayed, and then went to dinner. Then I went about and delivered corn; then I came into my chamber, and wrote notes in my Testament, and after received rents, and walked awhile, and then examined myself and prayed; after, I walked awhile, and read of Babington,[5] and then went to supper, and soon after went to bed, Master Hoby coming home late.

Wednesday the 10th day

After private prayers, I went about and did eat my breakfast; then I wrote some notes in my Bible, then went to dinner; after, I walked and preserved some sweetmeat;[6] then I wrote notes again in my Bible; then I walked, and then came in and examined myself and prayed; then I went to supper, and, after, paid servants' wages, and so went to bed.

[...]

The Lord's Day the 28th

After private prayers, I wrote notes in my Testament, and did eat my breakfast; then, to church; after I came home, to prayer and so to dinner; after which, I talked with a woman that was to be divorced from her husband with whom she lived incestuously;[7] then I went to church, and, after catechizing and sermon, I walked abroad; then I meditated of the sermons, and read and spoke to Mistress Ormstone of the chapter that was read in the morning, and so went to private prayer; after, to supper, then to prayers, and soon after to bed.

[...]

Wednesday the 15th [of November]

After private prayer, I wrought till dinner time; after, I wrought and did business in the house till

[1] "Possibly of the Bourchier family, cousins through Lady Russell, Lady Hoby's mother-in-law" (Moody, p. 20, note 53).

[2] "Master Neville, possibly related to Lady Burghley" (Moody, p. 21, note 56).

[3] Neither Moody nor Meads identifies Helurn, although he may have been a servant, and certainly Hoby records in an earlier entry (Friday 28 Sept.) that "one of the men read of the Book of Martyrs."

[4] the Book of Martyrs John Foxe's Acts and Monuments of These Latter and Perilous Days (popularly known as the Book of Martyrs) (1563; 2nd edition, revised and enlarged, 1570), a popular and influential collection of stories of the English Protestant martyrs from the fourteenth century to Foxe's own time.

[5] Gervase Babington (1550-1610), bishop, and prolific author of many religious works (including sermons, expositions of Scripture, and sacred dialogues), and participant in the Hampton Court Conference.

[6] sweetmeat preserved or candied fruit, sugared nuts, etc.

[7] a woman … incestuously i.e., this woman and her husband had been married within the forbidden degrees of consanguinity (kinship) set out in the Church of England.

almost supper time; then I prayed and examined myself, when I found what it was to want[1] the continual preaching of the word by my coldness to all spiritual exercises, but I beseech the Lord pardon my several defects and restore me to my former life, for thy mercy's sake, with increase of his spirit, and so much more spiritual comfort as now is a-wanting. After supper, I walked till bedtime, and then I prayed, and so went to bed.

[...]

[1603]

[The 23rd of March: Which Day the Queen Departed This Life]

Master Hoby received letters which came from the Privy Council to the lord president and all the justices of peace, that our Queen was sick, which wrought great sorrow and dread in all good subjects' hearts. These letters were dated the 16th of March.

[March, 1603, the 26th]

This day, being the Lord's day, was the death of the Queen published, and our now King, James of Scotland, proclaimed king to succeed her. God send him a long and happy reign. Amen.

[The 27th]

Went Master Hoby and myself towards York, thinking to continue there until all things were established, but he received letters from the Council at York. We both returned from Linton the 29th day to Hackness where we found all quiet, God be praised.

[...]

—1599-1603

[1] want lack.

Samuel Daniel
1562/1563-1619

Samuel Daniel wrote in a variety of genres, including history, drama, lyric, and narrative poetry, as well as non-fictional prose (of particular note is his influential essay A Defence of Rhyme). Many of his works were dedicated to or commissioned by nobility and royalty. In 1592, he was under the patronage of the sister of Sir Philip Sidney, Mary Sidney Herbert, countess of Pembroke, and he would later join the literary circle at Wilton, Mary and her husband's Pembroke estate. A number of his works are dedicated to various members of this family. Delia (1592) contributed to the vogue in sonnet sequences; published alongside Delia was the long and dramatic poem, The Complaint of Rosamond, which draws on Petrarchan tropes to create the tragic lament of a murdered mistress. Daniel's Panegyric Congratulatory to the King's Majesty welcomed King James to England in 1603; while the poem failed to gain James's favour, Daniel was under Queen Anne's patronage by 1604 and wrote the first of four dramatic works for the Court.

EDITIONS: Delia. London: Printed by I.C. for Simon Waterson, 1592. STC 6243.2; "The Complaint of Rosamond" in Delia and Rosamond augmented. Cleopatra. London: [By James Roberts and Edward Allde] for Simon Waterson, 1594. STC 6243.4; "To the Lady Lucy, Countess of Bedford," "To the Lady Anne Clifford," "A Panegyric Congratulatory to the King's Most Excellent Majesty," and "A Defence of Rhyme" in A panegyrike congratulatorie delivered to the Kings most excellent Majestie … Also certaine epistles, with a defence of ryme … London: Imprinted [by V. Simmes] for Edward Blount, 1603. STC 6259.

from Delia

To the Right Honourable the Lady Mary, Countess of Pembroke.

Right Honourable, although I rather desired to keep in the private passions of my youth from the multitude, as things uttered to myself and consecrated to silence, yet seeing I was betrayed by the indiscretion of a greedy printer, and had some of my secrets bewrayed[1] to the world uncorrected, doubting[2] the like of the rest, I am forced to publish that which I never meant. But this wrong was not only done to me, but to him whose unmatchable lines have endured the like misfortune,[3] ignorance sparing not to commit sacrilege upon so holy relics. Yet Astrophil, flying with the wings of his own fame a higher pitch than the gross-sighted can discern, hath registered his own name in the annals of eternity and cannot be disgraced, howsoever disguised. And for myself, seeing I am thrust out into the world, and that my unboldened Muse is forced to appear so rawly in public, I desire only to be graced by the countenance of your protection, whom the fortune of our time hath made the happy and judicial patroness of the Muses (a glory hereditary to your house) to preserve them from those hideous beasts, Oblivion and Barbarism. Whereby you do not only possess the honour of the present, but also do bind posterity to an ever grateful memory of your virtues, wherein you must survive yourself. And if my lines hereafter better laboured shall purchase grace in the world, they must remain the monuments of your honourable favour, and record the zealous duty of me, who am vowed to your honour in all observancy forever,

Samuel Daniel.

[1] bewrayed revealed, betrayed.

[2] doubting fearing.

[3] But this wrong … like misfortune Sir Philip Sidney's sonnet sequence Astrophil and Stella was first printed in 1591 in three versions, none of which was authorized by Sidney, who had died in 1586, or by his unofficial literary executor, his sister Mary Sidney Herbert, countess of Pembroke; one edition of 1591 included twenty-seven of Daniel's Delia sonnets and one sonnet to the author.

Sonnet VI

Fair is my love, and cruel as sh'is fair;
Her brow shades frowns, although her eyes are sunny;
Her smiles are lightning, though her pride dispair;
And her disdains are gall, her favours honey.
A modest maid, deckt with a blush of honour,
Whose feet do tread green paths of youth and love,
The wonder of all eyes that look upon her,
Sacred on earth, design'd a saint above.
Chastity and Beauty, which were deadly foes,
Live reconciled friends within her brow:
And had she pity to conjoin with those,[1]
Then who had heard the plaints I utter now?
Oh had she not been fair, and thus unkind,
My Muse had slept, and none had known my mind.

Sonnet IX

If this be love, to draw a weary breath,
Paint[2] on floods, till the shore, cry to th'air,
With downward looks, still reading on the earth,
The sad memorials of my love's despair;
If this be love, to war against my soul,
Lie down to wail, rise up to sigh and grieve me,
The never-resting stone of care to roll,[3]
Still to complain my griefs, and none relieve me;
If this be love, to clothe me with dark thoughts,
Haunting untrodden paths to wail apart,
My pleasures horror, music tragic notes,
Tears in my eyes, and sorrow at my heart;
If this be love, to live a living death,
Oh then love I, and draw this weary breath.

Sonnet XV

If that a loyal heart and faith unfeigned,
If a sweet languish with a chaste desire,
If hunger-starven thoughts so long retained,
Fed but with smoke, and cherisht but with fire;
And if a brow with cares' characters painted,
Bewrays my love, with broken words half spoken,
To her that sits in my thoughts' temple sainted,
And lays to view my vulture-gnawn heart open;
If I have done due homage to her eyes,
And had my sighs still tending on her name,
If on her love my life and honour lies,
And she th'unkindest maid still scorns the same;
Let this suffice, the world yet may see,[4]
The fault is hers, though mine the hurt must be.

Sonnet XVIII

Restore thy tresses to the golden ore,
Yield Cithereas' son those arks of love,[5]
Bequeath the heavens the stars that I adore,
And to th'Orient do thy pearls remove.
Yield thy hands' pride unto th'ivory white,
T'Arabian odours[6] give thy breathing sweet,
Restore thy blush unto Aurora[7] bright,
To Thetis[8] give the honour of thy feet.

---

1 had she … those i.e., if she would join pity to chastity and beauty.

2 Paint "pant" has been proposed as an alternate, but to "paint on floods"—and to "till the shore"—are examples of futile endeavours.

3 The never-resting … roll Sisyphus was condemned eternally to roll a rock up a hill, only to have it roll back down before reaching the summit.

4 The end of this line was later revised to amend the meter: "that all the world may see."

5 Cithereas' … love Aphrodite, a goddess of war and love, landed on the island of Cythera and so is referred to as "Cytherean." Both Aeneas and Eros were her sons. The "arks of love" are the mistress's eyebrows.

6 T'Arabian odours spices were imported from Arabia.

7 Aurora the dawn.

8 Thetis Thetis, a sea nymph and one of the Nereids, is the mother of Achilles.

Let Venus[1] have thy graces, her resigned,
And thy sweet voice give back unto the spheres,[2]
But yet restore thy fierce and cruel mind,
To Hyrcan[3] tigers, and to ruthless bears.
Yield to the marble thy hard heart again;
So shalt thou cease to plague, and I to pain.

Sonnet XXX

I once may see when years shall wreck my wrong,[4]
When golden hairs shall change to silver wire,
And those bright rays, that kindle all this fire
Shall fail in force, their working not so strong.
Then beauty, now the burthen[5] of my song,
Whose glorious blaze the world doth so admire,
Must yield up all to tyrant Time's desire:
Then fade those flowers which deckt her pride so long.
When if she grieve to gaze her in her glass,
Which then presents her winter-withered hue,
Go you my verse, go tell her what she was,
For what she was she best shall find in you.
Your fiery heat lets not her glory pass,
But phoenix-like[6] shall make her live anew.

Sonnet XXXV

Thou canst not die whilst any zeal abound
In feeling hearts, that can conceive these lines:
Though thou a Laura hast no Petrarch[7] found,
In base attire, yet clearly Beauty shines.
And I, though born [with]in a colder clime,
Do feel mine inward heat as great, I know it:
He never had more faith, although more rhyme,
I love as well, though he could better show it.
But I may add one feather to thy fame,
To help her flight throughout the fairest isle:
And if my pen could more enlarge thy name,
Then shouldst thou live in an immortal style.
But though that Laura better limned[8] be,
Suffice, thou shalt be lov'd as well as she.

Sonnet XLIX

Unhappy pen and ill-accepted papers,
That intimate in vain my chaste desires,
My chaste desires, the ever burning tapers,
Enkindled by her eyes' celestial fires.
Celestial fires and unrespecting powers,
That deign not view the glory of your might,
In humble lines the work of careful hours,
The sacrifice I offer to her sight.
But sith[9] she scorns her own, this rests for me:
I'll moan my self, and hide the wrong I have,
And so content me that her frowns should be
To my'infant style the cradle, and the grave.
What though myself no honour get thereby,
Each bird sings t'herself, and so will I.

—1592

---

1 Venus goddess of love.

2 sweet … the spheres a reference to "the music of the spheres," that harmonious music produced by the turning of the heavenly bodies on their fixed spheres.

3 Hyrcan The Hyrcanian region on the Caspian Sea was known for its wildness.

4 wreck my wrong cause my ruin.

5 burthen weighty matter as in "burden," but the "burthen" also refers to the refrain or chorus of a song.

6 phoenix-like The phoenix is a mythic bird, one of a kind, that lives for up to 600 years and is consumed by flames of its own making, only to be reborn with renewed vigour and beauty.

7 Petrarch The Italian poet Francesco Petrarch (1304-74) greatly influenced English love poetry, especially the sonnet. Laura is the beloved in Petrarch's lyric sequence.

8 limned to illuminate or embellish with gold or bright colours; to paint or portray.

9 sith since.

from The Complaint of Rosamond[1]

Out from the horror of infernal deeps,
My poor afflicted ghost comes here to plain it,[2]
Attended with my shame that never sleeps,
The spot wherewith my kind, and youth did stain it.
My body found a grave where to contain it:
A sheet could hide my face, but not my sin,
For Fame finds never tomb t'enclose it in.

And which is worse, my soul is now denied
Her transport to the sweet Elysian[3] rest,
The joyful bliss for ghosts repurified,
The ever-springing gardens of the blest:
Caron denies me wastage[4] with the rest,
And says my soul can never pass the river,
Till lovers' sighs on earth shall it deliver.

So shall I never pass, for how should I
Procure this sacrifice amongst the living?
Time hath long since worn out the memory
Both of my life, and life's unjust depriving:
Sorrow for me is dead for aye reviving.
Rosamond hath little left her but her name,
And that disgrac'd, for time hath wrong'd the same.

No Muse suggests the pity of my case,
Each pen doth overpass my just complaint,
Whilst others are preferred, though far more base:
Shore's wife[5] is grac'd, and passes for a saint;
Her legend justifies her foul attaint;
Her well-told tale did such compassion find,
That she is pass'd, and I am left behind.

Which seen with grief, my miserable ghost,
(Whilom[6] invested in so fair a veil,
Which whilst it liv'd, was honoured of the most,
And being dead, gives matter to bewail)
Comes to solicit thee (since others fail)
To take this task, and in thy woeful song
To form my case, and register my wrong.

Although I know thy just lamenting Muse,
Toil'd in th'affliction of thine own distress,[7]
In others' cares hath little time to use,
And therefore may'st esteem of mine the less:
Yet as thy hopes attend happy redress,
Thy joys depending on a woman's grace,
So move thy mind a woeful woman's case.

Delia may hap to deign to read our story,
And offer up her sigh among the rest,
Whose merit would suffice for both our glory,
Whereby thou might'st be grac'd, and I be blest:
That indulgence would profit me the best.
Such power she hath by whom thy youth is led,
To joy the living and to bless the dead.

So I (through beauty) made the woefull'st wight,
By beauty might have comfort after death:
That dying fairest, by the fairest might Find life above on earth, and rest beneath.

---

[1] The Complaint was published along with Delia in 1592 and again, revised and augmented, in 1594. This version is based on the 1594 edition. The poem is, for the most part, in the voice of Rosamond, who begs the poet to tell the story, and alludes to Delia as the poet's Muse. Rosamond Clifford (1133-76) appears to have been a distant relative of Anne Clifford (to whom Daniel was a tutor and also wrote a verse letter, included here). Anne Clifford married Philip Herbert, earl of Pembroke; the Complaint is dedicated to Lady Mary Sidney Herbert, countess of Pembroke.

[2] plain it complain, lament.

[3] Elysian Elysium is the abode of the blessed after death in Greek mythology.

[4] Caron Chiron is the ferryman who conveys the shades across the river Styx; wastage loss or diminution by decay.

[5] Shore's wife Jane Shore (c. 1445-c. 1527), mistress to both Edward IV and Thomas Grey, first marquess of Dorset, was accused by Richard III of sorcery, imprisoned, and forced to do public penance. She is the subject of a number of poems, including a pair of epistles by Michael Drayton.

[6] Whilom at some past time, or at times.

[7] I.e., in writing sonnets to Delia.

She that can bless us with one happy breath,
Give comfort to thy Muse to do her best,
That thereby thou may'st joy, and I might rest.

Thus said, forthwith mov'd with a tender care[1]
And pity (which myself could never find),[2]
What she desir'd, my Muse deigned to declare,
And therefore will'd her boldly tell her mind:
And I (more willing) took this charge assigned,
Because her griefs were worthy to be known,
And telling hers, might hap forget mine own.

Then write (quoth she) the ruin of my youth,
Report the downfall of my slippery state:
Of all my life reveal the simple truth,
To teach to others, what I learnt too late.
Exemplify my frailty, tell how fate
Keeps in eternal dark our fortunes hidden,
And ere they come, to know them 'tis forbidden.

For whilst the sunshine of my fortune lasted,
I joy'd the happiest warmth, the sweetest heat
That ever yet imperious beauty tasted,
I had what glory ever flesh could get:
But this fair morning had a shameful set.
Disgrace darkt honour, sin did cloud my brow,
As note the sequel, and I'll tell thee how.

The blood I stain'd was good and of the best,
My birth had honour, and my beauty fame:
Nature and fortune join'd to make me blest,
Had I had grace t'have known to use the same.
My education show'd from whence I came,
And all concur'd to make me happy first,
That so great hap[3] might make me more accurst.

Happy liv'd I, whilst parents' eye did guide
The indiscretion of my feeble ways,
And country home kept me from being eyed,
Where best unknown I spent my sweetest days;
Till that my friends mine honour sought to raise
To higher place, which greater credit yields,
Deeming such beauty was unfit for fields.

From country then to court I was preferr'd,
From calm to storms, from shore into the deeps:
There where I perish'd, where my youth first err'd,
There where I lost the flower which honour keeps,
There where the worser thrives, the better weeps;
Ah me (poor wench) on this unhappy shelf[4]
I grounded me, and cast away my self.[5]

For thither com'd,[6] when years had arm'd my youth,
With rarest proof of beauty ever seen:
When my reviving eye had learnt the truth,
That it had power to make the winter green,
And flower affections whereas none had been,
Soon could I teach my brow to tyrannize,
And make the world do homage to mine eyes.

For age I saw (though years with cold conceit Congealed their thoughts against a warm desire)

[1] This stanza is in the voice of the poet; Rosamond continues in the next stanza.

[2] I.e., from Delia.

[3] hap some editions say "hope."

[4] shelf a sandbank or submerged ledge of rock, which continues the ship and sea imagery.

[5] In the fourth edition, in 1601, the following stanza was inserted:

There whereas frail and tender beauty stands,
With all assaulting powers environed,
Having but prayers and weak, feeble hands
To hold their honour's fort unvanquished,
There where to stand, and be unconquered,
Is to b'above the nature of our kind,
That cannot long for pity be unkind.

[6] For thither com'd i.e., "There I came."

Yet sigh their want, and look at such a bait;
I saw how youth was wax before the fire;
I saw by stealth, I fram'd my look a lyre.[1]
Yet well perceiv'd how fortune made me then
The envy of my sex, and wonder unto men.

Look how a comet at the first appearing,
Draws all men's eyes with wonder to behold it;
Or as the saddest tale at sudden hearing,
Makes silent list'ning unto him that told it:
So did my speech when rubies did unfold it,
So did the blazing of my blush appear,
T'amaze the world, that holds such sights so dear.

Ah beauty Siren,[2] fair enchanting good,
Sweet silent rhetoric of persuading eyes:
Dumb eloquence, whose power doth move the blood,
More than the words or wisdom of the wise:
Still harmony, whose diapason[3] lies
Within a brow, the key which passions move,
To ravish sense, and play a world in love.

What might I then not do whose power was such?
What cannot women do that know their power?
What women knows it not (I fear too much)
How bliss or bale lies in their laugh or lour?[4]
Whilst they enjoy their happy blooming flower,
Whilst Nature decks her with her proper fair
Which cheers the world, joys each sight, sweetens th'air.[5]

Such one was I, my beauty was mine own,
No borrowed blush which bank-rot[6] beauties seek:
That newfound-shame, a sin to us unknown,
Th'adulterate beauty of a falsed cheek:
Vild stain to honour and to women eke,[7]
Seeing that time our fading must detect,
Thus with defect to cover our defect.

Impiety of times, chastity's abater,[8]
Falsehood, wherein thyself thyself deniest:
Treason, to counterfeit the seal of Nature,
The stamp of Heaven, impressed by the highest.
Disgrace unto the world, to whom thou liest,
Idol unto thyself, shame to the wise,
And all that honour thee idolatrise.

Far was that sin from us whose age was pure,
When simply beauty was accounted best,
The time when women had no other lure
But modesty, pure cheeks, a virtuous breast;
This was the pomp wherewith my youth was blest;
These were the weapons which mine honour won
In all the conflicts that mine eyes begun.

Which were not small; I wrought on no mean object;
A crown was at my feet, sceptres obeyed me;
Whom fortune made my king, love made my subject;

---

1 There are two possibilities: a "lyre," the instrument whose music entices men, or a "liar."

2 Siren a mythical creature, part woman, part bird, who lures sailors to their deaths with enchanted singing. In one edition, this word is "sired" (produced).

3 diapason a note of concord, harmony.

4 lour frown.

5 These last two lines were later amended: "Whilst Nature decks them in their best attires / Of youth and beauty, which the world admires."

6 bank-rot bankrupt; this section condemns cosmetics.

7 Vild vile; eke also.

8 abater to beat down.

Who did command the land, most humbly prayed me;
Henry the second, that so highly weigh'd[1] me,
Found well (by proof) the privilege of beauty,
That it hath power to countermand all duty.

For after all his victories in France,
Triumphing in the honour of his deeds,
Unmatch'd by sword, was vanquished by a glance,
And hotter wars within his bosom breeds:
Wars whom whole legions of desires feeds,
Against all which my chastity opposes,
The field of honour, virtue never loses.

No armour might be found that could defend
Transpiercing rays of crystal-pointed eyes:
No stratagem, no reason could amend,
No not his age (yet old men should be wise):
But shows deceive, outward appearance lies;
Let none for seeming so, think saints of others,
For all are men, and all have suckt their mothers.

Who would have thought a monarch would have ever
Obeyed his handmaid, of so mean estate,
Vulture ambition feeding on his liver,
Age having worn his pleasures out of date.
But hap comes never or it comes too late,
For such a dainty which his youth found not,
Unto his feeble age did chance allot.

Ah fortune, never absolutely good,
For that some cross still counterchecks our luck,
As here behold th'incompatible blood,
Of age and youth was that whereon we stuck:
Whose loathing, we from nature's breasts do suck,
As opposite to what our blood requires,
For equal age doth equal like desires.

But mighty men in highest honour sitting,
Nought but applause and pleasure can behold:
Sooth'd in their liking, careless what is fitting,
May not be suffred once to think the'are old,
Not trusting what they see, but what is told.
Miserable fortune to forget so far
The state of flesh, and what our frailties are.

Yet must I needs excuse so great defect,
For drinking of the Lethe[2] of mine eyes,
H'is forc'd forget himself, and all respect
Of majesty whereon his state relies,
And now of loves and pleasures must devise.
For thus reviv'd again, he serves and su'th,[3]
And seeks all means to undermine my youth.

Which never by assault he could recover,
So well encamp'd in strength of chaste desires:
My clean-arm'd thoughts repell'd an unchaste lover.
The crown that could command what it requires,
I lesser priz'd than chastity's attires:
Th'unstained veil, which innocents adorns,
Th'ungathred rose, defended with the thorns.

And safe mine honour stood, till that in truth,
One of my sex, of place and nature bad,
Was set in ambush to entrap my youth,
One in the habit of like frailty clad,
One who the liv'ry[4] of like weakness had.
A seeming matron, yet a sinful monster,
As by her words the chaster sort may conster.[5]

[...]

[1] Henry the second Henry II, reigned 1154-89; weigh'd prized.

[2] Lethe a river in Hades, whose water causes forgetfulness.

[3] su'th sues, seeks.

[4] liv'ry livery or a suit of clothes, here "appearance."

[5] conster construe.

"Daughter" (saith she) "behold thy happy chance,
That hast the lot cast down into thy lap,
Whereby thou maist thy honour great advance,
Whilst thou (unhappy) wilt not see thy hap:
Such fond respect thy youth doth so enwrap,
To'oppose thy self against thine own good fortune,
That points thee out, and seems thee to importune.

"Dost thou not see how that thy king (thy Jove),[1]
Lightens forth glory on thy dark estate,
And showers down gold and treasure from above,
Whilst thou dost shut thy lap against thy fate?
Fie fondling fie, thou wilt repent too late
The error of thy youth, that canst not see
What is the fortune that doth follow thee.

[...]

"The subtle city-women, better learned,
Esteem them chaste enough that best seem so;
Who though they sport, it shall not be discerned,
Their face bewrays not what their bodies do;
'Tis wary walking that doth safeliest go,
With show of virtue, as the cunning knows:
Babes are beguiled with sweets, and men with shows.

"Then use thy talent, youth shall be thy warrant,
And let not honour from thy sports detract:
Thou must not fondly think thyself transparent,
That those who see thy face can judge thy fact;
Let her have shame that cannot closely[2] act,
And seem thee chaste, which is the chiefest art,
For what we seem each sees: none knows our heart.

"The mighty, who can with such sins dispense,
Instead of shame do honours great bestow:
A worthy author doth redeem th'offence,
And makes the scarlet sin as white as snow.
The Majesty that doth descend so low,
Is not defiled, but pure remains therein,
And being sacred, sanctifies the sin."

[...]

Here interrupt she leaves me in a doubt,
When lo began the combat in my blood,
Seeing my youth environ'd round about,
The ground uncertain where my reasons stood;
Small my defence to make my party good,
Against such powers which were so surely laid,
To overthrow a poor unskillful maid.

Treason was in my bones, myself conspiring
To sell myself to lust, my soul to sin:
Pure-blushing shame was even in retiring,
Leaving the sacred hold it gloried in.
Honour lay prostrate for my flesh to win,
When cleaner thoughts my weakness gan upbray[3]
Against myself, and shame did force me say:

"Ah Rosamond, what doth thy flesh prepare?
Destruction to thy days, death to thy fame.
Wilt thou betray that honour held with care,
T'entomb with black reproach a spotted name,
Leaving thy blush the colours of thy shame?
Opening thy feet to sin, thy soul to lust,
Graceless to lay thy glory in the dust?

Nay, first let th'earth gape wide to swallow thee,
And shut thee up in bosom with her dead,
Ere serpent tempt thee taste forbidden tree,
Or feel the warmth of an unlawful bed,
Suff'ring thyself by lust to be misled,

[1] Jove the supreme deity.
[2] closely secretly.
[3] upbray upbraid, censure.

So to disgrace thyself and grieve thine heirs,
That Clifford's race should scorn thee one of theirs.

[...]

But what? he is my king and may constrain me,
Whether I yield or not I live defamed.
The world will think authority did gain me,
I shall be judg'd his love, and so be shamed.
We see the fair condemn'd, that never gamed.
And if I yield, 'tis honourable shame,
If not, I live disgrac'd, yet thought the same."

[...]

Thus stood I balanc'd equally precise,
Till my frail flesh did weigh me down to sin:
Till world and pleasure made me partialize,[1]
And glittering pomp my vanity did win.
When to excuse my fault my lusts begin,
And impious thoughts alleg'd this wanton clause,
That though I sinn'd, my sin had honest cause.

[...]

Thus wrought to sin, soon was I trained[2] from Court,
T'a solitary grange,[3] there to attend
The time the King should thither make resort,
Where he love's long-desired work should end.
Thither he daily messages doth send,
With costly jewels (orators of love),
Which (ah too well men know) do women move.

[...]

I saw the sin wherein my foot was ent'ring,
I saw how that dishonour did attend it,
I saw the shame whereon my flesh was vent'ring,[4]
Yet had I not the power for to defend it,
So weak is sense when error hath condemn'd it.
We see what's good, and thereto we consent,
But yet we choose the worst, and soon repent.

And now I come to tell the worst of illness,
Now draws the date of mine affliction near,
Now when the dark had wrapt up all in stillness,
And dreadful black had dispossess'd the clear,
Com'd was the night (mother of sleep and fear),
Who with her sable mantle friendly covers,
The sweet-stol'n sports of joyful meeting lovers.

When lo, I joyed my lover, not my love,
And felt the hand of lust most undesired:
Enforc'd th'unproved bitter sweet to prove,
Which yields no mutual pleasure when 'tis hired.
Love's not constrain'd, nor yet of due required.
Judge they who are unfortunately wed,
What 'tis to come unto a loathed bed.

But soon his age receiv'd his short contenting,
And sleep sealed up his languishing desires,
When he turns to his rest, I to repenting,
Into myself my waking thought retires:
My nakedness had prov'd my senses liars.
Now opened were mine eyes to look therein,
For first we taste the fruit, then see our sin.

Now did I find myself unparadis'd,
From those pure fields of my so clean beginning:
Now I perceiv'd how ill I was advis'd,
My flesh gan loathe the new-felt touch of sinning:
Shame leaves us by degrees, not at first winning.

---

1 partialize became biased.

2 trained drawn.

3 T'a to a; grange a country house.

4 vent'ring venturing.

For nature checks a new offence with loathing,
But use of sin doth make it seem as nothing.

And use of sin did work in me a boldness,
And love in him incorporates such zeal,
That jealousy increas'd with age's coldness,
Fearing to lose the joy of all his weal.
Or doubting time his stealth might else reveal,
H'is driven to devise some subtle way,
How he might safeliest keep so rich a prey.

A stately palace he forthwith did build,
Whose intricate innumerable ways,
With such confused errors so beguil'd
Th'unguided ent'rers with uncertain strays,
And doubtful turnings kept them in delays,
With bootless labour leading them about,
Able to find no way, nor in, nor out.

Within the closed bosom of which frame,
That serv'd a centre to that goodly round,
Were lodgings, with a garden to the same,
With sweetest flowers that ev'r adorn'd the ground,
And all the pleasures that delight hath found,
T'entertain the sense of wanton eyes,
Fuel of love, from whence lust's flames arise.

Here I enclos'd from all the world asunder,
The Minotaur[1] of shame kept for disgrace,
The monster of fortune, and the world's wonder,
Liv'd cloistered in so desolate a case:
None but the king might come into the place,
With certain maids that did attend my need,
And he himself came guided by a threed.[2]

[...]

Yet would to God my foot had never moved
From country safety, from the fields of rest,
To know the danger to be highly loved,
And live in pomp to brave[3] among the best;
Happy for me, better had I been blest,
If I unluckily had never strayed,
But liv'd at home a happy country maid.

Whose unaffected innocency thinks
No guileful fraud, as doth the courtly liver:
She's deckt with truth; the river where she drinks
Doth serve her for her glass, her counsel giver:
She loves sincerely, and is loved ever.
Her days are peace, and so she ends her breath
(True life that knows not what's to die till death).

So should I never have been registered,
In the black book of the unfortunate:
Nor had my name enrolled with maids misled,
Which bought their pleasures at so high a rate.
Nor had I taught (through my unhappy fate),
This lesson (which myself learnt with expense),
How most it hurts that most delights the sense.

Shame follows sin, disgrace is duly given,
Impiety will out, never so closely done:
No walls can hide us from the eyes of Heaven,
For shame must end what wickedness begun,
Forth breaks reproach when we least think thereon.
And this is ever proper unto courts:
That nothing can be done but fame reports.

[...]

[1] Minotaur The Minotaur—half bull, half man—was hidden in a labyrinth and fed young sacrifices. It was killed by Theseus.

[2] threed thread.

[3] to brave to glory, to dress splendidly.

And this our stealth she[1] could not long conceal,
From her whom such a forfeit most concerned:
The wronged Queen, who could so closely deal,
That she the whole of all our practice learned,
And watched a time when least it was discerned,
In absence of the King, to wreak her wrong,
With such revenge as she desired long.

The labyrinth she ent'red by that threed
That serv'd a conduct to my absent lord,
Left there by chance, reserv'd for such a deed,
Where she surpris'd me whom she so abhorred.
Enrag'd with madness, scarce she speaks a word,
But flies with eager fury to my face,
Off'ring me most unwomanly disgrace.

[...]

And after all her vile reproaches used,
She forc'd me take the poison she had brought,
To end the life that had her so abused,
And free her fears, and ease her jealous thought.
No cruelty her wrath would leave unwrought,
No spiteful act that to revenge is common
(For no beast fiercer than a jealous woman).

"Here take" (saith she) "thou impudent unclean,
Base graceless strumpet, take this next your heart;
Your lovesick heart, that overcharg'd hath been
With pleasure's surfeit, must be purg'd with art.
This potion hath a power that will convart[2]
To naught, those humours that oppress you so.
And (girl) I'll see you take it ere I go.

"What, stand you now amaz'd, retire you back?
Tremble you (minion)? Come, dispatch with speed.
There is no help, your champion now you lack,
And all these tears you shed will nothing steed;[3]
Those dainty fingers needs must do the deed.
Take it, or I will drench you else by force,
And trifle not, lest that I use you worse."

Having this bloody doom from hellish breath,
My woeful eyes on every side I cast:
Rigour about me, in my hand my death,
Presenting me the horror of my last,
All hope of pity and of comfort past.
No means, no power, no forces to contend,
My trembling hands must give myself my end.

Those hands that beauty's ministers had been,[4]
They must give death, that me adorn'd of late:
That mouth that newly gave consent to sin,
Must now receive destruction in thereat.
That body which my lust did violate,
Must sacrifice itself t'appease the wrong
(So short is pleasure, glory lasts not long).

And she no sooner saw I had it taken,
But forth she rushes (proud with victory),
And leaves m'alone, of all the world forsaken,
Except of death, which she had left with me
(Death and myself alone together be),
To whom she did her full revenge refer.
Ah poor weak conquest both for him and her.

Then straight my conscience summons up my sin,
T'appear before me in a hideous face;
Now doth the terror of my soul begin,
When ev'ry corner of that hateful place
Dictates mine error, and reveals disgrace;
Whilst I remain opprest in every part,
Death in my body, horror at my heart.

[1] she i.e., fame.
[2] convart convert.
[3] steed stead: i.e., the tears will do you no good.
[4] been pronounced "bin."

Down on my bed my loathsome self I cast,
The bed that likewise gives in evidence
Against my soul, and tells I was unchast,[1]
Tells I was wanton, tells I followed sense.
And therefore cast, by guilt of mine offence,
Must here the right of Heaven needs satisfy,
And where I wanton lay, must wretched die.

Here I began to wail my hard mishap,
My sudden, strange unlooked for misery,
Accusing them that did my youth entrap,
To give me such a fall of infamy.
"And poor distressed Rosamond (said I),
Is this thy glory got, to die forlorn
In deserts where no ear can hear thee mourn?

Nor any eye of pity to behold
The woeful end of thy sad tragedy,
But that thy wrongs unseen, thy tale untold,
Must here in secret silence buried lie,
And with thee, thine excuse together die.
Thy sin reveal'd, but thy repentance hid,
Thy shame alive, but dead what thy death did.

[...]

O you that proud with liberty and beauty
(And oh may well be proud that you be so),
Glitter in court, lov'd and observ'd of duty,
Oh that I might to you but ere I go
Speak what I feel, to warn you by my woe,
To keep your feet in pure clean paths of shame,
That no enticing may divert the same.

See'ng how against your tender weakness still,
The strength of wit, of gold, and all is bent;
And all th'assaults that ever might or skill
Can give against a chaste and clean intent;

Ah let not greatness work you to consent.
The spot is foul, though by a monarch made,
Kings cannot privilege a sin[2] forbade.

[...]

And fly (Oh fly) these bed-brokers unclean,
(The monsters of our sex) that make a prey
Of their own kind, by an unkindly mean;
And even (like vipers) eating out a way
Through th'womb of their own shame, accursed they Live by the death of fame, the gain of sin,
The filth of lust, uncleanness wallows in.

Oh is it not enough that we (poor we)
Have weakness, beauty, gold and men our foes,
But we must have some of ourselves to be
Traitors unto ourselves, to join with those?
Such as our feeble forces do disclose,
And still betray our cause, our shame, our youth,
To lust, to folly, and to men's untruth?"

[...]

But now, the poison spread through all my veins,
Gan dispossess my living senses quite,
And naught-respecting death (the last of pains),
Plac'd his pale colours (th'ensign[3] of his might),
Upon his new-got spoil before his right;
Thence chas'd my soul, setting my day ere noon,
When I least thought my joys could end so soon.

And as conveyed t'untimely funerals,
My scarce cold corse[4] not suff'red longer stay,
Behold the King (by chance) returning, falls
T'encounter with the same upon the way,

[1] unchast unchaste.

[2] a sin The 1601 edition has "what God."

[3] th'ensign the banner or sign.

[4] corse corpse, body.

As he repaired to see his dearest joy.
Not thinking such a meeting could have been,
To see his love, and seeing been unseen.

Judge those whom chance deprives of sweetest treasure,
What 'tis to lose a thing we hold so dear:
The best delight, wherein our soul takes pleasure,
The sweet of life, that penetrates so near.
What passions feels that heart, enforc'd to bear
The deep impression of so strange a sight?
Tongue, pen, nor art, can never show aright.

[...]

"O heavens" (quoth he) "why do mine eyes behold,
The hateful rays of this unhappy sun?
Why have I light to see my sins controlled,
With blood of mine own shame thus vildly done?
How can my sight endure to look thereon?
Why doth not black eternal darkness hide
That from mine eyes, my heart cannot abide?"

[...]

Thus as these passions do him overwhelm,
He draws him near my body to behold it:
And as the vine married unto the elm
With strict embraces, so doth he enfold it.
And as he in his careful arms doth hold it,
Viewing the face that even death commends,
On senseless lips, millions of kisses spends.

[...]

"Wonder of beauty, oh receive these plaints,
These obsequies, the last that I shall make thee:
For lo, my soul that now already faints
(That lov'd thee living, dead will not forsake thee)
Hastens her speedy course to over-take thee.
I'll meet my death, and free myself thereby,
For (ah) what can he do that cannot die?

"Yet ere I die, thus much my soul doth vow,
Revenge shall sweeten death with ease of mind,
And I will cause posterity shall know,
How fair thou wert above all women kind.
And after-ages monuments shall find,
Showing thy beauty's title, not thy name,
Rose of the world[1] that sweet'ned so the same."

[...]

Then were my funerals not long deferred,
But done with all the rites pomp could devise,
At Godstow, where my body was interred,
And richly tomb'd in honourable wise.
Where yet as now scarce any note descries
Unto these times, the memory of me,
Marble and brass so little lasting be.

[...]

And were it not thy favourable lines,
Re-edified the wrack of my decays,
And that thy accents willingly assigns
Some farther date, and give me longer days,
Few in this age had known my beauty's praise.
But thus renewed, my fame redeems some time,
Till other ages shall neglect thy rhyme.

Then when confusion in her course shall bring
Sad desolation on the times to come,
When mirthless Thames shall have no swan to sing,
All music silent, and the Muses dumb,
And yet even then it must be known to some,

[1] Rose of the world her name: Rose-a-mond.

That once they flourisht, though not cherisht so,
And Thames had swans as well as ever Po.[1]

But here an end, I may no longer stay thee,
I must return t'attend at Stygian[2] flood,
Yet ere I go, this one word more I pray thee,
Tell Delia now her sigh may do me good,
And will her note the frailty of our blood.
And if I pass unto those happy banks,
Then she must have her praise, thy pen her thanks.

So vanisht she, and left me to return,[3]
To prosecute the tenor of my woes:
Eternal matter for my Muse to mourn,
But (ah) the world hath heard too much of those;[4]
My youth such errors must no more disclose.
I'll hide the rest, and grieve for what hath been;
Who made me known, must make me live unseen.

—1592

To the Lady Lucy, Countess of Bedford[5]

Though virtue be the same when low she stands
In th'humble shadows of obscurity
As when she either sweats in martial bands,
Or sits in court clad with authority,
Yet, madam, doth the strictness of her room
Greatly detract from her ability:
For as inwalled within a living tomb,
Her hands and arms of action labour not,
Her thoughts, as if abortive from the womb,
Come never born, though happily begot.
But where she hath mounted in open sight
An eminent and spacious dwelling got,
Where she may stir at will, and use her might,
There is she more herself, and more her own:
There in the fair attire of honour dight,[6]
She sits at ease and makes her glory known:
Applause attends her hands, her deeds have grace,
Her worth new-born is straight as if full grown,
With such a goodly and respected face
Doth virtue look, that's set to look from high,
And such a fair advantage by her place
Hath state and greatness to do worthily.
And therefore well did your high fortunes meet
With her, that gracing you, comes grac't thereby,
And well was let into a house so sweet
So good, so fair; so fair, so good a guest,
Who now remains as blessed in her seat,
As you are with her residency blest.
And this fair course of knowledge whereunto
Your studies, learned lady, are addressed,
Is th'only certain way that you can go
Unto true glory, to true happiness:
All passages on earth besides are so
Encumbered with such vain disturbances,
As still we lose our rest in seeking it,
Being but deluded with appearances.
And no key had you else that was so fit
T'unlock that prison of your sex, as this,
To let you out of weakness, and admit
Your powers into the freedom of that bliss
That sets you there where you may oversee
This rolling world, and view it as it is,
And apprehend how th'outsides do agree
With th'inward being of the things we deem
And hold in our ill-cast accounts to be
Of highest value and of best esteem.
Since all the good we have rests in the mind,
By whose proportions only we redeem

[1] Po the river Po, in northern Italy.

[2] Stygian pertaining to the River Styx, over which the dead are ferried by Charon.

[3] This stanza is in the voice of the poet.

[4] those the "Delia" sonnets.

[5] the Lady Lucy, Countess of Bedford the daughter of John Harrington, married to the third earl of Bedford, and a patroness of the arts. The exact dating of these two verse epistles to Lady Lucy and Lady Anne is uncertain, but they were included in a 1603 publication with the Panegyric Congratulatory.

[6] dight dressed.

Our thoughts from out confusion, and do find
The measure of our selves, and of our powers,
And that all happiness remains confined
Within the kingdom of this breast of ours,
Without whose bounds, all that we look on, lies
In others' jurisdictions, others' powers,
Out of the circuit of our liberties.
All glory, honour, fame, applause, renown,
Are not belonging to our royalties,
But t'others' wills, wherein th'are only grown.
And that unless we find us all within,
We never can without us[1] be our own,
Nor call it right our life that we live in,
But a possession held for others' use,
That seem to have most interest therein,
Which we do so dissever, part, traduce,
Let out to custom, fashion, and to show,
As we enjoy but only the abuse,
And have no other deed at all to show.
How oft are we constrained to appear
With other countenance than that we owe,[2]
And be ourselves far off, when we are near?
How oft are we forc't, on a cloudy heart,
To set a shining face, and make it clear,
Seeming content to put ourselves apart,
To bear a part of others' weaknesses:
As if we only were compos'd by art,
Not nature, and did all our deeds address
T'opinion, not t'a conscience, what is right:
As fram'd b'example, not advisedness,
Into those forms that entertain our sight.
And though books, madam, cannot make this mind,
Which we must bring apt to be set aright,
Yet do they rectify it in that kind,
And touch it so, as that it turns that way
Where judgement lies. And though we cannot find
The certain place of truth, yet do they stay,
And entertain us near about the same,
And give the soul the best delight that may
Encheer it most, and most our spirits inflame
To thoughts of glory, and to worthy ends.

[1] without us on the outside.

[2] owe own.

And therefore in a course that best became
The clearness of your heart, and best commends
Your worthy powers, you run the rightest way
That is on earth, that can true glory give,
By which when all consumes, your fame shall live.

—1603

To the Lady Anne Clifford[3]

Unto the tender youth of those fair eyes
The light of judgement can arise but new,
And young the world appears t'a young conceit,
Whilst through th'unacquainted faculties
The late invested[4] soul doth rawly view
Those objects which on that discretion wait.
Yet you that such a fair advantage have,
Both by your birth, and happy powers t'out-go,
And be before your years, can fairly guess
What hue of life holds surest without stain,
Having your well-wrought heart full furnished so
With all the images of worthiness,
As there is left no room at all t'invest
Figures of other form but sanctity:
Whilst yet those clean-created thoughts, within
The garden of your innocency's rest,
Where are no notions of deformity
Nor any door at all to let them in.
With so great care doth she, that hath brought forth
That comely body, labour to adorn
That better part, the mansion of your mind,
With all the richest furniture of worth,
To make y'as highly good as highly born,
And set your virtues equal to your kind.
She tells you how that honour only is
A goodly garment put on fair deserts,
Wherein the smallest stain is greatest seen,

[3] Lady Anne Clifford was the daughter of George Clifford, third earl of Cumberland, and Margaret Russell. Her first marriage was to Richard Sackville, the earl of Dorset, her second to Philip Herbert, earl of Pembroke and Montgomery. Daniel was her tutor when she was between the ages of nine and 12.

[4] invested established.

And that it cannot grace unworthiness,
But more apparent shows defective parts,
How gay soever they are decked therein.
She tells you too how that it bounded is,
And kept enclosed with so many eyes,
As that it cannot stray and break abroad
Into the private ways of carelessness,
Nor ever may descend to vulgarize,
Or be below the sphere of her abode.
But like to those supernal bodies set
Within their orbs, must keep the certain course[1]
Of order, destin'd to their proper place,
Which only doth their note of glory get.
Th'irregular appearances enforce
A short respect, and perish without grace:
Being meteors seeming high, but yet low plac't,
Blazing but while their dying matters last.
Nor can we take the just height of the mind,
But by that order which her course doth show,
And which such splendour to her actions gives;
And thereby men her eminency find,
And thereby only do attain to know
The region, and the orb wherein she lives.
For low in th'air of gross uncertainty,
Confusion only rolls; Order sits high.
And therefore since the dearest thing on earth,
This honour, madam, hath his stately frame
From th'heav'nly order, which begets respect,
And that your nature, virtue, happy birth,
Have therein highly interplac'd your name,
You may not run the least course of neglect.
For where, not to observe, is to profane
Your dignity, how careful must you be
To be yourself, and though you may to all
Shine fair aspects,[2] yet must the virtuous gain
The best effects of your benignity,
Nor must your common graces cause to fall
The price of your esteem t'a lower rate,
Than doth befit the pitch of your estate.
Nor may you build on your sufficiency,
For in our strongest parts we are but weak,
Nor yet may over-much distrust the same,
Lest that you come to check it so thereby,
As silence may become worse than to speak:
Though silence women never ill became.
And none, we see, were ever overthrown
By others' flattery more than by their own.
For though we live amongst the tongues of praise
And troops of soothing people, that collaud[3]
All that we do, yet 'tis within our hearts
Th'ambushment lies, that evermore betrays
Our judgements, when ourselves become t'applaud
Our own ability and our own parts.
So that we must not only fence this fort
Of ours, against all others' fraud, but most Against our own, whose danger is the most,
Because we lie the nearest to do hurt,
And soon'st deceive ourselves, and soon'st are lost
By our best powers that do us most transport.
Such are your holy bounds, who must convey
(If God so please) the honourable blood
Of Clifford, and of Russell, led aright
To many worthy stems whose offspring may
Look back with comfort, to have had that good
To spring from such a branch that grew s'upright;
Since nothing cheers the heart of greatness more
Than th'ancestors' fair glory gone before.

—1603

A Panegyric Congratulatory to the King's Most Excellent Majesty

1

Lo here the glory of a greater day
Than England ever heretofore could see
In all her days. When she did most display
The ensigns[4] of her power, or whenas she Did spread herself the most, and most did sway
Her state abroad, yet could she never be
Thus blest at home, nor ever come to grow
To be entire in her full orb till now.

[1] The planets followed fixed cycles.

[2] aspects generally "looks," but also with allusions to the astrological positioning of the planets.

[3] collaud praise highly.

[4] ensigns signs or banners.

2

And now she is, and now in peace therefore
Shake hands with union, O thou mighty state,
Now thou art all great Britain, and no more,
No Scot, no English now, nor no debate:
No borders but the ocean, and the shore,
No wall of Adrian[1] serves to separate
Our mutual love, nor our obedience,
All subjects now to one imperial prince.

3

What heretofore could never yet be wrought
By all the swords of power, by blood, by fire,
By ruin, and destruction, here is brought
To pass, with peace, with love, with joy, desire:
Our former blessed union[2] hath begot
A greater union that is more entire,
And makes us more ourselves, sets us at one
With nature that ordain'd us to be one.

4

Glory of men, this hast thou brought to us,
And yet hast brought us more than this by far:
Religion comes with thee, peace, righteousness,
Judgement and justice, which more glorious are
Than all thy kingdoms, and art more by this
Than lord and sov'reign, more than emperor
Over the hearts of men that let thee in
To more than all the powers on earth can win.

5

God makes thee king of our estates, but we
Do make thee king of our affection,
King of our love, a passion borne[3] most free,
And most un-subject to dominion:
And know, that England which in that degree
Can love with such a true devotion
Those that are less than kings, to thee must bring
More love, who art so much more than a king.

6

And king of this great nation, populous,
Stout, valiant, powerful, both by sea and land,
Attemptive,[4] able, worthy, generous,
Which joyfully embraces thy command:
A people tractable, obsequious,
Apt to be fashion'd by thy glorious hand
To any form of honour, t'any way
Of high attempts, thy virtues shall assay.

7

A people so inur'd[5] to peace, so wrought
To a successive course of quietness,
As th'have forgot (and Oh b'it[6] still forgot)
The nature of their ancient stubbornness;
Time alt'red hath the form, the means, and brought
The state to that proportion'd evenness,
As 'tis not like again t'will ever come
(Being used abroad) to draw the sword at home.

8

This people, this great state, these hearts adore
Thy sceptre now, and now turn all to thee,
Touched with as powerful zeal, and if not more
(And yet Oh more, how could there ever be
Than unto her, whom yet we do deplore[7]
Amidst our joy?), and give us leave if we Rejoice and mourn, that cannot without wrong
So soon forget her we enjoyed so long.

[1] Adrian Hadrian's wall was started in 122 CE, to keep northern raiders from invading the settled southern areas. It runs across the width of the country, from Bowness on Solway on the west coast to Wallsend on the east.

[2] Our former blessed union the marriage of Margaret, daughter of Henry VII, to James IV of Scotland.

[3] borne or perhaps "born."

[4] Attemptive adventurous.

[5] inur'd accustomed.

[6] b'it be it.

[7] Than unto her Queen Elizabeth I; deplore weep for.

9

Which likewise makes for thee, that yet we hold
True after death, and bring not this respect
To a new prince from hating of the old,
Or from desire of change, or from neglect;
Whereby O mighty sov'reign, thou art told
What thou and thine are likely to expect
From such a faith, that doth not haste to run
Before their time to an arising sun.

10

And let my humble Muse whom she did grace,
Beg this one grace for her that now lies dead,
That no vile tongue may spot her with disgrace,
Nor that her fame become disfigured.
Oh let her rest in peace, that rul'd in peace,
Let not her honour be disquieted
Now after death, but let her grave enclose
All but her good, and that it cannot close.

11

It adds much to thy glory and our grace,
That this continued current of our love
Runs thus to thee, all with so swift a pace;
And that from peace to peace we do remove,
Not as in motion put from out our place,
But in one course, and do not seem to move,
But in more joy than ever heretofore,
And well we may, since thou wilt make us more.

[...]

22

We have an earnest that doth even tie
Thy sceptre to thy word, and binds thy crown
(That else no band can bind) to ratify
What thy religious hand hath there set down,[1]
Wherein thy all-commanding sov'reignty
Stands subject to thy pen and thy renown;
There we behold thee king of thine own heart,
And see what we must be, and what thou art.

[...]

29

Such power hath thy example and respect
As that without a sword, without debate,
Without a noise (or feeling in effect),
Thou wilt dispose,[2] change, form, accommodate
Thy kingdom, people, rule, and all effect,
Without the least convulsion of the state,
That this great passage and mutation will
Not seem a change, but only of our ill.

30

We shall continue one, and be the same
In law, in justice, magistrate, and form,[3]
Thou wilt not touch the fundamental frame
Of this estate thy ancestors did form,
But with a reverence of their glorious fame
Seek only the corruptions to reform,
Knowing that course is best to be observ'd
Whereby a state hath longest been preserv'd.

31

A king of England now most graciously
Remits the injuries that have been done
T'a king of Scots, and makes his clemency[4]
To check them more than his correction;
Th'annointed blood that stained most shamefully
This ill seduced state, he looks thereon
With th'eye of grief, not wrath t'avenge the same,
Since th'authors are extinct that caus'd that shame.

[1] an earnest … there set down Daniel is probably referring to James's political tract Basilikon Doron (1599), which outlines the responsibilities of monarch and subjects; it was republished in 1603 in London and became a best seller.

[2] dispose adjust or distribute.

[3] On his arrival in England, there was fear that James would try to change English laws and traditions, or to impose Scottish ones.

[4] T'a king of Scots England and Scotland had a history of antagonism and warfare; clemency mercy.

[...]

41

The broken frame of this disjointed state,
Being by the bliss of thy great grandfather,
Henry the seventh,[1] restor'd to an estate
More sound than ever, and far steadfaster,
Owes all it hath to him, and in that rate
Stands bound to thee that art his successor:
For without him it had not been begun,
And without thee, we had been now undone.

42

He, of a private man, became a king,[2]
Having endur'd the weight of tyranny;
Mourn'd with the world, complain'd, and knew the thing
That good men wish for in their misery
Under ill kings: saw what it was to bring
Order and form to the recovery
Of an unruly state: conceiv'd what cure
Would kill the cause of this distemp'rature.

43

Thou, born a king, hast in thy state endur'd
The sour affronts of private discontent
With subjects' broils;[3] and ever been inur'd
To this great mystery of government:
Whereby thy princely wisdom hath allur'd
A state to peace, left to thee turbulent:
And brought us an addition to the frame
Of his great work, squar'd fitly to the same.

[...]

58

What a great check will this chaste Court be now
To wanton courts debauched with luxury?
Where we no other mistresses shall know
But her to whom we owe our loyalty:
Chaste mother of our princes[4] whence do grow
Those righteous issues, which shall glorify
And comfort many nations with their worth,
To her perpetual grace that brought them forth.

59

We shall not fear to have our wives distain'd,
Nor yet our daughters violated here
By an imperial lust, that being unrein'd
Will hardly be resisted anywhere.
He will not be betrayed with ease, nor train'd
With idle rest, in soft delights to wear
His time of life, but knows whereto he tends,
How worthy minds are made for worthy ends.

[...]

70

Then since we are in this so fair a way
Of restoration, greatness and command,
Cursed be he that causes the least stay
In this fair work, or interrupts thy hand,
And cursed he that offers to betray
Thy graces, or thy goodness to withstand:
Let him be held abhorr'd, and all his race
Inherit but the portion of disgrace.

71

And he that shall, by wicked offices,
Be th'author of the least disturbancy,
Or seek t'avert thy godly purposes,
Be ever held the scorn of infamy:

---

[1] Henry the seventh James VI claimed his inheritance through Henry VII, whose daughter Margaret married James IV of Scotland. Henry VII was thus Elizabeth's grandfather and James's great-great grandfather.

[2] Henry VII was not immediately descended from royalty; he is a descendent of John of Gaunt, son to Edward III.

[3] With subjects' broils Daniel could be referring to the turbulence of the Scottish Reformation, of James's minority, or of his mother Mary's reign.

[4] Chaste mother of our princes Queen Anne was the mother of Henry, Charles, and Elizabeth.

And let men but consider their success
Who princes' loves abus'd presumptuously,
They shall perceive their ends do still relate,
That sure God loves them not whom men do hate.

72

And it is just, that they who make a prey
Of princes' favours, in the end again
Be made a prey to princes, and repay
The spoils of misery with greater gain;
Whose sacrifices ever do allay
The wrath of men, conceiv'd in their disdain:
For that their hatred prosecuteth still,
More than ill princes, those that make them ill.

73

But both thy judgement and estate doth free
Thee from these powers of fear and flattery,
The conquerors of kings, by whom we see
Are wrought the acts of all impiety.
Thou art so set, as th'hast no cause to be
Jealous, or dreadful[1] of disloyalty;
The pedestal whereon thy greatness stands,
Is built of all our hearts, and all our hands.

—1603

from A Defence of Rhyme

To William Herbert Earl of Pembroke[2]

The general custom and use of rhyme in this kingdom, noble lord, having been so long (as if from a grant of nature) held unquestionable, made me to imagine that it lay altogether out of the way of contradiction, and was become so natural as we should never have had a thought to cast it off into reproach, or be made to think that it ill-became our language. But now I see, when there is opposition made to all things in the world by words, we must now at length likewise fall to contend for words themselves and make a question, whether they be right or not. For we are told how that our measures go wrong, all rhyming is gross, vulgar, barbarous, which if it be so, we have lost much labour to no purpose: and for mine own particular, I cannot but blame the fortune of the times and mine own genius that cast me upon so wrong a course, drawn with the current of custom, and an unexamined example. Having been first encourag'd or fram'd thereunto by your most worthy and honourable mother, receiving the first notion for the formal ordering of those compositions at Wilton,[3] which I must ever acknowledge to have been my best school, and thereof always am to hold a feeling and grateful memory. Afterward, drawn farther on by the well-liking and approbation of my worthy lord, the fosterer of me and my Muse, I adventured to bestow all my whole powers therein, perceiving it agreed so well, both with the complexion of the times, and mine own constitution, as I found not wherein I might better employ me. But yet now, upon the great discovery of these new measures, threatening to overthrow the whole state of rhyme in this kingdom, I must either stand out to defend, or else be forced to forsake myself, and give over all. [...]

[...]

Every language hath her proper number or measure fitted to use and delight, which, custom entertaining by the allowance of the ear, doth endenize[4] and make natural. All verse is but a frame of words confined within certain measure, differing from the ordinary speech, and introduced, the better to express men's conceits, both for delight

[1] dreadful full of dread or fear.

[2] William is Mary Sidney Herbert, countess of Pembroke's eldest son. This defence responded to Thomas Campion's Observations on the Art of English Poesie (1602), which attacked rhyme and instead proposed classical, quantitative scansion as a superior model for English poetry. Daniel here has the last word on a debate which had been continuing since Puttenham's The Art of English Poesy (1589).

[3] The Pembroke family home, Wilton, became a retreat for a number of writers under the patronage of William's mother, Mary.

[4] endenize to naturalize, make a citizen of.

and memory. Which frame of words consisting of rithmus or metrum, number or measure, are disposed into divers fashions, according to the humour of the composer and the set of the time; and these rhythmi as Aristotle saith are familiar amongst all nations, and è naturali & sponte fusa compositione.[1] And they fall as naturally already in our language as ever art can make them, being such as the ear of itself doth marshal in their proper rooms, and they of themselves will not willingly be put out of their rank, and that in such a verse as best comports with the nature of our language. And for our rhyme (which is an excellency added to this work of measure, and a harmony far happier than any proportion antiquity could ever show us) doth add more grace, and hath more of delight than ever bare numbers, howsoever they can be forced to run in our slow language, can possibly yield. [...] it is likewise number and harmony of words, consisting of an agreeing sound in the last syllables of several verses, giving both to the ear an echo of a delightful report and to the memory a deeper impression of what is delivered therein.

[...]

Ill customs are to be left,[2] I grant it: but I see not how that can be taken for an ill custom which nature hath thus ratified, all nations received, time so long confirmed, the effects such, as it performs those offices of motion for which it is employed: delighting the ear, stirring the heart, and satisfying the judgement in such sort as I doubt whether ever single numbers will do in our climate, if they show no more work of wonder than yet we see. [...] For this kind acquaintance and continual familiarity ever had betwixt our ear and this cadence is grown to so intimate a friendship, as it will now hardly ever be brought to miss it. For be the verse never so good, never so full, it seems not to satisfy nor breed that delight as when it is met and combined with a like sounding accent.

[...]

And indeed I have wished there were not that multiplicity of rhymes as is used by many in sonnets, which yet we see in some so happily to succeed, and hath been so far from hindering their inventions, as it hath begot conceit beyond expectation, and comparable to the best inventions of the world: for sure in an eminent spirit whom nature hath fitted for that mystery, rhyme is no impediment to his conceit, but rather gives him wings to mount and carries him not out of his course, but as it were beyond his power to a far happier flight. All excellencies being sold us at the hard price of labour, it follows, where we bestow most thereof, we buy the best success: and rhyme being far more laborious than loose measures (whatsoever is objected) must needs, meeting with wit and industry, breed greater and worthier effects in our language. [...] For the body of our imagination, being as an unformed chaos without fashion, without day, if by the divine power of the spirit it be wrought into an orb of order and form, is it not more pleasing to nature, that desires a certainty, and comports not with that which is infinite, to have these closes, rather than not to know where to end, or how far to go, especially seeing our passions are often without measure? And we find the best of the Latins many times either not concluding, or else otherwise in the end than they began. Besides, is it not most delightful to see much excellently ordered in a small room, or little gallantly disposed and made to fill up a space of like capacity, in such sort that the one would not appear so beautiful in a larger circuit, nor the other do well in a less? Which often we find to be so, according to the powers of nature in the workman. And these limited proportions and rests of stanzas, consisting of 6, 7 or 8 lines, are of that happiness, both for the disposition of the matter, the apt planting the sentence where it may best stand to hit; the certain close of delight with the full body of a just period well carried is such as neither the Greeks or Latins ever attained unto. For their boundless running on often so confounds the reader that having once lost himself, must either give off unsatisfied, or uncertainly cast back to retrieve the escaped sense and to find way again into his matter.

[1] è naturali & sponte fusa compositione a natural and spontaneously flowing composition.

[2] left abandoned.

Methinks we should not so soon yield our consents captive to the authority of antiquity, unless we saw more reason: all our understandings are not to be built by the square of Greece and Italy. We are the children of nature as well as they; we are not so placed out of the way of judgement, but that the same sun of discretion shineth upon us; we have our portion of the same virtues as well as of the same vices. [...]

[...]

For what ado have we here, what strange precepts of art about the framing of an iambic verse in our language, which when all is done, reaches not by a foot, but falleth out to be the plain ancient verse consisting of ten syllables or five feet, which hath ever been used amongst us time out of mind. And for all this cunning and counterfeit name can or will be any other in nature than it hath been ever heretofore: and this new dimeter[1] is but the half of this verse divided in two, and no other than the caesura or breathing place in the middest thereof, and therefore it had been as good to have put two lines in one, but only to make them seem diverse. Nay it had been much better for the true English reading and pronouncing thereof, without violating the accent, which now our adversary hath herein most unkindly done: for being as we are to sound it according to our English march, we must make a rest, and raise the last syllable, which falls out very unnatural in desolate, funeral, Elizabeth, prodigal, and in all the rest saving the monosyllables. Then follows the English trochaic,[2] which is said to be a simple verse, and so indeed it is, being without rhyme; having here no other grace than that in sound it runs like the known measure of our former ancient verse, ending (as we term it according to the French) in a feminine foot,[3] saving that it is shorter by one syllable at the beginning, which is not much missed, by reason it falls full at the last. Next comes the elegiac[4] [...] and that likewise is no other than our old accustomed measure of five feet; if there be any difference, it must be made in the reading, and therein we must stand bound to stay where often we would not, and sometimes either break the accent or the due course of the word. And now for the other four kinds of numbers, which are to be employed for odes, they are either of the same measure, or such as have ever been familiarly used amongst us. So that of all these eight several kinds of new promised numbers you see what we have: only what was our own before, and the same but apparelled in foreign titles, which had they come in their kind and natural attire of rhyme, we should never have suspected that they had affected to be other, or sought to degenerate into strange manners, which now we see was the cause why they were turned out of their proper habit, and brought in as aliens, only to induce men to admire them as far-comers. But see the power of nature: it is not all the artificial coverings of wit that can hide their native and original condition, which breaks out through the strongest bands of affectation and will be itself, do singularity what it can. And as for those imagined quantities of syllables, which have been ever held free and indifferent in our language, who can enforce us to take knowledge of them, being in nullius verba iurati,[5] and owing fealty to no foreign invention? Especially in such a case where there is no necessity in nature, or that it imports either the matter or form, whether it be so or otherwise. But every versifier that well observes his work finds in our language, without all these unnecessary precepts, what numbers best fit the nature of her idiom, and the proper places destined to such

[1] dimeter A dimeter is a line containing two metrical sequences; a caesura is a "cut" or pause in the line.

[2] trochaic A trochaic foot is a stressed syllable followed by an unstressed one.

[3] A feminine ending has the final stress on the penultimate or even antepenultimate syllable. They are common in blank verse.

[4] elegiac An elegiac stanza is a quatrain in iambic pentameter.

[5] being in nullius verba iurati i.e., having sworn allegiance to nobody.

accents, as she will not let in to any other rooms than into those for which they were born. As for example, you cannot make this fall into the right sound of a verse:

None thinks reward rendred worthie his worth unless you thus misplace the accent upon rendrèd and worthìe, contrary to the nature of these words, which showeth that two feminine numbers (or Trochees, if so you will call them) will not succeed in the third and fourth place of the verse. And so likewise in this case:

Though Death doth consume, yet Virtue preserves.

It will not be a verse, though it hath the just syllables, without the same number in the second, and the altering of the fourth place, in this sort:

Thou Death doth ruin, Virtue yet preserves.

[...]

But now for whom hath our adversary taken all this pains? For the learned, or for the ignorant, or for himself, to show his own skill? If for the learned, it was to no purpose, for every grammarian in this land hath learned his prosodia,[1] and already knows all this art of numbers. If for the ignorant, it was vain, for if they become versifiers, we are like to have lean numbers, instead of fat rhyme. And if Tully[2] would have his orator skilled in all the knowledges appertaining to God and man, what should they have, who would be a degree above orators? Why then it was to show his own skill, and what himself had observed; so he might well have done, without doing wrong to the fame of the living, and wrong to England, in seeking to lay reproach upon her native ornaments, and to turn the fair stream and full course of her accents into the shallow current of a loose uncertainty, clean out of the way of her known delight. And I had thought it could never have proceeded from the pen of a scholar (who sees no profession free from the impure mouth of the scorner) to say the reproach of others' idle tongues is the curse of nature upon us, when it is rather her curse upon him that knows not how to use his tongue. What, doth he think himself is now gotten so far out of the way of contempt, that his numbers are gone beyond the reach of obloquy,[3] and that how frivolous or idle soever they shall run, they shall be protected from disgrace, as though that light rhymes and light numbers did not weigh all alike in the grave opinion of the wise? And that it is not rhyme, but our idle arguments that hath brought down to so base a reckoning the price and estimation of writing in this kind. When the few good things of this age, by coming together in one throng and press with the many bad, are not discerned from them, but overlooked with them, and all taken to be alike. But when aftertimes shall make a quest of inquiry to examine the best of this age, peradventure[4] there will be found in the now contemned records of rhyme matter not unfitting the gravest divine and severest lawyer in this kingdom. But these things must have the date of antiquity to make them reverent and authentical, for ever in the collation[5] of writers, men rather weigh their age than their merit, & legunt priscos cum reverentia, quando coetaneos non possunt sine invidia.[6] And let no writer in rhyme be any way discouraged in his endeavour by this brave alarum, but rather animated to bring up all the best of their powers, and charge with all the strength of nature and industry upon contempt, that the show of their real forces may turn back insolency into her own hold. For, be sure that innovation never works any overthrow but upon the advantage of a careless idle-

[1] prosodia Prosody is the study of versification, the rules which govern quantity (length) of syllables in verse.

[2] Tully popular name of Marcus Tullius Cicero.

[3] obloquy abuse or slander.

[4] peradventure perhaps.

[5] collation comparison.

[6] & legunt priscos cum reverentia, quando coetaneos non possunt sine invidia Latin, "and they respect the ancients with reverence, since they cannot do this to their contemporaries without envy."

ness. And let this make us look the better to our feet, the better to our matter, better to our manners. Let the adversary that thought to hurt us bring more profit and honour by being against us than if he had stood still on our side.

[...]

But yet now notwithstanding all this which I have here delivered in the defence of rhyme, I am not so far in love with mine own mystery, or will seem so froward,[1] as to be against the reformation and the better settling these measures of ours. Wherein there be many things I could wish were more certain and better ordered, though myself dare not take upon me to be a teacher therein, having so much need to learn of others. And I must confess that to mine own ear, those continual cadences of couplets used in long and continued poems are very tiresome and unpleasing, by reason that still, methinks, they run on with a sound of one nature, and a kind of certainty which stuffs the delight rather than entertains it. But yet notwithstanding, I must not out of mine own daintiness condemn this kind of writing, which peradventure to another may seem most delightful, and many worthy compositions we see to have passed with commendation in that kind. Besides, methinks sometimes, to beguile the ear with a running out and passing over the rhyme as no bound to stay us in the line where the violence of the matter will break through, is rather graceful than otherwise. [...] And to avoid this overglutting the ear with that always certain and full encounter of rhyme, I have assayed in some of my epistles to alter the usual place of meeting, and to set it further off by one verse,[2] to try how I could disuse my own ear and to ease it of this continual burden, which indeed seems to surcharge it a little too much, but as yet I cannot come to please myself therein: this alternate or cross rhyme holding still the best place in my affection.

[...]

And I cannot but wonder at the strange presumption of some men that dare so audaciously adventure to introduce any whatsoever foreign words, be they never so strange; and of themselves as it were, without a parliament, without any consent or allowance, establish them as free-denizens[3] in our language. But this is but a character of that perpetual revolution which we see to be in all things that never remain the same, and we must herein be content to submit ourselves to the law of time, which in few years will make all that for which we now contend, nothing.

—1603

[1] froward adverse, untoward.

[2] set it ... one verse See "To the Lady Anne Clifford" for an example.

[3] free-denizens free citizens.

Thomas Lodge
1558-1625

Born into a wealthy mercantile family, son of Sir Thomas Lodge (d. 1585), lord mayor of London, and his wife Anne, Thomas Lodge was educated at the Merchant Taylors' School and Trinity College, Oxford (BA, 1577). He also spent some time serving in the household of Henry Stanley, earl of Derby, to whom Lodge later dedicated A Fig for Momus (1595). He became one of that group which early twentieth century critics called "the University Wits," a group of well-educated young men who turned their classical, humanist education to the service of the Elizabethan stage and popular press. Although he also attended Lincoln's Inn, entering in 1578, Lodge—like many of his fellow law-students—found the social and literary milieu of the Inns and of the wider circle they gave him access to a far more congenial prospect than that of the law. He does not seem to have ever practiced law, although the title-pages of several of his works continue to advertise his association with the Inn.

Lodge spent the next two decades writing in numerous genres for the burgeoning print market. His first substantial work, the tract usually known as A Defence of Plays (1580), was written in response to Stephen Gosson's attack on the stage, plays, and poetry in general (see pp. 446-53). Like many of Lodge's works, it was a "first": in this case, the first full-length defence of poetry and stage-plays in England. Between 1580 and 1596, he published other pamphlets, such as An Alarum Against Usurers (1584) and Wit's Misery and the World's Madness (1596), as well as a series of prose romances—including Rosalind: Euphues' Golden Legacy (1590), The Famous, True, and Historical Life of Robert, Second Duke of Normandy [Robin the Devil] (1591), The Life and Death of William Longbeard (1593), and A Margarite of America (1596). This period also saw Lodge produce an Ovidian minor epic (Scylla's Metamorphosis [1589]), lyrics (Phyllis [1593]), and Horatian satires and epistles (A Fig for Momus [1595]). In addition to all this activity, Lodge contributed to the play The Wounds of Civil War (printed 1594) and collaborated (probably with Robert Greene) on A Looking Glass for London and England (1594).

An adventurer as well, Lodge sailed twice on expeditions against Spanish imperial possessions. On the first of these voyages (sometime between 1584 and 1589), he wrote his most famous prose romance, Rosalind, which became the basis for Shakespeare's As You Like It. On the second (a journey to Brazil in 1591 commanded by Sir Thomas Cavendish) he wrote A Margarite of America. Although critics disagree about exactly when, Lodge had almost certainly converted to Catholicism by 1596, given the "explicitly [...] Catholic sympathies" of his Prosopopeia, which "use[s] the figure of Mary to meditate on the sins of the world."[1] After having received his medical degree from the University of Avignon in 1598 (recognized by Oxford University in 1602), Lodge established a successful medical practice in London (as well as in the Low Countries). It was only, however, in 1610 that he was granted a medical license by the College of Physicians, its denial up until this point apparently connected with his Catholicism. Lodge continued to write during his medical career, but he largely restricted himself to the translation of religious works, although he produced important translations of the ancient writers Seneca (1614) and Josephus (1602). His medical works include A Treatise of the Plague (1603) and a manuscript volume detailing popular medical knowledge and beliefs, The Poor Man's Talent. Listed as a physician who could be called upon in the event of plague, Lodge may well have died of this disease in London in 1625.[2]

EDITIONS: Rosalynde. Euphues golden legacie. London: Thomas Orwin for T.G. and John Busbie, 1590. STC 16664; A fig for Momus. London: Printed by [T. Orwin] for Clement Knight, 1595. STC 16658.

Additional Online Texts: Thomas Lodge. From Scylla's Metamorphosis (1589); from Robin the Devil [The Famous, True, and Historical Life of Robert, Second Duke of Normandy] (1591); and from The Life and Death of William Longbeard (1593).

[1] A. Halasz, "Thomas Lodge," DNB online, 2005.

[2] Ibid.

from Rosalind

Euphues' Golden Legacy:
found after his death in his cell at Silexedra.

Bequeathed to Philautus' sons,
nursed up with their father in England.[1]

Fetched from the Canaries by T.L., Gent.

London. Imprinted by Thomas Orwin for T.G. and John Busby.[2] 1590.

To the Right Honourable and His Most Esteemed Lord, the Lord of Hunsdon, Lord Chamberlain of Her Majesty's Household, and Governor of Her Town of Berwick: T.L.G. Wisheth Increase of All Honourable Virtues.[3]

Such Romans, Right Honourable, as delighted in martial exploits attempted their actions in the honour of Augustus[4] because he was a patron of soldiers, and Virgil dignified him with his poems as a Maecenas[5] of scholars—both jointly advancing his royalty as a prince warlike and learned. Such as sacrifice to Pallas[6] present her with bays[7] as she is wise and with armour as she is valiant, observing herein that excellent to prepon[8] which dedicateth honours according to the perfection of the person. When I entered, Right Honourable, with a deep insight into the consideration of these premises, seeing your lordship to be a patron of all martial men and a Maecenas of such as apply themselves to study, wearing with Pallas both the lance and the bay, and aiming with Augustus at the favour of all by the honourable virtues of your mind, being myself first a student, and after falling from books to arms, even vowed in all my thoughts dutifully to affect your lordship. Having with Captain Clarke made a voyage to the islands of Terceras and the Canaries,[9] to beguile the time[10] with labour I writ this book: rough, as hatched in the storms of the ocean, and feathered in the surges of many perilous seas. But as it is the work of a soldier and a scholar, I presumed to shroud it under your Honour's patronage, as one that is the fautor[11] and favourer of all virtuous actions, and whose honourable loves, grown from the general applause of the whole commonwealth for your higher deserts, may keep it from the malice of every bitter tongue. Other reasons more particular, Right Honourable, challenge in me a

---

[1] John Lyly's Euphues (1578; 2nd revised edition, 1579) and its sequel Euphues and His England (1580) detail the lives and loves of two friends, Euphues and Philautus. At the end of Euphues and His England, Philautus marries his beloved in England, while Euphues retires from the world to Mount Silexedra. Throughout Euphues and His England, Euphues has counselled his friend Philautus against falling in love too easily, Philautus' "Achilles heel" (at least according to Euphues). The reason for Euphues' decision to take up a hermit-like existence is somewhat unclear, although it is implied that he himself has perhaps fallen in love again, although the object of his devotion remains unspecified. See John Lyly, Euphues (2nd edition, 1579), pp. 458-85.

[2] John Busby (fl. 1576-1619), bookseller, freeman of the Stationers' Company from 1585. He had a shop in St Dunston's Churchyard, London (1590-1619), and is most famous for his hand in the publishing of Henry V (1600) and King Lear (1608). He also published Robin the Devil (1591) and Phyllis (1593).

[3] Henry Carey, first Baron Hunsdon (1526-96), made lord chamberlain in 1585; he was the patron of the Lord Chamberlain's Men, an early incarnation of Shakespeare's company; T.L.G. "Thomas Lodge, Gentleman."

[4] Augustus Gaius Julius Caesar Octavianus (63 BCE-14 CE), first Roman emperor (31 BCE-14 CE), and a serious patron of literature and the arts.

[5] Maecenas Gaius Maecenas (c. 70-8 BCE), influential Roman aristocrat, statesman, and one of Augustus' most trusted friends; a patron of the arts, Maecenas supported the works of Virgil, Horace, and Propertius; he introduced Virgil to Augustus.

[6] Pallas Athena, goddess of wisdom and war.

[7] Wreaths made of the bay tree would be worn by those who had achieved a great victory, often in the arenas of war or poetry.

[8] to prepon Greek, decorum, appropriateness.

[9] Terceras one of the Azores, an archipelago in the North Atlantic, about 800 miles W of Portugal; Canaries a group of islands off the NW coast of Africa (Topographical Dict., p. 40; 95). There are a number of possible voyages to which Lodge may be referring: "a sailing in 1586 of the Gold Noble; a voyage in 1585 on the Roebuck; and a voyage in 1590 on the Galleon Dudley. Of these, the voyages made in 1585 or 1586 are the most likely" (A. Halasz, "Thomas Lodge," DNB online, 2005).

[10] beguile the time make time pass pleasantly.

[11] fautor patron.

special affection to your lordship, as being a scholar with your two noble sons, Master Edmund Carey and Master Robert Carey[1] (two scions worthy of so honourable a tree, and a tree glorious in such honourable fruit), as also being a scholar in the university under that learned and virtuous knight Sir Edward Hoby[2] when he was Bachelor in Arts, a man as well lettered as well born and, after the etymology of his name, soaring as high as the wings of knowledge can mount him, happy every way, and the more fortunate as blessed in the honour of so virtuous a lady.[3] Thus, Right Honourable, the duty that I owe to the sons chargeth me that all my affection be placed on the father, for where the branches are so precious the tree of force[4] must be most excellent. Commanded and emboldened thus with the consideration of these forepassed reasons to present my book to your lordship, I humbly entreat your Honour will vouch of my labours, and favour a soldier's and a scholar's pen with your gracious acceptance; who answers in affection what he wants[5] in eloquence, so devoted to your Honour as his only desire is to end his life under the favour of so martial and learned a patron.

Resting thus in hope of your lordship's courtesy in deigning the patronage of my work, I cease, wishing you as many honourable fortunes as your lordship can desire or I imagine.

Your Honour's soldier, humbly affectionate,

Thomas Lodge.

[1] Edmund Carey Edmund Carey (d. 1637), vice-admiral of Lincolnshire; Robert Carey (?1560-1639), youngest son of Henry Carey, later first earl of Monmouth, a title bestowed in 1626 by Charles I; he took part in the Armada and was warden-general of the Scottish Marches. Both these young men were students at Oxford along with Thomas Lodge. For more detail about the Careys and Lodge's relationship with them, see D. Beecher, ed., Rosalind by Thomas Lodge (Ottawa, 1997), p. 230, note 3 and note 4.

[2] Sir Edward Hoby (1560-1617), diplomat and courtier, son of Sir Thomas Hoby, translator of Castiglione's The Book of the Courtier. Edward was related to the Careys through his marriage to Henry Carey's daughter, Margaret.

[3] The name "Hoby" is identical to the obsolete form of "hobby," a small species of falcon, once used to hunt larks and other small birds.

[4] of force of necessity; necessarily.

[5] wants lacks.

To the Gentlemen Readers.

Gentlemen, look not here to find any sprigs of Pallas' bay tree, nor to hear the humour of any amorous laureate,[6] nor the pleasing vein of any eloquent orator: nolo altum sapere,[7] they be matters above my capacity. The cobbler's check shall never light on my head: ne sutor ultra crepidam;[8] I will go no further than the latchet,[9] and then all is well. Here you may perhaps find some leaves of Venus' myrtle,[10] but hewn down by a soldier with his curtal axe,[11] not bought with the allurement of a filed[12] tongue. To be brief, gentlemen, room for a soldier and a sailor that gives you the fruits of his labours that he wrought in the ocean, when every line was wet with a surge and every humorous passion counterchecked with a storm. If you like it, so; and yet I will be yours in duty, if you be mine in favour. But if Momus[13] or any squint-eyed ass that hath mighty ears to conceive with Midas,[14] and yet little reason to judge, if he come aboard our bark[15] to find fault with the tackling when he

[6] amorous laureate love poet.

[7] Latin, "I have no desire to understand high (i.e., profound) matters."

[8] Latin, "Let not the shoemaker go beyond his last" (Erasmus, Adages 1.6.16). A "last" is a wooden model of a foot, on which shoemakers shape boots and shoes. In English, it became a very commonly used proverb, meaning that "a man should not seek to involve himself in or offer judgements about matters beyond those in which he has been trained" (Tilley C480).

[9] Proverb, essentially a variation on the above saying, where "latchet" is a shoe-lace.

[10] Venus' myrtle A plant sacred to Venus, the myrtle is traditionally an emblem of love.

[11] curtal axe a type of short, broad sword; a heavy cutting or slashing sword.

[12] filed smooth, polished.

[13] Momus Greek god of ridicule and severe, excessive censure; Momus was banished from Heaven when he criticized the other gods, and thus his name has come to mean, more generally, a fault-finder or unreasonably severe critic. See selections from Lodge's A Fig for Momus, pp. 991-94 in this anthology.

[14] In Greek mythology, Midas was king of Phrygia. Called upon to judge a musical contest between Apollo and Pan, Midas gave the victory to Pan. Apollo punished Midas by giving him the ears of an ass, an emblem of his lack of discernment and judgement.

[15] bark ship.

knows not the shrouds,[1] I'll down into the hold and fetch out a rusty poleaxe[2] that saw no sun this seven year, and either well bebaste[3] him or heave the coxcomb[4] overboard to feed cods. But courteous gentlemen that favour most, backbite none, and pardon what is overslipt, let such come and welcome. I'll into the steward's room and fetch them a can of our best beverage. Well, gentlemen, you have Euphues' Legacy. I fetched it as far as the islands of Terceras, and therefore read it, censure with favour, and farewell.

Yours,

T.L.

The Schedule[5] Annexed to Euphues' Testament, the Tenor of His Legacy, the Token of His Love.

The vehemency of my sickness, Philautus, hath made me doubtful of life, yet must I die in counselling thee like Socrates, because I love thee. Thou hast sons by Camilla,[6] as I hear, who being young in years have green thoughts, and nobly born have great minds. Bend them in their youth like the willow, lest thou bewail them in their age for their wilfulness.[7] I have bequeathed them a golden legacy because I greatly love thee. Let them read it as Archelaus did Cassander,[8] to profit by it, and in reading let them meditate, for I have approved it the best method. They shall find love anatomized by Euphues with as lively colours as in Apelles' table:[9] roses to whip him when he is wanton, reasons to withstand him when he is wily. Here may they read that virtue is the king of labours, opinion the mistress of fools, that unity is the pride of nature, and contention the overthrow of families. Here is hellebore,[10] bitter in taste, but beneficial in trial. I have nothing to send thee and Camilla but this counsel: that instead of worldly goods, you leave your sons virtue and glory, for better were they to be partakers of your honours than lords of your manors. I feel death that summoneth me to my grave, and my soul desirous of his god. Farewell, Philautus, and let the tenor of my counsel be applied to thy children's comfort.

Euphues dying to live.

If any man find this scroll, send it to Philautus in England.

Rosalind

[The romance opens in France on the scene of Sir John of Bordeaux's death-bed, where he offers advice on brotherhood, love, and marriage

---

[1] tackling the rigging of a sailing ship; the tackle, equipment, or gear of a ship; shrouds a set of ropes, usually in pairs, leading from the head of the mast, and serving to relieve the lateral strain; they form part of the standard rigging of a ship.

[2] poleaxe a battle axe used for fighting at close quarters.

[3] bebaste beat soundly, thrash.

[4] coxcomb fool, simpleton.

[5] Schedule here, a codicil to a will (a codicil is a supplement to a will or testament, added by the testator for the purpose of explanation, alteration, or revocation of the original contents). The "Schedule Annexed to Euphues' Testament" was first printed in the second edition (1592).

[6] Thou hast sons by Camilla Lodge is in error here. Camilla is the woman whom Philautus initially desires in Euphues and His England; she, however, scorns him and marries a gentleman named Surius. Rejected, Philautus turns his attention to the lady Frances: he falls in love with and marries her.

[7] Proverb, "Best to bend while it is a twig" (Tilley T632), and "Thraw [twist] the wand while it is green" (W27).

[8] as Archelaus did Cassander At the beginning of Euphues and His England, Euphues tells Philautus a tale which ostensibly warns against the perils of travel: the rich usurer Cassander is on his death-bed, and he tells his son, Callimachus (not Archelaus), that the key he hands him will unlock a chest containing all the wealth that he is heir to. When Callimachus opens the chest, he finds a letter containing much good and virtuous advice, but no money. His reaction, however, is not to profit from it immediately, since he curses his father and after gathering what money he can goes on an extended and often ill-fated journey.

[9] Apelles' table Apelles (fl. 4th century BCE), Greek painter in the time of Alexander the Great; he specialized in historical and mythological subjects, and is generally acknowledged by classical writers as perhaps the greatest painter who ever lived, particularly for the stunningly life-like quality of his works; table painting.

[10] hellebore a name given by the ancient Greeks and Romans to plants with both poisonous and medicinal qualities, especially those used in the treatment of mental disorders.

to his three sons, Saladine (the eldest), Fernandine, and Rosader. After Sir John dies, Saladine, partly driven by his father's obviously greater love for Rosader and partly by his desire to engross all his father's wealth, denies Rosader an upbringing appropriate for a gentleman's son. (Fernandine, a scholar, drops out of the story almost immediately.) Although Rosader is brought up like a "peasant," he soon shows his inborn aristocratic qualities and martial abilities, rebelling against being treated like a menial servant. Rosader's rebellion leads Saladine to plot his death. Saladine bribes the Norman, a wrestling champion, to kill Rosader in a wrestling contest at a tournament arranged by Torismond, king of France (who has earlier usurped the throne from Rosalind's father, Gerismond, who has fled to the forest of Arden). Not only does Rosader kill the Norman and win the favourable notice of Torismond, but he also first encounters there Rosalind; they fall in love with each other at first sight.]

The death of this champion [...] drew the King and all the peers into a great admiration that so young years and so beautiful a personage should contain such martial excellence. But when they knew him to be the youngest son of Sir John of Bordeaux, the King rose from his seat and embraced him, and the peers entreated him with all favourable courtesy, commending both his valour and his virtues, wishing him to go forward in such haughty deeds that he might attain to the glory of his father's honourable fortunes.

As the King and lords graced him with embracing, so the ladies favoured him with their looks, especially Rosalind, whom the beauty and valour of Rosader had already touched. But she accounted love a toy and fancy a momentary passion, that as it was taken in with a gaze might be shaken off with a wink, and therefore feared not to dally in the flame; and to make Rosader know she affected him, took from her neck a jewel and sent it by a page to the young gentleman. The prize that Venus gave to Paris[1] was not half so pleasing to the Trojan as this gem was to Rosader, for if fortune had sworn to make him sole monarch of the world, he would rather have refused such dignity than have lost the jewel sent him by Rosalind. To return her with the like he was unfurnished, and yet that he might more than in his looks discover his affection, he stepped into a tent and, taking pen and paper, wrote this fancy:

Two suns at once from one fair heaven there shined,
Ten branches from two boughs tipped all with roses,
Pure locks more golden than is gold refined,
Two pearled rows that nature's pride encloses;

Two mounts[2] fair marble-white, down-soft and dainty,
A snow-dyed orb, where love increased by pleasure
Full woeful makes my heart and body fainty:
Her fair, my woe, exceeds all thought and measure.

In lines confused my luckless harm appeareth,
Whom sorrow clouds, whom pleasant smiling cleareth.

This sonnet he sent to Rosalind, which when she read she blushed, but with a sweet content in that she perceived love had allotted her so amorous a servant.

[Rosader, rejoicing over his victory, returns home in triumph accompanied by a group of admiring

[1] Paris Son of Priam, king of Troy, and Hecuba, his wife, Paris was called upon to judge the competing claims of Juno, Venus, and Minerva to pre-eminence in beauty. Each goddess appeared before him in turn, naked and unadorned; each offered him inducements to proclaim her the most beautiful of the goddesses: Juno promised him worldly power and kingship; Minerva, glory on the battlefield and fame as a warrior; Venus, the most beautiful woman in the world as his wife, Helen of Troy, wife of Menelaus, king of Sparta.

[2] mounts breasts.

young gentlemen. When Saladine attempts to shut them out of the house, Rosader, shamed in front of his new comrades, breaks down the door and, with the help of a loyal old servant, Adam Spencer, raids the pantry, providing the company with food and wine. When the gentlemen have left, Rosader is only prevented from attacking Saladine by Adam. While Saladine pretends to be reconciled with his younger brother, he is busily plotting revenge. Lodge turns at this point back to Rosalind.]

Rosalind, returning home from the triumph, after she waxed solitary, love presented her with the idea of Rosader's perfection, and, taking her at discovert,[1] struck her so deep as she felt herself grow passing passionate. She began to call to mind the comeliness of his person, the honour of his parents, and the virtues that, excelling both, made him so gracious in the eyes of everyone. Sucking in thus the honey of love by imprinting in her thoughts his rare qualities, she began to surfeit with the contemplation of his virtuous conditions. But when she called to remembrance her present estate and the hardness of her fortunes, desire began to shrink and fancy to vail bonnet,[2] that between a chaos of confused thoughts she began to debate with herself in this manner:

Rosalind's Passion.[3]

"Unfortunate Rosalind, whose misfortunes are more than thy years, and whose passions are greater than thy patience! The blossoms of thy youth are mixed with the frosts of envy, and the hope of thy ensuing fruits perish in the bud. Thy father is by Torismond banished from the crown, and thou, the unhappy daughter of a king, detained captive, living as disquieted in thy thoughts as thy father discontented in his exile. Ah, Rosalind, what cares wait upon a crown![4] What griefs are incident to dignity! What sorrows haunt royal palaces! The greatest seas have the sorest storms,[5] the highest birth subject to the most bale,[6] and of all trees the cedars soonest shake with the wind.[7] Small currents are ever calm, low valleys not scorched in any lightnings, nor base[8] men tied to any baleful prejudice. Fortune flies, and if she touch poverty it is with her heel, rather disdaining their want with a frown than envying their wealth with disparagement. Oh, Rosalind, hadst thou been born low, thou hadst not fallen so high, and yet being great of blood thine honour is more if thou brookest[9] misfortune with patience.

"Suppose I contrary[10] fortune with content, yet fates, unwilling to have me any way happy, have forced love to set my thoughts on fire with fancy. Love, Rosalind? Becometh it women in distress to think of love? Tush, desire hath no respect of persons;[11] Cupid is blind and shooteth at random, as soon hitting a rag as a robe, and piercing as soon the bosom of a captive as the breast of a libertine.[12] Thou speakest it, poor Rosalind, by experience, for being every way distressed, surcharged with cares, and overgrown with sorrows, yet amidst the heap of all these mishaps love hath lodged in thy heart the perfection of young Rosader, a man every way absolute as well for his inward life as for his outward lineaments, able to content the eye with beauty and the ear with the report of his virtue.

---

1 at discovert in an uncovered or exposed condition; off one's guard.

2 to vail bonnet to yield, give way.

3 Apart from the obvious meaning (a commanding, vehement, or overpowering feeling), a "passion" is also a literary composition conveying deep or strong emotion.

4 Proverb, "Crowns have cares" (Tilley C863).

5 Proverb, "The greatest seas have the sorest storms" (Tilley S186); sorest most serious or violent.

6 bale evil; harm, injury.

7 Proverb, "High cedars fall (are shaken) when low shrubs remain (are scarcely moved)" (Tilley C208).

8 base in the sense of lower class, or rank.

9 brookest endure.

10 contrary oppose, strive against, thwart.

11 Proverb, "Love has no respect of persons" (Tilley L505); hath no respect of persons does not discriminate or show partiality on the basis of rank or status.

12 libertine here, simply "freedman, one freed from slavery"; usually means one unrestrained by moral or sexual standards.

"But consider, Rosalind, his fortunes and thy present estate: thou art poor and without patrimony, and yet the daughter of a prince; he a younger brother, and void of such possessions as either might maintain thy dignities or revenge thy father's injuries. And hast thou not learned this of other ladies, that lovers cannot live by looks, that women's ears are sooner content with a dram of 'give me' than a pound of 'hear me,' that gold is sweeter than eloquence, that love is a fire and wealth is the fuel, that Venus' coffers should be ever full? Then, Rosalind, seeing Rosader is poor, think him less beautiful because he is in want, and account his virtues but qualities of course[1] for that he is not endued with wealth. Doth not Horace tell thee what method is to be used in love?

Quaerenda pecunia primum, post nummos virtus.[2]

"Tush, Rosalind, be not over rash, leap not before thou look. Either love such a one as may with his lands purchase thy liberty or else love not at all. Choose not a fair face with an empty purse, but say as most women use to say,[3]

Si nihil attuleris, ibis Homere foras.[4]

"Why, Rosalind, can such base thoughts harbour in such high beauties? Can the degree of a princess, the daughter of Gerismond, harbour such servile conceits as to prize gold more than honour, or to measure a gentleman by his wealth, not by his virtues? No, Rosalind, blush at thy base resolution and say, if thou lovest, either Rosader or none. And why? Because Rosader is both beautiful and virtuous."

Smiling to herself to think of her new-entertained passions, taking up her lute that lay by her, she warbled out this ditty:

Rosalind's Madrigal.[5]

Love in my bosom like a bee
Doth suck his sweet.
Now with his wings he plays with me,
Now with his feet.
Within mine eyes he makes his nest,
His bed amidst my tender breast,
My kisses are his daily feast,
And yet he robs me of my rest.
Ah wanton, will ye?

And if I sleep, then percheth he
With pretty flight,
And makes his pillow of my knee
The livelong night.
Strike I my lute, he tunes the string,
He music plays if so I sing;
He lends me every lovely thing,
Yet cruel he my heart doth sting.
Whist,[6] wanton, still ye!

Else I with roses every day
Will whip you hence,
And bind you when you long to play,
For your offence.
I'll shut mine eyes to keep you in,
I'll make you fast it for your sin,
I'll count your power not worth a pin;
Alas, what hereby shall I win,
If he gainsay[7] me?

What if I beat the wanton boy
With many a rod?
He will repay me with annoy,
Because a god.

---

1 of course customary, natural, to be expected.

2 Latin, "Seek money first, virtue after money" (Epistles, 1.1.53-54).

3 use to say are accustomed or wont to say.

4 Latin, "If you bring nothing, you'll be going right out the doors, Homer" (Ovid, Art of Love, 2.279-80). The full verse lines say that even if Homer himself were to visit a beloved, bringing with him all the Muses, if he came carrying no gift, he'd be quickly shown the door.

5 Madrigal a short lyric poem usually about love, suitable to be set to music (a part song for three or more voices).

6 Whist hush.

7 gainsay oppose, hinder; refuse.

Then sit thou safely on my knee,
And let thy bower my bosom be;
Lurk in mine eyes, I like of thee.
O Cupid, so thou pity me,
Spare not but play thee.

Scarce had Rosalind ended her madrigal before Torismond came in with his daughter Alinda and many of the peers of France, who were enamoured of her beauty; which Torismond perceiving, fearing lest her perfection might be the beginning of his prejudice[1] and the hope of his fruit[2] end in the beginning of her blossoms, he thought to banish her from the court: "For," quoth he to himself, "her face is so full of favour that it pleads pity in the eye of every man. Her beauty is so heavenly and divine that she will prove to me as Helen did to Priam.[3] Some one of the peers will aim at her love, end[4] the marriage, and then in his wife's right attempt the kingdom. To prevent, therefore had-I-wist in all these actions,[5] she tarries not about the court, but shall (as an exile) either wander to her father or else seek other fortunes."

In this humour, with a stern countenance full of wrath, he breathed out this censure[6] unto her before the peers, that charged her that that night she were not seen about the court:

"For," quoth he, "I have heard of thy aspiring speeches and intended treasons." This doom was strange[7] unto Rosalind, and presently, covered with the shield of her innocence, she boldly broke out in reverent terms to have cleared herself; but Torismond would admit of no reason, nor durst his lords plead for Rosalind, although her beauty had made some of them passionate, seeing the figure of wrath portrayed in his brow. Standing thus all mute, and Rosalind amazed, Alinda, who loved her more than herself, with grief in her heart and tears in her eyes, falling down on her knees began to entreat her father thus:

Alinda's Oration to Her Father in Defence of Fair Rosalind.

"If, mighty Torismond, I offend in pleading for my friend, let the law of amity crave pardon for my boldness, for where there is depth of affection there friendship alloweth a privilege. Rosalind and I have been fostered up[8] from our infancies, and nursed under the harbour of our conversing together with such private familiarities, that custom had wrought an union of our nature, and the sympathy of our affections such a secret love that we have two bodies and one soul.[9] Then marvel not, great Torismond, if seeing my friend distressed I find myself perplexed with a thousand sorrows, for her virtuous and honourable thoughts (which are the glories that maketh women excellent), they be such as may challenge[10] love and raze out suspicion. Her obedience to your Majesty I refer to the censure of your own eye, that since her father's exile hath smothered all griefs with patience, and in the absence of nature, hath honoured you with all duty as her own father by nurture, not in word uttering any discontent, nor in thought (as far as conjecture may reach) hammering on revenge, only in all her actions seeking to please you and to win my favour. Her wisdom, silence, chastity, and other such rich qualities I need not decipher; only it rests for me to

---

1 prejudice destruction.

2 fruit profit, gain. Torismond's "fruit" may also refer to his daughter and heir, Alinda.

3 as Helen did to Priam Helen, the wife of Menelaus, king of Sparta, eloped with Priam's son, Paris; taking refuge with her lover in Priam's central city, Troy, Helen's presence finally resulted in the destruction of Priam's city and kingdom, when Menelaus and his Greek allies after some ten years took the city, burning it to the ground, and slaughtering Priam and what remained of his family and nobility.

4 end complete, conclude.

5 To prevent, therefore had-I-wist … actions i.e., to prevent, therefore, saying later and in vain, "Oh, had I only known about all these goings-on!"

6 censure judgement.

7 doom sentence, condemnation; strange surprising, unaccountable, astonishing.

8 fostered up brought up, raised [together].

9 we have two bodies and one soul Marcus Tullius Cicero's dialogue Laelius: De Amicitia ("On Friendship") (44 BCE) makes this claim as does Aristotle's Ethics (1166A32).

10 challenge have a natural right or claim to.

conclude in one word that she is innocent. If then fortune, who triumphs in variety of miseries, hath presented some envious person (as minister of her intended stratagem) to taint Rosalind with any surmise of treason, let him be brought to her face and confirm his accusation by witnesses, which proved, let her die, and Alinda will execute the massacre. If none can avouch any confirmed relation of her intent, use justice, my lord—it is the glory of a king—and let her live in your wonted[1] favour; for if you banish her, myself, as co-partner of her hard fortunes, will participate in exile some part of her extremities."

Torismond, at this speech of Alinda, covered his face with such a frown as tyranny seemed to sit triumphant in his forehead, and checked her up[2] with such taunts as made the lords (that only were hearers) to tremble.

"Proud girl," quoth he, "hath my looks made thee so light of tongue or my favours encouraged thee to be so forward that thou darest presume to preach after thy father? Hath not my years more experience than thy youth and the winter of mine age deeper insight into civil policy than the prime of thy flourishing days? The old lion avoids the toils where the young one leaps into the net; the care of age is provident and foresees much; suspicion is a virtue where a man holds his enemy in his bosom. Thou, fond[3] girl, measurest all by present affection, and as thy heart loves thy thoughts censure. But if thou knewest that in liking Rosalind thou hatchest up a bird to peck out thine own eyes, thou wouldst entreat as much for her absence as now thou delightest in her presence. But why do I allege policy to thee? Sit you down, housewife,[4] and fall to your needle. If idleness make you so wanton or liberty so malapert,[5] I can quickly tie you to a sharper task. And you, maid, this night be packing,[6] either into Arden to your father, or whither best it shall content your humour,[7] but in the court you shall not abide."

This rigorous reply of Torismond nothing amazed[8] Alinda, for still she prosecuted her plea in the defence of Rosalind, wishing her father, if his censure might not be reversed, that he would appoint her partner of her exile, which, if he refused to do, either she would by some secret means steal out and follow her, or else end her days with some desperate kind of death. When Torismond heard his daughter so resolute, his heart was so hardened against her that he set down a definitive and peremptory sentence that they should both be banished, which presently was done, the tyrant rather choosing to hazard the loss of his only child than any ways to put in question the state of his kingdom, so suspicious and fearful is the conscience of an usurper. Well, although his lords persuaded him to retain his own daughter, yet his resolution might not be reversed, but both of them must away from the court without either more company or delay. In he went with great melancholy and left these two ladies alone. Rosalind waxed[9] very sad and sat down and wept. Alinda she smiled and, sitting by her friend, began thus to comfort her:

Alinda's Comfort to Perplexed Rosalind.

"Why, how now, Rosalind, dismayed with a frown of contrary fortune? Have I not oft heard thee say that high minds were discovered in fortune's contempt, and heroical seen in the depth of extremities? Thou wert wont to tell others that complained of distress that the sweetest salve for misery was patience, and the only medicine for want, that precious implaister[10] of content. Being such a good physician to others, wilt thou not

---

1 wonted usual, customary.

2 checked her up rebuked her.

3 fond foolish; infatuated.

4 housewife In addition to the long-standing meaning—the wife as governor of domestic household matters—this word also refers to a sexually incontinent, worthless, or insolent woman or girl (usually spelled "huswife," whence we get the insult, "hussy").

5 wanton rebellious; perhaps, also, "spoiled or petulant"; malapert presumptuous, impudent.

6 be packing "get going" in haste (a dismissive/contemptuous usage).

7 humour governing disposition.

8 amazed terrified, alarmed.

9 waxed grew.

10 want lack; implaister plaster, healing salve.

minister receipts[1] to thyself? But perchance thou wilt say:

Consulenti nunquam caput doluit.[2]

"Why, then, if the patients that are sick of this disease can find in themselves neither reason to persuade nor art to cure, yet, Rosalind, admit of the counsel of a friend and apply the salves that may appease thy passions. If thou grievest that being the daughter of a prince and envy thwarteth thee with such hard exigents, think that royalty is a fair mark,[3] that crowns have crosses when mirth is in cottages, that the fairer the rose is the sooner it is bitten with caterpillars, the more orient[4] the pearl is the more apt to take a blemish, and the greatest birth, as it hath most honour so it hath much envy. If, then, fortune aimeth at the fairest, be patient, Rosalind, for first by thine exile thou goest to thy father. Nature is higher prized than wealth, and the love of one's parents ought to be more precious than all dignities. Why then doth my Rosalind grieve at the frown of Torismond, who, by offering her a prejudice,[5] proffers her a greater pleasure? And more, mad lass, to be melancholy when thou hast with thee Alinda, a friend who will be a faithful co-partner of all thy misfortunes, who hath left her father to follow thee, and chooseth rather to brook[6] all extremities than to forsake thy presence. What, Rosalind,

Solamen miseris socios habuisse doloris.[7]

"Cheerily, woman! As we have been bedfellows in royalty, we will be fellowmates in poverty. I will ever be thy Alinda, and thou shalt ever rest[8] to me Rosalind; so shall the world canonize our friendship, and speak of Rosalind and Alinda as they did of Pylades and Orestes.[9] And if ever fortune smile and we return to our former honour, then folding ourselves in the sweet of our friendship, we shall merrily say (calling to mind our forepassed miseries):

Olim haec meminisse iuvabit."[10]

At this, Rosalind began to comfort her, and after she had wept a few kind tears in the bosom of her Alinda, she gave her hearty thanks, and then they sat them down to consult how they should travel. Alinda grieved at nothing but that they might have no man in their company, saying it would be their greatest prejudice[11] in that two women went wandering without either guide or attendant.

"Tush," quoth Rosalind, "art thou a woman and hast not a sudden shift[12] to prevent a misfortune? I, thou seest, am of a tall stature and would very well become the person and apparel of a page. Thou shalt be my mistress,[13] and I will play the man so properly that, trust me, in what company soever I come I will not be discovered. I will buy me a suit and have my rapier[14] very handsomely at my side, and if any knave offer wrong, your page will show him the point of his weapon."

At this Alinda smiled, and upon this they agreed and presently gathered up all their jewels, which they trussed up in a casket; and Rosalind in all haste provided her of robes, and Alinda from

---

1 receipts medical formulae or prescriptions.

2 Latin, "The head of the counsellor/adviser never aches."

3 fair mark attractive target.

4 orient lustrous.

5 prejudice injury.

6 brook endure, tolerate.

7 Latin, "It is a relief or consolation to the miserable or the unfortunate to have had sharers or partakers in affliction." A very common proverbial saying with many variants in the period: "It is good to have company in trouble (misery)" (Tilley C571).

8 rest remain.

9 Pylades and Orestes Brought up and educated together, these cousins became the emblem of total and inviolable friendship. Orestes was the son of Agamemnon and Clytemnestra. When Clytemnestra murdered Agamemnon, Orestes escaped the same fate by fleeing to his uncle, Strophius, king of Phocis. Later, with the aid of Pylades, Orestes avenged his father's death, killing both his mother and her lover and accomplice, Aegisthus.

10 Latin, "... even this distress it will some day be a joy to recall" (Virgil, Aeneid, trans. H.R. Fairclough, 1.203).

11 prejudice harm; the meaning here is closer to "danger."

12 sudden shift ingenious device, subterfuge, or trick.

13 mistress a woman who employs others in her service.

14 rapier a small sword.

her royal weeds put herself in more homely[1] attire. Thus fitted to the purpose, away go these two friends, having now changed their names, Alinda being called Aliena and Rosalind Ganymede.[2] They travelled along the vineyards and, by many by-ways, at last got to the forest side, where they travelled by the space of two or three days without seeing any creature, being often in danger of wild beasts and pained with many passionate sorrows. Now the black ox began to tread on their feet,[3] and Alinda thought of her wonted royalty. But when she cast her eyes on her Rosalind, she thought every danger a step to honour. Passing thus on along, about midday they came to a fountain compassed with a grove of cypress trees, so cunningly and curiously planted as if some goddess had entreated nature in that place to make her an arbour. By this fountain sat Aliena and her Ganymede, and forth they pulled such victuals as they had and fed as merrily as if they had been in Paris with all the king's delicates.[4]

[Aliena (Alinda) and Ganymede (Rosalind) stop to rest in the forest of Arden and there they find the shepherd Montanus' poem of unrequited love "carved in the bark of a pine tree."]

"No doubt," quoth Aliena, "this poesy is the passion of some perplexed shepherd that, being enamoured of some fair and beautiful shepherdess, suffered some sharp repulse and therefore complained of the cruelty of his mistress."

"You may see," quoth Ganymede, "what mad cattle you women be, whose hearts sometimes are made of adamant[5] that will touch with no impression, and sometimes of wax that is fit for every form. They delight to be courted, and then they glory to seem coy.[6] And when they are most desired, then they freeze with disdain. And this fault is so common to the sex that you see it painted out in the shepherd's passions, who found his mistress as froward[7] as he was enamoured."

"And I pray you," quoth Aliena, "if your robes were off, what mettle are you made of that you are so satirical against women? Is it not a foul bird defiles [its][8] own nest?[9] Beware, Ganymede, that Rosader hear you not, if he do, perchance you will make him leap so far from love that he will anger every vein in your heart."

"Thus," quoth Ganymede, "I keep decorum; I speak now as I am Aliena's page, not as I am Gerismond's daughter, for put me but into a petticoat, and I will stand in defiance to the uttermost that women are courteous, constant, virtuous, and what not."

"Stay[10] there," quoth Aliena, "and no more words, for yonder be characters graven upon the bark of the tall beech tree."

"Let us see," quoth Ganymede, and with that they read a fancy[11] written to this effect:

First shall the heavens want[12] starry light,
The seas be robbed of their waves,
The day want sun, and sun want bright,
The night want shade, the dead men graves,
The April, flowers and leaf and tree,
Before I false my faith to thee.

---

1 weeds apparel, dress, clothing; homely simple, plain.

2 Aliena Latin, "stranger, foreigner, alien"; Ganymede According to Ovid, Ganymede was a beautiful shepherd. Jupiter, in the guise of an eagle, stole him away to be his cupbearer. Some classical writers say that Jupiter was enamoured of the young man and carried him away to satisfy his sexual desires. In the Renaissance, a "ganymede" is a catamite, a boy kept for the purpose of fulfilling his employer's homosexual desires.

3 Proverb, "The black ox never trod on his foot" (i.e., he has never experienced suffering or misfortune) (Tilley O103); thus, here, suffering or misfortune begins to prey upon them.

4 delicates choice delicacies.

5 adamant a mythic stone, sometimes confused with the diamond in this period, which shares the latter's reputation as impregnably hard.

6 coy modestly backwards or reserved.

7 froward disposed to go counter to what is demanded or reasonable; perverse.

8 originally "the" in the copytext, clearly a printer's error.

9 A proverb, meaning "it is a foul thing for a man to slander the treasure or things of his own house" (R. Tavener, Proverbs or Adages, 1552). See Tilley B377.

10 Stay stop, cease.

11 fancy here, "product of the imagination."

12 want lack.

First shall the tops of highest hills
By humble plains be overpried,[1]
And poets scorn the Muses' quills,
And fish forsake the water glide,
And Iris lose her coloured weed,[2]
Before I fail thee at thy need.

First direful hate shall turn to peace,
And love relent in deep disdain,
And death his fatal stroke shall cease,
And envy pity every pain,
And pleasure mourn and sorrow smile,
Before I talk of any guile.[3]

First time shall stay his stayless race,
And winter bless his brows with corn,
And snow bemoisten July's face,
And winter spring, and summer mourn,
Before my pen, by help of fame,
Cease to recite thy sacred name.

Montanus.

"No doubt," quoth Ganymede, "this protestation grew from one full of passions."

"I am of that mind too," quoth Aliena, "but see, I pray, when poor women seek to keep themselves chaste, how men woo them with many feigned promises, alluring with sweet words as the Sirens, and after proving as trothless as Aeneas.[4] Thus promised Demophoön to his Phyllis,[5] but who at last grew more false?"

"The reason was," quoth Ganymede, "that they were women's sons and took that fault of their mother, for if man had grown from man, as Adam did from the earth, men had never been troubled with inconstancy."

"Leave off" quoth Aliena, "to taunt thus bitterly, or else I'll pull off your page's apparel and whip you, as Venus doth her wantons, with nettles."

"So you will," quoth Ganymede, "persuade me to flattery, and that needs not. But come, seeing we have found here by this fount the tract[6] of shepherds by their madrigals and roundelays,[7] let us forward, for either we shall find some folds, sheepcotes, or else some cottages wherein for a day or two to rest."

"Content," quoth Aliena, and with that they rose up and marched forward till towards the even,[8] and then, coming into a fair valley compassed with mountains whereon grew many pleasant shrubs, they might descry where two flocks of sheep did feed.

[The old shepherd, Corydon, and the young shepherd, Montanus, appear. The two sing an eclogue, wherein Corydon tries to counsel Montanus against love, which he terms "a sugared harm, a poison full of pleasure." Montanus cannot accept Corydon's counsel or his characterization of love, and we learn the name of his scornful beloved: the shepherdess Phoebe. They finish their song and then greet Aliena and Ganymede. When Corydon learns that Aliena desires to live simply in the country as a shepherdess, he arranges for her purchase of his landlord's flock and land, which have recently been put up for sale. Meanwhile, Saladine takes his revenge on Rosader by having him chained to a post in the middle of the hall, and refusing him food or drink. Adam Spencer, fearing

[1] overpried overlooked.

[2] Iris goddess of the rainbow; weed article of clothing or apparel.

[3] guile trick, deceit.

[4] Sirens sea nymphs whose singing was so enthralling that listeners would become entranced, losing themselves in the music and finally starving to death because they forgot to eat. They appear most famously in Homer's Odyssey; Aeneas In Virgil's national epic the Aeneid, Aeneas is a Trojan prince and the founder of the Roman Empire; during his journeys, he and his followers are driven ashore at Carthage and are welcomed there by its queen, Dido. Although Aeneas vows his love to the enamoured Dido, he finally leaves her, obeying the gods' commands to seek out his destiny in Italy; in response to Aeneas' faithlessness and her own abandonment, Dido commits suicide.

[5] Demophoön King of Athens, son of Theseus and Phaedra, and participant in the Trojan war, Demophoön treated Phyllis of Thrace with careless faithlessness, accepting her love while he was in Thrace, but forgetting her entirely when he finally returned to Athens. In despair, Phyllis hanged herself (Ovid, Heroides, 2).

[6] tract path; trace.

[7] roundelay a short, simple song with a refrain.

[8] even i.e., evening.

that Rosader will die, brings him food secretly and then releases him. Spencer persuades Rosader to remain near the post, however, rather than immediately seeking revenge for his ill treatment. During a banquet the next day, Rosader is insulted by Saladine and his friends, whereat Rosader throws off his chains, lays about him with a poleaxe, hurts some of the guests, kills others, and drives everyone out of the house. When Saladine arrives to retake the house with the sheriff and a troop of men, Rosader breaks through the group and along with Adam flees into the forest of Arden. After five or six days wandering in the forest, Adam is weak from hunger and close to death. Rosader and he come across Gerismond (Rosalind's father and the usurped king of France) and his group of loyal retainers, and Rosader bravely demands food and drink for his servant, which Gerismond provides, later taking Rosader into his service. Meanwhile, Torismond, desirous of possessing John of Bordeaux's lands, has Saladine imprisoned on a pretext; during this brief imprisonment Saladine repents his treatment of Rosader and determines to find him and make amends. Torismond banishes Saladine, and Saladine takes the opportunity to go search for his brother. Meanwhile, Rosader mourns his separation from Rosalind in poetry which he engraves on trees. One day, Aliena and Ganymede overhear Rosader sighing for Rosalind, and they approach him.]

[1]"I pray thee tell me, forester, what is this Rosalind for whom thou pinest away in such passions? Is she some nymph that waits upon Diana's train, whose chastity thou hast deciphered in such epithets? Or is she some shepherdess that haunts these plains whose beauty hath so bewitched thy fancy, whose name thou shadowest in covert under the figure of Rosalind, as Ovid did Julia under the name of Corinna?[2] Or say me forsooth, is it that Rosalind of whom we shepherds have heard talk—she, forester, that is the daughter of Gerismond that once was king and now an outlaw in this forest of Arden?"

At this Rosader fetched a deep sigh and said, "It is she, O gentle swain,[3] it is she. That saint it is whom I serve, that goddess at whose shrine I do bend all my devotions, the most fairest of all fairs, the phoenix[4] of all that sex, and the purity of all earthly perfection."

"And why, gentle forester, if she be so beautiful and thou so amorous, is there such a disagreement in thy thoughts? Haply she resembleth the rose that is sweet but full of prickles? Or the serpent regius that hath scales as glorious as the sun and a breath as infectious as the aconitum[5] is deadly? So thy Rosalind may be most amiable and yet unkind, full of favour and yet froward, coy without wit and disdainful without reason."

"O shepherd," quoth Rosader, "knewest thou her personage, graced with the excellence of all perfection, being a harbour wherein the Graces shroud their virtues, thou wouldst not breathe out such blasphemy against the beauteous Rosalind. She is a diamond, bright but not hard, yet of most chaste operation,[6] a pearl so orient that it can be stained with no blemish, a rose without prickles, and a princess absolute as well in beauty as in virtue. But I, unhappy I, have let mine eye soar with the eagle against so bright a sun that I am quite blind. I have with Apollo enamoured myself of a Daphne,[7] not, as she, disdainful, but far more

---

[1] The speaker here is Rosalind in her disguise as Ganymede.

[2] Ovid Publius Ovidius Naso (43 BCE-17 CE), a famed Roman poet. His Amores, a collection of Latin love poetry, celebrates a woman named Corinna, who traditionally has been identified as Julia (39 BCE-c. 14 CE), only daughter of the emperor Augustus. Traditionally, her affair with Ovid is one of the reasons for Augustus' banishment of Ovid from Rome. For more on Julia and her representation, see Chapman's Ovid's Banquet of Sense, p. 1166, note 4.

[3] swain shepherd.

[4] phoenix a beautiful mythic bird who climbed onto its own funeral pyre every 500 years and was reborn vital and young from its own ashes.

[5] aconitum aconite or monk's-head (also known as wolf's-bane), a common and deadly poisonous plant.

[6] operation influence, virtue, force.

[7] Apollo … Daphne Apollo fell in love with Daphne, a beautiful nymph, daughter of the river god Peneus. Rejecting his advances, she fled from him and when she found she could not escape his pursuit, she prayed to her father to save her. He transformed her into a laurel tree. Apollo made the laurel wreath his sacred symbol.

chaste than Daphne. I have with Ixion laid my love on Juno and shall, I fear, embrace nought but a cloud.[1] Ah shepherd, I have reached at a star, my desires have mounted above my degree, and my thoughts above my fortunes. I, being a peasant, have ventured to gaze on a princess whose honours are too high to vouchsafe such base loves."

"Why, forester," quoth Ganymede, "comfort thyself. Be blithe and frolic, man! Love souseth[2] as low as she soareth high, Cupid shoots at a rag as soon as at a robe, and Venus' eye that was so curious sparkled favour on pole-footed[3] Vulcan. Fear not, man, women's looks are not tied to dignity's feathers, nor make they curious esteem where the stone is found, but what is the virtue.[4] Fear not, forester; faint heart never won fair lady.[5] But where lives Rosalind now? At the court?"

"Oh no," quoth Rosader, "she lives I know not where, and that is my sorrow; banished by Torismond, and that is my hell. For might I but find her sacred personage and plead before the bar[6] of her pity the plaint of my passions, hope tells me she would grace me with some favour, and that would suffice as a recompense of all my former miseries."

[...]

Ganymede, pitying her Rosader, thinking to drive him out of this amorous melancholy, said that now the sun was in his meridional heat and that it was high noon: "Therefore we shepherds say 'tis time to go to dinner, for the sun and our stomachs are shepherds' dials.[7] Therefore, forester, if thou wilt take such fare as comes out of our homely scrips,[8] welcome shall answer whatsoever thou wantest in delicates."[9]

Aliena took the entertainment by the end,[10] and told Rosader he should be her guest. He thanked them heartily and sat with them down to dinner, where they had such cates as country state did allow them, sauced with such content and such sweet prattle as it seemed far more sweet than all their courtly junkets.[11]

As soon as they had taken their repast, Rosader, giving them thanks for his good cheer, would have been gone; but Ganymede, that was loath to let him pass out of her presence, began thus:

"Nay forester," quoth he, "if thy business be not the greater, seeing thou sayest thou art so deeply in love, let me see how thou canst woo. I will represent Rosalind, and thou shalt be as thou art, Rosader. See in some amorous eclogue[12] how if Rosalind were present, how thou couldst court her; and while we sing of love, Aliena shall tune her pipe and play us melody."

"Content," quoth Rosader.

And Aliena, she to show her willingness, drew forth a recorder and began to wind it. Then the loving forester began thus:

The Wooing Eclogue Betwixt Rosalind and Rosader.

Rosader.

I pray thee, nymph, by all the working words,
By all the tears and sighs that lovers know,
Or what or thoughts or falt'ring tongue affords,

---

[1] Ixion … cloud Ixion, king of Thessaly, shunned and rejected by all mankind because of his treacherous murder of his father-in-law, Deioneus, was pitied by Jupiter, who invited him to one of the gods' banquets. There, Ixion fell in love with Juno, Jupiter's wife and queen of the gods; his attempts to seduce her, however, were prevented by Jupiter who replaced Juno with a cloud shaped like her. Ixion's punishment was to be bound in hell to an eternally spinning wheel.

[2] souseth swoops or plunges down.

[3] curious fastidious, exacting, precise; pole-footed i.e., "polt-footed": club-footed or lame on account of a deformed foot.

[4] nor make they … the virtue i.e., women don't give excessively-close or minute examination to the circumstances wherein they find a precious thing (the "stone" or gem), but to the actual quality and value (the "virtue") of the gem itself.

[5] Proverb, "Faint heart ne'er won fair lady" (Tilley H302).

[6] bar in a judicial court, the barrier or wooden rail marking at which prisoners are stationed for arraignment, trial, or sentence.

[7] dials i.e., sundials; thus, time-keepers.

[8] fare food; homely scrips simple bags or satchels.

[9] welcome shall answer whatsoever thou wantest in delicates i.e., warm hospitality shall recompense you for whatever you lack in delicacies.

[10] by the end i.e., she took charge of the hospitality [which they were offering].

[11] junkets feasts or banquets.

[12] eclogue a short poem of any kind, but especially a pastoral dialogue, such as those in Virgil's Eclogues.

I crave for mine in ripping up[1] my woe.
Sweet Rosalind, my love (would God, my love),
My life (would God, my life), aye, pity me!
Thy lips are kind and humble like the dove,
And but with beauty pity will not be.
Look on mine eyes made red with rueful tears,
From whence the rain of true remorse descendeth,
All pale in looks am I though young in years,
And nought but love or death my days befriendeth.
Oh let no stormy rigour knit thy brows,
Which love appointed for his mercy seat.
The tallest tree by Boreas'[2] breath it bows,
The iron yields with hammer and to heat.
O Rosalind, then be thou pitiful,
For Rosalind is only beautiful.

Rosalind.
Love's wantons arm their trait'rous suits with tears,
With vows, with oaths, with looks, with showers of gold:
But when the fruit of their affects appears,
The simple heart by subtle sleights is sold.
Thus sucks the yielding ear the poisoned bait,
Thus feeds the heart upon his endless harms,
Thus glut the thoughts themselves on self-deceit,
Thus blind the eyes their sight by subtle charms.
The lovely looks, the sighs that storm so sore,
The dew of deep-dissembled doubleness:
These may attempt, but are of power no more
Where beauty leans to wit and soothfastness.[3]
O Rosader, then be thou witiful,[4]
For Rosalind scorns foolish pitiful.

Rosader.
I pray thee, Rosalind, by those sweet eyes
That stain the sun in shine, the morn in clear,
By those sweet cheeks where Love encamped lies
To kiss the roses of the springing year.
I tempt thee, Rosalind, by ruthful[5] plaints,
Not seasoned with deceit or fraudful guile,[6]
But firm in pain far more than tongue depaints,
Sweet nymph, be kind and grace me with a smile.
So may the heavens preserve from hurtful food
Thy harmless flocks; so may the summer yield
The pride of all her riches and her good
To fat thy sheep, the citizens of field.
Oh, leave to arm thy lovely brows with scorn:
The birds their beak, the lion hath his tail,
And lovers nought but sighs and bitter mourn,
The spotless fort of fancy to assail.
O Rosalind, then be thou pitiful:
For Rosalind is only beautiful.

Rosalind.
The hardened steel by fire is brought in frame.

Rosader.
And Rosalind, my love, than any wool more softer,
And shall not sighs her tender heart inflame?

Rosalind.
Were lovers true, maids would believe them ofter.

Rosader.
Truth and regard and honour guide my love.

Rosalind.
Fain[7] would I trust, but yet I dare not try.

Rosader.
Oh, pity me, sweet nymph, and do but prove.[8]

Rosalind.
I would resist, but yet I know not why.

Rosader.
O Rosalind, be kind, for times will change,
Thy looks ay nill[9] be fair as now they be;
Thine age from beauty may thy looks estrange;
Ah, yield in time, sweet nymph, and pity me.

---

1 ripping up revealing, disclosing.
2 Boreas god of the north wind.
3 soothfastness truthfulness.
4 witiful full of wit; wise, sensible.
5 ruthful that which exacts pity or compassion; lamentably piteous.
6 guile insidious cunning, treachery.
7 Fain willingly, gladly, with pleasure.
8 prove test.
9 ay nill will not always.

Rosalind.
O Rosalind, thou must be pitiful,
For Rosader is young and beautiful.

Rosader.
Oh, gain more great than kingdoms or a crown.

Rosalind.
Oh, trust betrayed if Rosader abuse me.

Rosader.
First let the heavens conspire to pull me down,
And heaven and earth as abject quite refuse me.
Let sorrows stream about my hateful bower,
And restless horror hatch within my breast,
Let beauty's eye afflict me with a lower,[1]
Let deep despair pursue me without rest,
Ere Rosalind my loyalty disprove,
Ere Rosalind accuse me for unkind.

Rosalind.
Then Rosalind will grace thee with her love,
Then Rosalind will have thee still in mind.

Rosader.
Then let me triumph more than Tithon's[2] dear,
Since Rosalind will Rosader respect.
Then let my face exile his sorry cheer,[3]
And frolic in the comfort of affect;[4]
And say that Rosalind is only pitiful,
Since Rosalind is only beautiful.

When thus they had finished their courting eclogue in such a familiar clause, Ganymede, as augur of some good fortunes to light upon their affections, began to be thus pleasant:

"How now, forester, have I not fitted your turn? Have I not played the woman handsomely and showed myself as coy in grants, as courteous in desires, and been as full of suspicion as men of flattery? And yet to salve all, jumped I not all up with[5] the sweet union of love? Did not Rosalind content her Rosader?"

The forester, at this smiling, shook his head and, folding his arms, made this merry reply:

"Truth, gentle swain, Rosader hath his Rosalind but as Ixion had Juno, who thinking to possess a goddess only embraced a cloud. In these imaginary fruitions of fancy I resemble the birds that fed themselves with Zeuxis' painted grapes,[6] but they grew so lean with pecking at shadows that they were glad with Aesop's[7] cock to scrape for a barley kernel. So fareth it with me, who, to feed myself with the hope of my mistress's favours, soothe myself in thy suits and only in conceit[8] reap a wished-for content. But if my food be no better than such amorous dreams, Venus at the year's end shall find me but a lean lover. Yet do I take these follies for high fortunes and hope these feigned affections do divine[9] some unfeigned end of ensuing fancies."

"And thereupon," quoth Aliena, "I'll play the priest. From this day forth Ganymede shall call thee husband and thou shalt call Ganymede wife, and so we'll have a marriage."

"Content," quoth Rosader, and laughed.

---

1 lower rhymes with "bower": to frown, look sullen.

2 Tithon or Tithonus was the son of Laomedon, king of Troy. His extraordinary beauty caused Aurora, goddess of the dawn, to fall in love with and have children by him. Having been granted by her his desire for immortality, Tithonus found himself in a sorry situation: having neglected to ask for eternal youth, strength, and vigour along with eternal life, Tithonus finally became old and decrepit, but lacked the ability to die. Taking pity on him, Aurora, although she could not give him the death he craved, transformed him into a grasshopper.

3 cheer appearance, expression of the face.

4 affect inward disposition, feeling.

5 jumped I not all up with i.e., have I not resolved all (the obstacles between the lovers)by.

6 Zeuxis (fl. 430-390 BCE), Greek painter, student of Apollodorus. In a contest with his contemporary Parrhasius, Zeuxis' painting of a man carrying grapes achieved such verisimilitude that birds tried to eat the painted fruit.

7 Aesop (fl. 6th century BCE), Greek writer of fables. In the fable of "The Cock and the Precious Stone" (not included any longer among Aesop's complete fables), a cock scratching in a barnyard for something to eat turned up a gem, which he rejected with disappointment, saying he'd far prefer a barley kernel, having no use for the gem at all.

8 conceit thought, conception.

9 divine predict.

"Content," quoth Ganymede, and changed as red as a rose.

And so with a smile and a blush they made up this jesting match that after proved to a marriage in earnest, Rosader full little thinking he had wooed and won his Rosalind.

But all was well; hope is a sweet string to harp on, and therefore let the forester awhile shape himself to his shadow and tarry[1] Fortune's leisure, till she may make a metamorphosis fit for his purpose.

I digress, and therefore to Aliena, who said the wedding was not worth a pin unless there were some cheer, nor that bargain well made that was not stricken up[2] with a cup of wine. And therefore she willed Ganymede to set out such cates[3] as they had and to draw out her bottle, charging[4] the forester, as he had imagined his loves, so to conceit these cates to be a most sumptuous banquet, and to take a mazer[5] of wine and to drink to his Rosalind—which Rosader did—and so they passed away the day in many pleasant devices. Till at last Aliena perceived time would tarry no man[6] and that the sun waxed very low, ready to set, which made her shorten their amorous prattle and end the banquet with a fresh carouse,[7] which done, they all three rose and Aliena broke off thus:

"Now forester, Phoebus,[8] that all this while hath been partaker of our sports, seeing every woodsman more fortunate in his loves than he in his fancies, seeing thou hast won Rosalind when he could not woo Daphne, hides his head for shame and bids us adieu in a cloud. Our sheep, they (poor wantons) wander towards their folds, as taught by nature their due times of rest, which tells us, forester, we must depart. Marry,[9] though there were a marriage, yet I must carry this night the bride with me, and tomorrow morning, if you meet us here, I'll promise to deliver her as good a maid as I find her."

"Content," quoth Rosader, "'tis enough for me in the night to dream on love, that in the day am so fond to dote on love, and so, till tomorrow, you to your folds and I will to my lodge." And thus the forester and they parted.

He was no sooner gone but Aliena and Ganymede went and folded their flocks and, taking up their hooks,[10] their bags, and their bottles, hied[11] homeward. By the way, Aliena, to make the time seem short, began to prattle with Ganymede thus:

"I have heard them say that what the Fates forepoint that Fortune pricketh down with a period;[12] that the stars are sticklers[13] in Venus' court, and desire hangs at the heel of destiny. If it be so, then by all probable conjectures this match will be a marriage, for if augurism[14] be authentical or the divines' dooms principles,[15] it cannot be but such a shadow portends the issue of a substance, for to that end did the gods force the conceit of this eclogue, that they might discover the ensuing consent of your affections, so that ere it be long I hope in earnest to dance at your wedding."

"Tush," quoth Ganymede, "all is not malt that is cast on the kiln. There goes more words to a bargain than one.[16] Love feels no footing in the air, and fancy holds it slippery harbour to nestle in the tongue. The match is not yet so surely made but he may miss of his market; but if fortune be his friend, I will not be his foe, and so I pray you, gentle mistress Aliena, take it."

---

1 tarry wait on, wait for.

2 stricken up concluded or ratified with.

3 cates provisions, victuals.

4 charging commanding, instructing.

5 mazer drinking cup or goblet.

6 Proverb, "Time stays for no man" (Tilley T334).

7 carouse a cupful drunk "all out"; a toast.

8 Phoebus i.e., the sun, after Phoebus Apollo, the sun god.

9 Marry exclamation, "certainly, indeed, to be sure."

10 hooks shepherds' staffs.

11 hied hastened.

12 forepoint ordain; pricketh writes; period conclusion.

13 sticklers agents, instigators (as the stars affect the behaviours and dispositions of human beings).

14 augurism i.e., "augury": the practice of divining or predicting the future from a set of signs, portents, or omens, such as the flight of birds, the entrails of sacrificed animals, etc.

15 or the divines' dooms principles i.e., or the judgements of learned clerics [be] principles.

16 Proverb, "More words than one go to a bargain" (Tilley W819).

"I take all things well," quoth she, "that is your content, and am glad Rosader is yours, for now I hope your thoughts will be at quiet, your eye that ever looked at love will now lend a glance on your lambs, and then they will prove more buxom and you more blithe, for the eyes of the master feeds the cattle."

As thus they were in chat, they spied old Corydon where he came plodding to meet them, who told them supper was ready, which news made them speed them home.

[Rosader comes across Saladine sleeping in the forest, with a lion waiting nearby to devour him if he stirs. After some internal debate, Rosader determines to save his brother from the lion, which he does although he is wounded in the fight. Not recognizing Rosader, Saladine reveals to him his deep repentance over how he has treated his younger brother. Rosader reveals himself, the brothers are perfectly reconciled, and Rosader introduces his brother to Gerismond and his band. A few days later, Rosader goes to visit Aliena and Ganymede, and while he is talking with them, some bandits try to carry off Aliena and Ganymede. Rosader fights valiantly, but there are too many of them, and he is seriously wounded. Saladine arrives and renews the fight and with the help of Rosader kills some and drives off the rest. Aliena and Saladine fall in love at first sight. While Rosader is recovering, Lodge returns to characters introduced earlier: Montanus and Phoebe. When Corydon arranges for Aliena and Ganymede to witness a lyric exchange between Montanus and Phoebe (where Phoebe rejects Montanus' love), Ganymede is so incensed by Phoebe's careless cruelty that he scolds her. Phoebe falls in love with Ganymede at first sight, and soon sends him a letter to this effect. Plotting how to get the love of Phoebe for Montanus, Ganymede and Aliena hit upon a plan, and Ganymede goes to visit Phoebe.]

Phoebe looking as lovely as Venus in her night-gear, tainting her face with as ruddy a blush as Clytia[1] did when she bewrayed her loves to Phoebus, taking Ganymede by the hand began thus:

"Fair shepherd, if love were not more strong than nature, or fancy the sharpest extreme, my immodesty were the more and my virtues the less, for nature hath framed women's eyes bashful, their hearts full of fear, and their tongues full of silence. But love, that imperious love, where his power is predominant, then he perverts all and wresteth the wealth of nature to his own will: an instance in myself, fair Ganymede, for such a fire hath he kindled in my thoughts that to find ease for the flame, I was forced to pass the bounds of modesty and seek a salve at thy hands for my secret harms. Blame me not if I be overbold, for it is thy beauty, and if I be too forward, it is fancy and the deep insight into thy virtues that makes me thus fond.[2] For let me say in a word what may be contained in a volume: Phoebe loves Ganymede."

At this she held down her head and wept, and Ganymede rose, as one that would suffer no fish to hang on his fingers,[3] made this reply:

"Water not thy plants, Phoebe, for I do pity thy plaints, nor seek not to discover thy loves in tears, for I conjecture thy truth by thy passions. Sorrow is no salve for loves, nor sighs no remedy for affection. Therefore frolic, Phoebe, for if Ganymede can cure thee, doubt not of recovery. Yet this let me say without offence, that it grieves me to thwart Montanus in his fancies, seeing his desires have been so resolute and his thoughts so loyal. But thou allegest that thou art forced from

[1] Clytia In Greek mythology, her unrequited love for Phoebus Apollo, the sun god, led her to reveal Apollo's relationship with Leucothoe. Leucothoe's father, Orchamus, responded to this revelation by burying his daughter alive. Grief-stricken, Apollo avoided Clytia entirely, and after a long fast during which she did nothing but watch the sun travel through the sky, she was transformed into a flower (like the violet) which always turns its face towards the sun.

[2] fond overly affectionate, doting.

[3] The proverb "to find fish on one's fingers" (Tilley F326) means "to have plenty of occupation." Thus, here, Lodge means that Ganymede wants to deal as quickly as possible with this unpleasant set of circumstances.

him by fate; so I tell thee, Phoebe, either some star or else some destiny fits my mind rather with Adonis to die in chase than be counted a wanton on Venus' knee. Although I pity thy martyrdom, yet I can grant no marriage, for though I held thee fair yet mine eye is not fettered. Love grows not, like the herb spattana,[1] to his perfection in one night, but creeps with the snail and yet at last attains to the top. Festina lente,[2] especially in love, for momentary fancies are ofttimes the fruits of follies. If, Phoebe, I should like thee as the Hyperborei[3] do their dates, which banquet with them in the morning and throw them away at night, my folly should be great and thy repentance more. Therefore, I will have time to turn my thoughts, and my loves shall grow up as the watercresses, slowly but with a deep root. Thus, Phoebe, thou mayst see I disdain not though I desire not, remaining indifferent till time and love makes me resolute. Therefore, Phoebe, seek not to suppress affection, and with the love of Montanus quench the remembrance of Ganymede. Strive thou to hate me as I seek to like of thee, and ever have the duties of Montanus in thy mind, for I promise thee thou mayst have one more wealthy but not more loyal."

These words were corrosives to the perplexed Phoebe, that, sobbing out sighs and straining out tears she blubbered out these words:

"And shall I, then, have no salve of Ganymede but suspense? No hope but a doubtful hazard? No comfort but be posted off[4] to the will of time? Justly have the gods balanced my fortunes, who, being cruel to Montanus, found Ganymede as unkind to myself; so in forcing him perish for love, I shall die myself with overmuch love."

"I am glad," quoth Ganymede, "you look into your own faults and see where your shoe wrings you, measuring now the pains of Montanus by your own passions."

"Truth," quoth Phoebe, "and so deeply I repent me of my frowardness toward the shepherd that could I cease to love Ganymede, I would resolve to like Montanus."

"What, if I can with reason persuade Phoebe to mislike of Ganymede, will she then favour Montanus?"

"When reason," quoth she, "doth quench that love that I owe to thee, then will I fancy him, conditionally, that if my love can be suppressed with no reason, as being without reason, Ganymede will only wed himself to Phoebe."

"I grant it, fair shepherdess," quoth he, "and to feed thee with the sweetness of hope, this resolve on: I will never marry myself to woman but unto thyself."

And with that Ganymede gave Phoebe a fruitless kiss and such words of comfort that, before Ganymede departed, she arose out of her bed and made him and Montanus such cheer as could be found in such a country cottage—Ganymede in the midst of their banquet rehearsing the promises of either in Montanus' favour, which highly pleased the shepherd. Thus all three content and soothed up in hope, Ganymede took his leave of his Phoebe and departed, leaving her a contented woman, and Montanus highly pleased.

[Aliena and Saladine decide to marry, and at the pre-marriage festivities, Montanus arrives and reveals his love of Phoebe to Gerismond, who is impressed both by the shepherd's poetic skill and his passion. Learning of Phoebe's cruelty to Montanus and her love for Ganymede, Gerismond agrees to arbitrate this love controversy, and when he asks Ganymede to first present his argument, Ganymede asks leave to withdraw. When he returns, he has put on women's clothing and appears as Rosalind.]

In went Ganymede and dressed herself in woman's attire, having on a gown of green with

---

[1] spattana perhaps "sputania," a herb mentioned by Robert Greene which appears to have two properties: it can make one half lunatic or it can cause constipation (OED, "sputania").

[2] Latin, "Make haste slowly" (Tilley H192).

[3] Hyperborei a mythic race who were thought to live in the far northern reaches of Europe and Asia; extremely long-lived, they also enjoyed a perfect and felicitous life together.

[4] posted off handed over to, transferred over.

kirtle of rich sendal,[1] so quaint[2] that she seemed Diana triumphing in the forest. Upon her head she wore a chaplet of roses, which gave her such a grace that she looked like Flora perked[3] in the pride of all her flowers. Thus attired came Rosalind in and presented herself at her father's feet, with her eyes full of tears, craving his blessing and discoursing unto him all her fortunes—how she was banished by Torismond and how ever since she lived in that country disguised.

Gerismond, seeing his daughter, rose from his seat and fell upon her neck, uttering the passions of his joy in watery plaints, driven into such an ecstasy of content that he could not utter one word. At this sight, if Rosader was both amazed and joyful, I refer myself to the judgement of such as have experience in love, seeing his Rosalind before his face whom so long and deeply he had affected. At last, Gerismond recovered his spirits and in most fatherly terms entertained[4] his daughter Rosalind, after many questions demanding of her what had passed between her and Rosader.

"So much, sir," quoth she, "as there wants nothing but your grace to make up the marriage."

"Why then," quoth Gerismond, "Rosader take her, she is thine, and let this day solemnize both thy brother's and thy nuptials."

Rosader, beyond measure content, humbly thanked the King and embraced his Rosalind, who turning towards Phoebe, demanded if she had shown sufficient reason to suppress the force of her loves.

"Yea," quoth Phoebe, "and so great a persuasive that, please it you, madam, and Aliena to give us leave, Montanus and I will make this day the third couple in marriage."

She had no sooner spoke this word but Montanus threw away his garland of willow,[5] his bottle where was painted despair, and cast his sonnets in the fire, showing himself as frolic as Paris when he handselled[6] his love with Helena.

At this Gerismond and the rest smiled, and concluded that Montanus and Phoebe should keep their wedding with the two brethren. Aliena, seeing Saladine stand in a dump, to wake him from his dream began thus:

"Why, how now, my Saladine, all amort?[7] What melancholy, man, at the day of marriage? Perchance thou art sorrowful to think on thy brother's high fortunes and thine own base desires to choose so mean[8] a shepherdess? Cheer up thy heart, man, for this day thou shalt be married to the daughter of a king: for know, Saladine, I am not Aliena but Alinda, the daughter of thy mortal enemy Torismond."

At this all the company was amazed, especially Gerismond, who, rising up, took Alinda in his arms and said to Rosalind:

"Is this that fair Alinda, famous for so many virtues, that forsook her father's court to live with thee exiled in the country?"

"The same," quoth Rosalind.

"Then," quoth Gerismond, turning to Saladine, "jolly forester, be frolic, for thy fortunes are great and thy desires excellent. Thou hast got a princess as famous for her perfection as exceeding in proportion."

"And she hath with her beauty won," quoth Saladine, "an humble servant as full of faith as she of amiable favour."

While everyone was amazed with these comical events,[9] Corydon came skipping in and told them that the priest was at church and tarried for their coming. With that, Gerismond led the way and the rest followed, where to the admiration of all the country swains in Arden their marriages were solemnly solemnized. As soon as the priest had finished, home they went with Alinda, where Corydon had made all things in readiness. Dinner

---

1 kirtle a skirt or outer petticoat; sendal a thin, rich silken material.

2 quaint beautiful, fine.

3 perked made spruce or smart; trimmed.

4 entertained discoursed with.

5 The willow is traditionally associated with grief and death caused by unrequited love. See Othello, 4.3.43-60.

6 handselled ceremoniously solemnized.

7 all amort completely dejected or spiritless.

8 mean inferior in rank, degree, or status.

9 comical events i.e., events typical of the conclusion of a comedy; happy or fortunate events (as opposed to tragical).

was provided, and—the tables being spread, and the brides set down by Gerismond—Rosader, Saladine and Montanus that day were servitors. Homely cheer[1] they had, such as their country could afford, but to mend their fare they had mickle[2] good chat and many discourses of their loves and fortunes. About mid-dinner, to make them merry, Corydon came in with an old crowd[3] and played them a fit of mirth, to which he sung this pleasant song:

Corydon's Song.

A blithe and bonny country lass,
heigh-ho, the bonny lass,
Sat sighing on the tender grass and weeping said, "Will none come woo me?"
A smicker boy, a lither[4] swain,
heigh-ho, a smicker swain,
That in his love was wanton fain,
with smiling looks straight came unto her.

Whenas the wanton wench espied,
heigh-ho, when she espied,
The means to make herself a bride,
she simpered smooth like Bonnybell.[5]
The swain that saw her squint-eyed kind,
heigh-ho, so squint-eyed kind,
His arms about her body twined,
and said, "Fair lass, how fare ye, well?"

The country kit[6] said, "Well, forsooth,
heigh-ho, well, forsooth,
But that I have a longing tooth,[7]
a longing tooth that makes me cry."
"Alas," said he, "what gars[8] thy grief?
heigh-ho, what gars thy grief?"
"A wound," quoth she, "without relief,
I fear a maid that I shall die."

"If that be all," the shepherd said,
"heigh ho," the shepherd said.
"I'll make thee wive it, gentle maid,
And so recure thy malady."
Hereon they kissed with many a oath,
heigh-ho, with many a oath,
And 'fore god Pan did plight their troth,[9]
and to the church they hied them fast.

And God send every pretty peat,
heigh-ho, the pretty peat,[10]
That fears to die of this conceit,[11]
so kind a friend to help at last.

Corydon having thus made them merry, as they were in the midst of all their jollity, word was brought in to Saladine and Rosader that a brother of theirs, one Fernandine, was arrived and desired to speak with them. Gerismond, overhearing this news, demanded who it was.

"It is, sir," quoth Rosader, "our middle brother that lives a scholar in Paris; but what fortune hath driven him to seek us out I know not."

With that, Saladine went and met his brother, whom he welcomed with all courtesy, and Rosader gave him no less friendly entertainment. Brought he was by his two brothers into the parlour where they all sat at dinner. Fernandine, as one that knew as

[1] Homely cheer simple, plain, or rustic food.

[2] mickle much.

[3] crowd an early form of the fiddle.

[4] smicker handsome; lither agile, nimble (both of these words also have negative connotations, although "lither" more so than "smicker").

[5] Bonnybell In the August eclogue of Spenser's Shepheardes Calender, Bonibell is the name of a beautiful shepherdess whose glance wounds the shepherd Perigot to the heart (l. 62). Perigot and Wilye's singing match focuses on her and the effects of love. Lodge imitates certain aspects of this song, especially the refrain.

[6] kit abbreviated form of "kitten" (or the short form of Katherine, Kate); a kit is also a "light woman, a wanton."

[7] longing tooth Proverb, "to have a sweet (wanton) tooth" (Tilley T420).

[8] gars causes, occasions.

[9] Pan God of shepherds and of all inhabitants of the country, Pan is often associated with fertility and marriage; plight their troth pledge themselves in marriage.

[10] peat term of endearment for a woman or girl, although it has various shades of meaning: it means simply "girl," but also "light or merry girl" as well as "fondled or spoiled girl," etc.

[11] conceit thought, conception, fancy.

many manners as he could[1] points of sophistry and was as well brought up as well lettered, saluted them all. But when he espied Gerismond, kneeling on his knee he did him what reverence belonged to his estate and with that burst forth into these speeches:

"Although, right mighty Prince, this day of my brothers' marriage be a day of mirth, yet time craves another course, and therefore from dainty cates rise to sharp weapons. And you, the sons of Sir John of Bordeaux, leave off your amours and fall to arms; change your loves into lances, and now this day show yourselves as valiant as hitherto you have been passionate. For know, Gerismond, that hard by[2] the edge of this forest the twelve peers of France are up in arms to recover thy right, and Torismond, trooped with a crew of desperate renegades, is ready to bid them battle. The armies are ready to join; therefore show thyself in the field to encourage thy subjects. And you, Saladine and Rosader, mount you and show yourselves as hardy soldiers as you have been hearty lovers. So shall you for the benefit of your country discover the idea of your father's virtues to be stamped in your thoughts, and prove children worthy of so honourable a parent."

At this alarum given by Fernandine, Gerismond leapt from the board, and Saladine and Rosader betook themselves to their weapons.

"Nay," quoth Gerismond, "go with me. I have horse and armour for us all, and then, being well mounted, let us show that we carry revenge and honour at our falchions'[3] points."

Thus they leave the brides full of sorrow, especially Alinda, who desired Gerismond to be good to her father. He, not returning a word because his haste was great, hied him home to his lodge, where he delivered Saladine and Rosader horse and armour and, himself armed, royally led the way, not having ridden two leagues before they discovered where in a valley both the battles were joined. Gerismond, seeing the wing[4] wherein the peers fought, thrust in there and cried "Saint Denis!," Gerismond laying on such load upon his enemies that he showed how highly he did estimate of a crown. When the peers perceived that their lawful king was there, they grew more eager; and Saladine and Rosader so behaved themselves that none durst stand in their way nor abide the fury of their weapons. To be short, the peers were conquerors, Torismond's army put to flight, and himself slain in battle. The peers then gathered themselves together and, saluting their king, conducted him royally into Paris, where he was received with great joy of all the citizens.

As soon as all was quiet and he had received again the crown, he sent for Alinda and Rosalind to the court, Alinda being very passionate for the death of her father, yet brooking it with the more patience in that she was contented with the welfare of her Saladine. Well, as soon as they were come to Paris, Gerismond made a royal feast for the peers and lords of his land which continued thirty days, in which time, summoning a parliament, by the consent of his nobles he created Rosader heir-apparent to the kingdom; he restored Saladine to all his father's land and gave him the dukedom of Nameurs; he made Fernandine principal secretary to himself; and that fortune might every way seem frolic, he made Montanus lord over all the forest of Arden, Adam Spencer captain of the King's guard, and Corydon master of Alinda's flocks.

Here, gentlemen, may you see in Euphues' Golden Legacy that such as neglect their fathers' precepts incur much prejudice; that division in nature as it is a blemish in nurture so 'tis a breach of good fortunes; that virtue is not measured by birth but by action; that younger brethren, though inferior in years, yet may be superior to honours; that concord is the sweetest conclusion, and amity betwixt brothers more forcible[5] than fortune. If you gather any fruits by this legacy, speak well of Euphues for writing it and me for fetching it. If you grace me with that favour, you encourage me

[1] could had learned, had knowledge of.

[2] hard by close by, very nearby.

[3] falchions swords.

[4] wing one of the two divisions on each side of the main body or centre of an army.

[5] forcible strong, powerful.

to be more forward, and as soon as I have overlooked my labours, expect The Sailor's Calendar.[1]

T. Lodge.

Finis.

—1590

from A Fig for Momus: Containing Pleasant Variety, Included in Satires, Eclogues, and Epistles.[2]

[...]

To the Gentlemen Readers Whatsoever.

Gentlemen, I know you wonder that having so long time kept silence I salute the world with so peremptory a title, but if thou consider the reasons before you enter into mislike, you shall be satisfied and I excused.

I entitle my book A Fig for Momus[3] not in contempt of the learned, for I honour them; not in disdain of the well-minded, because they cherish science; but in despite of the detractor, who having no learning to judge, wanteth no liberty to reprove.

Who worthily deserving the name of Momus shall rather at my hands have a fig to choke him, than he and his lewd tongue shall have a frump to check[4] me. Sheep are soonest worried by curdogs, because they are mild; but he that nips him soundly that bites him cowardly purchaseth his own peace and escapes much peril.

Heraclitus entitling one of his books with Ponou Encomion, "the praise of labour," King Ptolemy (causing all the copies to be bought) commanded the first letter of Ponou to be put out, and called the book Onou Encomion, "the praise of the ass." But had Heraclitus begun with Ptolemy, and touched him with cowardly flight from Demetrius, with effeminate vanity in apparel, with exceeding gluttony and drunkenness, with his lechery with Agathoclea and bawdry with Oenante, the King would rather have given a talent to stop his mouth than devised (by taking away of a letter) to abuse his title.[5] Where detraction is given to challenge, it is good striking first, for whelps that are whipped for brawling are quickly quiet.

This cause, gentlemen, hath drawn me to use this title, and under this title I have thought good to include satires, eclogues, and epistles:[6] first, by reason that I study to delight with variety; next, because I would write in that form wherein no man might challenge me with servile imitation (wherewith heretofore I have been unjustly taxed[7]). My satires (to speak truth) are by pleasures rather placed here to prepare and try[8] the ear than to feed it: because if they pass well, the whole centon[9] of them, already in my hands, shall suddenly be published.

In them (under the names of certain Romans) where I reprehend vice, I purposely wrong no man, but observe the laws of that kind of poem. If any repine thereat, I am sure he is guilty, because he bewrayeth himself. For my eclogues, I commend them to men of approved judgement, whose margins though I fill not with quotations, yet their matter and handling will show my diligence.[10] For my epistles, they are in that kind wherein no Englishman of our time hath publically written, which if they please, may draw on more, if displease, have their privilege by authority. Briefly, I have so written as I have read; so read

---

[1] The Sailor's Calendar if Lodge actually wrote and published such a work, it has not survived.

[2] The title page contains the Italian proverb Che pecora si fa, il lupo selo mangia ("Those who make themselves sheep will be eaten by the wolf").

[3] Momus Greek god of ridicule and severe, excessive censure; Momus was banished from heaven when he criticized the other gods, and thus his name has come to mean more generally, a fault-finder or unreasonably severe critic.

[4] frump mocking speech; jeer; check taunt, revile, reproach; perhaps also, to stop suddenly or sharply.

[5] The Ptolemy referred to is Ptolemy IV; he lusted after the court musician Agathoclea and she became his mistress; Oenante seems to have been his bawd or pimp.

[6] Lodge is the first English writer to have published satires in imitation of ancient Roman models, and the first to have written verse epistles also in imitation of earlier Roman writers.

[7] taxed censured, reproved; accused, charged.

[8] try test.

[9] centon Latin, centum: 100.

[10] Poetry and prose were often published with informative marginalia, indicating the sources of particular ideas, figures of speech, philosophical concepts, etc.

as I can judge. In which respect, if any man doubt, let him ask and I will resolve him; if any man reprove, let him look to it, I will nip[1] him. For as I am ready to satisfy the reasonable, so I have a gird[2] in store for a railer. Finally, gentlemen, as Prometheus after he had formed his image of earth presented it to the sun;[3] and Ops[4] when she had brought forth Jupiter (for fear lest he should be devoured by time, figured in Saturn) gave him in keeping to the Cureti; so I present this frail image of my art to take life and light from the sun of your approved judgements, and, desirous to commend this infant of my wit to immortality and defend it from the assaults of time and envy, commit and submit it to your protection, the true Cureti of all cunning; who, accepting these fragments in good worth, shall shortly receive from me, matters both worthy regard and reading.

Vale[5] 6. of May 1595.

Yours as you use him,
T.L.

[...]

To His Mistress A.L.: Epistle 3.[6]

In that same month wherein the spring begins
And on that day when Phoebe left the twins[7]
(Which was on Saturday, the twelfth of March),
Your servant brought a letter sealed with starch,
Which by my soul (sweet mistress) when I op'ed[8]
And read your motion[9] far from that I hoped,
Believe me (had not troubles tired me quite)
Might be enough to make me laugh outright.
You pray me to advise and tell you what
Will take away your pursiness[10] and fat.
You pray me without any let[11] or pause
To write of both the remedy and cause,
And in a short discourse to let you know
The antidote of that mislikes you so.
Well, since your beauty may and must command,
Thus briefly will I answer your demand:
Fatness (connatural[12] to sick and whole
Which nearest under-dwell the northern pole)
In those by nature who enjoy the same
Is passable,[13] not prejudized by blame.
That other grown by surfeit and excess,
That chokes the vital powers with heaviness,
Is that (fair mistress) which you ought to fly
And that which physic's art may remedy.
Fatness by nature (not immoderate)
Kills not the wit, quells not the mind's estate;[14]
But fatness by intemperance increased,
(When living man resembleth loathsome beast,
And belly-cheer[15] with greedy gluttony
Is held the fulness of felicity):
This maketh men addicted to the same,
Dull in conceit,[16] gross-minded, worthy blame.
Of such do Basil, Galen, Plato[17] write

---

1 look to it beware, be careful; nip rebuke sharply.

2 gird sharp blow or stroke.

3 In some accounts, Prometheus, a semi-divine figure, fashioned the first man and woman out of clay and brought them to life by means of the fire he stole from the chariot of the sun.

4 Ops Also known as Rhea, Ops is the daughter of Coelus ("heaven") and Terra ("earth"); married to Saturn, Ops was the mother of the central classical deities (e.g., Vesta, Ceres, Juno, Pluto, Neptune, etc.); fearful for the security of his heavenly throne, Saturn swallowed each of his children in turn as it was born. As a result, Ops fled to Crete, gave birth to Jupiter, and left him in the care of the local people, the Cureti. Jupiter finally drove his father from the throne and became king of the gods. For Saturn's allegorical representation, see Fulgentius the Mythographer, trans. L.G. Whitbread (Ohio, 1971), pp. 49-50.

5 Vale Latin, "farewell."

6 In the first edition, this is misnumbered as epistle 6.

7 Phoebe left the twins a reference to the astrological relationship between the moon and the constellation known as "the Twins."

8 op'ed opened.

9 motion proposal, suggestion; bidding.

10 pursiness short-windedness, breathlessness.

11 let hesitation.

12 connatural innate, natural (to living beings).

13 passable tolerable, fairly good or acceptable.

14 estate state or condition.

15 belly-cheer feasting, gluttony; luxurious eating.

16 conceit apprehension, understanding.

17 Basil St Basil of Caesarea (Basil the Great) (330-379 CE), bishop and proponent of asceticism and charity; several of his works focus on famine, poverty, and the sin of gluttony; Galen Galen of Pergamum (c. 129-?199/216 CE), Graeco-Roman physician, anatomist, and medical writer; the author of more than 350 works (with many more attributed to him), Galen was enormously influential in Renaissance medicine, philosophy, and natural science. His medical writings formed the theoretical and diagnostic basis of medieval and Renaissance medicine; Plato (c. 429-347 BCE), Greek philosopher.

"That fattest belly hath the weakest sprite."
For reason (only made for man's behoof)[1]
Affords hereof this true and certain proof:
Therefore are lawless belly-gods by kind[2]
Defect in understanding and in mind,
Because gross blood by their disordered seed
And swift concoction plenteously doth breed;
And by this blood, gross spirits from their hearts
Ascend and seize upon their upperparts;
And from these spirits, spirits of the brain
A dead and loathsome dullness do retain;
Through which it comes that they wax stark and slow,
Because their spirits animal be so.[3]
That fatness, then, engendered and engrost[4]
By riot, surfeit, belly cheer and cost
Is hateful. And that fatness nature breeds
From good complexion orderly proceeds.
Which praised, because approved, methinks I hear
A saint, sweet like yourself, harked in mine ear,
And with a maiden blush entreat me tell
Why fatness most doth in the belly dwell,
Whereas the head (the master part of all)
Is fleshless, slender, pretty, round, and small?
To this, this answer, mistress, do I make:
The belly therefore fatness doth partake,
Because it keeps the matter of our meat,
And still contains our fatness-breeding heat;[5]
But for the head, it therefore is not charged[6]
With fat, or flesh, or by such like enlarged,
Because the heavenly workman did provide
That such a part which is the body's guide,
And is the seat where sovereign-like remains
That reasonable power the soul contains,
Should not by flesh be soiled or overset,[7]
For fear the works of reason should be let.[8]
This problem plainly opened to the eye,
It followeth thus of fatness orderly:
It vitiates beauty, makes a barren womb,
Because the blood which sperma should become[9]
Is wholly turned to fat; it hast'neth age
And holds our appetites in vassalage.
It hinders blood, and short'neth breathing too,
And maketh all things tedious that we do.
It causeth sownings,[10] passions of the heart,
It makes the pulses in their places start.
Briefly, (if Avicen[11] speak not amiss)
Grossness the body's loathsome fetter is.
The self opinion old Pythagoras[12]
Maintained: who seeing once a fat man pass,
Said thus to them that did attend him then,
"A loathsome prison doth yond spirit pen."
This Plato knowing well, and waxing gross,[13]
Chose out a shady wood and fruitful close,[14]
Where walking, he his scholars taught and trained,
Which all his followers afterward maintained.
A world it were to reckon up and write
How all those old philosophers do fight,
Contend, debate, decide, dispute, entreat,
Whether this fatness come from cold or heat.
But to be short, the synod[15] and the sect

[1] behoof benefit.

[2] kind nature; natural inclination.

[3] Because gross blood … spirits animal be so For a full explanation of the physiology referred to in lines 39-46, see Appendix, at the end of this entry.

[4] engrost engrossed (rhymes with "cost"); to render gross, dense, or bulky (to render fluids gross or dense).

[5] The belly … heat Classical and Renaissance physiology saw heat as an essential physiological force, aiding, for example, in digestion. As Lodge notes below, there was disagreement among philosophers about whether fatness resulted from the body's heat or coldness. See p. 994, note 2, and Appendix.

[6] charged burdened.

[7] overset overwhelmed, overcome.

[8] let hindered, obstructed.

[9] On the relationship between blood and sperm (semen or seed), see p. 995. Both men and women were thought to produce semen (or seed), although woman's seed was thought to be less highly refined, and thus thicker, more viscous, and less physiologically perfect than man's.

[10] sownings swoonings, fainting fits.

[11] Avicen Avicenna (Ibn Sina, d. 1037 CE), Arab physician and author of more than 250 medical works, the most important of which, his Canon of Medicine (or Al-Qanun fi l-tibb) reinterpreted and contextualized Galenic medicine in terms of Aristotelian philosophy.

[12] self same; Pythagoras (fl. c. 530 BCE), Greek philosopher dedicated to the value and practice of abstinence and asceticism.

[13] waxing gross growing fat or corpulent.

[14] close perhaps a field or courtyard.

[15] synod an assembly, convention, or council.

Of those who rightly nature's works respect
Conclude that by a double sort of heat
Our fat is made, and moult, and so concreate.[1]
Excessive heat dissolves, the mean makes hard;
Heat in excess, as deeper read, award
Is that same heat which doth engender fat.
Heat moderate is rightly counted that
Which Galen termeth cold.[2] By this decree
Two mighty factions thus accorded be.
Well since these proofs the causes do assure,
Let us debate a little on the cure.
Much sitting, and long abstinence from care,
Drinking of oily wines, our fat prepare.
Eggs, whitemeat, pottage[3] do increase the same,
And bring the waxing body out of frame.
Let therefore fat men grown by gluttony
(For to the rest no med'cine I apply)
Open a vein; or if that seem too sore,[4]
Use cuppings and oft rubbings[5] evermore.
Live in that air which is both hot and dry.
Watch much, and sleeping little, hardly[6] lie.
Walk much, and toss, and tumble in the sun;
Delight to ride, to hawk, to hunt, to run.
Drink little, gargarize, fly grosser food,[7]
Or if some deem a hare or partridge good,
Feed modestly thereon, and if he hath
Some crowns to spend, go often to the bath.[8]
Not Aesculapius,[9] were he now alive,
Could better helps or remedies contrive,
Except beholding mighty Groedoes' port,
He cut off both his legs to make him short.
Whither am I transported in discourse?
My Muse methinks hath run too long a course.
The question is resolved; why fail I then
To seal this letter up and leave my pen?
Faith, nought but this in kindness to desire
(My genius of good wit) sure I require,
To count her fatness no deformity,
But as it is the guise[10] in Italy,
To nourish that: for fat, slick, fair, and full
Is better liked than lean, lank, spare, and dull.

—1595

Appendix: Physiology in Lodge's "To His Mistress A.L.: Epistle 3," lines 39-46

Lodge describes the consequences of gluttony and the body's resultant corpulence in the physiological terminology common in classical, medieval, and Renaissance medical texts; these medical traditions were unaware of the circulation of the blood. Blood was understood to be both a

[1] moult melting; concreate congealed, made solid.

[2] by a double sort of heat … Galen termeth cold In lines 95-101, Lodge indicates that later philosophers tried to accommodate the opposed opinions of Galen and Aristotle, the two pillars of Renaissance medicine: Galen believed that fatness was a result of excessive cold (the dominance of cold humours) in the body, while Aristotle believed that it was the result of excessive heat. Modern-day theorists, Lodge states, agree with Aristotle that excessive heat dissolves fat (in the stomach) and in a later stage moderate heat ("mean" heat) congeals it into a bodily solid; they (those who read more closely or "deeper") judge that ("award") Aristotle's "heat in excess" is the same heat that creates fat, while "heat moderate" is equivalent to that quality which Galen calls "cold." As a result, for some early modern philosophers, in their attempts to rationalize Galenic and Aristotelean physiology, fatness results both from the qualities of excessive heat and cold.

[3] whitemeat foods prepared from milk; dairy products (sometimes including eggs); pottage a thick soup or stew, often made with vegetables and meat.

[4] Open a vein i.e., be medicinally bled; judicious bleeding or venesection was a common medical treatment for a variety of disorders thought to originate in the imbalance of the bodily humours. Since fatness from gluttony was generally agreed to result from the creation of excessive blood, and the corruption thereof, bleeding was a logical medical treatment for this condition; sore serious, extreme (a measure).

[5] cuppings Cupping was a method of venesection or medicinal blood-letting which involved applying a hot "cup" or "cupping-glass" to the skin, producing scarifying of the area and bleeding; rubbings massages, which along with diet and exercise were thought effective in maintaining one's health.

[6] watch keep awake intentionally; hardly uncomfortably.

[7] gargarize gargle; fly grosser food avoid food which is dense, thick, or coarse: also, food which engenders gross or thick bodily humours.

[8] bath Curative wells and public baths have long been part of Western medical treatment, from the recommendation and practice of early Greek and Roman physicians, such as Asclepiades, to the English participation in bathing at the sites of curative wells, such as those in Barnet that attracted large crowds in the seventeenth century, to the public curative baths, accessible for a fee, such as that in Endell Street, London (P. Ackroyd, London: The Biography [London, 2001], p. 670).

[9] Aesculapius son of Apollo and Coronis, the Greek god of medicine.

[10] guise habit, customary practice.

bodily fluid and a humour. There were four humours or governing fluids in the body: blood, phlegm, choler, and melancholy or black choler. A person's dominant temperament, constitutional or habitual disposition, or mental and emotional tendencies was thought to spring from the mixture, relative balance, and interaction between the humours. A relatively good balance between these various fluids was essential to sound mental, emotional, and physical health; gluttony was only one of a number of things which could upset this balance.

Blood (both the liquid and the humour) was thought to be created through the ingestion of food and drink. The process of concoction (digestion) had three stages: first, food and drink were transformed into a substance called chyle, which in the second stage was then refined through the action of the liver into blood and the other humours. In this second stage, another important classical and Renaissance medical concept comes into play: the spirits, those highly refined substances, fluids, or more vaguely "powers" (classified as natural, animal, and vital) that permeated the blood and chief organs of the body. Natural spirits were seated in the liver and were thought to govern reproduction, nutrition, digestion, and growth; animal spirits were seated in what we would now call the nervous system (including the brain) and governed thought, sensation, and motion; the vital spirits were perhaps the most important, since they were seated in the heart and thus governed the very force or principle of life itself. One's heartbeat and pulse depended on the vital spirits.

Thus, this three-stage process involving the blood was essentially one of purification, and this medical tradition classified the different humours in terms of the quality of the blood they contained. The most refined blood was venous blood. It was thinner, hotter, and redder than grosser blood, and when it flowed into the heart it brought with it the "natural spirits" which it had been given in the purification process. This venous blood entered the heart and received there an infusion of the "vital spirits," which were then conveyed out of the heart to animate the rest of the body. In the third and final stage, blood itself was transformed (in the spermatical vessels) into its most highly refined product, semen (in Renaissance medical texts called "seed," which both and women were thought to produce).

Those given to gluttony took in the necessary materials (food and drink) to produce blood; however, by taking in too much food and drink, the body produced a great deal of corrupted ("gross") blood. Not only was this blood insufficiently refined, there was simply too much of it to be "used up" by the body. In the glutton's case, their blood was corrupted because it was over-produced and under-refined through speedy digestion ("swift concoction"), and thus a glutton's semen would also be corrupt ("disordered"), since semen was thought to be the most highly refined transformation of blood. Because the glutton's blood—which ascended upwards from the stomach to the heart—was insufficiently refined, it carried with it in turn corrupted spirits; these spirits, the heart passed on to the rest of the body, and they ascended upwards to infect the spirits of the brain (the animal spirits). The result was a mental slowness ("a dead and loathsome dullness"), as well as a resultant physical rigidity, inflexibility, or incapacity of movement ("stark[ness]"). In short, lack of dietary moderation could disrupt the entire body's physiological and psychological balance.

As Lodge goes on to state, "fatness" could also be a person's natural condition, arising from "good complexion"; that is, fatness could be the result of a good bodily habit or constitution, arising from a person's own particular balance of the four humours. However, even "natural" fatness ("fatness orderly"), Lodge argues later, is to be avoided because it still has bad effects on the body as a whole.

For a fuller description of Renaissance physiology, see N.G. Siraisi, Medieval and Early Renaissance Medicine: An Introduction to Knowledge and Practice (Chicago, 1990), especially chapter 4; and G.K. Paster, The Body Embarrassed: Drama and the Disciplines of Shame in Early Modern England (Ithaca, NY, 1993), especially chapter 2.

Robert Greene
1558-1592

Born in Norwich and educated at St John's College (Cambridge) and Oxford University (MA, 1588), Robert Greene's early life and family connections are obscure. He may have been the son of a Norwich saddler or innkeeper, and he probably attended the grammar school at Norwich before moving on to university; he certainly became a member of that unofficial group of highly educated writers who began to turn out works for the burgeoning public press: the "University Wits." His autobiographical pamphlets—Never Too Late (1590), Greene's Groatsworth of Wit, Bought with a Million of Repentance (1592; attributed to Greene, but probably the work of its "editor," Henry Chettle), and The Repentance of Robert Greene (1592)—represent his life partly as moral tale, partly as romance.

According to his own accounts, Greene was a sexually dissolute young man, who surrounded himself with an equally disreputable crew. He travelled extensively, and finally married a respectable woman. His wife attempted to reform her husband, but he admits that after they had a child together and he had spent all of her dowry, he abandoned her. Making his way to London, he began writing for the stage: Friar Bacon and Friar Bungay (1589) is perhaps the most famous of his dramatic works, anticipating many of the aspects of Shakespearean pastoral comedy. Living with a prostitute who bore him a son, Fortunatus, Greene also engaged in sometimes rancorous relationships with other playwrights, writers, and players. According to Gabriel Harvey, Greene died "after a surfeit of pickled herring and Rhennish wine," in ignominious and impoverished circumstances.

How much of Greene's own account of himself is fact and how much fiction remains a matter of some critical debate. What is certain is that Greene's construction of his life and death in these pamphlets is partly what made him, in Newcombe's words, "England's first celebrity author, a role that he invented and others elaborated for him." His shifting authorial persona (based largely on the prodigal-son narrative), his popularity, his reporting of Elizabethan criminal life, and his apparent sexual adventuring created a reading public avid for a "true" account of Greene's life and death. Following his death, a series of works appeared which aimed at exploiting this voyeuristic appetite: Greene's Groatsworth of Wit (1592); Greene's Vision (1592); B.R.'s Greene's News Both from Heaven and Hell (1593; perhaps by Barnabe Rich); R.B.'s Greene's Funerals (1594; perhaps by Richard Barnfield); Samuel Rowlands' Greene's Ghost Haunting Cony-catchers (1624); and Henry Chettle's Kind-Heart's Dream (1592). B.R.'s Greene's News Both from Heaven and Hell presents Greene's journey to Heaven, where he is rejected for not having sufficiently exposed the vices of the rich and powerful, and his journey to Hell, where he is rejected for having too well exposed the vices of the criminal under-class (the subject of his many "cony-catching" pamphlets).

It seems appropriate that Greene should have sprouted fictional afterlives, since his autobiographical pamphlets may be almost as fictional. Apart from these pamphlets and his dramas, Greene wrote several accomplished prose romances: Pandosto, or The Triumph of Time (1588), a major source for Shakespeare's The Winter's Tale (1610), and Menaphon (1589) are his best known. He is also more and more widely read now for his "cony-catching" pamphlets, among which are A Notable Discovery of Cozenage (1591), The Black Book's Messenger (1591), and A Disputation between a He Cony-Catcher and a She Cony-Catcher (1592). These works, with their lively use of thieves' cant or slang, offer vivid representations of the criminal underworld of London.[1]

EDITIONS: A quip for an upstart courtier. London: Imprinted by John Wolfe, 1592. STC 12300 [British Library, Gen. Ref. 95 b.19.(1.)]; A disputation, between a hee conny-catcher, and a shee conny-catcher. London: Imprinted by A. I[effes] for T. G[ubbin], 1592. STC 12234; Greenes, groats-worth of witte, bought with a million of repentance. London: Imprinted [by J. Wolfe and J. Danter] for William Wright, 1592. STC 12245.

---

[1] Unless otherwise indicated, references in the footnotes to Greene's other works are to G.H.B. Harrison's editions for the Bodley Head Press (London, 1923). Special thanks to Drs. Michael Treschow (UBC-O, English) and Kenneth Philips (UBC-O, English) for their assistance with Greene's scriptural allusions.

from A Quip for an Upstart Courtier: Or, A Quaint Dispute between Velvet-breeches and Cloth-Breeches. Wherein Is Plainly Set Down the Disorders in All Estates and Trades.[1]

To the Right Worshipful Thomas Barnaby[2] Esquire, Robert Greene Wisheth Heart's Ease and Heaven's Bliss.

Sir, after I had ended this Quip for an Upstart Courtier,[3] containing a quaint[4] dispute between Cloth-breeches and Velvet-breeches, wherein under a dream I shadowed[5] the abuses that pride had bred in England, how it had infected the court with aspiring envy, the city with griping covetousness, and the country with contempt and disdain; how since men placed their delights in proud looks and brave[6] attire, hospitality was left off, neighbourhood[7] was exiled, conscience was scoffed at, and charity lay frozen in the streets; how upstart gentlemen for the maintenance of that their fathers never looked after[8] raised rents, racked their tenants,[9] and imposed great fines: I stood in a maze[10] to whom I should dedicate my labours, knowing I should be bitten by many sithens I had touched[11] many, and therefore need some worthy patron under whose wings I might shroud myself from Goodman Find-fault. At last I called to mind your Worship, and thought you the fittest of all my friends, both for the duty that I owe and the worshipful qualities you are endued withal, as also for that all Northamptonshire reports how you are a father of the poor, a supporter of ancient hospitality, an enemy to pride, and to be short a maintainer of Cloth-breeches (I mean of the old and worthy customs of the gentility and yeomanry[12] of England). Induced by these reasons, I humbly present this pamphlet to your Worship, only craving you will accept it as courteously as I present it dutifully, and then I have the end of my desire, and so resting in hope of your favourable acceptance, I humbly take my leave.

Your dutiful adopted son,
Robert Greene.

To the Gentlemen Readers: Health.

Gentle gentlemen, I hope Cloth-breeches shall find you gentle censors of this homely apology[13] of his ancient prerogatives, sith though he speaks against Velvet-breeches, which you were, yet he twits not the weed[14] but the vice, not the apparel when 'tis

---

[1] Quip was a very popular tract, receiving six editions in its year of publication; the most striking difference between the first and later editions is the removal of a section which satirized Greene's adversaries Gabriel Harvey and his brothers; Estates social ranks or classes. The copytext is the British Library copy (1592).

[2] Thomas Barnaby Greene's work Ciceronis Amor: Tully's Love (1589) has a commendatory poem by Burnaby (or Barnibe); Greene also dedicates his Never Too Late (1590) to Thomas Burnaby.

[3] Quip a sharp or sarcastic remark; Upstart Courtier an insulting term for someone who has newly risen in position or importance.

[4] quaint carefully or ingeniously elaborated.

[5] shadowed represented in an allegorical or symbolic way.

[6] brave splendid, showy.

[7] neighbourhood neighbourliness.

[8] I.e., for the maintenance of that rank and its accoutrements that their fathers never sought to obtain.

[9] racked their tenants oppressed their tenants through the burden of excessive rents.

[10] a maze a state of bewilderment.

[11] touched rebuked; perhaps, stung or nettled.

[12] gentility the gentry, that class or rank in sixteenth-century society comprised of gentlemen and gentlewomen, individuals above the common people, but below the peerage (nobility); yeomanry that class or rank in sixteenth-century society comprised of yeomen or small landed proprietors, usually freeholders under the rank of gentleman; hence, vaguely, a commoner or countryman of respectable standing, especially one who cultivates his own land. In Greene's play, Friar Bacon and Friar Bungay (1594), one of the characters exclaims: "I warrant you he's as yeomanly a man, as you shall see; mark you master, here's a plain honest man, without welt or garde." See p. 999, note 9, for "welt" and "garde."

[13] censors critics, judges; apology defence.

[14] twits cavils at, disparages; weed garment, dress.

worthily worn, but the unworthy person that wears it; who sprang of a peasant will use any sinister means to climb to preferment, being then so proud as the fop forgets like the ass that a mule was his father.[1] For ancient gentility and yeomanry, Cloth-breeches attempteth[2] this quarrel, and hopes of their favour. For upstarts he is half careless, and the more because he knows whatsoever some think privately, they will be no public carpers,[3] lest by kicking where they are touched, they bewray their gald[4] backs to the world; and by starting up to find fault prove themselves upstarts and fools. So then poor Cloth-breeches sets down his rest on the courtesy of gentle gentlemen and bold yeomen, that they will suffer[5] him to take no wrong. But suppose the worst, that he should be frowned at, and that such occupations as he hath upon conscience discarded from the jury should commence an action of unkindness against him;[6] he'll prove it not to hold plea,[7] because all the debate was but a dream. And so hoping all men will merrily take it, he stands solemnly leaning on his pike staff, till he hear what you conceive of him for being so peremptory. If well, he swears to crack his hose at the knees to quite[8] your courtesy. If hardly,[9] he hath vowed that whatsoever he dreams never to blab it again, and so he wisheth me humbly to bid you farewell.

[1] In Aesop's fable "The Mule," a proud mule fancies that her father is a race horse and that she has inherited his strength and speed. However, losing a race makes her acknowledge that her father was really just a mule. The moral is that in situations where one is showcased, one should always be mindful of one's origins, since the outcome of such situations is always uncertain.

[2] attempteth goes forth to engage in or have to do with.

[3] carpers fault-finders, cavillers, captious critics.

[4] bewray reveal; gald sore (from chafing or rubbing).

[5] suffer allow, permit.

[6] such occupations … against him a reference to the ensuing pamphlet, much of which concerns the narrator's attempts to compose a jury to hear the quarrel between Cloth-breeches and Velvet-breeches; the potential jurors represent many of the ranks and occupations in sixteenth-century society.

[7] he'll prove it not to hold plea i.e., he'll demonstrate that it (the jury) is unable to try this action at law, or does not have jurisdiction to do so.

[8] crack his hose at the knees to wear out the knees in his stockings in making formal obeisances, which involved crooking or bending the knees in a bow; quite requite, repay.

[9] hardly harshly, severely.

A Quip for an Upstart Courtier

It was just at that time when the cuckold's chorister began to bewray April-gentlemen[10] with his never changed notes, that I, damped with a melancholy humour, went into the fields to cheer up my wits with the fresh air; where solitary, seeking to solace myself, I fell in a dream, and in that drowsy slumber I wandered into a vale all tapestried with sweet and choice flowers. There grew many simples,[11] whose virtues taught men to be subtle, and to think nature by her weeds warned men to be wary and by their secret properties to check wanton and sensual imperfections.

[...]

As thus I walked forward, seeking up the hill, I was driven half into a maze with the imagination of a strange wonder which fell out thus: methought I saw an uncouth headless thing come pacing down the hill, stepping so proudly with such a geometrical grace as if some artificial braggart had resolved to measure the world with his paces. I could not descry[12] it to be a man, although it had motion, for that it wanted[13] a body, yet seeing legs and hose I supposed it to be some monster nourished up in those deserts. At last, as it drew more nigh[14] unto me, I might perceive that it was a very passing[15] costly pair of velvet breeches, whose panes, being made of the chiefest Neapolitan stuff,[16] was drawn over with the best Spanish satin, and [10] cuckold's chorister … April-gentlemen Traditionally the harbinger of spring, the cuckoo lays its eggs in other birds nests to be hatched and cared for by other birds; this practice and the word's aural and visual likeness to "cuckold" led to the bird's linkage with sexual deception. The April-gentlemen are those newly married husbands whose status as cuckolds the springtime song of the cuckoo has revealed.

[11] simples plants or herbs employed for medicinal purposes.

[12] descry perceive.

[13] wanted lacked.

[14] more nigh nearer.

[15] passing surpassingly.

[16] panes here, narrow pieces or strips of alternate or different colours (e.g., red and blue) or different materials (e.g., velvet and cloth of gold), or pieces of the same colour with lace or other trimmings inserted in the seams; Neapolitan stuff material made in Naples.

marvellous curiously overwhipped with gold twist,[1] interseamed with knots of pearl;[2] the netherstock was of the purest Granado silk.[3] No cost was spared to set out these costly breeches, who had girt unto them a rapier and a dagger gilt, point pendant,[4] as quaintly as if some curious Florentine had tricked them up to square it[5] up and down the streets before his mistress. As these breeches were exceeding sumptuous to the eye, so were they passing pompous in their gestures, for they strutted up and down the valley as proudly as though they had there appointed to act some desperate combat.

Blame me not if I were driven into a muse[6] with this most monstrous sight, to see in that place such a strange headless courtier jetting up and down like the usher of a fence-school about to play his prize,[7] when I deem never in any age such a wonderful object fortuned unto any man before. Well, the greater dump[8] this novelty drove me into, the more desire I had to see what event would follow. Whereupon looking about to see if that any more company would come, I might perceive from the top of the other hill another pair of breeches more soberly marching, and with a softer pace, as if they were not too hasty and yet would keep promise nevertheless at the place appointed. As soon as they were come into the valley, I saw they were a plain pair of cloth breeches, without either welt or guard,[9] straight to the thigh, of white kersey, without a slop,[10] the netherstock of the same, sewed to above the knee, and only seamed with a little Coventry blue,[11] such as in diebus illis[12] our great grandfathers wore, when neighbourhood[13] and hospitality had banished pride out of England. Nor were these plain breeches weaponless, for they had a good sower bat[14] with a pike in the end, able to lay on load[15] enough if the heart were answerable to the weapon, and upon this staff pitched down upon the ground Cloth-breeches stood solemnly leaning, as if they meant not to start, but to answer to the uttermost whatsoever in that place might be objected. Looking upon these two, I might perceive by the pride of the one and homely resolution of the other that this their meeting would grow to some dangerous conflict, and therefore to prevent the fatal issue of such a pretended[16] quarrel, I stepped between them both, when Velvet-breeches greeted Cloth-breeches with this salutation:

"Proud and insolent peasant, how darest thou without leave or low reverence press into the place where I am come for to disport myself?[17] Art thou not afraid? Thy high presumption should summon me to displeasure, and so force me draw my rapier, which is never unsheathed but it turns[18] to the scabbard with a triumph of mine enemy's blood. Bold bayard, avaunt![19]

---

[1] curiously overwhipped ingeniously trimmed or ornamented with embroidery; twist thread or cord composed of two or more fibres or filaments.

[2] interseamed with knots of pearl adorned with small clusters of pearls sprinkled between.

[3] netherstock stocking; Granado silk silk made in the Spanish city, Granada.

[4] rapier sword; pendant hanging down.

[5] quaintly elegantly, fashionably; curious particular, fastidious; tricked them up adorned them (usually with the notion of artifice); to square it to strut or swagger.

[6] a muse profound meditation or abstraction.

[7] jetting strutting or swaggering; usher of a fence-school the assistant schoolmaster in a school devoted to the art of fencing; play his prize engage in a contest or match, especially a fencing match.

[8] dump a dazed or puzzled state.

[9] welt frill, fringe, or trimming; guard an ornamental border or trimming on a garment.

[10] kersey a kind of coarse, narrow cloth, woven from long wool and usually ribbed; slop wide, baggy breeches or hose, of the kind commonly worn in the sixteenth or early-seventeenth century; here, the loose or wide part of a pair of breeches of this kind.

[11] seamed ornamented with an inserted seam; Coventry blue a kind of blue embroidery thread manufactured at Coventry.

[12] Latin, "in those days" (i.e., in earlier or former times).

[13] neighbourhood neighbourliness.

[14] sower bat perhaps, a "sore bat," where "sore" is an adjective meaning "able to cause bodily pain," and "bat" a staff for support and defence (the "pike" is a sharp point or spike embedded in its end).

[15] to lay on load to deal heavy blows.

[16] pretended intended, purposed.

[17] leave permission; low reverence deep (even grovelling) bow; to disport myself to enjoy myself.

[18] turns i.e., returns.

[19] bayard one blind to the light of knowledge, who has the self-confidence of ignorance; avaunt Begone! Away!

Beard[1] me not to my face! For this time, I pardon thy folly, and grant thy legs leave to carry away thy life."

Cloth-breeches, nothing amazed[2] at this bravado, bending his staff as if he meant (if he were wronged) to bestow his benison,[3] with a scornful kind of smiling made this smooth reply: "Marry gip, Goodman[4] Upstart, who made your father a gentleman? Soft fire makes sweet malt, the curstest cow hath the shortest horns, and a brawling cur of all bites the least.[5] Alas, good sir, are you so fine that no man may be your fellow? I pray you, what difference is between you and me but in the cost and the making? Though you be never so richly daubed with gold and powdered with pearl, yet you are but a case[6] for the buttocks, and a cover for the basest part of a man's body no more than I. The greatest pre-eminence is in the garnishing, and thereof you are proud; but come to the true use we were appointed to, my honour is more than thine, for I belong to the old ancient yeomanry, yea and gentility, the fathers, and thou to a company of proud and unmannerly upstarts, the sons."

At this Velvet-breeches stormed and said, "Why thou beggar's brat, descended from the reversion[7] of base poverty, is thy insolence so great to make comparison with me, whose difference is as great as the brightness of the sun and the slender light of the candle? I (poor snake[8]) am sprung from the ancient Romans, born in Italy, the mistress of the world for chivalry, called into England from my native home (where I was famous) to honour your country[9] and young gentlemen here in England with my countenance; where I am holden in high regard, that I can press into the presence[10] when thou, poor soul, shalt with cap and knee beg leave of the porter to enter, and I sit and dine with the nobility, when thou art fain[11] to wait for the reversion[12] of the alms basket. I am admitted boldly to tell my tale, when thou art fain to sue by means of supplication,[13] and that and thou too so little regarded that most commonly it never comes to the prince's hand, but dies imprisoned in some obscure pocket. Sith then there is such difference between our estates, cease to urge my patience[14] with thy insolent presumption."

Cloth-breeches, as brief as he was proud, swore by the pike of his staff that his choplogic[15] was not worth a pin, and that he would turn his own weapon into his bosom thus: "Why, Signior Glorioso,"[16] quoth he, "though I have not such glosing phrase to trick out[17] my speeches withal

---

1 Beard defy.

2 amazed alarmed, terrified.

3 benison blessing.

4 Marry gip "oh, get out!" or "go along with you!"; Goodman a respectful form of address, but one applied only to men under the rank of gentleman, especially yeomen or farmers; here, a deliberate insult.

5 Popular proverbs: "Soft fire makes sweet malt" (Tilley F280) recommends gentle and merciful behaviour as the most profitable; "A curst cow has short horns" (Tilley C751) means that those individuals who are most likely to abuse their power have that power limited (cf. Tilley G217: "God sends a curst (shrewd) cow short horns"); and "Great barkers are no biters" (Tilley B85) means that people who make the most threatening bluster against others are the least likely to act upon it.

6 case covering.

7 reversion in law, the return of an estate to the donor or grantor, or his heirs, after the expiry of the grant; an estate which then returns to the donors or his heirs; in more common use, "reversion" refers to an estate of this kind as granted or transferable to another party, especially upon the death of the original grantee; hence, the right of succeeding to, or next occupying an estate, etc.

8 poor snake a contemptuous appellation: a poor, needy, or humble person; a drudge.

9 the 1592 copy in the Bodleian Library has "courtiers," here (8° M 24 Linc [3]; Scolar Press, facsimile, n.d.).

10 the presence of an individual of high rank.

11 fain necessitated, obliged.

12 reversion the right of succeeding to the possession of something after another is done with it, or simply of obtaining it at some future time; a thing or possession which one expects to obtain. Velvet-breeches also uses "reversion" here with a pointed and insulting reference to its more specific legal meaning (see p. 1000, note 7): Cloth-breeches, he implies, cannot hope for the reversion of any other property or wealth (e.g., from a wealthy or landed relation), because his class status excludes him from such prospects. His only "inheritance" can be from the basket containing the public alms or charitable contributions towards the maintenance of the poor of a parish.

13 supplication a written, formal petition.

14 urge my patience bear pressingly upon or try my patience.

15 choplogic sophistical or contentious argument.

16 Glorioso boaster, braggart.

17 glosing smooth, specious, and (thus) deceptive or lying; trick out dress, adorn (usually, as here, with the notion of artifice).

as you, yet I will come over your fellows with this bald[1] rhetoric. I pray you, Monsieur Malapert,[2] are you therefore my superior because you are taken up with gentlemen, and I with the yeomanry? Doth true virtue consist in riches, or humanity in wealth? Is ancient honour tied to outward bravery?[3] Or is not rather true nobility a mind excellently qualified with rare virtues? I will teach thee a lesson worth the hearing, proud princox,[4] how gentility first sprung up. I will not forget the old wives' logic, 'When Adam delved and Eve span, who was then a gentleman?'[5] But I tell thee after the general flood that there was no more men upon the Earth but Noah and his three sons and that Ham had wickedly discovered his father's secrets, then grew the division of estates thus: the church was figured in Shem, gentility in Japheth, and labour and drudgery in Ham; Shem being chaste and holy, Japheth learned and valiant, Ham churlish and servile. Yet did not the curse extend so far upon Ham, nor the blessing upon Japheth, but if the one altered his nature, and became either endued with learning or valour, he might be a gentleman. Or if the other degenerated from his ancient virtues, he might be held a peasant. Whereupon Noah inferred that gentility grew not only by propagation of nature, but by perfection of qualities.[6] Then is your Worship wide[7] that boast of your worth for your gold and pearl, sith cucullus non facit monachum,[8] nor a velvet slop make a sloven a gentleman. And whereas thou sayest thou wert born in Italy and called hither by our courtiers, him may we curse that brought thee first into England, for thou camest not alone but accompanied with a multitude of abominable vices, hanging on thy bumbast[9] nothing but infectious abuses, as vain-glory, self-love, sodomy, and strange poisonings, wherewith thou hast infected this glorious island. Yea, insolent braggart, thou hast defiled thine own nest,[10] and fatal was the day of thy birth, for since the time of thy hatching in Italy, as then famous for chivalry and learning, the imperial state through thy pride hath decayed, and thou hast like the young pelican pecked at thy mother's breast with thy presumption,[11] causing them to lose that their forefathers with true honour conquered; so hast thou been the ruin of the Roman Empire, and now fatally art thou come into England to attempt here the like subversion. Whereas thou dost boast that I am little regarded where thou art highly accounted of, and hast sufferance to press into the presence when I am for my simpleness shut out of door, I grant thy allegation in part, but not in whole: for men of high wisdom and honour measure not men by the outward show of bravery, but by the inward worth and honesty; and so, though I am disdained of a few overweening fools, I am valued as well as thyself with the wise. In that thou sayest thou canst speak when I sue by supplication, I grant it, but the tale thou tellest is to the ruin of the poor, for coming into high favour with an impudent face, what farm is there expired whose lease thou dost not

[1] fellows perhaps, "accompanying comments"; bald unadorned, meagrely simple, plain. In some copies, "bald" is "bad."

[2] Malapert presumptuous, impudent, saucy.

[3] bravery fine clothes (and their display).

[4] princox princock: an impudent boy or youth; a conceited young fellow.

[5] Popular proverb: "delved" means "digged/dug" (especially to dig [the ground] in preparation for planting a crop) and "span" means "spun," referring to the traditionally feminine occupation of preparing wool to be made into cloth (Tilley A30).

[6] For the story of the flood, see Genesis 6-8. For Ham's sin in looking upon the drunk and naked Noah, see Genesis 9:20-29.

[7] wide mistaken, astray in opinion or belief.

[8] Latin, "The cowl [i.e., the hood, part of a traditional religious habit] does not make the monk," a medieval proverb which warns that people may not be what they appear, that dressing in a saintly garb will not make the wearer a saint.

[9] bumbast bombast: cotton-wool used as padding or stuffing for clothes, etc., here meant fig.: inflated language; high-sounding language on trivial or commonplace subjects (the spelling may also be an oblique reinforcement of the vice of sodomy, which the English often viewed as the result of pernicious foreign influences; the vb. "to bombast" or "bumbast" means "to beat on the posteriors").

[10] Proverb, "It is a foul bird that defiles his own nest" (Tilley B377).

[11] pelican ... presumption referring to the ancient and popular belief that the pelican fed its young with blood drawn from its own breast.

beg? what forfeit of penal statutes? what concealed lands[1] can overslip thee? Yea, rather than thy bravery should fail thoul't beg polling pence[2] for the very smoke that comes out of poor men's chimneys! Shamest thou not, uplandish[3] upstart, to hear me discourse thy imperfections? Get thee home again into thy own country, and let me as I was wont[4] live famous in my native home, in England where I was born and bred, yea and bearded Caesar thy countryman till he compassed the conquest by treason."[5]

"The right and title in this country, base brat," quod Velvet-breeches, "now authority favours me, I am admitted viceroy, and I will make thee do me homage, and confess that thou holdest thy being and residence in my land from the gracious favour of my sufferance."[6]

And with that he laid hold on the hilts of his rapier, and Cloth-breeches betook him to his staff, when I stepping betwixt them parted them thus: "Why, what mean ye? Will you decide your controversy by blows, when you may debate it by reason? This is a land of peace, governed by true justiciaries[7] and honourable magistrates, where you shall have equity without partiality,[8] and therefore listen to me and discuss the matter by law. Your quarrel is, whether[9] of you are most ancient and most worthy. You, sir, boast of your country and parentage, he of his native birth in England; you claim all, he would have but his own. Both plead an absolute title of residence in this country; then must the course between you be trespass or disseisin of frank tenement. You, Velvet-breeches, in that you claim the first title, you shall be the plaintiff, and plead a trespass of disseisin[10] done you by Cloth-breeches, so shall it be brought to a jury, and tried by a verdict of twelve or four and twenty."

"Tush, tush," quoth Velvet-breeches, "I neither like to be plaintiff nor yet allow of a jury, for they may be partial, and so condemn me in mine own action, for the country swains[11] cannot value of my worth, nor can mine honours come within the compass of their base wits. Because I am a stranger in this land, and but here lately arrived, they will hold me as an upstart and so lightly esteem of my worthiness; and for my adversary is their countryman and less chargeable,[12] he shall

---

[1] farm … lease … beg A lease is a contract between parties, by which one conveys lands or tenements to the other usually in consideration of rent or other periodical compensation; in the sixteenth century such conveyance was usually for a set period rather than for life; what forfeit of penal statutes i.e., what lands, goods, etc. forfeited by those people affected by penal statutes (such as those which would lead to the expiry of the lease on their farm) [would you not beg?]; concealed lands property which "had been by various means concealed from the commissioners for the dissolution of the monasteries, &c. [...] During the reign of Elizabeth there was a regular traffic carried on, with a good deal of what would now be called swindling, in discovering concealments and obtaining grants of them from the crown." See R. Nares, "Concealment," A Glossary of Words, Phrases, Names, and Allusions in the Works of English Authors, Particularly of Shakespeare and His Contemporaries; rev. ed., J.O. Halliwell and Thomas Wright (London: Routledge, 1905; rept., Detroit, 1966), p. 185.

[2] polling pence money paid or exacted as a poll or head tax (i.e., a tax levied on every person); "polling" clearly also means "cheating" or "extortionate" in this context.

[3] uplandish here, outlandish, foreign; the word is also frequently used in the sixteenth century in the sense of "rustic, uncultivated, boorish."

[4] wont accustomed, used to, in the habit of doing so.

[5] For the account of how Julius Caesar conquered Britain through the connivance of Mandubrace and other inhabitants of what was to become the city of London, see Survey London, 1.1-3.

[6] sufferance permission, leave.

[7] justiciaries administrators of justice.

[8] equity without partiality fairness or even-handed treatment without bias or prejudice.

[9] whether which.

[10] disseisin a legal term, meaning the wrongful dispossession (by forcible entry or otherwise) of the lands, estates, etc. of another, particularly when the dispossessed person "hath frank tenement" (Littleton's Tenures [1574], 57b) or freehold rights, that is where the dispossessed person has absolute possession (the lands, etc. belong to him and his heirs forever, without limitation to any particular class of heirs), entailed possession (the lands, etc. are entailed or limited to some particular class of heirs, e.g., male heirs), or possession for life. Since the fifteenth century, "disseisin" has not been used to refer to an individual's forcible dispossession of moveable goods, or where the dispossessed person was tenant at will or tenant for years. The "absolute title of residence" (which the narrator says that both Cloth-breeches and Velvet-breeches claim) is the equivalent of absolute possession, defined above, which obviously only one of them can legitimately and legally claim.

[11] swains country or farm labourers; rustics.

[12] chargeable important. There is also the sense here that Cloth-breeches is less likely to be held responsible by a jury made up of his peers.

have the law mitigated, if a jury of hinds or peasants should be impaneled. If ancient gentlemen, yeomen, or plain ministers should be of the quest,[1] I were sure to lose the day because they loathe me, in that I have persuaded so many landlords for the maintenance of my bravery to raise their rents."[2]

"You seek a knot in a rush,"[3] quod I. "You need not doubt of that, for whom you distrust and think not indifferent,[4] him you, upon a cause manifested, challenge from your jury."[5]

"If your law allow such large favour," quoth Velvet-breeches, "I am content my title be tried by a jury, and therefore let mine adversary plead me Nul tort, Nul disseisin."[6]

Cloth-breeches was content with this, and so they both agreed I should be judge and juror in this controversy, whereupon I wished them to say for themselves what they could, that I might discourse to the jury what reasons they alleged of their titles.

Then Velvet-breeches began thus: "I cannot but grieve that I should be thus outfaced with a carter's weed only fit for husbandry,[7] seeing that I am the original[8] of all honourable endeavours. To what end doth youth bestow their wits on law, physic,[9] or theology, were it not the end they aim at is the wearing of me and winning of preferment? Honour nourisheth art, and for the regard of dignity do learned men strive to exceed in their faculty.

Impiger extremos currit Mercator ad indos,
Per mare, per saxa, &c.[10]

What drives the merchants to seek foreign marts, to venture their goods and hazard their lives? Naught, if still the end of their travail[11] were a pair of cloth breeches. No! Velvet costly attire, curious and quaint[12] apparel is the spur that pricks them forward to attempt such a danger. Doth not the soldiers fight to be brave,[13] the lawyer study to countenance himself with cost,[14] the artificer[15] take pains only for my sake, that wearing me he may brag it amongst the best? What credit carries he nowadays that goes pinned up[16] in a cloth breech? Who will keep him company that thinks well of himself, unless he use the simple slave to make clean his shoon?[17] The world is changed, and men are grown to more wit, and their minds to aspire after more honourable thoughts. They were dunces in diebus illis;[18] they had not the true use of gentility, and therefore they lived meanly[19] and died obscurely, but now men's capacities are refined, time hath set a new edge on gentlemen's humours,[20] and they show them as they should be, not like gluttons as

---

1 hinds farm servants, agricultural labourers; plain ministers those not distinguished by rank or position; ordinary parish ministers; quest an inquest or jury.

2 This complaint became increasingly common in the sixteenth century; see for example Hugh Latimer's "A Sermon on the Ploughers," p. 119, ll.321-26.

3 You seek a knot in a rush i.e., you seek or make difficulties where there are none.

4 indifferent impartial, unbiased; even-handed.

5 challenge from your jury a legal term, here meaning to object to a juryman, and thus have him removed from the jury.

6 Latin, "no tort, no disseisin." In English law, a "tort" is breach of a duty imposed by the law, whereby some person acquires a right of action for damages. If there has been no such breach, there cannot legally be grounds for a charge of disseisin, or unlawful dispossessing of lands, tenements, or estates.

7 outfaced defied boldly or with effrontery; weed clothing, apparel; husbandry farming, agricultural labour.

8 original origin; cause, source.

9 physic medicine, medical science.

10 Latin, "The active merchant sails towards the furthest Indies, / Shunning poverty (by travelling) over sea, over rocky ground, through fire."

11 travail labour (also, "travel").

12 curious skillfully, elaborately, or beautifully made; quaint fashionable, elegant.

13 brave finely or splendidly dressed.

14 to countenance himself with cost to set himself off by the expense (of his clothes).

15 artificer craftsman.

16 pinned up obviously, fastened with a pin; then, as now, indicating that the clothing so treated is worn, damaged, or torn.

17 shoon shoes.

18 Latin, "in those days" (i.e., in former times).

19 meanly basely.

20 set a new edge on to give a new keenness to; humours dominant temperament, constitutional or habitual disposition, or mental and emotional tendencies.

their fathers did in chines[1] of beef and alms to the poor, but in velvets, satins, cloth of gold, pearl, yea pearl lace which scarce Caligula[2] wore on his birthday. And to this honourable humour have I brought these gentlemen since I came from Italy. What is the end of service to a man but to countenance himself and credit his master with brave suits? The scurvy tapsters and ostlers (fex populi) fill pots and rub horseheels[3] to prank themselves with my glory. Alas, were it not to wear me, why would so many apply themselves to extraordinary idleness? Beside[4] I make fools be reverenced and thought wise amongst the common sort, I am a severe censor to such as offend the law, provided there be a penalty annexed that may bring in some profit. Yea, by me the chiefest part of the realm is governed, and therefore I refer my title to the verdict of any men's judgement."[5]

To this, mildly, Cloth-breeches answered thus: "As I have had always that honest humour in me to measure all estates by their virtues not by their apparel, so did I never grudge at the bravery[6] of any whom birth, time, place, or dignity made worthy of such costly ornaments; but if, by the favour of their prince and their own deserts, they merited them, I held both lawful and commendable to answer their degrees in apparel correspondent unto their dignities. I am not so precise directly[7] to inveigh against the use of velvet, either in breeches or other suits, nor will I have men go like John the Baptist in coats of camel's hair.[8] Let princes have their diadems, and Caesar what is due to Caesar;[9] let noblemen go as[10] their birth requires, and gentlemen as they are born or bear office. I speak in mine own defence, for the ancient gentility and yeomanry of England, and inveigh against none but such malapert upstart[s] as raised up from the plough, or advanced for their Italian devices, or for their witless wealth, covet in bravery to match, nay to exceed, the greatest noblemen in this land.

"But leaving this digression, Monsieur Velvet-breeches, again to the particulars of your fond[11] allegation. Whereas you affirm yourself to be both [the] original and final end of learning, alas, proud princox, you preach a bough too high.[12] Did all the philosophers beat their brains and busy their wits to wear velvet breeches? Why, both at that time thou wert unknown, yea, unborn, and all excess in apparel had in high contempt, and now in these days all men of worth are taught by

[1] chines in cookery, a joint of meat consisting of the whole of part of the backbone of an animal, with the adjoining flesh; in beef, any part of the back (ribs or sirloin).

[2] cloth of gold a tissue consisting of threads, wires, or strips of gold, generally interwoven with silk or wool; also applied to gilded cloth; Caligula Gaius (12-41 CE), Roman emperor, nicknamed Caligula ("Little Boots"), reported to have committed incest with his sisters, established public brothels, humiliated religious and political leaders, and murdered the innocent. He became an emblem of depravity, cruelty, and excess, and was assassinated by his own guards.

[3] scurvy contemptible; tapster a man who draws beer for customers in a tavern; ostler a stableman or groom; Latin, "fex populi" = "faex populi": the dregs of the people; pots drinking vessels; horseheels hooves or hind feet.

[4] Beside in addition to the fact that.

[5] men's judgement "men of judgement" in Bodleian Library copy.

[6] bravery fine clothing, especially that made for display or show.

[7] precise scrupulous, overly exact; directly completely, absolutely.

[8] Often interpreted as an emblem of Christian asceticism and rejection of worldly luxury, John the Baptist appears like the prophets of the Hebrew Scriptures preaching repentance as a preparation for the coming of the messiah, the end of the world, and the subsequent last judgement of all humankind (Matthew 3:1-12). He wears "a garment of camel's hair, [with] a leather girdle round his waist; and his food [is] locusts and wild honey" (Matthew 3:4).

[9] The Pharisees posed Jesus the question of whether or not it was lawful for Jews to pay Roman taxes. Hoping on the basis of his answer either to alienate him from resentful taxpaying Jews or to condemn him before the Roman authorities, the Pharisees received the answer that since the face on the tax money was that of Caesar, Jews should "Render therefore to Caesar the things that are Caesar's, and to God the things that are God's" (Matthew 22:15-22; see also Mark 12:13-17).

[10] go as be habitually in the apparel that.

[11] fond foolish.

[12] original spelling: "you preach a bowe to hie." Metaphorically, Velvet-breeches' arguments (his "preachings") have missed the mark, like an archer who has aimed too high. The Bodleian Library copy has instead "you pearch a bowe to hie" suggesting that Velvet-breeches' arguments are as weak and as likely to collapse under him as the thin branch or bough under a man who has climbed too high into a tree.

reading that excess is a great sin, that pride is the first step to the downfall of shame. They study with Tully, that they may seem born for their countries as well as for themselves:[1] the divine to preach the gospel; the lawyer to reform wrongs and maintain justice; the physician to discover the secrets of God's wonders by working strange cures. To be brief, the end of all being is to know God, and not, as your Worship good Master Velvet-breeches wrests,[2] to creep into acquaintance.

"I will not deny but there be as fantastical[3] fools as yourself, that perhaps are puffed up with such presuming thoughts, and ambitiously aim to trick themselves in your Worship's masking suits;[4] but while such climb for great honours, they often fall to great shames. It may be thereupon you bring in honos alit artes,[5] but I guess your mastership never tried what true honour meant, that truss it up within the compass of a pair of velvet breeches, and place it in arrogancy of the heart. No, no! Say honour is idolatry, for they make fools of themselves and idols of their carcasses; but he that valueth honour so shall read a lecture out of Apuleius's Golden Ass to learn him more wit.[6]

"But now, sir, by your leave, a blow with your next argument, which is that merchants hazard their goods and lives to be acquainted with your mastership. Indeed you are awry, for wise men frequent marts for profit not for pride, unless it be some that by wearing of velvet breeches and apparel too high for their calling have proved bankrupts in their youth, and have been glad in their age to desire my acquaintance, and to truss up their tails in homespun russet.[7] Whereas thou dost object[8] the valour of hardy soldiers to grow for the desire of brave apparel, 'tis false; and I know if any were present, they would prove upon thy bones thou wert a liar, for their country's good, their prince's service, the defence of their friends, the hope of favour is the final end of their resolutions, esteeming not only them but the world's glory, fickle, transitory and inconstant. Shall I fetch from thine own country weapons to wound thyself withal? What sayest thou to Cincinnatus? Was he not called to be dictator from the plough? And after many victories, what, did he jet up and down the court in costly garments and velvet breeches? No, he despised dignity, contemned[9] vainglory and pride, and returned again to his quiet, contented life in the country.[10] How much did Caius Fabritius value their Numa Pompilius? Scevola, Scipio, Epaminondas, Aristides:[11] they held themselves

[1] Tully …themselves Marcus Tullius Cicero (106-43 BCE), Roman orator, politician and writer cites approvingly Plato's claim that we are not born for ourselves alone, but for the service of our country (De Officiis [On Duties], 1.7.22).

[2] wrests twists, perverts (the true or proper meaning of something).

[3] fantastical impulsive, capricious; also, foppish in attire.

[4] trick dress or array (usually with the notion of artifice); masking suits the elaborate clothing worn by courtiers at the performance of court masques, spectacular dramatic entertainments, with an emphasis on music, dancing, and fantastic costumes.

[5] Latin, "Honour nourishes the arts" (i.e., artists are encouraged in their endeavours by the praise and honour given to the arts). See Cicero, Tusculan Disputations, 1.2.4.

[6] I.e., any man stupid enough to make an idol out of the honour that derives from the fashion, style, and cost of his wardrobe is stupid enough to think that he can learn true wit from Apuleius' Golden Ass. A Latin romance written in the 2nd century CE, the Golden Ass or Metamorphoses recounts the adventures of Lucius who is transformed into an ass. Perhaps Greene is commenting on the thoroughly conventional (if more than usually transparent) statement by William Adlington, author of the popular 1566 translation of this classical work, who presents Apuleius' erotically charged fictions as allegories of the conflict between virtue and vice.

[7] tails buttocks; homespun russet a coarse homemade woolen cloth of a reddish-brown colour, used for the dress of peasants and countryfolk.

[8] object adduce.

[9] contemned viewed with contempt or disdain; scorned.

[10] Lucius Quinctius Cincinnatus, early Roman leader, who later became a byword for the ancient Roman virtues of incorruptibility in public life and asceticism in private life. During an emergency in 458 BCE, when a Roman army was trapped by the Aequi at Algidus, he was summoned while ploughing and appointed dictator. In the space of 15 days Cincinnatus raised an army, defeated the enemy, triumphed, laid down his office, and returned to the plough (Dict. Ancient Hist., p. 148).

[11] Fabritius Gaius Fabricius Luscinus (fl. 3rd century BCE), successful Roman general and statesman. Famous for his honesty in public life, he became a symbol for the Roman virtue of incorruptibility (Dict. Ancient Hist., p. 258); Numa Pompilius ancient Roman king and supposed successor of Romulus, one of the founders of Rome, was famous for his peaceful rule and his creation of Rome's religious institutions and rituals (ibid., p. 443); Scevola Quintus Mucius (continued) worms' meat, and counted pride vanity, and yet thou art not ashamed to say thou art the end of soldiers' worthy honour! I tell thee, saucy skipjack,[1] it was a good and a blessed time here in England when King Stephen wore a pair of cloth breeches of a noble a pair and thought them passing[2] costly; then did he count Westminster Hall too little to be his dining chamber and his alms was not bare bones, instead of broken meat, but lusty chines of beef fell into the poor man's basket.[3] Then charity flourished in the court, and young courtiers strove to exceed one another in virtue, not in bravery; they rode not with fans to ward their faces from the wind, but with burgans[4] to resist the stroke of a battle-ax; they could then better exhort a soldier to armour than court a lady with amorets;[5] they caused the trumpet to sound them points of war,[6] not poets to write them wanton elegies of love; they sought after honourable fame, but hunted not after fading honour. Which distinction by the way take thus: there be some that seek honour, and some are sought after by honour. Such upstarts as fetch their pedigree from their fathers' ancient leather apron and creep into the court with great humility, ready at the first basciare li piedi di la vostra signoria,[7] having gotten the countenance[8] of some nobleman, will straight be a kindred to Cadwaller,[9] and swear his great-grandmother was one of the burgesses of the Parliament house,[10] will at last steal by degrees into some credit by their double diligence, and then wind some worshipful place[11] as far as a hungry sow can smell a sir-reverence,[12] and then with all their friends seek day and night with coin and countenance[13] till they have got it. Others there be whom honour itself seeks, and such be they whom virtue doth frame fit for that purpose, that rising by high deserts, as learning or valour, merit more than either they look for or their prince hath any ease conveniently to bestow on them. Such[14] honour seeks, and they with a blushing conscience entertain him, be they never so high in favour, yet they beg no office, as the shameless upstart doth that hath a hungry eye to spy out, an impudent face to sue, and a flattering tongue to entreat for some void place of worship,[15] which little belonged to them if the prince intended to bestow offices for virtue not favour. Other, Mon-

---

Scaevola (d. 82 BCE), Roman lawyer and consul, responsible for several important pieces of early legal legislation and author of an important work on civil law (ibid., p. 572); Scipio probably Publius Cornelius Scipio Africanus (236-183 BCE), an enormously successful Roman general. Most famous for defeating Hannibal in 202 BCE, he went on to a successful public life as censor and consul (ibid., pp. 575-76); Epaminondas (d. 362 BCE), Theban general who defeated the Spartans, reducing their power significantly; although his forces triumphed over the Spartans at Mantinea, he died there (ibid., pp. 233-34); Aristides (c. 525-467 BCE), Athenian statesman and general, a major force in important Greek victories at the battles of Marathon, Salamis and Plataea; he became known as Aristides the Just because of his honesty in both public and private life (Classical Dict., p. 83).

[1] skipjack a pert, shallow-brained fellow; a conceited dandy.

[2] of a noble a pair i.e., costing a noble (6 shillings, 8 pence) a pair; passing exceedingly.

[3] The story about King Stephen's attire comes from an old ballad, part of which Iago quotes in Shakespeare's Othello (2.3.83-90):

King Stephen was and a worthy peer,
His breeches cost him but a crown;
He held 'em sixpence all too dear,
With that he call'd the tailor lown [lout],
He was a wight [person] of high renown,
And thou art but of low degree,
'Tis pride that pulls the country down,
Then take thine owd [auld or old] cloak about thee.

[4] burgan burgonet: a helmet with a visor, so fitted to the neck-piece, that the head could be turned without exposing the neck.

[5] amorets love songs or sonnets.

[6] points of war a short phrase sounded on an instrument as a war signal.

[7] Italian, "to kiss the foot of your ladyship"

[8] countenance patronage, favour.

[9] Cadwaller also called Cadwallader (Cadwaldr ap Cadwallon [d. ?664 CE]), an ancient Welsh king, whom Merlin prophesied would turn back the tide of Anglo-Saxon invaders; an early British national hero.

[10] great-grandmother ... Parliament house Since women did not serve as elected representatives in Parliament, Cloth-breeches' point may be that Velvet-breeches knows so little about English systems of government that he would make such an elementary error and thus tell so obvious a lie through ignorance; burgess one elected to represent his fellow citizens in Parliament; the member of Parliament for a borough, corporate town, or university.

[11] wind some worshipful place sniff out some honourable office or position.

[12] a sir-reverence a "turd"; a piece of excrement.

[13] with coin and countenance i.e., though bribery and patronage.

[14] Such i.e., such men.

[15] some void place of worship i.e, some profitable and socially-prestigious office, presently vacant.

sieur Velvet-breeches, there be of your crew that pinch their bellies to polish their backs, that keep their maws empty to fill their purses, that have no show of gentility but a velvet slop, who by polling[1] or selling of land that their father left will bestow all to buy an office about the court that they may be worshipful, extorting from the poor to raise up their money that the base deceiving companions have laid out to have an office of some countenance and credit, wherein they may, of me[n] better than themselves, be termed by the name of 'Worship.' The last—whom virtue pleadeth for, and neither silver, gold, friends, nor favour advanceth—be men of great worth, such as are thought of worship, and unwillingly entertain her, rather vouchsafing[2] proffered honour for the country's cause than for any proud opinion of hoped-for preferment.

"Blessed are such lands whose officers are so placed, and where the prince promoteth not for coin nor countenance, but for his worthy deserving virtues. But leaving this by-talk, methought I heard you say, Signor Velvet-breeches, that you were the father of mechanical arts, and handicrafts were found out to foster your bravery. In faith, Goodman Goosecap,[3] you that are come from the startups and therefore is called an upstart, quasi start up from clouted shoon,[4] your lips hung in your light[5] when you brought forth this logic. For I hope there is none so simple but knows that handicrafts and occupations grew for necessity not pride; that men's inventions waxed sharp to profit the commonwealth, not to prank up themselves in bravery.

[...]

"Indeed[6] I cannot deny but your Worship hath brought in deceit as a journeyman[7] into all companies, and made that a subtle craft which while I was holden in esteem was but a simple mystery.[8] Now, every trade hath his sleights to slubber up his work to the eye,[9] and to make it good to the sale, howsoever it proves in the wearing. The shoemaker cares not if his shoes hold the drawing on; the tailor sows with hot needle and burnt threat. Tush, pride hath banished conscience, and velvet breeches honesty, and every servile drudge must ruffle in his silks, or else he is not suitable.[10]

"The world was not so a principio,[11] for when velvet was worn but in kings' caps, then conscience was not a broom-man in Kent Street[12] but a courtier; then the farmer was content his son should hold the plough, and live as he had done before; beggars then feared to aspire, and the higher sorts scorned to envy. Now every lout must have his son a courtnoll,[13] and those dunghill drudges wax[14] so proud that they will presume to wear on their feet what kings have worn on their heads. A clown's[15] son must be clapped in a velvet pantofle[16] and a velvet breech, though the pre-

[1] polling despoiling (wringing as much money out of it as possible).

[2] vouchsafing receiving graciously; deigning to accept.

[3] Goodman See p. 1000, note 4; Goosecap simpleton, fool.

[4] quasi Latin, "just as"; Cloth-breeches links the figurative meaning of "startup" (an upstart or low-born person who has risen to wealth or power) to the word's literal meaning (a kind of boot worn by rustics, linked closely to the "clouted shoes," boots studded with large-headed nails or protected with iron plates). "Shoon" is the archaic plural of "shoe."

[5] Proverb, "Your lips hang in your light" (Tilley L330) means that you are foolishly obstructing your own understanding (cf. "to stand in one's own light" [Tilley L276]).

[6] The speaker here is still Cloth-breeches.

[7] journeyman one who, having served his apprenticeship to a handicraft or trade, is qualified to work at it for days' wages (often said of an individual who works at a trade or handicraft as the servant or employee of another); in status and skill, the journeyman is greater than the apprentice but lesser than the master.

[8] subtle of craftsmen, etc.: skilful, expert; also, of persons or animals: crafty, treacherously or wickedly cunning; craft a branch of skilled work (especially a manual art or handicraft); a trade or profession requiring special skill and knowledge; in a bad sense: skill or art applied to deceive; deceit, fraud, cunning; mystery here, a "secret" or highly technical operation in a trade or art; also, more generally, a handicraft, craft, or art; (one's) trade or profession.

[9] to slubber up his work to the eye i.e., to hurriedly produce his goods so that they appear fine on a superficial inspection.

[10] ruffle make a great stir or display; swagger, bear (oneself) proudly or arrogantly; suitable i.e., suitably dressed.

[11] Latin, "from the beginning."

[12] broom-man street-sweeper; Kent Street the site of a London slum, famed as the haunt of prostitutes, thieves, broom men, and beggars (Topographical Dict., p. 293).

[13] courtnoll a contemptuous or familiar name for a courtier.

[14] wax grow, become.

[15] clown countryman, rustic, peasant.

[16] pantofle in-door slipper or loose shoe.

sumptuous ass be drowned in the mercer's book, and make a convey of all his lands to the usurer for commodities.[1] Yea, the fop must go like a gallant for awhile, although at last in his age he beg. But indeed, such young youths, when the broker hath blessed them with Saint Needam's cross,[2] fall then to privy lifts and cozenages,[3] and when their credit is utterly cracked, they practise some bad shift,[4] and so come to a shameful end.

"Lastly, whereas thou sayest thou art a severe censor to punish sins, as austere as Cato to correct vice,[5] of truth I hold thee so in penal statutes when thou hast begged the forfeit of the prince;[6] but such correction is open extortion and oppression of the poor, nor can I compare it better, Monsieur Velvet-breech, than to the wolf chastising the lamb for disturbing their fountain, or the devil casting out devils through the power of Beelzebub.[7] And thus much, courteous sir, I have said to display the follies of mine adversary, and to show the right of mine own interest."

[...]

[At this point, the dreamer interviews a number of men, from different occupations and classes. Each man is objected to by either Cloth-breeches or Velvet-breeches or by both. After much debate, they finally arrive at a jury of twenty-three made up of: Knight, Esquire, Gentleman, Priest, Printer, Grocer, Skinner, Dyer, Pewterer, Saddler, Joiner, Bricklayer, Cutler, Plasterer, Sailor, Ropemaker, Smith, Glover, Husbandman, Shepherd, Waterman, Waterbearer, and Bellowsmender. However, the dreamer desires the traditional number of 24 and looks about for an extra man.]

"What, is it not possible," quoth I, "to have one more to make up the four and twenty?"

As I was thus speaking, I espied afar off a certain kind of an over-worn[8] gentleman attired in velvet and satin, but it was somewhat dropped[9] and greasy, and boots on his legs, whose soles waxed thin and seemed to complain of their master, which treading thrift under his feet had brought them unto that consumption.[10] He walked not as other men in the common beaten way, but came compassing circum circa, as if we had been devils and he would draw a circle about us,[11] and at every third step he looked back, as if he were afraid of a bailey or a sergeant.[12]

After him followed two pert apple-squires,[13] the one had a murrey cloth gown on, faced down

---

[1] mercer's book the account book of a dealer in silks, velvets, and other costly materials. "The mercer's book" is a proverbial phrase in the Elizabethan period with reference to the debts of gallants; make a convey … commodities i.e., transfers his property to the moneylender in order to purchase necessary goods.

[2] when the broker hath blessed them with Saint Needam's cross i.e., when the broker (a second-hand dealer; a pawnbroker) hath blessed them with the cross (the burden) of Saint Needham (poverty, beggary, need). Needham is properly the name of a small town (Needham Market) near Ipswich in Suffolk, used in the period punningly with allusion to "need."

[3] privy lifts and cozenages stealthy thefts and deceptions/con-games.

[4] practise some bad shift take up some evil expedient.

[5] Cato … vice Marcus Porcius Cato, the Censor (234-149 BCE) was a Roman official famed for the rectitude and austerity of his public and private life, his support for ancient Roman values, and his often blunt critique of the vices of luxury and corruption (Dict. Ancient Hist., p.134).

[6] of truth … prince Cloth-breeches accuses Velvet-breeches of begging for those goods, lands, or other property, the forfeiture of which was sometimes part of a judicial judgement.

[7] In Aesop's "The Wolf and the Lamb," a wolf accuses a lamb of wronging him to justify devouring the helpless creature. Although the lamb convincingly shows that he cannot possibly have been responsible for the crime the wolf accuses him of, the wolf still eats him. The moral is that even an airtight defence is no protection against someone intent on doing you harm.

[8] over-worn worn out, exhausted (with age, toil, etc.).

[9] dropped drooping; perhaps, spotted, dirty.

[10] consumption a wasting disease.

[11] compassing circum circa i.e., making or describing a series of circles; moving in a roundabout or circular manner; as if we had been devils and he would draw a circle about us a method for the containment and exorcism of devils in the period. See the famous woodcut for the 1616 edition of Marlowe's Dr Faustus which shows the magician himself standing in a circle that allows him to safely conjure up devils.

[12] bailey bailiff: an officer of justice under a sheriff, who executes writs and has powers of arrest; sergeant an officer whose duty is to enforce the judgements of a tribunal or judge, arrest offenders, or summon persons to appear before the court.

[13] apple-squires harlot's attendants; pimps. OED cites a different edition that reads "april esquires," and suggests the tentative definition of "new-made squires."

before with grey cunny,[1] and laid thick on the sleeves with lace, which he quaintly[2] bore up to show his white taffeta[3] hose and black silk stockings, a huge ruff about his neck wrapped in his great head like a wicker cage, a little hat with brims like the wings of a doublet,[4] wherein he wore a jewel of glass, broad as a Chancery seal.[5] After him followed two boys in cloaks like butterflies, carrying one of them his cutting sword of choler, the other his dancing rapier of delight.[6] His comrade that bore him company was a jolly light-timbered jackanapes, in a suit of watchet taffeta cut to the skin, with a cloak all-to-be-daubed[7] with coloured lace. Both he and my gowned brother seemed by their pace as if they had some suits to Monsieur Boots.[8] At length coming near, I might discern the first to be a poet, the second a player, the third a musician, alias the usher of a dancing school.

"Well met, Master Poet," quoth I, "and welcome you, friends, also, though not so particularly known. So it is, though none of you three be commonwealth's-men,[9] yet upon urgent necessity we must be forced to employ you. We have a jury to be impaneled immediately, which one of you three must help to make up, even he which approves[10] himself the honestest man."

"They are all honest men and good fellows," quoth Velvet-breeches. "Therefore, it is no great matter whether[11] of them we choose."

"The Doctors[12] doubt of that," quoth Cloth-breeches, "for I am of a different opinion. The first, whom by his careless, slovenly gait at first sight I imagined to be a poet, is a waste-good and an unthrift,[13] that he is born to make the taverns rich and himself a beggar. If he have £40 in his purse together, he puts it not to usury, neither buys land nor merchandise with it, but a month's commodity of wenches and capons.[14] £10 a supper? Why 'tis nothing, if his plough goes and his inkhorn be clear. Take one of them worthy £20,000 and hang him. He is a king of his pleasure, and counts all other[s] boors and peasants that though they have money at command yet know not like him how to domineer with it to any purpose as they should. But to speak plainly, I think him an honest man if he would but live within his compass, and generally no man's foe but his own. Therefore, I hold him a man fit to be of my jury."

"Nay," quoth Velvet-breeches, "I have more mind to these two, for this poet is a proud fellow, that because he hath a little wit in his budget[15] will contemn[16] and disklike us that are the common sort of gentlemen, and think we are beholding to

---

1 murrey purple-red or blood-red in colour; cunny cony: rabbit (fur), with the obvious play on the period's slang term for the female genitalia. See p. 1016, note 8.

2 quaintly elegantly; in a showy manner.

3 taffeta a plain-wove glossy silk.

4 wings of a doublet The doublet was a close-fitting body garment, with or without sleeves, worn by men from the 14th to the 18th century, the prototype of the modern coat, jacket, and waistcoat; this garment had a pair of lateral projecting pieces on or near the shoulder.

5 Chancery seal a seal used to authenticate documents, writs, etc., issued by the court of the lord chancellor of England, the highest court of judicature, next to the House of Lords.

6 butterfly a vain, gaudily-attired person; a giddy trifler. The difference between a "sword" and a "rapier" in the period lies in the sword's heavier, double-edged nature, meant for cutting and hewing an opponent; the rapier was a much lighter, sharp-pointed sword, designed only for thrusting, similar to the foil now used in fencing.

7 light-timbered lightly built or active; jackanapes ridiculous upstart; impertinent fellow, who assumes ridiculous airs; watchet pale blue; cut to the skin It was the fashion to make slashes or cuts in clothing, especially sleeves, in order to reveal the colour and quality of the garment underneath; all-to-be-daubed completely decorated (in a coarse, tasteless manner).

8 Monsieur Boots i.e., the over-worn gentleman (identified in the next sentence as the Poet).

9 commonwealth's-men men devoted to the interests of the commonwealth; citizens.

10 approves shows or proves (himself) to be.

11 whether which.

12 Doctors learned men, teachers; there is perhaps a more specific reference to the Doctors of the Church (Ambrose, Augustine, Jerome, and Gregory).

13 waste-good spendthrift; unthrift shiftless, dissolute person; spendthrift or prodigal.

14 capons castrated cocks, a delicacy in the period.

15 budget pouch, bag; fig., here, "mind"; the phrase to "open one's budget" means "to speak one's mind."

16 contemn despise.

him if he do but bestow a fair look upon us. The player and the usher of the dancing school are plain, honest, humble men, that for a penny or an old cast suit of apparel."[1]

"Indeed," quoth Cloth-breeches, "you say troth. They are but too humble, for they be so lowly that they be base-minded: I mean not in their looks or apparel, for so they be peacocks and painted asses, but in their course of life, for they care not how they get crowns, I mean how basely, so they have them; and yet of the two I hold the player to be the better Christian, although in his own imagination too full of self-liking and self-love, and is unfit to be of the jury, though I hide and conceal his faults and fopperies, in that I have been merry at his sports. Only this I must say: that such a plain country fellow as myself they bring in as clowns and fools to laugh at in their play, whereas they get[2] by us, and of our alms the proudest of them all doth live. Well, to be brief, let him trot to the stage, for he shall be none of the jury. And for you, Master Usher of the dancing school, you are a leader into all misrule: you instruct gentlemen to order their feet when you drive them to misorder their manners; you are a bad fellow that stand upon your tricks and capers, till you make young gentlemen caper without their lands. Why, sir, to be flat with you, you live by your legs as a juggler by his hands; you are given over to the pomps and vanities of the world; and, to be short, you are a keeper of misrule and a lewd fellow, and you shall be none of the quest."

"Why then," quoth I, "you are both agreed that the poet is he that must make up the twenty-four?"

They answered both, "He and none but he."

Then I, calling them all together, bade them lay their hands on the book, and first I called the knight, and after the rest as they followed in order, then I gave them their charge thus: "Worshipful sir, with the rest of the jury whom we have solicited of choice honest men, whose consciences will deal uprightly in this controversy, you and the rest of your company are here upon your oath and oaths to inquire whether Cloth-breeches have done disseison unto Velvet-breeches, yea or no in or about London, in putting him out of frank tenement, wronging him of his right and imbolishing his credit.[3] If you find that Cloth-breeches hath done Velvet-breeches wrong, then let him be set in his former estate and allow him reasonable damages."

Upon this, they laid their hands on the book and were sworn, and departed to scrutine[4] of the matter by inquiry amongst themselves, not stirring out of our sight nor staying long but straight returned, and the knight for them all (as the foremost[5]) said thus: "So it is that we have with equity and conscience considered of this controversy between Velvet-breeches and Cloth-breeches, as touching the prerogative of them both, which are most worthy to be rightly resident and have seisin in frank tenement[6] here in England, and we do find that Cloth-breeches is by many hundred years more ancient, ever since Brute[7] an inhabitant in this island, one that hath been in diebus illis a companion to kings, an equal with the nobility, a friend to gentlemen and yeomen, and a patron of the poor, a true subject, a good housekeeper, and general as honest as he is ancient. Whereas, Velvet-breeches is an upstart come out of Italy, begot of pride, nursed up by self-love, and brought into this country by his companion new-fangledness; that he is but of late time,[8] a raiser of rents, and an enemy to the commonwealth, and

---

[1] I.e., for these dubious benefits, the player and the usher will do anything. The sentence is incomplete but the sense is clear enough.

[2] get profit; get their living by.

[3] disseison See p. 1002, note 10; frank tenement free-hold possession (see p. 1002, note 10); imbolishing his credit destroying or utterly ruining his reputation.

[4] scrutine make an examination or investigation.

[5] I.e., as the foreman of the jury, he pronounces the sentence that the entire group has decided upon.

[6] seisin in frank tenement have the right to possess land as free-hold property (see p. 1002, note 10).

[7] Brute legendary great-grandson of Aeneas, hero of Virgil's Aeneid and equally legendary ancestor of the Romans. English historians in the Middle Ages and the Renaissance recount the story of Brute's exile from Rome, and his founding of Troynovant or New Troy, the earliest antecedent of London.

[8] of late time of recent days.

one that is not in any way to be preferred in equity before Cloth-breeches. [Therefore, in general verdict we adjudge Cloth-breeches][1] to have done him no wrong, but that he hath lawfully claimed his title of frank tenement, and in that we appoint him forever to be resident."

At this verdict pronounced by the knight, all the standers-by clapped their hands and gave a mighty shout, whereat I started and awaked, for I was in a dream and in my bed, and so rose up, and writ in a merry vein what you have heard.

FINIS

—1592

from A Disputation between a He Cony-Catcher and a She Cony-Catcher, Whether a Thief or a Whore Is Most Hurtful in Cozenage[2] to the Commonwealth.

Discovering the Secret Villainies of Alluring Strumpets. With the Conversion of an English Courtesan, Reformed This Present Year, 1592.[3]

To All Gentlemen, Merchants, Apprentices, and Country Farmers: Health.

Gentlemen, countrymen, and kind friends, for so I value all that are honest and enemies of bad actions, although in my books of cony-catching[4] I have discovered diverse forms of cozenings, and painted out both the sacking and crossbiting laws[5] which strumpets use to the destruction of the simple, yet willing to search all the substance as I have glanced at the shadow, and to enter into the nature of villainy as I have broached up[6] the secrets of vice, I have thought good to publish this dialogue or disputation between a he cony-catcher and a she cony-catcher, whether of them are most prejudicial to the commonwealth, discoursing the base qualities of them both, and discovering the inconvenience[7] that grows to men through the lightness of inconstant wantons, who, being wholly given to the spoil,[8] seek the ruin of such as light into their company. In this dialogue, loving countrymen, shall you find what prejudice ensues by haunting of whore-houses, what dangers grows by dallying with common harlots, what inconvenience follows the inordinate pleasures of unchaste libertines,[9] not only by their consuming of their wealth and impoverishment of their goods and lands, but to the great endangering of their health. For in conversing with them, they aim not simply at the loss of goods and blemish of their good names, but they fish for diseases, sickness, sores incurable, ulcers bursting out of the joints, and salt rheums, which by the humour of that villainy leapt from Naples into France, and from France into the bowels of England, which makes many cry out in their

---

[1] This part of the sentence has been dropped from the British Library copy, and has been inserted from the copy in the Huntington Library (STC 12301a).

[2] Cony-Catcher one who catches "conies" or dupes; a cheat, swindler, con-man; Cozenage the habit or practice of cozening or cheating; deception, fraud.

[3] The title page also includes two epigrams: "Read, laugh, and learn" and "Nascimur pro patria" (Latin, "We are born for our native land"). See p. 1005, note 1. The copy text is the Bodleian Library copy (Malone 574), reprinted by G.B. Harrison (1923).

[4] in my books of cony-catching Apart from those referred to in the head-note and the various notes following, Greene published The Second Part of Cony-catching (1591), The Third Part of Cony-Catching (1592), and The Defence of Cony-Catching. Or, a Confutation of Those Two Injurious Pamphlets Published by R.G. … by Cuthbert Cony-catcher (1592), which despite its title and attribution is widely believed to be Greene's work.

[5] the sacking and crossbiting laws In A Notable Discovery of Cozenage (1591), Greene offers "A table of the words of art, used in effecting these base villanies," including "sacking law" ("lechery"), and "crossbiting law" ("cozenage [deception] by whores"). "To crossbite" is to "bite the biter"; to cheat or deceive in return.

[6] broached up pierced or broken into, in order to liberate or extract something.

[7] inconvenience harm, injury; misfortune.

[8] spoil the action or practice of pillaging or plundering.

[9] libertines men who lead a dissolute, sexually-licentious life.

bones,[1] whilst Goodman Surgeon laughs in his purse: a thing to be feared as deadly while men live, as Hell is to be dreaded after death, for it not only infecteth the body, consumeth the soul, and waste wealth and worship, but engraves a perpetual shame in the forehead of the party so abused.[2] Whereof Master Higgins hath well written in his Mirror of Magistrates, in the person of Mempricaius exclaiming against harlots; the verses be these:

> Eschew vile Venus' toys (she cuts off age),
> And learn this lesson oft, and tell thy friend:
> By pox,[3] death sudden, begging, harlots end.

Besides, I have here laid open the wily wisdom of over-wise courtesans, that with their cunning can draw on not only poor novices, but such as hold themselves masters of their occupation. What flatteries they use to bewitch, what sweet words to inveigle, what simple holiness to entrap, what amorous glances, what smirking ocyliades,[4] what cringing courtesies, what stretching adios,[5] following a man like a blood-hound, with their eyes white, laying out of hair,[6] what frouncing[7] of tresses, what paintings, what ruffs, cuffs, and braveries,[8] and all to betray the eyes of the innocent novice, whom when they have drawn on to the bent of their bow,[9] they strip like the prodigal child, and turn out of doors like an outcast of the world.[10] The croco-

---

[1] All of these are symptoms of advanced syphilis, recounted most famously in the poem Syphilis, sive Morbus Gallicus ("Syphilis, or the French Disease"; 1530) by the Italian humanist Girolamo Fracastoro (?1478-1553). This poem (translated, 1685) also recounts the most popular theory of the origins and spread of syphilis. Although Fracastoro subscribes to a more complicated etiology, he recounts the rumour that Columbus's men contracted the disease in the New World, and when they returned home those who joined the French army that besieged and captured Naples in 1495 initiated the spread of this disease in Italy and France. According to Fracastoro, the French role in spreading syphilis led to its most common appellation: "the French disease." For a translation of these sections of the poem, see Source Book of Medical History, ed. L. Clendening (Dover, 1960), pp. 111-15; salt rheums watery matter secreted by the mucous glands or membranes; when abnormal, such rheums were supposed to cause disease; humour the peculiar or particular qualities of; cry out in their bones Aching or painful bones and joints were another symptom of various sexually-transmitted diseases.

[2] a reference to the scars produced by healed syphilitic sores, but also a fig. reference to the practice of branding a convicted criminal on the face or hand with the initial letter of his or her crime. This penalty was often used in conjunction with whipping, as part of the punishment for the crime of prostitution. However whipping and branding were also the punishments for all "rogues, vagabonds or sturdy beggars" (14 Eliz., c.5, § 2, 1572); thus, a mark of shame, stigma.

[3] Mempricaius Having murdered his brother to gain the crown, the early British king Mempricius (fl. c. 989 BCE) took up a life of increasing sexual excess, moving from taking his subjects' wives and daughters as his concubines to finally practising the "sin of sodomy." It is to this sexual practice specifically that Mempricius attributed his providential death: being torn apart by wolves. See L.B. Campbell, ed., Parts Added to The Mirror for Magistrates, by J. Higgins and T. Blenerhasset (Cambridge, 1946), ll. 110-12, p. 128. The second line in Campbell's edition reads: "And learn this lesson of [and teach] thy friend"; pox a general label applied to sexually-transmitted diseases, such as syphilis.

[4] ocyliades probably from the French, "oeillades," amorous or ogling glances. Cf. King Lear: "Strange oeilliades and most speaking looks" (4.4.25). .

[5] adios Spanish, "goodbye" or "farewell."

[6] with their eyes white referring to the phrase "to turn up the whites of one's eyes," which usually means that the person in question is putting on an affected and insincere devotion; laying out of hair i.e., instead of being modestly gathered up or contained under a cap, their hair is worn down and exposed to view, the sign of a whore. See R. Crowley's "The Woman's Lesson" in The Voice of the Last Trumpet (1549): "Let thine hair bear the same colour / That nature gave it to endure / Lay it not out as doth an whore / That would men's fantasies allure" (qtd. in S.W. Hull, Chaste, Silent and Obedient: English Books for Women, 1475-1640 [San Marino, CA, 1982], p. 54).

[7] frouncing frizzing or curling.

[8] paintings the colouring of the face with paint (cosmetics); braveries finery; fine clothes.

[9] drawn on to the bent of their bow i.e., lured on to (accord with) their will; brought under their control.

[10] like the prodigal child ... world Demanding his inheritance, the younger of two sons leaves his father's house and proceeds to waste all his money in dissolute living, finally being reduced to poverty and servitude. Penitent, he returns to his father intending to offer himself as a servant. The prodigal son's father, however, forgives him and rejoices over his return (Luke 15:11-32). Although "The Geneva Bible" and the RSV describe the prodigal son as having "devoured" his father's "goods with harlots" (Luke 15:30), the image of the harlots consuming the prodigal son's wealth and, when all his money is gone, stripping him of his clothes and casting him out naked into the world occurs only in popular medieval retellings of the parable (R. Helgerson, Elizabethan Prodigals [Berkeley, 1976], p. 99).

dile hath not more tears,[1] Proteus[2] more shape[s], Janus more faces,[3] the Hieria[4] more sundry tunes to entrap the passengers than our English courtesans—to be plain, our English whores—to set on fire the hearts of lascivious and gazing strangers. These common, or rather consuming, strumpets, whose throats are softer than oil, and yet whose steps lead unto death,[5] they have their ruffians to rifle,[6] when they cannot fetch over with other cunning, their crossbiters attending upon them, their foists, their bufts, their nips,[7] and such like. Being waited on by these villains, as by ordinary servants, so that who thinks himself wise enough to escape their flatteries, him they crossbite; who holds himself to rule, to be bitten with a counterfeit apparitor,[8] him they rifle; if he be not so to be verst upon,[9] they have a foist or a nip upon him, and so sting him to the quick. Thus, he that meddles with pitch cannot but be defiled,[10] and he that acquainteth himself or converseth with any of these cony-catching strumpets cannot but by some way or other be brought to confusion:[11] for either he must hazard his soul, blemish his good name, lose his goods, light upon diseases, or at the least have been tied to the humour of a harlot, whose quiver is open to every arrow, who likes all that have fat purses, and loves none that are destitute of pence. I remember a monk in diebus illis,[12] writ his opinion of the end of an adulterer, thus:

Quatuor his casibus sine dubio cadet adulter,
Aut hic pauper erit, aut hic subito morietur,
Aut cadet in causum qua debet iudice vinci,
Aut aliquod membrum casu vell crimine perdet,[13]

Which I Englished thus:

---

[1] The crocodile hath not more tears The crocodile was said to weep, either to allure a man for the purpose of devouring him, or while (or after) devouring him; hence fig. someone who grieves hypocritically or with a malicious purpose.

[2] Proteus a sea-god, shepherd of Neptune's sea-creatures; as a reward for Proteus' services, Neptune gave him the power of prophecy and shape-shifting.

[3] Janus Roman god of doorways, city gates, thresholds, and (by association) new beginnings. Traditionally represented with two faces looking in opposite directions, Janus had a reputation for being an untrustworthy protector of his human supplicators.

[4] Hieria Greene is clearly referring to the mythical Sirens, a group of sea nymphs whose singing was so enthralling that listeners would become entranced; losing themselves in the music, they would finally starve to death because they forgot to eat. They appear most famously in Homer's Odyssey. Since "hieria" is neither a Greek nor Latin word for these creatures, this may be a printer's error for "hyena," a creature who was in the period thought to have "a certain magical virtue" or "wonderful power [...] in transporting the mind of man or woman, and ravishing their sense so, as that it will allure them unto her very strangely." Although it is not its voice which accomplishes this effect, the hyena was thought to use this mysterious power to bring down the hunter, who became so "intoxicate in his brain, that he is not able to bear his head nor sit his horse, but to fall from his back" (Pliny, Natural History, 2.311). Greene describes the prostitute Lamilia as a "hyena" in Greene's Groatsworth of Wit.

[5] "For the lips of a loose woman drip honey, and her speech is smoother than oil; but in the end she is bitter as wormwood, sharp as a two-edged sword. Her feet go down to death; her steps follow the path to Sheol [i.e., Hell or the world of the dead]" (Proverbs 5:3-5).

[6] ruffians those habitually given to acts of violence or crime; cut-throat villains. Although according to the OED the more specific meaning of "the protector or confederate of courtesans" only comes into use around 1618, clearly the implication here is that if the prostitutes cannot through cunning relieve customers of their money, they have male accomplices lying in wait to use more persuasive methods; to rifle to despoil, plunder, or rob (a person) in a thorough fashion, especially by searching his pockets or clothes.

[7] crossbiters those who "bite the biters"; those who cheat in return or cheat by outwitting, gulling, or deceiving. In Notable Discovery of Cozenage (1591), the crossbiter is a participant in "cozenage by whores" whereby "base rogues [...] doth consent, nay constrain their wives to yield the use of their bodies to other men, that taking them together, he may crossbite the party of all the crowns he can presently make" (40); foist pickpocket; buft bully or harlot's protector (Partridge, Wordsworth Dictionary of the Underworld, p. 80); nip cutpurse (in the period, people would often carry their money in a bag or "purse," attached to a belt or "girdle"; a nip would steal a purse by cutting it away from its belt).

[8] apparitor an officer of a civil court.

[9] verst upon imposed upon; cheated.

[10] Proverb, "He that touches pitch shall be defiled" (Tilley P358).

[11] confusion overthrow, ruin, destruction.

[12] in diebus illis Latin, "in those days" (i.e., in earlier or former times).

[13] attributed to St. Augustine (S. Singer, Thesaurus proverbiorum medii aevi, vol. 2 [Lexicon der Sprichwörter des romanisch-germanischen Mittelalters, Band 2: Bisan-erbauen] "Ehebrecher(isch) S. EHEBRUCH adultère/adultery." Walter de Gruyter, 1995).

He that to harlots' lures do yield him thrall
Through sour misfortune to bad end shall fall:
Or sudden death, or beggary shall him chance,
Or guilt before a judge his shame enhance:
Or else by fault or fortune he shall leese,[1]
Some member sure escape from one of these.

Seeing then such inconvenience grows from the caterpillars of the commonwealth,[2] and that a multitude of the monsters here about London, particularly and generally abroad in England, to the great overthrow of many simple men that are inveigled by their flatteries, I thought good not only to discover their villainies in a dialogue, but also to manifest by an example how prejudicial their life is to the state of the land, that such as are warned by an instance may learn and look before they leap.[3] To that end, kind countrymen, I have set down at the end of the disputation the wonderful[4] life of a courtesan, not a fiction but a truth of one that yet lives, but[5] now in another form repentant. In the discourse of whose life, you shall see how dangerous such trulls[6] be to all estates that be so simple as to trust their feigned subtleties. Here shall parents learn how hurtful it is to cocker up[7] their youth in their follies, and have a deep insight how to bridle their daughters, if they see them any ways grow wantons, wishing therefore my labours may be a caveat[8] to my countrymen to avoid the company of such cozening courtesans.

Farewell.
R.G.

A Disputation between Laurence,[9] a Foist and Fair Nan, a Traffic,[10] Whether a Whore or a Thief Is Most Prejudicial.[11]

[...]

NAN: Oh, swear not so deeply, but let me first hear what you can say for yourself.

LAURENCE: What? Why, more, Nan, than can be painted out in a great volume, but briefly this: I need not describe the laws of villainy, because R.G. hath so amply penned them down in "The First Part of Cony-catching"[12] that though I be one of the faculty yet I cannot discover more than he hath laid open. Therefore, first to the gentlemen foist. I pray you what finer quality? what art is more excellent either to try the ripeness of the wit, or the agility of the hand, than that for him that will be master of his trade must pass[13] the proudest juggler alive the points of leger de maine?[14] He must have an eye to spy the bung or purse, and then a heart to dare to attempt it (for this by the way, he that fears the gallows shall never be good thief while he lives); he must as the cat watch for a mouse, and walk Paul's, Westminster, the Exchange, and such common haunted[15] places, and 1 leese lose.

---

2 caterpillars ... commonwealth rapacious persons; extortioners; here, more specifically, people who prey on society. The image is a common one for those individuals who undermine the nation. See Shakespeare, Richard II, 2.3.164-65 and 3.4.40-47.

3 look before they leap Proverb (Tilley L429).

4 wonderful exciting astonishment or wonder.

5 in the copytext, "not," clearly a printer's error.

6 trulls low prostitutes; drabs, strumpets.

7 cocker up bring up indulgently and luxuriously.

8 caveat warning, caution, or admonition.

9 In The Second and Last Part of Cony-Catching (1591), Greene identifies him as Laurence Pickering, "a notable foist" and an important member of Elizabethan London's criminal underworld. Greene represents his house as a place where this criminal "corporation" or "company" had "their feasts and weekly meetings" (p. 36). Whether Pickering was an actual person or a fictional creation is uncertain.

10 Traffic In "crossbiting law" or "cozenage by whores," the "traffic" is the prostitute used by a group of cony-catchers as the lure in blackmailing schemes (Greene, Notable Discovery of Cozenage, pp. 40-51).

11 Nan and Laurence have agreed that the winner of their debate will buy supper.

12 Notable Discovery of Cozenage (1591) was Greene's first pamphlet on the criminal underworld and its practices.

13 pass i.e., surpass.

14 leger de maine French, "léger de main," literally "light of hand"; legerdemain, sleight of hand, trickery.

15 Westminster here, Westminster Hall as a court of justice, although contemporary accounts describe it as a place to transact business, meet friends, and buy goods (such as books and clothes); the Exchange the Royal Exchange, where London merchants would assemble for the transaction of business; haunted frequented by many people; much resorted to.

there have a curious eye to[1] the person, whether he be gentleman, citizen, or farmer, and note either where his bung[2] lies, whether in his hose or pockets, and then dog the party into a press,[3] where his staul[4] with heaving and shoving shall so molest him that he shall not feel when we strip him of his bung, although it be never so fast or cunningly couched[5] about him. What poor farmer almost can come to plead his case at the bar, to attend upon his lawyers at the bench, but look he never so narrowly to it we have his purse, wherein some time there is fat purchase, £20 or £30? And I pray you how long would one of your traffics be earning so much with your chamber work? Besides in fairs and markets and in the circuits after judges,[6] what infinite money is gotten from honest-meaning men, that either busy about their necessary affairs or carelessly looking to their crowns light amongst us that be foists. Tush, we dissemble in show, we go so neat in apparel, so orderly in outward appearance, some like lawyers' clerks, others like servingmen, that attended there about their masters' business, that we are hardly smoked,[7] versing upon[8] all men with kind courtesies and fair words, and yet being so warily watchful that a good purse cannot be put up[9] in a fair but we sigh if we share it not amongst us. And though the books of cony-catching hath somewhat hindered us and brought many brave foists to the halter,[10] yet some of our country farmers, nay of our gentlemen and citizens, are so careless in a throng of people that they show us the prey, and so draw on a thief, and bequeath us their purses, whether we will or no. For who loves wine so ill that he will not eat grapes if they fall into his mouth? And who is so base that if he see a pocket fair before him will not foist in[11] if he may, or if foisting will not serve, use his knife and nip, for although there be some foists that will not use their knives, yet I hold him not a perfect workman or master of his mystery[12] that will not cut a purse as well as foist a pocket, and hazard any limb for so sweet a gain as gold.[13] How answer you me this brief objection, Nan? Can you compare with either our cunning to get, our gains in purchase?

NAN: And have you no stronger arguments, Goodman Laurence, to argue your excellency in villainy but this? Then in faith put up your pipes,[14] and give me leave to speak! Your chop-logic[15] hath no great subtlety, for simple you reason of foisting, and appropriate that to yourselves, to you men I mean, as though there were not women foists and nips as neat in that trade as you, of as good an eye, as fine and nimble a hand, and of as resolute a heart. Yes, Laurence, and your good mistresses in that mystery,[16] for we without like suspicion can pass in your walks under the colour of simplicity to Westminster, with a paper in our hand, as if we were distressed women that had some supplication to put up to the judges, or some bill of information to deliver to our lawyers, when, God wot, we shuffle in for a bung[17] as well as the best of you all, yea as yourself Laurence, though you be called King of Cutpurses; for though they smoke[18] you, they will hardly mistrust us, and sup-

[1] have a curious eye to i.e., be attentive, careful, accurate in the observation or investigation of.

[2] bung (also bong, boong, boung): a purse.

[3] dog the party into a press i.e., follow the person so singled-out into a crowd.

[4] staul stale or stall: a pickpocket's helper who distracts the attention of the victim whose pocket is being rifled. Greene defines the "stale" as "he that faceth the man" (i.e., the victim). See Notable Discovery of Cozenage (1591), p. 39.

[5] fast securely; couched concealed.

[6] the circuits after judges A circuit is the journey of a judge through a certain appointed area for the purpose of holding court; the visitation of the judge for holding assizes.

[7] we are hardly smoked we are scarcely or with difficulty suspected.

[8] versing upon imposing upon, tricking, swindling.

[9] put up put away, stowed away.

[10] halter noose.

[11] foist in thrust (his) hand into a pocket.

[12] mystery a "secret" or highly technical operation in a trade or art; thus, more generally, a handicraft, craft, art; (one's) trade, profession, or calling.

[13] The punishment for theft could include the loss of a hand or other limb.

[14] put up your pipes Stop talking! Shut up!

[15] chop-logic sophistical or contentious argument.

[16] I.e., and we are your superiors in that profession, trade, or art.

